door further south than the buggy, to make a purchase. Upon coming out he got into the buggy and drove off. He wished to go north on that street, and in order to do so it was necessary for him to cross to the other side of the street, turning his horse and buggy around in the operation so as to face them north. Accordingly he started to drive in a course curving to the east and north and crossing the car track so as to bring his horse to the east side of the street and east of the car track with its head to the north. He got the horse and all of the buggy, except the left hind wheel, across the track, when the defendant's car, which was going south, struck that wheel with such force that it was broken to pieces, and the plaintiff Jennie R. Scott was thrown out and severely injured. The buggy had immovable side curtains so placed that the driver, while in the usual position, could not readily look to the rear. While Scott was in the hat store, the car in question had come from the north, and had stopped at the corner on Orange street south of State street. As Scott came out of the store and walked northerly to his buggy, the car was standing at the corner in plain sight and in line with his buggy. He looked both ways as he got into the buggy. The evidence is not clear on this point, but the jury may justly have inferred the fact. However, he did not observe the car, and it must be conceded that he did not look with care. There is a conflict of evidence upon the question whether the car had started south or was standing motionless at the corner at the time he made this observation, got into the buggy, and started to make the turn to the north. Gaylord testified that he was standing on the east side of Orange street to the north and rear of the car; that when he first noticed it the car was just a trifle from the corner of State street in motion, going south; that he next observed a horse coming across the track to the south of the car, with a buggy attached; that the car was then about two car lengths (78 feet) from the horse, and could not have more than started from the corner. If this was true, the car must have been standing still when the horse started. Meek, who was on the car, testified that the car was standing at the corner when the buggy started. Smith, for the defense, testified that the car was just starting in motion as he saw Scott start across the track, which, of course, was some seconds after Scott started from the side of the street, if the witness is to be taken literally. Some of the statements of these witnesses on cross-examination might be construed to be inconsistent with this testimony, but the apparent inconsistency may easily be reconciled. There was other evidence indicating that the car started before Scott did; but, as we must view the case, the fact was established that he started while the car was standing still upon the track, with the front end 59 feet from the point where he must cross the track. He did not observe the car when he started; but, as he would have seen it if he had looked attentively, his conduct must be judged as if he had seen it there standing, and had then started to cross in front of it.

The evidence further shows that he listened attentively while crossing the track, and heard no gong or sound of car wheels; that he was slightly dull of hearing, but not hard of hearing; that he could not see far toward the rear of the buggy from his position in the buggy; that when he got on the track he had turned sufficiently to see down the street a little farther in the direction from which the car was coming, but saw no car approaching; that he first saw the car after his horse was across the track and had turned to the north, and while his hind wheel was still on the track. The car was then some 10 or 12 feet away, and he urged his horse ahead to get the buggy out of the way of the car, and thought he was going to get clear. As it was, the car barely caught the hind wheel. The car did not slacken its speed until it struck the wheel or until it was within 5 or 6 feet of it. The evidence shows that the motorman did not see the buggy nor make any effort to stop the car until his attention was called to it by others in the car about the time it struck the buggy, and that he then stopped it within a distance variously estimated at from 6 to 15 feet. The car was then going up a slight ascending grade at the speed of four miles an hour, according to the estimate of most of the witnesses. There was evidence of actual observation, showing that the cars, when running at practically the same speed, covered the distance of 59 feet from the place of starting to the point of collision in six seconds, actual time, or at an average speed of 6.7 miles an hour. This would be fully as satisfactory as estimates of eyewitnesses. As it was at rest at the beginning, it might be inferred from this that the speed gradually increased from nothing at the start to a rate much faster than the average speed, and that it was going at this rapid rate when the collision occurred. It was upon the busiest street in Redlands, and at the busiest time of the day. Other teams were on the street in that block at the time, and another car was standing at the next corner to the south. It was customary at that time of day for cars going south on Orange street to stop on the south side of State street to let off passengers. Some teams standing on the east side of Orange street prevented plaintiff from going straight across the track, compelling him to turn in closer to the rails than he otherwise would.

It is the law that one walking or driving in a public street is bound to use reasonable care to look and listen as he goes, so as to be able to avoid collisions with others exercising the common privilege of using the street. This duty is not confined to persons driving or about to drive upon a street car track. It rests alike upon every person while in a public street. It is as obligatory upon the motorman propelling a car as upon the footman, horseman, and driver. In determining whether or not he will cross such a street at any given time and place, one may, and often must, act upon the theory that he has an equal right with others, and upon the belief and expectation that others as well as himself will use the reasonable care that the situation requires, and that, while he is necessarily looking out ahead to avoid running down any person on the street and to guide himself or his team, others approaching him from the side will in like manner look out ahead and avoid a collision with him. A street car cannot go on the street except upon its rails, and hence it has the better right to that space, to which others must yield when necessary; but otherwise its rights are not superior to that of any other person who has occasion to use the street. Shea v. Potrero, etc., Co., 44 Cal. 414; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 280, 55 Pac. 908. The reasonable care which is required must be measured by all these conditions, rights, and circumstances. The foot passenger or driver of a horse has a right to expect that those in charge of street cars will operate them in the manner and run them at the speed which is customary at the particular place, and that they will give the usual warnings and signals, and take the usual precautions to avoid injury to others. Orcutt v. Pac. C. R. Co., 85 Cal. 299, 24 Pac. 661; Driscoll v. Cable R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203. In a crowded street it is often necessary and not inconsistent with reasonable prudence for a person to cross the street in front of street cars, in motion or at rest, at a point so near that it would be prima facie an act of negligence, if attempted at another place where the streets are less crowded and the cars usually run faster. The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty toward others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time. Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 277, 55 Pac. 908.

Assuming, therefore, that George H. Scott did see the car standing at the corner of State street, and apparently about to start south, and that he thereupon started to drive across the street to turn northward, as he did, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that it was a negligent act. People do the same thing every day under similar conditions in every city. It cannot be said that an act which the majority of men would do in the existing circumstances, and which we may presume is usually done in safety, is negligence per se. "It falls within the province of the jury, not only to determine the facts constituting negligence, but also the question as to what would be the conduct of a person of ordinary prudence, under similar circumstances, which commonly is a question of fact, not of law. In general, all these questions are for the jury, whose verdict in favor of the plaintiff must be regarded as conclusive, unless the validity of the defense, both as to the existence of the negligence and its effect as contributing proximately to the injury, follows necessarily from the undisputed facts." Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 488, 86 Pac. 737. "It cannot be said that a person is guilty of contributory negligence merely because he attempts to cross a street railway when a car is approaching. If that were so, he could never attempt to cross such a track in the crowded parts of a city where there is practically always an approaching car; and, in such case, as street cars go at a comparatively low rate of speed and are quickly stopped, the question of negligence would depend on the proximity or remoteness of the car, and upon all the other circumstances surrounding the occurrence. In such a situation the traveler cannot be held to exercise the very highest prudence and judgment. It is sufficient if he exercises that degree of care and prudence and good sense which men who possess those qualities in an ordinary or average degree exercise." Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 278, 55 Pac. 908.

It may be conceded that the failure of Scott to observe the car standing at the corner ready to start at the time he started to make the turn was negligence. But the jury would have been justified in finding that; even if he had seen the car, it was not negligence for him to attempt to cross in front of it, and they may rightly have concluded that his negligent failure to perceive it did not contribute to the injury. Their verdict compels us to assume that they took that view. A negligent act or omission "must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action or damages can be founded upon it." McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 486, 42 Pac. 981.

With respect to his failure after he got upon the track to lean forward and look toward the car to see if it was approaching before he was so far turned as to be able to see it from his position in the buggy, we are of the opinion that the question whether or not he exercised ordinary prudence was also for the jury to decide. The car, according to its custom, would not be going at full speed at that point. It was on an ascending grade, equipped with air brakes, and could be quickly stopped. It was the motorman's duty to keep watch ahead of his car for vehicles, and it is to be presumed that he usually did his duty in that respect. Scott found other teams obstructing his course and requiring his attention to avoid them. It is not clear from the evidence that, even if he had looked when upon the track and had seen the car approaching, he would or should have anticipated the acceleration of its speed which the evidence indicates may have been given to it, or the culpable carelessness of the motorman in running the car at that speed in such a place without looking ahead, or that, from all the circumstances as then presented to his mind, reasonable prudence would have required greater effort in urging his horse forward, or a change in its course. He cannot be charged with negligence per se, under all the circumstances, unless we are prepared to say that in the crowded streets of a city one who presumes to drive in front of a street car just starting from a corner is guilty of negligence in law, if he does not expect and use due care to guard against the gross and culpable negligence of a motorman in propelling his car along the street in utter disregard of the safety of others. We should have to license those in charge of the cars at such places to act with the utmost recklessness, to the end that the travelers who failed to anticipate and avoid the danger therefrom could be charged with contributory negligence, and the company thereby escape liability. The greater their negligence, the better their defense. Whatever the rule may be with regard to the right of travelers at steam railroad crossings, reason and authority require that in the crowded streets of a city, where their rights are equal, the rule should be that a traveler has the right to assume until his senses, exercised with reasonable diligence, inform him to the contrary, that the persons operating street cars will use ordinary care, give the usual signals, and keep the usual lookout ahead. Driscoll v. Cable R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 567, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; Strong v. S. & P. R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 328; Shearman and R. on Neg. § 31.

It is unnecessary to discuss at length the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the negligence of the motorman. Out of his own mouth he stands convicted. Conceding that the actions of the horses standing in front of the store at his left attracted his attention in that direction, it did not justify him in proceeding blindly up the street without looking ahead or slackening his speed. In response to an interrogatory the jury found specially that the motorman, after he discovered the dangerous position of plaintiffs, used ordinary care, with the appliances under his control, to prevent the collision. As this issue was determined in favor of the defendant, it is unnecessary to consider the refusal of the court to give instructions relating to the conduct of the motorman at that time. Such ruling must necessarily have been harmless in view of the instructions given.

The defendant asked the following instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence that defendant's employes in charge of the car at the time of the collision, as soon as they discovered the dangerous position of plaintiffs, used ordinary care to prevent the collision, the defendant would not be liable for the result of any collision which might have been prevented if such employes had been possessed at that time of other appliances for preventing the collision which they did not possess." The court gave it; but added the following: "Unless a mere running of the car without having it provided with such additional appliances, if there were any, would in itself have amounted to wanton and reckless conduct, on the part of the defendant." We do not think there was any error in this of which the defendant can complain.

The complaint alleged that the plaintiffs had suffered damage to the amount of $14,000 by reason of the injuries to Mrs. Scott, and to the extent of $1,000 by reason of expenses in curing her hurts. There was no evidence of any expense. The answer denied that plaintiffs had, by reason of the collision, sustained any damage in excess of $1,000. The verdict fixed the damages at $1,500. The court instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiffs, the verdict should be "in such sum as damages, not exceeding the sum of $15,000 asked for in the complaint, as may have been sustained by them on account of said collision." The defendant urges this as a prejudicial error, as from the evidence the plaintiffs were not entitled to more than $14,000. The jury, in other instructions, were directed to estimate the damages "from the facts and circumstances in evidence," that in determining the amount "they should take into consideration all the facts and evidence before them," and that, if they found for the plaintiffs, "the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant such damages as you may find from the evidence" plaintiffs have sustained by reason of the accident. It is clear that the jury must have understood that they were not authorized to give damages for expenses which were alleged but not proven, and, hence, they must have entirely disregarded the claim for expenses. And as the verdict was much less than the $14,000 claimed for the personal injury to Mrs. Scott, it is plain that the error in stating it as $15,000 did not injure defendant.

There are no other points of sufficient importance to require notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW — RIGHTS OF HEIRS.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by Edward Quigley McCaughey and others against Alexander Lyall and others to have it adjudicated that plaintiffs were the owners of an undivided half of certain land, and recover possession thereof. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

McNutt & Hamon and Wm. G. Griffith, for appellants. B. F. Thomas and W. P. Butcher, for respondents. H. J. Finger, pro se.

McFARLAND, J. George McCaughey died intestate on March 1, 1890. The plaintiffs are his children and heirs at law. During his lifetime, on June 6, 1889, the deceased executed a mortgage on certain land to one H. J. Finger to secure a promissory note for $500, which was due and unpaid at the death of the decedent. After his death Susan McCaughey was duly appointed and qualified as administratrix of his estate. The note and mortgage were duly presented to the administratrix, and were allowed by her and approved by the probate judge. In January, 1894, Finger commenced an action against the administratrix to foreclose the mortgage, but did not make plaintiffs parties to such action. Such proceedings were had that a judgment of foreclosure was regularly rendered under which the land was duly sold by the sheriff on April 10, 1895, to defendant Lyall, who in due time received a sheriff's deed therefor. Several years afterwards this present action was brought by said heirs to have it adjudicated cated that they are the owners of an undivided one-half of the said land, that the claim of the defendants thereto be adjudged null and void, and that plaintiffs recover the possession of the land, etc. A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed by the defendant Lyall and by other defendants. The demurrers were sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to amend, judgment was rendered for defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

The point relied on by appellants for reversal is that the judgment in the foreclosure suit was null and void as against them, because they were not made parties to that suit, and were not given notice of its pendency. Counsel for appellants say in their brief: "This cause is brought here for the purpose of having reviewed a single question arising from the record. This question is best suggested by the inquiry, can the heir at law be divested of the title which the law casts upon him at the death of his intestate ancestor by any proceeding to which he is not made a party? This court has more than once decided the question in the affirmative. We believe the decisions are wrong in the particulars to which we shall presently advert, and we, therefore, shall respectfully urge that they be overruled and the right rule of the law established." This statement and admission make it unnecessary for us to review the former decisions of this court to show that they do establish the law in the manner as admitted by appellants. Some of the cases are these: Cunningham v. Ashley, 45 Cal. 485; Bayly v. Muehe, 65 Cal. 345, 3 Pac. 467, 4 Pac. 486; Finger v. McCaughey, 119 Cal. 59, 51 Pac. 13; Dickey v. Gibson, 121 Cal. 276, 53 Pac. 704. In these cases it is held that, in an action to enforce claims and liens against an estate where the same might have been maintained against the deceased, if living, the only necessary party defendant is the administrator; and as those decisions have established a rule of property under which no doubt many titles are held, we have no disposition at this time to review the question again and consider the correctness of those decisions. It is clearly a matter to which the rule of stare decisis should apply.

Appellants contend that the former decisions should not be taken as final because, if the construction which they give to certain sections of the Code, and particularly section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are correct, then those sections are unconstitutional as violative of section 13, article 1, of the Constitution of this state, which declares that no one can be deprived of property "without due process of law," which they say includes "notice" to the person who is to be deprived of property. The fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution is also invoked. As our state Constitution does not deal in any way with heirship and descents and distributions of estates. It is somewhat difficult to imagine how, on that subject, any constitutional question can be discovered or invented. At all events we see none here. The Legislature had full control of the whole subject, and the rights of an heir are merely those which he takes under legislative provision. The right to be an heir at all comes from the Legislature. Now the Code, which provides that upon the death of the ancestor the title to his land vests immediately in the heirs, has many other provisions which limit and qualify that title and subject it to many conditions deemed proper for the settlement of estates. There is no doubt that the Legislature has the power to provide that in suits for the enforcement of claims and liens against the estate only the administrator need be made a party defendant; and that is exactly what the Legislature did by section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as decided by the former decisions. Counsel contends that this construction of the section is wrong; but no constitutional question arises. The Legislature has also, beyond doubt, the power to declare that in proceedings against an estate like those above mentioned the heir should be represented by the administrator and therefore not entitled to notice; and the former decisions declare that such, under the law, is the rule. Counsel claim that this decision is also wrong; but still no constitutional question arises. The heir takes, subject to the conditions imposed by the statutory law, which alone gives him any right at all.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Franklin R. Spencer against J. O. McCament. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Simpson (H. G. Simpson, of counsel), for appellant. D. Z. Gardner and Thos. L. Neal, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The contract, dated November 9, 1905, is set out in hæc verba in the complaint. The consideration for the purchase was $1,350. The sum of $50 was paid upon execution of the contract, which provided that $100 was to be paid upon the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient deed, and $600 on or before one year from date, and $600 on or before two years from date. It was also provided that, if the remaining payments be not made according to this agreement and contract, the above-mentioned deposit of $50 should be forfeited without recourse. The contract also contained the following clause: "This sale is on the condition that the planing mill and appurtenances shall be moved from the north side of Center street within 30 days."

Plaintiff alleges that on December 7, 1905, he paid the $100 mentioned in the contract, and duly performed on his part all of the conditions of said contract, but that defendant refuses to make the conveyance of the property in accordance with said contract. The answer denies the payment of $100, denies that plaintiff removed said planing mill within 30 days, as agreed, and sets up affirmative matters to the effect that there was made contemporaneously with said written contract an oral agreement, whereby plaintiff covenanted as a part of the consideration for said purchase, that he would erect and operate said planing mill upon the land so purchased, provided he could obtain a license so to do from the proper city authorities. It is further alleged that this part of the agreement relating to the erection and operation of the said planing mill upon the lands purchased was, through inadvertence and mistake, omitted from the written contract; and defendant asks that the contract be reformed by inserting the same therein, and alleges that plaintiff has not erected and operated said planing mill upon said land so agreed to be conveyed.

1. The opinion of the trial judge, to which appellant devotes a great part of his argument, constitutes no part of the record on appeal. Assuming the reasons assigned for his rulings to be erroneous, error cannot be predicated thereon. Higgins v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 4 Cal. App. 722, 91 Pac. 344. Whatever views the trial court may have entertained with reference to the propriety of admitting testimony in support of the alleged contemporaneous oral agreement and its omission from the written contract, it nevertheless appears from the record that all evidence offered in support thereof was received, and that such testimony was contradicted by the defendant, and a finding made thereon.

2. There was no error in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff made out a prima facie case, showing that he had fully complied with the provisions of the written contract, as set out in his complaint, except as to the provision relating to the removal of the planing mill within 30 days. Upon this point the evidence shows that defendant had some 6 days before the expiration of the time, at plaintiff's request, extended the time within which to make the removal, and that plaintiff relied upon the extension so granted, and did not remove the mill until several days after the 30-day period had expired. This was sufficient to constitute an estoppel against defendant from exacting a strict performance of the contract in this respect.

3. The $100 called for in the contract was paid to one Wilson, who signed a receipt therefor as agent of defendant. The purchase had been made through him, and the deposit of $50 paid to him. It seems immaterial, however, whether or not he was such agent, for it appears that he deposited the $100 in bank to defendant's account, of which fact defendant had notice.

There is a substantial conflict of evidence as to all the issues, and for that reason alone, if for no other, the conclusions of the trial court must be affirmed.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITE et al. (Cr. 64.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.)

Dec. 10, 1907.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES—SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION—REPRESENTATION CONCERNING EXISTING CONTRACTS.

An information for obtaining money under false pretenses alleged that defendants, intending by false representations to obtain money of F., fraudulently represented to him that a certain company was a responsible corporation, and that it would pay F. $100 upon receiving from him $1 per week for 65 consecutive weeks, that certain contracts between the company and F. were payable in $100 at the end of 65 consecutive weekly payments of $1, that F. believed the false representations and paid defendants money on the strength thereof. Held that, as the only fair inference from the allegations as to the contracts referred to is that they had already been executed by F., defendants' representations were concerning existing contracts, and did not constitute the obtaining of money by false pretenses.

2. SAME—CONNECTION BETWEEN FALSE REPRESENTATIONS AND DELIVERY OF MONEY.

The information was insufficient, since no natural connection appeared between the representations charged to have been made by defendants and the delivery of the money to them and no connection was shown, inasmuch as it was not alleged that defendants had any connection with the company, nor that F. was induced to contract with it, nor that he had entered into the contracts described or any others by reason of defendants' representations, nor that the money was paid defendants under such contracts, nor for the company.

3. SAME—REQUISITES OF INFORMATION.

An information for obtaining money under false pretenses must show that it was obtained by the false pretenses alleged; and, where there appears to be no natural connection between the pretenses and the delivery of the money, the necessary additional facts must be alleged to show the relation, and a failure to show the connection is a material defect which is not cured by verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

J. L. White and another were prosecuted for obtaining money under false pretenses. From an order sustaining demurrers to the information, the people appeal. Affirmed.

Attorney General Webb, for appellant. Hiram W. Johnson, Aitken & Skafte, and Walter Gallagher, for respondents.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by the people from an order sustaining the demurrers of the defendants to an information drawn under section 532 of the Penal Code, and comes before us upon a bill of exceptions duly settled. The defendants were jointly charged, but demurred separately, the demurrers being both general and special.

We think the demurrers were properly sustained by the trial court. The information is quite long, and we do not think it necessary to set it out at length in order to make clear the point involved in the attack on the information. In substance it is alleged that the defendants, intending by false and fraudulent representations to obtain the personal property and money of J. M. Furrer, with intent to cheat and defraud said Furrer of the same, did "willfully and unlawfully, knowingly and designedly, falsely and fraudulently, pretend and represent to said J. M. Furrer that the Mutual Mercantile Company was a responsible business corporation, doing business at No. 121 Geary street, in the city and county of San Francisco; that the Mutual Mercantile Company would pay to the said J. M. Furrer one hundred dollars ($100) in lawful money of the United States of America, upon receiving from him one dollar ($1.00) in lawful money of the United States of America a week for sixty-five consecutive weeks; that certain contracts in said Mutual Mercantile Company, known as 'Series A,' and numbered 198, 199, 200, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, and 271, between the said Mutual Mercantile Company and the said J. M. Furrer were each payable in the sum of one hundred dollars ($100.00) in lawful money of the United States of America at the end of sixty-five (65) consecutive weekly payments of one dollar ($1.00) in lawful money of the United States of America each." Here follow other representations affecting the responsibility of said company, followed by proper allegations of the falsity of the various pretenses and representations, and of the knowledge thereof of defendants. It is then in substance alleged that said Furrer believed said false representations and pretenses, and was induced thereby to deliver to, and did deliver to the defendants at the city and county of San Francisco, $87 during the months of May and June, in the year 1905, of the money of said Furrer.

It is nowhere alleged in the information that the defendants had any connection with the Mutual Mercantile Company, or that said Furrer was induced to enter into any contract or business relation with said company. It is not alleged that said Furrer entered into the contracts described, or any contracts with said company, by reason of such representations, nor does it appear that the money alleged to have been paid to defendants was paid on or under such contracts, or for said company. The only fair inference from the allegations of the information is that the contracts referred to, "numbered 198, 199, 200, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, and 271, between the said Mutual Mercantile Company and the said J. M. Furrer," had already been entered into by said Furrer. In this respect the representation was concerning certain contracts "between the said Mutual Mercantile Company and the said J. M. Furrer." In other words, defendants' representations were concerning existing contracts.

From this analysis of the information it is apparent that there does not appear to be any natural connection between the representations charged to have been made by the defendants and the delivery of the money to defendants. The representations were concerning a company with which it is not alleged that defendants had any connection, nor with which said Furrer entered into any relations because of said representations. "The indictment must show that the property was obtained by means of the false pretense alleged. Accordingly, when there appears to be no natural connection between the pretense and the delivery of the property, such additional facts as are necessary to show the relation must be alleged. A defect in the indictment arising from failure to show the connection between the false pretense and the obtaining is a material one, and it is not cured by verdict." 19 Cyc. 429, and numerous authorities cited under note 37.

Roper v. State, 58 N. J. Law, 420, 33 Atl. 969, is a case quite like the one at bar. The indictment charged that Roper made certain false representations to John J. Renshaw concerning the financial responsibility of the Mutual Land & Building Syndicate, which representations were properly set forth and negatived. It was then in the usual form alleged that thereby Roper obtained from Renshaw $3,000. The court said: "If it be true, as stated, that Renshaw, the person defrauded, parted with his money to the defendant merely because the latter falsely asserted and represented that a certain association, with which neither he nor the defendant had any apparent connection, had a genuine existence, the inducement to his act was not what the law regards as a false pretense. * * * If A. should falsify in stating to B. that C. was a man of property, such fabrication would not per se in any conceivable way induce B. to part with his property to A. And yet this is the entire criminal case made in this indictment."

So in the case at bar Furrer parted with his money to defendants because defendants made representations as to the responsibility of a third party with which defendants had no apparent connection, and with which Furrer entered into no connection, contractual or otherwise, by reason of the representations. In Hurst v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 196, 45 S. W. 573, it was held that an indictment for swindling by false representations concerning a collecting agency was insufficient because it did not appear that defendant had any connection with the agency.

In none of the cases cited by appellant concerning the sufficiency of the indictment (People v. Jordan, 66 Cal. 11, 4 Pac. 773, 56 Am. Rep. 73; People v. Wasservogle, 77 Cal. 175, 19 Pac. 270; People v. Cadot, 138 Cal. 527, 71 Pac. 649) did any such defect exist in the indictment or information as exists in the information in the case at bar.

For the reasons above set forth, the court did not err in sustaining the demurrers of defendants, and the orders and judgments are affirmed.

Limited, et al. (Civ. 423.)

Dec. 7, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1908;
Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. VENUE—CHANGE OF VENUE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 393, provides that if an action or proceeding is commenced or pending in a court, and the judge or justice thereof is disqualified from acting as such, it must be transferred for trial to the nearest and most accessible court where the like objection or cause for making the order does not exist. Held, that a disqualified judge has no discretion, and must perform the duty imposed by the provision.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Venue, §§ 71, 72.]

2. SAME—AFFIDAVITS AS TO DISQUALIFICATION—WHO MAY FILE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 398, requires a judge who is disqualified to act in a matter pending in his court to transfer the case to the nearest and most accessible court where the like objection does not exist. Section 170 defines the disqualification, and provides that applications for transfer based thereon shall be made upon affidavits, and provides a right to file counter affidavits when the facts are in dispute; but there is no special provision restricting to either party the right to make and file affidavits. Defendants filed affidavits that both judges of the county where the action was brought were disqualified, and that R. county was the nearest and most accessible county. Plaintiff thereupon filed an affidavit, in no wise controverting such statements, but showing that the judge of R. county was also disqualified. Defendants thereupon filed an additional affidavit that the judge of O. county, the next nearest and most accessible county, was also disqualified, and the court thereupon made an order, reciting the disqualification of the judges of the three counties, and transferring the cause to another county as the nearest and most accessible court to which objection on account of the disqualification of the judges did not exist. Held that, though none of the affidavits were counter affidavits, they were properly considered, and the order was properly made.

3. SAME—EFFECT OF STATUTE—SELECTION OF JUDGE.

By entertaining the affidavits filed by plaintiff, the court did not exercise a discretion in transferring the cause, nor select the judge who was to try it, since the law makes the selection when the undisputed facts are before the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by Samuel B. Parrish and others against the Riverside Trust Company, Limited, and others. From an order of the superior court of San Bernardino county transferring the cause to Los Angeles county for trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. B. Kellogg, John G. North, and Collier & Carnahan, for appellants. Byron Waters and C. C. Haskell, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by defendants from an order of the superior court of San Bernardino county transferring a cause for trial to the county of Los Angeles. The action was originally brought in San Bernardino county.

The defendants in due time filed affidavits showing that both judges of San Bernardino county were interested in the result of the suit, and therefore, under section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, disqualified to sit and act, and, further, that Riverside county was the nearest and most accessible county. The plaintiffs thereupon filed affidavits in no respect controverting those of defendants, but which show that the judge of the superior court of Riverside county was also interested in the result of the suit, and therefore disqualified to sit and act. Defendants thereupon filed an additional affidavit showing that the superior judge of Orange county was also interested in the result of the suit, it appearing that Orange county, next to Riverside county, was the nearest and most accessible county to that of San Bernardino. The superior court of San Bernardino county thereupon made its order, reciting the disqualification of the judges of the three counties named, and ordering the cause transferred to Los Angeles county as the nearest and most accessible court to which objections on account of the disqualification of the judges did not exist. The authority for the transfer is contained in section 398, Code of Civil Procedure: "If an action or proceeding is commenced or pending in a court, and the judge or justice thereof is disqualified from acting as such, * * * it must be transferred for trial * * * to the nearest and most accessible court, where the like objection or cause for making the order does not exist."

A disqualified judge has no discretion, and must perform the duty imposed by this provision. Livermore v. Brundage, 64 Cal. 300, 80 Pac. 848. Section 170 defines the disqualification, and provides that applications for transfer based thereon should be made upon affidavits. There is nothing specifically stated in either section, or suggested thereby, which can be interpreted as restricting to any particular party the right to make and file the affidavits. It is true that section 170 confers the right to file counter affidavits when the facts are in dispute; but in this case no facts are in dispute, and none of the affidavits on file may be properly termed counter affidavits, but all are in line as establishing the facts warranting a transfer to the proper county.

Appellants insist that the court, in entertaining the affidavits filed by plaintiffs, was sitting and acting in the cause in which he was interested to the extent that he was passing upon the qualification of the judge in Riverside county, and that he was violating the well-established rule that "he should neither try his own cause nor select his judge." We do not construe the section as attempting to confer upon a disqualified judge a right to select a judge; but, on the contrary, the duty imposed is to accept the affidavits, when not controverted, as true, and transfer the cause, not to a judge of his own selection, but to the nearest and most accessible court where no disqualification exists. The law selects the judge when the undisputed facts are before the court. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in the case of Northwestern Iron Co. v. Crane, 66 Wis. 567, 29 N. W. 655, in construing a somewhat similar statute, says: "The primary purpose of this section was to prescribe the court to which such cause should be sent on such application." The application was made by both parties, and the nearest and most accessible county where the cause could be properly tried was made apparent. We are unable to see where the judge transcended his authority, or did any act other than to perform a plain duty devolving upon him by statute. The court had jurisdiction to make the order, and we perceive no error therein.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. Myers and another against the city of Oceanside. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dadmun & Belleu and W. T. Belleu, for appellant. Wright & Schoonover, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. This is an action to quiet title to one-half of a block of land in the city of Oceanside, county of San Diego, claimed by the defendant to have been dedicated as a public park by one Andrew J. Myers, the original owner by U. S. patent, and predecessor in title to the plaintiffs. Judgment was for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from the judgment and an order of the superior court denying its motion for a new trial.

The findings of the court were affirmative of the allegations of the complaint, which was in the usual form of a complaint to quiet title. The case made by the city is unlike that usually presented to show a dedication. The evidence establishes no express dedication, discloses no filing of a map displaying a park delineated thereon, and fails to show that any survey or location of the boundaries was ever made by the city. No permanent improvements were ever made upon the property to indicate that it was a public park, and it stands (according to the testimony of some of the witnesses), just as it has since 1883, all open, uninclosed, and crossed in various directions by teamsters at their pleasure, and in all respects the same as other unoccupied unimproved property in and about Oceanside.

The offer of dedication relied upon appears as declarations in 23 deeds of lots in the Oceanside town site, made to various persons by said Andrew J. Myers between August 11, 1883, and January 13, 1885. All of these refer to the "Lockling Survey," as shown by two different plats filed in the county recorder's office—one on June 11, 1883, and the other on October 13, 1883. Those referring to the former plat contain the clause "together with an interest in block 19, according to above plat, as a public square forever"; and those referring to the latter contain the clause "together with an interest in lots 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, in block No. 19, according to above plat, as a public square forever." In some of the latter the term used is "public park" instead of "public square." These maps were not filed at the request of Myers or of any one else claiming an interest in the land, and no words of dedication, or delineation of the so-called public square or park, appear upon either of them. They differ materially as to the location and subdivision of block 19, and the lots claimed as a park did not appear upon the one filed June 11, 1883. On July 1, 1885, a map of block No. 19, based upon a survey made by C. J. Coutts, C. E., in June, 1885, was filed by Myers. This was the first map filed at his request, and was some six months later in date than the last of the 23 deeds above mentioned. It displayed all of block 19 as subdivided into building lots 50x100 feet including the half block in question, which appears thereon as lots 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, but in no manner indicates any intention to dedicate any part of the block to park purposes. On October 18, 1889, Andrew J. Myers granted to A. O. Wallace all his "right, title, and interest in the land described in a patent," etc. (referring to a patent conceded to include the land in question), "except the block upon which I have filed a homestead, and, any and all lands in said tracts heretofore conveyed by me." It is from Wallace that plaintiffs deraign their title. The city of Oceanside was incorporated the latter part of the year 1888, and it never at any time passed any formal resolution accepting the so-called dedication, and prior to the date of the deed to Wallace did no act tending to show an intent to accept a dedication. There are other and later acts of the city relied upon to show an acceptance by it of an offer of dedication by Myers, but no attempt is made to show additional assent upon the part of him or his grantee to the treatment of the offer as still open. These evidences of acceptance consist of entries in the minutes of the meetings of the board of trustees in which the term "park" is used in relation to the purchase and planting of trees, furnishing water to, and collecting rates from campers for the use of the "park" in the years 1897, 1901, and 1902. As to the action taken by the officers of the city under these minutes, there is some conflict in the evidence; it appearing by the testimony of some of the witnesses that the trees were not planted on the park, and that the arrangement and care of the campers was for the purpose of collecting water rates, and incidental to keeping a camping place in order for campers who might desire to come to Oceanside.

If it be conceded that the declarations in the private deeds were sufficient evidence to show an offer of dedication, the court was justified in considering the filing of the Coutts map as evidence of a full and complete revocation or withdrawal of such offer so far as the public was concerned. That the easement created for the benefit of his grantees still existed, and that the grantor was estopped to deny them such rights in block 19 as he had expressly granted to them, did not affect the public. The rights created by the deeds might be enforced by the grantees against Myers and his successors in interest whether there was or was not a dedication to public use (Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145), but, considered in connection with the question of dedication, the clauses creating the interest in block 19 were merely admissions on the part of Myers of an intention to dedicate. They did not constitute an express dedication, and were not evidence tending to show an express dedication. There was not a complete dedication, as would have been the case if the deeds had been made to the city or to some one for the benefit of the public, or if the map filed at Myers' request had shown words of dedication on its face. In case of a complete dedication no acceptance is required, it being presumed from the benefits arising from the dedication. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 175, 13 Pac. 405. It is important, therefore, to observe the distinction between a complete dedication and a mere offer of dedication. In the latter case there must be an acceptance, and until there is the owner may at any time revoke and withdraw the offer. Revocation may be evidenced in various acts inconsistent with the use for which it is claimed the land was dedicated. This may be by filing a map or plat upon which the property is delineated as private property, or by conveying the title of it to a third person without recognizing the easement. Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. 141; Schmitt v. San Francisco, 100 Cal. 308, 34 Pac. 961. In the latter case, unless the grantee expressly indicates an intention to keep the offer open, it will be presumed that he does not intend to do so. Forsyth v. Dunnagan, 94 Cal. 441, 29 Pac. 770. The owner may revoke until some one has acted upon the offer in such a mode that they would be injured by the revocation. Schmitt v. San Francisco, supra.

A revocation before an acceptance having been shown, the whole question of dedication must be eliminated from the case in considering the findings. Prescott v. Edwards, 117 Cal. 301, 49 Pac. 178, 59 Am. St. Rep. 186. The filing of the Coutts map, the conveyance of the land to Wallace without reservation, and the sworn declarations of Myers on the witness stand, all tended to show an intention to revoke any offer of dedication that had been made or which could have been inferred from the deeds made by Myers, and were sufficient to support the finding of "no dedication." The later acts of the city could not operate to revive the revoked offer, even if sufficient to show an acceptance. But they were not sufficient for this purpose. Use of the land for purposes of a highway and as a camping place by strangers are not within the purposes of the dedication contended for. There was nothing shown in the way of planting and maintaining shrubbery and trees on the land and a keeping of it as a "park" in the common acceptance of that term. No intention to carry out the purposes of the dedication is shown. Only such acts as tend to show an acceptance for the purpose indicated can be considered. Archer v. Salinas City, supra. The question of intention is the controlling one in all matters of dedication, and it is one of fact, and the finding of the trial court in this respect must be sustained if there be any evidence to support it. City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, 125 Cal. 463, 58 Pac. 90; Anaheim v. Langenberger, 134 Cal. 608, 66 Pac. 855.

We cannot agree with appellant's contention that a quitclaim deed is no evidence of title. It was announced as the well-established doctrine in this state in Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 344, that quitclaim deeds are as effectual to transfer title to lands as deeds of bargain and sale, and a decree quieting the title of a party claiming under a quitclaim deed was sustained in that case. That case has been frequently affirmed. Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 254, 3 Pac. 867; Spaulding v. Bradley, 79 Cal. 456, 22 Pac. 47; Taylor v. Opperman, 79 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 369; Nidever v. Ayers, 83 Cal. 42, 23 Pac. 192. While there are purposes for which the inventory and appraisal in the estate of a deceased person is not admissible as evidence, or at least is immaterial (Nathan v. Dierksen, 146 Cal. 63, 79 Pac. 739), in the case at bar the decree of distribution in the estate of A. O. Wallace, deceased, through which plaintiffs claim title, referred to the inventory and appraisal in that estate for purposes of description. It was competent evidence for that purpose.

There was no material error prejudicial to defendant's case committed by the court in the 40 rulings excepted to by it. Some of these are covered by the foregoing views of the court, and those not so disposed of are not especially urged in the brief. The most important of them relate to rulings rejecting testimony offered by defendant to show how the property was assessed on the assessment roll of the city. This was entirely immaterial in the case as presented. It could not conclude the property owner. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405. At the time these books were made there was no pending offer to dedicate, and if there had been the assessor had no authority to accept for the public. Schmitt v. San Francisco, supra. The testimony of the county assessor in this same connection was admitted without objection to show that the property had not been assessed to Myers for a number of years, and in response to this plaintiffs were permitted to introduce certificates of sales of some of the lots for taxes. Conceding this to have been error, it in no manner prejudiced the case of defendant, as that of plaintiffs was made independent of this evidence. Defendant's estimate of the admissibility of the testimony in this respect appears to be governed by the question, what is its effect? While one error cannot be held to offset another, the party introducing improper evidence may well be estopped to complain of the court's permitting the introduction of evidence at the request of the other party to rebut such improper testimony. If either party were claiming under a title acquired by adverse possession, the question whether or not the property was assessed, and to whom and who paid the taxes, etc., might have been material, but no such title was attempted to be established here. The evidence introduced improperly was immaterial but not prejudicial.

The other exceptions do not require consideration, and, the record showing no prejudicial error, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WAGNER v. GOLDSCHMIDT.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—LIEN—SETTLEMENT BETWEEN THE PARTIES.

Unless an attorney has an interest in, or a lien on, a judgment, the client may in good faith settle the same without consulting the attorney, who has no right to interfere with or prevent a settlement.

2. SAME—RIGHT TO LIEN—NOTICE.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 1063, giving an attorney a lien on a judgment to the extent of the compensation agreed on from the "giving notice thereof to the party against whom the judgment * * * is given, and filing the original with the clerk," an attorney has no lien on a judgment as against the judgment debtor unless the notice is given and filed, and, where the debtor in good faith pays or satisfies the judgment before notice, the attorney cannot enforce the judgment as against him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attorney and Client, §§ 390-392.]

3. JUDGMENT — SATISFACTION PENDING APPEAL.

The pendency of an appeal from a judgment neither prevents the judgment debtor from in good faith paying the judgment nor the judgment creditor from satisfying the judgment of record; the satisfaction being the act of the party, and not an exercise of jurisdiction by the court or its officers over the judgment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Arthur L. Frazer, Judge.

Action by Henry M. Wagner against S. L. Goldschmidt. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. From an order directing the cancellation of the satisfaction of the judgment entered pending the appeal, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. W. Joseph, for appellant. N. H. Bloomfield and D. M. Donagh, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. On April 5, 1906, plaintiff commenced an action in the circuit court of Multnomah county against defendant to recover $500 alleged to be due for commission on sale of real estate. Issue was joined, and a trial had resulting in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount demanded. Defendant appealed to this court, pending the determination of which the parties, without knowledge of their respective attorneys, settled and compromised their differences, and on the 16th of January, 1907, plaintiff acknowledged full satisfaction of the judgment on the judgment lien docket, but the appeal has never been dismissed, and is now pending and undetermined. A few days after the acknowledgment of satisfaction, the court below, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, directed the clerk to cancel the same, from which order defendant appeals.

The original case of Wagner v. Goldschmidt having been settled by the parties, there remains no substantial controversy between them, and therefore this court will not proceed further with a consideration of the merits of the case, so far as their rights are concerned. The attorneys for Wagner, however, claim that they should be permitted to prosecute the appeal in the name of their client for the purpose of collecting their fees, and that the settlement made by the parties was in legal effect a fraud upon their rights. There is no evidence in the record that the settlement was collusive or made for the purpose of cheating or defrauding plaintiff's attorneys out of their fees, and no proof that they had a lien upon or interest in the judgment recovered by them in favor of their client at the time of such settlement. The law is that, unless an attorney has an interest in or lien upon a judgment, his client may, in good faith, settle and compromise the same in any manner he chooses, without consulting the attorney, and he has no right to interfere with or prevent such settlement. The statute provides that an attorney has a lien upon a judgment or decree "to the extent of the compensation specially agreed on from the giving notice thereof to the party against whom the judgment or decree is given, and filing the original with the clerk where such judgment or decree is entered and docketed." Section 1063, B. & C. Comp. Unless this notice is given and filed, the attorney has no claim or lien upon the judgment as against the judgment debtor, and if he, in good faith, pays or satisfies it before such notice, the attorney cannot enforce the judgment as against him. Day v. Larsen, 30 Or. 247, 47 Pac. 101; Stearns v. Wollenberg (Or.) 92 Pac. 1079.

Counsel argue that upon the perfection of the appeal in the case of Wagner v. Goldschmidt the trial court lost jurisdiction of the cause, and thereafter had no power to make any order in the matter, except in furtherance of the appeal. But conceding, without deciding, that this position is sound, it did not prevent the defendant from, in good faith, paying the judgment and the plaintiff satisfying it of record, and the attorneys could not prevent or interfere therewith unless they had a lien thereon. The satisfaction was the act of the party, and was not an exercise of jurisdiction by the court or its officers over the judgment.

It follows that the order of the court directing the clerk to cancel the satisfaction must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

FINN v. OREGON WATER POWER & RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A servant suing for injuries caused by the failure of the master to provide safe appliances has the burden of proving the negligence charged, and, where the ground of recovery is a defect in appliances, he must show, not only that the injury resulted from the defect, but that the master had notice thereof, or, by exercise of ordinary care, could have known of it, and mere proof of the accident is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 900-905.]

2. SAME—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The negligence of a master in failing to provide safe appliances need not be shown by positive and direct evidence, but it may be inferred from the proof of facts, other than proof of an accident resulting in injuries to an employé, from which the master's conduct can be ascertained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 954-963.]

3. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A servant was injured by the breaking of a chain holding a block. Whether the chain broke because it was defective or not sufficient for the purpose intended, or because it was improperly used, was not shown. The servant testified that he did not know what caused the chain to break. Held insufficient, as a matter of law, to show negligence of the master in failing to provide a safe appliance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 954-963.]

4. APPEAL—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—REFUSAL TO REOPEN CASE—REVIEW.

Where, in an action for injuries to an employé by the breaking of a chain, there was no evidence that the chain was defective or insufficient for the purpose, or that it was improperly used, the refusal of the court, during the motion for a nonsuit, to permit the employé to reopen his case to call another employé to ascertain whether he had the chain in his possession, with a view of offering it in evidence, was within the court's discretion, and its ruling would not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3851.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Calvin U. Gantenbein, Judge.

Action by William A. Finn against the Oregon Water Power & Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, entered on a motion for a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. McGinn, for appellant. R. W. Wilbur, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. This is an action to recover damages for a personal injury, and is brought here on an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant entered on a motion for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony. Plaintiff was employed about a donkey engine, which was used by defendant in operating a scraper in connection with the construction of a dam across the Clackamas river at Cazadero. His principal duty was to assist in getting fuel for the engine. To obtain fuel the employés hauled or pulled in logs to the engine by its own power by means of a cable, one end of which was fastened to the log and the other to a drum on the engine. The cable passed through a block or pulley, which was fastened by a chain to a skid upon which the engine rested. On September 18, 1905, while a log was being thus pulled in, the chain which held the block parted, and plaintiff was struck by the cable, and injured. He charges that his injury was due to the negligence of defendant in not furnishing a chain of sufficient strength to stand the strain. But there is no evidence in the record, independent of the accident itself, to support this averment. Plaintiff is the only witness who testified on the trial in reference to the accident or its cause. He says he was put to work at the engine by the day foreman to cut wood and assist in pulling in logs from which to obtain bark to keep up steam; that on the night of the accident, while a log was being pulled in, the chain broke, and he was struck with the cable and injured; and that he does not know what caused the chain to break. This is all the testimony as to the cause of the accident.

It is a settled law in this state that in an action by a servant against a master to recover for personal injuries sustained by the former while in the employ of the latter, due to alleged failure of the master to provide reasonably safe tools and appliances, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show the negligence charged; and, if the ground of recovery is a defect in machinery or appliances, to show, not only that the injury resulted from such defect, but that defendant had notice of the defect, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known. Mere proof of the accident is not sufficient. Duntley v. Inman, 42 Or. 334, 70 Pac. 529, 59 L. R. A. 785; Nutt v. S. P. Co., 25 Or. 291, 35 Pac. 653; Kincaid v. O. S. L. Ry. Co., 22 Or. 35, 29 Pac. 3. It is, of course, not necessary that there should be positive and direct proof of negligence, but, like any other fact, it may be inferred from circumstances. Geldard v. Marshall, 48 Or. 438, 73 Pac. 330. There must, however, be proof of some facts other than the accident from which the defendant's conduct can be ascertained and determined. Now, in this case, there was no proof from which it could have been determined whether defendant was negligent. The only proof is that the chain broke while it was being used by plaintiff and his co-employees, but whether it broke because it was defective or not sufficient for the purpose intended, or because it was improperly used or put to unnecessary strain, the record is silent. Plaintiff states that he does not know what caused the chain to break, and there was no evidence that the chain was not of suitable size and strength for the purpose for which it was intended, or that there was any defect therein, or, if so, that such defect was known or should have been known by defendant. There is no error, therefore, in sustaining the motion for a nonsuit. During the argument on the motion for a nonsuit, plaintiff asked permission to reopen his case for the purpose of calling one of defendant's employees to ascertain whether such employee had in his possession the chain which broke, with a view of offering such chain in evidence, but this was a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and, as no abuse thereof is shown, its ruling cannot be disturbed on appeal.

In this view of the case the other question argued is not important, and need not be considered. Judgment affirmed.

(51 Or. 69)

MEIER v. NORTHERN PAC. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. RAILROADS — KILLING STOCK — FENCES — PONDS.

B. & C. Comp. § 4342, subd. 7, provides that all ponds or other natural obstructions, "if equally secure against the trespass of any domestic animals, or made so by artificial means," shall be deemed lawful fences, and section 5140, requiring railroads to fence their tracks, declares that complete natural defenses against the entrance of stock on the track, such as natural walls or deep ditches, shall be deemed a fence under the act. Held that, where a railroad's right of way crossed a pond 3½ feet deep, through which plaintiff's horse escaped onto the right of way and was killed, whether such pond was to be deemed a lawful fence was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1634.]

2. SAME—FAILURE TO FENCE TRACK—PLACE OF ENTRY.

In an action under B. & C. Comp. §§ 5139-5144, making railroad companies liable for killing or injuring live stock on an unfenced track, it is not necessary to allege or prove entry on the track at a particular place, except where the stock is killed at a point where the railroad company is not required to fence.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

When it was alleged and proved that a railroad company failed to fence its track, and that plaintiff's stock was killed or injured on or near such unfenced track by a moving train, the railroad's negligence was established, and a recovery could be defeated only by proof of contributory negligence.

4. SAME—IMMEDIATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

Where plaintiff's horse strayed on defendant's unfenced railroad track, it was immaterial to defendant's liability whether the horse was struck by a train and thrown onto a fence and injured, or whether he was so frightened that he jumped on the fence in an effort to escape from the train.

5. EVIDENCE — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE — WEIGHT.

Where a fact is sought to be established by circumstantial evidence, it is only necessary that the conclusion desired be the more probable hypothesis, not that it should be the only conclusion that can fairly and reasonably be drawn from the evidence.

6. RAILROADS — INJURIES TO ANIMALS — UNFENCED TRACK—EVIDENCE.

Circumstantial evidence held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiff's horse was on the right of way of defendant railroad company, and was either struck and thrown on a fence by a moving train or was so frightened in his effort to get away that he jumped upon the fence and was killed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1608½.]

7. TRIAL—NECESSARY PROOF—FACTS ADMITTED.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for killing plaintiff's horse, alleged to have escaped through an unfenced right of way, it was stipulated at the trial that defendant owned and operated the railway at all times mentioned in the complaint, plaintiff was not required to prove that the train which caused the injury belonged to defendant or was operated by it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 88.]

8. SAME—NONSUIT—MOTION—GROUNDS.

A motion for a nonsuit must specify the grounds on which it is demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 371.]

9. APPEAL—REVIEW—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—GROUNDS.

Where a motion for a nonsuit specified the particulars wherein plaintiff's evidence was claimed to be insufficient, the Supreme Court would not consider other and additional assignments of insufficiency on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Columbia County; Thos. A. McBride, Judge.

Action by A. Meier against the Northern Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant has appealed from a judgment given against it for damages caused by its alleged negligence in failing to fence its track, which it is alleged resulted in the killing of plaintiff's horse upon or near defendant's right of way, by being struck or frightened by one of its moving trains, so that the horse was thrown or jumped upon a fence, a piece of which penetrated its body. The answer is a general denial of the averments of the complaint. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence tending to establish three material facts particularly specified in the motion. It is therein asserted that the evidence fails to show (1) that the portion of the right of way claimed to have been unfenced was unfenced; (2) that the horse got upon the track at the place claimed; and (3) that there was no evidence that the train of defendant either threw the horse or frightened it, causing it to jump upon the fence, as charged in the complaint. The motion being overruled, defendant offered its testimony, and at the close moved for a directed verdict in its favor upon substantially the same grounds as stated in its motion for a nonsuit. This motion being also overruled, the cause was submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor, upon which the judgment was entered. The only error relied upon is the overruling of these motions.

O. C. Spencer, for appellant. W. R. Dillard, for respondent

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). Defendant's road runs through plaintiff's farm, which is partly lowland, subject to overflow. At a point where the right of way crosses the farm there is a depression or slough across which a fill from 25 to 30 feet high, measured on the slope, has been made, and extending a distance of about 100 feet, and causing a pond of water to accumulate there, in the wet season, on the east side of the track, which, at the time of the accident, was about $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet deep, according to plaintiffs' testimony. This is where it is claimed the track is unfenced, and where plaintiff's horses went upon the track. Plaintiff testifies that there is no fence there, and that it is 32 feet across this pond from a ridge on his premises to defendant's embankment, and that at that point the water was then $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet deep. It is admitted by defendant that there is no fence along its right of way across this pond; but it claims that the pond is of sufficient depth to form a natural barrier, and therefore, under the statute, to be equivalent to a lawful fence, and he asked the court to so declare as a matter of law. But it is not any pond that is to be deemed a lawful fence, but only if it be "equally secure against the trespass of any domestic animals, or shall be made so by artificial means." B. & C. Comp. § 4342, subd. 7. That is a question of fact for the jury to determine and not the court, and, there being some evidence that stock did cross the pond to the embankment, the question was properly submitted to the jury. Nor could the court say as a matter of law that such ponds are "complete natural defenses against the entrance of such stock upon said track, such as natural walls or deep ditches," as provided in section 5140, B. & C. Comp.

2. It is next asserted that there is no evidence that the horse went upon the track at the place claimed. There is, perhaps, no direct evidence to that effect. Some horses did enter at that place, for the plaintiff and his witnesses testify that the next morning after the accident they examined the embankment at that place and found horse tracks going obliquely up the embankment to the railroad track, and that they traced them down the track to the broken place in the fence where they went out. But in an action on the statute for the killing or injuring live stock on an unfenced track it is not necessary to allege or offer proof of entry at a particular place, except where stock is killed at a place where the company is not bound to fence, as a public highway. When it is alleged and proved that the company failed to fence, and that the plaintiff's stock was killed or injured upon or near such unfenced track by a moving train, the negligence is established, and can be defeated only by proof of contributory negligence. Eaton v. O. R. N. Ry. Co., 19 Or. 371, 24 Pac. 413.

3. Finally it is urged that there is no evidence tending to prove that a train of defendant either threw the horse or frightened it, causing it to jump upon the fence. Here again plaintiff relies at least in part upon circumstantial evidence. Plaintiff swears that he owned three work horses, the one in question being a bay horse 7 years old; that the day before the accident his horses were in his field on a ridge not far from defendant's right of way, and close to the unfenced portion. On the afternoon of June 23, 1904, defendant's section foreman (Butler) observed a horse badly injured, but standing in plaintiff's field near the right of way, and opposite to it was a broken place in the fence. Butler paid no further attention to the horse, but a stranger that evening informed plaintiff's tenants of the injury to the horse. They in turn notified plaintiff by telephone that his horse had been badly injured. On the morning of the following day plaintiff went from Portland to his farm, and thence proceeded to the place where the injured horse was discovered. On the way there he met Butler on the track, who turned and went with plaintiff to the place of the injury. In the meantime the horse had died, and had been buried by plaintiff's tenants about 50 feet from the right of way. Plaintiff found there a pointed fragment of a board about four feet long, two feet of which was covered with blood, and which it was said pierced the horse, causing its death. Plaintiff swears that in Butler's presence he fitted this piece of board into the fence from where it had apparently been broken. Then he and Butler examined the roadway and found tracks of horses leading to the broken place along the track from the direction of the unfenced portion of the right of way, and the appearance of the tracks indicated that the horses had been running, as plaintiff could see where they had dug up and thrown gravel with their hoofs. They traced these tracks back and down to the unfenced portion of the right of way, a distance covered by about 600 ties. F. H. Adams also testified in plaintiff's behalf that on or about June 23d he was passing down the county road on the west side of defendant's track where this embankment is, and that he was about 40 rods from the track; that at that time he saw a bay horse, which he took to be plaintiff's, feeding along the track about three or four rods up the track from the unfenced portion; that when he saw the horse a freight train came around the curve, and as it approached the horse it became frightened and ran along the track ahead of the engine; that at his right there was a bunch of brush which obstructed his continued view so that when the horse passed out of his view behind the brush he could not tell whether the train knocked it off or it jumped off, or on which side of the track it went off, but he knew that when the train came in sight again there was no horse ahead of the engine. Are these facts sufficient to make a prima facie case that the injury to the horse was caused by the train either striking and throwing it upon the fence, or so frightening it that it jumped upon the fence in its effort to get away? If either inference can be reasonably and fairly drawn from the proved facts, it will be sufficient, for it has been held by this court in Meeker v. N. P. R. R. Co., 21 Or. 513, 28 Pac. 639, 14 L. R. A. 841, 28 Am. St. Rep. 758, that under the latter circumstance defendant is liable as well as under the former. A fact can be said to be established by circumstantial evidence in a civil action when the facts relied upon are of such a nature and are so related to each other that the conclusion sought to be established can fairly and reasonably be drawn from them. 1 Wigmore on Ev. § 38; Schoepper v. Hancock Chemical Co., 113 Mich. 582, 71 N. W. 1081. In 1 Greenleaf on Ev. (15 Ed.) § 13a, the noted author says: "In civil cases it is sufficient if the evidence on the whole agrees with and supports the hypothesis which it is adduced to prove, but in criminal cases it must exclude every other hypothesis but that of the guilt of the party." It may be that, where more than one inference can thus be drawn from the circumstantial facts in evidence, one favorable and another unfavorable to the conclusion sought to be established, the one favorable must be the more probable hypothesis in order to be of service to one having the burden of proof. But we do not think the rule is that it should be the only conclusion that can fairly and reasonably be drawn from such evidence, as stated in Asbach v. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co., 74 Iowa, 248, 37 N. W. 182, cited by defendant. There can be no doubt, however, that the circumstances here stated are sufficient to support plaintiff's contention that the horse was on the right of way, and was either struck and thrown upon the fence by a moving train, or was so frightened in its effort to get away that it jumped upon the fence and was thereby killed. It is argued by defendant in this connection that it is not shown that the train which caused the injury belonged to defendant or was operated by it; but it was stipulated by the parties at the trial that the defendant owned and operated the railway mentioned in the complaint at all the times therein stated, and this is conclusive of that contention.

Some other contentions were also made at the argument, such as that it was not there shown that plaintiff had ever lost a horse or that the horse injured and killed was, in fact, plaintiff's horse, but these matters seem not to have been questioned by defendant at the trial, but were impliedly admitted. At least it did not question them in its motion for a nonsuit, which is specific as to what the deficiencies in plaintiff's evidence were on which it relied to support the motion. The rule is well settled that the motion of an adverse party for a nonsuit must specify the grounds therefor, and, unless it does so, an appellate court will not review the action of the trial court in denying the motion, and, when it appears that the question sought to be reviewed was not thus submitted to such court, the presumption that its decision is correct ought to prevail. Ferguson v. Ingle, 38 Or. 43, 62 Pac. 760. None of these additional matters are suggested by defendant's motion, and they will not therefore be considered.

From these considerations it follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

DENNY v. BEAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION.

An agreement by a judgment creditor, who had been paid only a part of the judgment, to cancel it, based on the debtor's agreement not to appeal made after the time to appeal had expired, is without consideration; but an agreement to cancel the judgment, based on the debtor's agreement to cancel a debt due from the creditor, is supported by a valid consideration.

2. STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

The rule that statutes will be construed to operate prospectively only, unless an intent to the contrary appears, is only a guide where the legislative intent is obscure, in which case the statute should not be given a retroactive construction, though within the wording thereof, if such construction impairs existing rights, creates new obligations, or imposes new duties in respect to past transactions.

Laws 1892, § 2103, providing that whenever a judgment is given in a justice's court the judgment creditor may within one year thereafter file a transcript thereof, and operates prospectively only, the word "whenever" being an adverb of time, and when used with the present tense of the verb excludes the idea of a judgment theretofore given, and though construed to operate retroactively the statute cannot apply to a justice's judgment rendered in 1896, no transcript of which had been filed within one year after its rendition.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Polk County; Willham Galloway, Judge.

Suit by L. B. Denny against Agnes Bean and another. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Plaintiff sues in equity to enjoin the issuance of a sheriff's deed to a purchaser at a sale on an execution issued out of the circuit court of Polk county on a transcript of a justice's judgment filed therein, to have declared void and canceled of record the transcript of the judgment and the execution thereon, and to cancel the judgment as settled and paid. Plaintiff alleges, in substance, that on April 23, 1896, W. S. Bean commenced an action against him in the justice's court for District No. 2, of Polk county, and that on the ——— day of June, 1896, Bean secured judgment against him for $236.11; that about June 2, 1896, the sum of $62.15 was made on execution; that thereafter, and in the same month, plaintiff threatened to institute proceedings to set aside the judgment, claiming that he was never indebted to Bean in a sum greater than $54, and that before the time for appeal had expired he and Bean entered into an agreement and settlement, whereby the latter was to satisfy the judgment in consideration that plaintiff would not appeal or institute any other proceedings to annul the judgment; that on December 10, 1903, in violation of his contract, Bean caused a transcript of the judgment to be filed in the circuit court of that county, and afterwards assigned the same to Agnes Bean, who is his divorced wife; that Agnes Bean caused an execution to be issued out of the circuit court on October 13, 1904, which was levied on plaintiff's land, and on November 26, 1904, the land was sold to Agnes Bean for the balance due on the judgment; and that the sale was confirmed about May 8, 1905. J. T. Ford, sheriff, is made a party defendant. The answer denies all of the averments of the complaint, excepting the issuance of the execution at the instance of Agnes Bean, the sale of the land, and its purchase by her and the confirmation thereof. After the taking of testimony findings were made in plaintiff's favor, and a decree was entered canceling the judgment and annulling all the proceedings taken for its enforcement, from which decree defendant appeals.

Oscar Hayter and Carey F. Martin, for appellants. Frank Holmes, for respondent.

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). It was admitted at the trial that the judgment was, in fact, obtained on April 23, 1896, instead of in June as alleged, and that about December 10, 1903, a transcript thereof was made and filed in the circuit court at the instance of the judgment creditor. The plaintiff, however, has failed to establish the settlement and agreement to cancel the judgment, as alleged by him. The consideration alleged for the making of the agreement was that plaintiff would not appeal from the judgment, or institute any other proceedings to cause the same to be set aside. At the time of making the agreement not to appeal plaintiff had no right of appeal. That had been lost to him by the expiration of the time limited in the statute in which an appeal might have been taken. What other legal proceedings, if any, plaintiff had in contemplation to cause the judgment to be annulled, is not shown. There is some evidence that at that time he may have had a cause of action in debt against Bean upon which he might have recovered a judgment in an amount equal to or greater than the balance due on this judgment. An agreement, then, to surrender and cancel this indebtedness in payment and satisfaction of the judgment, and the actual surrender and cancellation thereof, with the correlative agreement by the judgment creditor to accept and receive the same in satisfaction and payment, would make a case, but it is not so alleged or proved. We are of the opinion, however, that there was no authority in law for the filing of the transcript of this judgment in the circuit court after the expiration of one year from its date, and consequently all of the proceedings based thereon are void. "Execution to enforce a judgment in a justice's court must not be issued against or levied upon the real property of the defendant; but when a judgment given by a justice has been duly docketed in the circuit court, thereafter it must be enforced as a judgment of such circuit court." Section 2232, B. & C. Comp. When this judgment was obtained the statute provided that, "Whenever a judgment is given in a justice's court in favor of any one for the sum of ten dollars or more, exclusive of costs or disbursements, the party in whose favor such judgment is given may, within one year thereafter, file a certified transcript thereof with the county clerk of the county wherein such judgment was given, and thereupon such clerk shall immediately docket the same in the judgment docket of the circuit court." Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 2103. By the next succeeding section such judgment is made a lien upon the real property of the defendant from the time of its docketing. No transcript of the judgment having been filed with the county clerk within one year after the judgment, the right to do so became extinguished, and the judgment creditor lost the means whereby he might obtain satisfaction thereof out of the defendants' real property. The former section of the statute, however, was repealed by the act of 1899, and a similar provision re-enacted, by which it was provided that, "Whenever a judgment is given in a justice's court * * * the party in whose favor the judgment is given may at any time thereafter, while such judgment is enforceable, file a certified transcript," etc. Section 2225, B. & C. Comp.

It is now contended by the defendants herein that this latter statute is general in its terms and contains no inhibitions or negative clauses denying the right to judgments given prior to the act, and that it applies generally to all judgments of justices' courts which were enforceable at the time the act came into force; in other words, that it is retroactive in its operation. The general rule is that statutes will be construed to operate prospectively, only, unless an intent to the contrary clearly appears. Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Con. § 642; Endlich on Int. Stat. § 271. But in the case of Judkins v. Taffe, 21 Or. 89, 27 Pac. 221, it was held by this court that statutes which merely change the remedy or course and form of procedure, but which do not destroy all remedy for the enforcement of rights, are retrospective, and apply to causes of action existing and litigation pending at the date of their passage. In the course of the same opinion, at page 93, it is also said: "In fact, the rule as gathered from all the authorities seems to be that, where the enactment deals with the procedure only, unless the contrary be expressed, the enactment applies to all actions, whether commenced before or after the passage of the act'"—citing Broom's Leg. Max. 35. The rule under consideration, however, is only a guide where the intention of the Legislature is obscure. Broom's Legal Maxims, 27. If the intention of the Legislature is obvious and plain, it must prevail; but, if it is obscure and doubtful, it should not be given a retrospective construction, although within the wording of the act, if such construction impairs existing rights, creates new obligations, or imposes more duties in respect to past transactions, unless such plainly appears to be the intent of the Legislature. Sutherland, Stat. Con. § 643. The case of Larkin v. Saffarans (C. C.) 15 Fed. 147, cited and approved by this court in Judkins v. Taffe, supra, quotes the above rule of construction taken from Broom's Legal Maxims, and applies it to the facts of that case; but at page 151 of the opinion the distinction is clearly made that, when a case has gone to judgment, there is no pending case on which to act, as it is past and gone from the court, and, in one sense, there then vests a right in the defendant to the judgment. It becomes a sort of property, and should not ordinarily be taken from him. In such a case the rule of construction stated would not apply, and nothing less than a specific direction in the statute would authorize the court to make it retrospective. The intent of the Legislature as to whether the act under consideration should operate prospectively only or retrospectively also is to be determined mainly from the words "whenever a judgment is given." The word "whenever" is an adverb of time, which, speaking from the date of the act, looks to the future rather than to the past. Kennebec & Portland Ry. Co. v. Portland & Kennebec Ry. Co., 59 Me. 9-61. It may, of course, be controlled by the tense of the verb which it modifies. When used, as in this instance, with the present tense of the verb, it would appear to exclude the idea of a judgment which had theretofore been given. In the case of McGovern v. Connell, 43 N. J. Law, 106, the court construed these words of a statute, "when any judgment is obtained," occurring in a statute which authorized an alias execution to issue under certain conditions to a constable of another county. It was contended that the act applied to judgments obtained before the passage of the act. The court say: "The most that can be said in favor of this construction is that the language used is indefinite as to time. If it may mean 'when any judgment has been obtained,' it may, at least, as plainly be understood to mean 'when any judgment shall be obtained.'" But, after considering and applying the rules for statutory construction, the phrase was held to mean "when any judgment is hereafter obtained." And that is the meaning we would derive from the words "whenever a judgment is given," used in the act under consideration. If there can be said to be any doubt, in view of the rule stated in Broom's Legal Maxims, quoted and approved by this court in Judkins v. Taffe, supra, or should the contrary conclusion be reached that the act should be made to apply to judgments previously given, there is no doubt that it could not apply to a state of facts disclosed in the present case, because the legal effect of the act, if applied, would be not to effect a change in the course or form of the procedure of a cause then pending, nor to enlarge the time in which a present right may be exercised, but would be a re-establishment of a right once existing, but lost and barred by the statute before the passage of the new act. When a remedy has been once barred by statute, a later enactment establishing a longer period of time in which the remedy may be enjoyed will not be given a retroactive construction to revive the lost remedy, unless that intention is affirmatively expressed in the act. Dyer v. Belfast, 88 Me. 140, 33 Atl. 790; Mann v. McAtee, 37 Cal. 11; Garfield v. Bemis, 2 Allen (Mass.) 445.

The decree should be modified so that the judgment may stand and the remainder be affirmed.

STURGIS v. STURGIS.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINALITY OF DETERMINATION—INTERLOCUTORY DECISIONS.

Const. art. 7, § 6, provides that "the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction only to revise the final decisions of the circuit courts." B. & C. Comp. § 547, as amended by Laws 1907, p. 813, c. 162, § 6, provides that "a judgment or decree may be reviewed as prescribed in this chapter and not otherwise. An order affecting a substantial right and which in effect determines the action or suit so as to prevent a judgment or decree therein, * * * for the purpose of being reviewed, shall be deemed a judgment or decree." Section 548 provides that "any party to a judgment or decree other than by confession or for want of an answer, may appeal therefrom." One adjudged a spendthrift and placed under guardianship married in another state without the guardian's consent, returned, and was sued for divorce; the guardian being made a defendant so as to subject the ward's estate to the payment of suit money and alimony. The court ordered defendants to pay a certain amount as suit money and a specified sum monthly as temporary alimony pending the suit. Held, that as against the guardian, who has no personal interest in the divorce litigation and no right to appeal from the final decree in the suit, the order is a "final decision," so as to be appealable.

2. SAME.

A void order or decree is appealable; and hence, in a suit for divorce against a spendthrift in which his guardian was made a party defendant only to subject the spendthrift's estate to the payment of suit money and alimony, there being no cause of action alleged against the guardian, an order directing defendants to pay a certain amount as suit money and a specified sum monthly as temporary alimony pending the suit, being void as to the guardian, the court having no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against him, is appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 749.]

3. MARRIAGE—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

In general, a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere, not only in other states generally, but in the state of the domicile of the parties, even when they left their own state to marry elsewhere to avoid the laws of the state of their domicile.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Marriage, § 3.]

4. SAME—PERSONS' ACTIONS—MERITS.

Marriages contrary to the law of nature as generally recognized in Christian countries, such as involve polygamy and incest, and marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity, are exceptions to the rule that a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere.

5. SAME—CIVIL STATUS.

If the marriage of a ward takes place in this state without the consent of the guardian, it involves the violation of the law only as to ceremony, form, or qualification; and although the violation of the law in the issuance of the license, making the affidavit therefor, or by the officer in solemnizing the marriage, may subject the offender to punishment therefor, yet the marriage is not therefor void.

6. SAME.

B. & C. Comp. § 5218, provides that "marriage is a civil contract which may be entered into by males of the age of 18 years, and females of the age of 15 years, who are otherwise capable." Section 5218 provides that "when either party to a marriage shall be incapable of consenting thereto, for want of legal age or sufficient understanding, * * * such marriage is voidable, but only at the suit of the party laboring under the disability," etc. Section 503 provides that marriages declared voidable by section 5218 shall be void from the time they are so declared by the decree. Plaintiff and defendant, a spendthrift, desired to marry; but the latter's guardian refused his consent thereto. Thereupon the parties, to avoid the marriage laws of the state, went to another state and were married. Held, that such marriage, being neither within sections 5217 and 502, which specifically prohibit certain marriages, making them absolutely void, nor contrary to the law of nature as generally recognized in Christian countries, is valid, being within the general rule that a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere.

7. DIVORCE—TEMPORARY ALIMONY—APPLICATION AND PROCEEDINGS THEREON—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

A wife, in a divorce suit against her spendthrift husband, his guardian being made a party defendant, so as to subject the ward's estate to the payment of suit money and alimony, secured an order directing defendants to pay a certain amount as suit money and a specified sum monthly as temporary alimony pending the suit. Held, on a motion to set aside the order, that the question as to collusion in the divorce suit between plaintiff and the ward defendant to wrest from the guardian part of the estate should not be tried on affidavits, since it involved the merits of the suit, and plaintiff was entitled to a full hearing and to the privilege of cross-examination of the defendant's witnesses.

8. GUARDIAN AND WARD—CUSTODY AND CARE OF WARD'S PERSON AND ESTATE—GUARDIAN'S LIABILITY ON CONTRACTS FOR WARD'S BENEFIT.

A guardian's liability upon his own contracts for the benefit of the ward is personal, and the judgment of a court rendered for such a debt is against him personally, and not against the ward's estate; and if he is compelled to pay such debt, and it was one properly made on behalf of the ward, the county court will allow it out of the ward's estate, but the liability of the estate in such a case is one to be settled in the county court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Guardian and Ward, § 454.]

9. SAME — ACTIONS — RIGHTS OF ACTION AGAINST GUARDIAN OR WARD.

An action cannot be maintained against a guardian upon the liability of the ward, but only against the ward; and the guardian, being a proper party, may appear and defend the action in the interest of the ward, but is not a party for the purpose of establishing a personal liability against him.

10. SPENDTHRIFTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

All proceedings provided by statute relating to guardian and ward subsequent to the appointment of the guardian apply equally to the guardianship of a spendthrift.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Spendthrifts, §§ 13-10.]

11. GUARDIANS AND WARD—MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE.

The property of the ward is in the custody of the law, and is not subject to attachment or execution, and the estate is administered under the direction of the county court; the powers and duties of the guardian in the management of the estate and payment of debts being specified in the statute.

12. SPENDTHRIFTS—ACTIONS.

The liability of a spendthrift for alimony pending a divorce suit against him is not upon the contract of either the spendthrift or his guardian, but, if it exists at all, is statutory, and may be established in any competent court by judgment against the ward.

13. GUARDIAN AND WARD—ACTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

By B. & C. Comp. §§ 5276, 5277, the personal or real estate of the ward can be converted into cash only by proper proceedings under the direction of the county court, and so the enforcement of a judgment against the ward can be accomplished only through the county court, and not by process against either the ward's estate or the guardian.

14. SAME—RIGHTS OF ACTION AGAINST WARD.

In an action for divorce against a spendthrift husband, the marriage being a valid one and the complaint stating a cause of action for divorce, it is not erroneous to allow plaintiff suit money and support pending the trial, as provided by statute, there being no suggestion that the amount is so excessive as to constitute an abuse of discretion, merely because defendant is under guardianship.

15. SPENDTHRIFTS—ACTIONS—GUARDIANS.

In an action for divorce against a spendthrift husband, his guardian being made a party defendant, so as to subject the ward's estate to the payment of suit money and alimony, an order directing defendants to pay a certain amount as suit money and a specified sum monthly as temporary alimony pending the suit is erroneous as against the guardian, since debts against the ward can be enforced only against the estate, as provided by B. & C. Comp. § 5275, and not by process from the circuit court against the guardian or the ward's estate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla County; H. J. Bean, Judge.

Action for divorce by Ada V. Sturgis against Wm. P. Sturgis, a spendthrift; James A. Fee, his guardian, being a party defendant. From an order directing defendants to pay suit money and temporary alimony pending the suit, the guardian appeals. Decree reversed as to the guardian personally.

This is a suit for divorce and alimony. Defendant W. P. Sturgis was adjudged a spendthrift by the county court of Umatilla county in 1906, being then 24 years old, and Jas. A. Fee was appointed the guardian of his person and estate, which was of the value of about $10,000. Thereafter, while such guardianship continued, viz., on January 13, 1906, plaintiff and defendant Sturgis desired to intermarry, but said guardian refused his consent thereto; and for the purpose of avoiding the marriage laws of this state, of which they were residents, they thereupon went to the state of Washington, where they were married, returning immediately. The said guardian is made a party defendant for the purpose of subjecting the estate of the defendant Sturgis to the payment of suit money and alimony. The court made an intermediate order directing that defendant pay to the clerk of the court for plaintiff as suit money $600 and $50 per month as temporary alimony pending the suit, which order the guardian thereafter moved to set aside. Many affidavits were filed by the defendant in support of his motion, and counter affidavits by the plaintiff; said affidavits being directed to the question of the validity of the marriage, plaintiff's knowledge of the guardianship at the time of the marriage, and as to collusion between plaintiff and defendant Sturgis in the divorce suit for the purpose of wresting from the guardian part of the estate. Upon the hearing the court modified the order, and ordered and decreed that defendants pay to the clerk of the court forthwith $150 as suit money and $50 as temporary alimony the 15th of every month pending the suit, from which order defendant James A. Fee appeals.

John McCourt, for appellant. J. P. Winter, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is first insisted by the plaintiff that the order appealed from is not an appealable order. By the Constitution of this state (article 7, § 6) it is provided that: "The Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction only to revise the final decisions of the circuit courts." This provision of the Constitution, it is held in Portland v. Gaston, 38 Or. 533, 63 Pac. 1051, is not self-executing, and the cases that may be appealed must be prescribed by the Legislature, and therefore the provisions of the statute prescribing the cases that may or may not be appealed is conclusive. B. & C. Comp. § 547, as amended in 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 313, c. 162, § 6), provides that: "A judgment or decree may be reviewed as prescribed in this chapter, and not otherwise. An order affecting a substantial right and which in effect determines the action or suit so as to prevent a judgment or decree therein, or a final order affecting a substantial right, and made in a proceeding after judgment or decree, or setting aside a judgment and granting a new trial for the purpose of being reviewed, shall be deemed a judgment or decree." Section 548, Id., provides that: "Any party to a judgment or decree other than a judgment or decree given by confession, or for want of an answer, may appeal therefrom." The terms of this section are very general, and constitute no limitation upon the constitutional provision above quoted. Section 547, supra, after the first sentence, is not a limitation of the cases that may be appealed, but an enlargement thereof, by which certain orders are included within the term "judgment or decree." Therefore, if the judgment or decree comes within the terms of the Constitution, viz., a "final decision," it is appealable.

Without determining whether an interlocutory order for suit money, rendered against a party to the suit, is appealable, which is not necessary to this decision, it is clear that the order or decree here is a final decision as to Jas. A. Fee, the guardian. He is not a party to the litigation. The suit is properly only against the ward, but the guardian appears in his behalf to defend for him, and not to defend any proceeding against himself, as we shall see further on; and as the order or decree is against the guardian, and he has no personal interest in the litigation and no right to appeal from the final decree in the suit, his appearance being only for the ward, therefore the decree is final as to him. Furthermore, the decree is void as to the guardian, the court having no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against him, as no cause of action is alleged against him, and a void order or decree is appealable. Deering v. Quivey, 26 Or. 556, 38 Pac. 710. In this proceeding Jas. A. Fee alone appeals on his own behalf.

The validity of the marriage is questioned by the guardian upon the ground that it was consummated without his consent, and that, even if valid under the laws of the state of Washington, where it was solemnized, yet, both parties being domiciled in this state and having secured the marriage in Washington for the purpose of avoiding the marriage laws of this state, the marriage is void here. Section 5216, B. & C. Comp., provides that: "Marriage is a civil contract, which may be entered into by males of the age of eighteen years, and females of the age of fifteen years, who are otherwise capable." Section 5217, Id., prohibits certain marriages, viz., "when either party thereto had a wife or husband living at the time of such marriage; (2) when the parties thereto are first cousins or any nearer of kin to each other; (3) when either of the parties is a white person and the other a negro, or Mongolian, or a person of one-fourth or more of negro or Mongolian blood." Section 5218, Id., provides that: "When either party to a marriage shall be incapable of consenting thereto, for want of legal age or sufficient understanding or when the consent of either party shall be obtained by force, or fraud, such marriage is voidable, but only at the suit of the party laboring under the disability, or upon whom the force or fraud is imposed." Under chapter 8, relating to divorce proceedings, section 503, Id., provides that marriages declared voidable by section 5218, supra, shall be void from the time they are so declared by the decree. Section 502, Id., provides in effect that all marriages prohibited by section 5217, supra, "shall, if solemnized within this state, be absolutely void." Thus it will be seen by section 5218, supra, that the marriage of the plaintiff and defendant Sturgis, even if solemnized in this state, would not be void, but only voidable. The rule as gathered from the authorities seems to be that in general a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere, not only in other states generally, but in the state of the domicile of the parties, even when they have left their own state to marry elsewhere for the purpose of avoiding the laws of the state of their domicile.

There are two exceptions to this rule, viz., marriages which are deemed contrary to the law of nature as generally recognized in Christian countries, such as involve polygamy and incest, and marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity, either in express terms or by necessary implication, viz., such as are prohibited by section 5217, supra. Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 33 Atl. 317, 34 L. R. A. 773; State of Georgia v. Tutty (C. C.) 41 Fed. 753, 7 L. R. A. 50; Conn v. Conn, 2 Kan. App. 419, 42 Pac. 1006; Pennegar and Haney v. State, 87 Tenn. 245, 10 S. W. 305, 2 L. R. A. 703, 10 Am. St. Rep. 648; Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray (Mass.) 119; Ex parte Chace, 28 R. I. 351, 58 Atl. 978, 69 L. R. A. 493; Commonwealth of Mass. v. Graham, 157 Mass. 73, 31 N. E. 706, 16 L. R. A. 578, 34 Am. St. Rep. 25; Everett v. Morrison, 60 Hun (N. Y.) 146, 23 N. Y. Supp. 377. This distinction is also referred to in McLennan v. McLennan, 31 Or. 480, at page 483, 50 Pac. 802, at page 803, 38 L. R. A. 863, 65 Am. St. Rep. 835, where Mr. Justice Bean says: "There is a distinction made in the books between the marriage of divorced parties declared by law incapable of remarrying and a marriage in violation of some statutory prohibition penal in its nature. In the one case the marriage is absolutely void, and in the other it is often held to be valid, although the party may be punished criminally for violating the prohibitory statute." The marriage in this case does not come within the first exception, as being contrary to the law of nature as generally recognized in Christian countries, such as polygamy or those involving incest; neither is it one specially prohibited by our statute. B. & C. Comp. § 5217. Nor does our statute contemplate that such marriages as the one involved here shall be deemed void, but, if in violation of the statute, are only voidable.

If the marriage of a ward under guardianship takes place in this state without the consent of the guardian, it involves the violation of the law only as to ceremony, form, or qualification; and although the violation of the law in the issuance of the license, making the affidavit therefor, or by the officer in solemnizing the marriage, may subject the one so violating the law to punishment therefor, yet the marriage is not by reason thereof void. In Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray (Mass.) 119, 122, in discussing the statutory requirements as to the ceremony, form, and qualification, the court say: "But the effect of these and similar statutes is not to render such marriages, when duly solemnized, void, although the statutory requirements may not have been complied with." In Ex parte Chace, 26 R. I. 353, 58 Atl. 979, 69 L. R. A. 493, 494, in discussing the status of a minor who married in another state while under guardianship, the court say: "Furthermore, it is not clear that, even if the marriage had been solemnized in this state, it would have been void. Pub. Laws 1898-99, p. 49, c. 549, § 11, merely provides that no marriage license shall issue to a person under guardianship without the written consent of the guardian; but it by no means necessarily follows that a marriage procured without first obtaining such license would be void, although the official or other person who performed the ceremony might be liable to punishment under section 19 of the same chapter. Coming now to the case in hand, it requires no argument to show that, even if the marriage might have been void if solemnized in this state, it is nevertheless not such a union that it can in any sense be considered so subversive of good morals, or so threatening to the fabric of society, as to fall within the exception to the general rule regarding foreign marriages. In other words, if valid in Massachusetts, it is equally valid here." The case of Hills v. State, 61 Neb. 589, 85 N. W. 836, 57 L. R. A. 155, is to the same effect, and in an exhaustive note to that case in 57 L. R. A. 155, in discussing the matrimonial capacity of the parties, it is suggested that most of the decisions that seem to hold that the law of the domicile of the parties determines their matrimonial capacity "are reducible to one or the other of the exceptions * * * to the general principle that the validity of the marriage is to be determined by reference to the lex loci, namely, (1) marriages which are polygamous, or which are incestuous according to the general view of Christendom; (2) marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity. By the first exception the Christian standard of marriage is applied to every marriage wherever celebrated and without reference to the domicile of the parties at the time of its celebration. If the marriage falls below this standard, it will be held void, although it may be valid according to the lex loci and lex domicilii." We conclude, then, that the validity of the marriage is beyond question.

The question as to the collusion between plaintiff and defendant Sturgis to secure a divorce is one that should not be tried out by affidavit under this collateral issue, as it involves the merits of the suit for divorce. It can be made an issue in the case and tried upon the evidence; but plaintiff is entitled to a full hearing and the privilege of cross-examination of the defendant's witnesses.

But it is more difficult to determine the extent of the liability of the guardian in such a proceeding as this. A guardian's liability upon his own contracts for the benefit of the ward is personal, and the judgment of a court rendered for such a debt is against him personally, and not against the ward's estate (Pendexter v. Cole, 66 N. H. 556, 22 Atl. 560; Baird v. Steadman, 39 Fla. 40, 21 South. 572; Lewis v. Edwards, 44 Ind. 333; Sanford v. Phillips, 68 Me. 431; Rollins v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 116; Municipal Court v. Le Valley, 25 R. I. 236, 55 Atl. 640; 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. 77); and if he is compelled to pay such debt, and it was one properly made on behalf of his ward, the county court will allow it out of the ward's estate; but the liability of the estate in such a case is one to be settled in the county court. Pendexter v. Cole, supra. An action cannot be maintained against a guardian upon the liability of a ward, but only against the ward, and, the guardian being a proper party, he may appear and defend the action in the interest of the ward, but is not a party for the purpose of establishing a personal liability against him. Rollins v. Marsh, supra; Municipal Court v. Le Valley, supra; Raymond v. Sawyer, 37 Me. 406; Stumph v. Goepper, 78 Ind. 323; Baird v. Steadman, supra. We make no reference here to the question of the personal liability of a guardian ad litem or a general guardian for costs in a suit prosecuted or defended by him, if such litigation is decided adversely to him. All proceedings provided by statute relating to guardian and ward subsequent to the appointment of the guardian apply equally to the guardianship of a spendthrift. This statute makes no special provision in relation to actions or judgments against the guardian, the ward, or his estate. The property of the ward is in the custody of the law, and is not subject to attachment or execution (1 Freeman, Executions [3d Ed.] § 131; Harrington v. La Rocque, 13 Or. 344, 10 Pac. 498), and the estate is administered under the direction of the county court; the powers and duties of the guardian in the management of the estate and payment of debts being specified in the statute.

Without deciding whether an ordinary creditor of the ward's estate may, in the first instance, bring an action therefor, it appears that this is not a liability upon the contract of either the ward or the guardian; but, if there is a liability, it is statutory, and may be established in any competent court by judgment against the ward. Gregg v. Gregg, 48 Hun, 451, 1 N. Y. Supp. 453. The payment by the estate, if judgment is obtained, may depend upon various contingencies, such as whether the estate has available money, or it must be procured from the sale of personal assets or from the sale of real estate, or whether the estate is sufficient to pay all the debts and liabilities of the ward or can only make a pro rata payment and render it necessary that the payment even of a judgment be secured through the county court. By B. & C. Comp. § 5276, 5277, the personal or real estate of the ward can be converted into cash only by proper proceedings under the direction of the county court. Coffin v. Elisminger, 75 Iowa, 30, 39 N. W. 124; Bates v. Dunham, 58 Iowa, 310, 12 N. W. 309; Grant v. Humbert, 114 App. Div. 462, 100 N. Y. Supp. 44. This is the policy of our whole probate law with reference to estates of deceased persons, as well as to those under guardianship. Therefore the enforcement of a judgment against the ward can be accomplished only through the county court, and not by process against either the ward's estate or the guardian.

The marriage being valid, and assuming for the purposes of this proceeding that the complaint states a cause of suit for divorce, we see no reason why the plaintiff is not entitled to the provisional remedies of the statute, if otherwise entitled thereto, even though the defendant is under guardianship; and, in so far as the order of the court grants her suit money and support pending the trial as against the defendant Sturgis, there is no error, there being no suggestion that the amount is so excessive as to constitute an abuse of discretion by the lower court. But to the extent that the order is personal against the guardian it is erroneous. The order or judgment establishes the debt or liability against the ward; but it can be enforced only against the estate as provided by B. & C. Comp. § 5275, and not by process from the circuit court against the guardian or the ward's estate.

The decree will be reversed, in so far as it affects the guardian personally.

KINGSTON et al. v. WALTERS.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 17, 1908.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

The statute of frauds is in force in this territory.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Even where a contract required to be in writing, because it relates to the transfer of real estate, is verbally changed as to the time of payment, a court of equity will intervene and order a performance, when the refusal to assume jurisdiction on account of the statute of frauds would amount to permitting a fraud to be committed.

3. ACTION—FORM—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE.

Under our Code of Civil Procedure (Comp. Laws, § 2685), there is in this territory but one form of civil action, and a complaint will not be dismissed when it sets up a cause of action which is good either in law or equity, because the plaintiff has misconceived the nature of his remedial right, and has asked for a legal remedy when it should have been equitable, or for an equitable remedy when it should have been legal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, §§ 313-319.]

Parker, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Chaves County; before Justice W. H. Pope.

Action by John H. Kingston and W. D. Mahoney against J. W. Walters. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The record in this case discloses that on August 11, 1904, the defendant and plaintiffs entered into a written agreement regarding the sale and purchase of certain lands, which agreement is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"McMillan, N. M. Aug. 11th, 1904.

"Received of John H. Kingston and W. D. Mahoney, one hundred dollars, part payment for 400 acres of land located in section 19 and 20, in Twp. 19 S., range 26 E. There is to be $200 more paid on or before the 15th day from date.

"On payment of said $200 as stipulated the undersigned will place with the Citizens' National Bank of Roswell quit-claim deeds for said land to be delivered on payment of $900 on or before 90 days from date.

"Failure to make payments as stipulated works a forfeiture of amount paid.

"J. W. Walters."

The complaint sets out that at the same time and place mentioned in the written contract the defendant entered into and made a subsequent oral contract extending for the period of five days the time in which to make the second payment of $200, and that afterwards, on the 20th day of August, 1904, plaintiffs paid the defendant the sum of $100 to apply on said contract, and again, on August 31, 1904, plaintiffs were ready and willing to pay the remaining $100, to be paid within the time in which said $200 was to be paid, and were prevented from so doing by defendant, who absented himself from his usual place of business in Roswell, N. M., and remained absent for some time.

Plaintiffs also allege that they have always been ready and willing, and are still ready and willing, to fulfill said agreement, and that on November 9, 1904, at Roswell, N. M., they tendered to defendant the balance $1,000 of said purchase money, and requested a conveyance to the real estate, but defendant refused and still refuses to execute and deliver same to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs claim damages in the sum of $2,800. To the complaint the defendant demurred, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and, plaintiffs electing to stand on their demurrer, the cause was dismissed. Motion for rehearing was filed and overruled, and an appeal to the Supreme Court was granted.

Alexander J. Nisbet and D. D. Temple, for appellants. Richardson, Reid & Hervey, for appellee.

MILLS, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). To the complaint filed in this case the defendant demurred, and the principal ground relied on in the demurrer is the statute of frauds, defendant claiming that the complaint shows on its face that the entire contract sued on, and which concerned the transfer of lands, was not in writing, as the complaint sets out that a verbal alteration was made in the terms of the written contract by which the time for the payment of the second installment of the purchase price was extended, and that the complaint does not show that there was any consideration for the extension of the time of such payment. After argument the demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs refusing to plead further, although time was given them so to do, the action was dismissed.

This court has held that the statute of frauds, being general in its nature and not local to England, and forming a part of the common law, is in force in this territory. Childers v. Talbott, 4 N. M. 336, 16 Pac. 275.

As in this case the plaintiffs have only asked for monetary damages, and not for any equitable relief, prior to the introduction of the reformed system of pleading, the demurrer was undoubtedly well taken, for the Supreme Court of the United States has announced the doctrine to be that in common-law cases, "a written contract within the statute of frauds cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement of the parties unless such new agreement is also in writing." Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. (U. S.) 28, 16 L. Ed. 360; Swain v. Seamans, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 254, 19 L. Ed. 554.

It is also a well-settled rule that courts of equity are as much bound by the statute of frauds as courts of law, and that they cannot specifically enforce contracts embraced by the statute any more than courts of law can give damages for their nonperformance. But courts of equity have always been clothed with the salutary power of preventing fraud, or affording positive relief against its consequences; and this power they have not hesitated to exercise by compelling the specific execution of a verbal contract to which the provisions of the statute of frauds apply, where the refusal to exercise it would amount to practicing a fraud. Browne on Statute of Frauds (5th Ed.) § 437.

This case seems to us to come within the rule as laid down in Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818, where the court says: "But there are other principles, founded in justice, that must control the decision of the present case. Even where time is made material, by express stipulation" (and in the case at bar such is not the case), "the failure of one of the parties to perform a condition within the particular time limited will not in every case defeat his right to specific performance, if the conditions be subsequently performed, without unreasonable delay, and no circumstances have intervened that would render it unjust or inequitable to give such relief. The discretion which a court of equity has to grant or refuse specific performance, and which is always exercised with reference to the circumstances of the particular case before it (Hennessey v. Woolworth, 128 U. S. 438, 442, 9 Sup. Ct. 109, 32 L. Ed. 500), may, and of necessity must often, be controlled by the conduct of the party who bases his refusal to perform the contract upon the failure of the other party to strictly comply with its conditions (Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265, 279; Levy v. Lindo, 3 Merivale, 81, 84; Hudson v. Bart-ram, 8 Madd. 440, 447; Lilley v. Fifty Associates, 101 Mass. 432, 435; Potter v. Tuttle, 22 Conn. 512, 519. See, also, Ahl v. Johnson, 20 How. (U. S.) 511, 518, 15 L. Ed. 1005)."

Believing that this is a case of which a court administering equitable relief should take cognizance, provided it can do so under the pleadings, we will now proceed to briefly examine the complaint, to ascertain whether or not it sets up such a cause of action as would warrant the court to disregard the statute of frauds in order to prevent a fraud. In this territory the practice is no longer controlled by the common-law forms, for under our Code of Civil Procedure (section 2635, Comp. Laws 1897) there is but one form of civil action, and a plaintiff may unite in the same complaint several causes of action, both legal and equitable. In other words, under the reformed system of pleadings which our Legislature has adopted, litigants are given the relief which the facts in the pleadings show them to be entitled to in one action, whether the relief is equitable or legal, or both.

contained in it which is well pleaded, so we must of necessity examine the complaint to see if it sets up a cause of action which is good either in law or equity. It is immaterial that the prayer for relief only asks for a judgment for monetary damages, for it is not the prayer that the court looks to, but the facts as they appear in the body of the complaint. Some courts have gone so far as to hold that under the reformed system of pleading a complaint is good without any prayer for relief, and it now seems to be the well-settled doctrine that if a plaintiff has set forth facts constituting a cause of action, and entitling him to some relief, either legal or equitable, his action shall not be dismissed because he has misconceived the nature of his remediable right and has asked for a legal remedy when it should have been equitable, or for an equitable remedy when it should have been legal. In Emery v. Pease, 20 N. Y. 62, the complaint set out facts which entitled the plaintiff to an accounting, but did not ask for one. It did not aver any settlement, nor ascertain balance due, and demanded judgment for a sum certain. On the trial the case was dismissed, on the ground that it did not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Comstock, J., after stating the old rule by which the action would have been properly dismissed, proceeds: "In determining whether an action will lie, the courts are to have no regard to the old distinction between legal and equitable remedies. Those distinctions are expressly abolished. A suit does not, as formerly, fail because the plaintiff has made mistake as to the form of the remedy. If the case which he states entitled him to any remedy, either legal or equitable, his complaint is not to be dismissed because he has prayed for a judgment to which he is not entitled." The rule is tersely and accurately stated in Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514-520, 99 Am. Dec. 423, where the court says: "Legal and equitable relief are administered in the same form and according to the same general plan. A party cannot be sent out of court merely because his facts do not entitle him to relief at law, or merely because he is not entitled to relief in equity, as the case may be. He can be sent out of court only when upon his facts he is entitled to no relief, either in law or in equity." This doctrine is held in nearly all the states where codes of procedure or practice acts have been adopted, and is the general rule. Pomeroy, Code Remedies (4th Ed.) § 11, note 1. The complaint alleges that "at the same time and places set out in the written contract * * * the defendant entered into and made a subsequent oral contract extending for the period of five days the time in which to make the second payment of $200"; that on August 20, 1904, plaintiffs paid the defendant the further sum of $100 to apply on the contract, and on August 31, 1904, were ready and willing to pay the remaining $100, but that defendant absented himself from his usual place of business in Roswell, and remained absent for some time, thereby defeating said payment at that time. A tender of the balance of the purchase price is also alleged. As above remarked, the demurrer admits the truth of everything in the complaint which is well pleaded. It admits the payments of $100 on August 11, 1904, and a similar amount on August 20, 1904, before any of the second payment became due; it admits that the time of the second payment was orally extended, as alleged in the complaint, and that defendant absented himself from his usual place of business in Roswell, "and remained absent for some time, thereby defeating said payment at that time."

It is evident that the facts as set out in the complaint and admitted by the demurrer are such that a court of equity in order to prevent a fraud will take jurisdiction of this cause, take proofs, and, if the facts warrant it, order a specific performance of the contract, or, in lieu thereof, award plaintiffs damages, or, if the plaintiffs fail in their proof, enter a judgment in favor of defendant.

For the reasons given above, the cause is reversed and remanded to the district court of Chaves county for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion, and it is so ordered.

GAMMON v. GALLES.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 13, 1908.)

APPEAL—FROM PROBATE COURT—FINAL ORDER.

An appeal does not lie from a probate court to the district court, except from a final order, decision, or judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 329-343.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to District Court, Sierra County; before Justice Frank W. Parker.

In the matter of the estate of J. E. Gentz. Action by Willie E. Gammon against Louis W. Galles. From the judgment, Gammon appealed to the district court, and from a judgment dismissing the appeal he brings error. Affirmed.

A. N. Elliott, for plaintiff in error. Mark B. Thompson, for defendant in error.

MANN, J. It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the order from which plaintiff in error attempted to appeal to the district court of Sierra county was merely an interlocutory order, but counsel contends that under section 40, c. 81, p. 158, Sess. Laws 1901, appeals from such orders were authorized by the Legislature.

Prior to the enactment of chapter 81, supra, this court held in the case of Territory ex rel. Lee v. Hubbell, 9 N. M. 560, 58 Pac. 344, that an appeal did not lie from a merely interlocutory order of the probate court, and such is still undoubtedly the law, unless there is an express statutory authority for such appeals. Section 40, c. 81, p. 158, Sess. Laws 1901, reads as follows: "That any person aggrieved by any decision of any probate court of any county in this territory, may appeal to the district court of the county in which such decision may be rendered, by filing within ninety days of the rendering of any such decision with the clerk of such probate court a motion praying such appeal and a bond, with two or more sureties, conditioned that such appellant shall prosecute his said appeal with diligence and effect, and pay all costs of such appeal as shall lawfully be adjudged against him; and thereupon it shall be the duty of such probate clerk to prepare and forthwith transmit to the district court of said county all such papers and copies of all such records as such appellant shall in writing designate as necessary to be considered upon said appeal, and upon the receipt by the clerk of said district court of said papers from said probate clerk, the clerk of said district court shall docket said appeal and papers as a cause in said district court and thereafter said appeal, so docketed as aforesaid, shall be tried de novo and determined in said district court as other causes are therein tried and determined: Provided, that this section shall not affect any proceeding or proceedings now provided by law for the review in the district court of any decision of any probate court upon the approval or disapproval of any last will or testament." "In some jurisdictions appeals from enumerated interlocutory orders are authorized by statute; but, as such appeals are the creation of statute, they cannot be extended by implication, and will only lie when expressly authorized." 2 Cyc., and cases cited; Sutherland on Statutory Construction, §§ 393, 394.

It will be observed that the statute in question does not enumerate any interlocutory orders or decisions of the probate court from which appeals may be taken, but merely provides that any person aggrieved by any decision of any probate court in any county may appeal to the district court of the county in which the decision is rendered by following the regulations therein laid down. Nowhere in the statute does it appear that the Legislature had in mind an enlargement of the appellate jurisdiction of the district courts to include interlocutory orders or decisions of the probate court. In fact, it affirmatively appears that only a regulation of the mode of taking appeals was being provided. Already the district court had appellate jurisdiction over the probate courts under section 900, Comp. Laws 1897, and this act (section 40, c.

81, p. 158, Laws 1901) did not attempt to repeal section 900, Comp. Laws, but merely provided a method of taking the appeals therein provided for, and under which this court had held in Territory ex rel. Lee v. Hubbell, supra, that appeals from interlocutory orders of probate courts did not lie. It was said in Northpoint C. I. Co. v. Utah & Salt Lake Canal Co., 14 Utah, 155, 46 Pac. 824, and quoted by this court with approval in Jung v. Meyer, 11 N. M. 378, 68 Pac. 933: "It would be presuming too much to say that the framers of the Constitution were fearful that the Legislature would enact laws preventing appeals from final judgments, and that, therefore, this provision was inserted giving a guarantee of the right of appeal from final judgments, thus leaving to the Legislature the right to enact laws allowing appeals from interlocutory orders. Especially is this so when we consider the fact that nearly every state in the Union allows appeal from final judgments and restricts or prohibits appeal from interlocutory orders as being against the policy of the law. The framers of the Constitution could not have anticipated that the Legislature would do an unreasonable thing, and thus take away the right of appeal from a final judgment when the right has grown to be almost inherent, and yet use words sufficient to authorize it to do that which in most states is considered questionable and by eminent writers to be against the policy of the law."

It will be observed that section 3305 of the Compiled Laws, providing for appeals from justices of the peace to the district court, is in almost the identical language of the section in question. It reads that: "Any person aggrieved by any judgment rendered by any justice, may appeal," etc., "to the district court of the county where the same was rendered." Yet it would hardly be contended that an order of a justice of the peace dissolving an attachment or quashing a service merely interlocutory in its nature would be appealable under that statute. True, section 40, c. 81, p. 158, Laws 1901, uses the word "decision," instead of "judgment," as in section 3305, supra, but in the sense it is here used the meaning is the same. 13 Cyc. 427, and cases cited. 1 Bouvier (Rawles' Revision) 517.

The judgment of the district court dismissing the appeal was right, and is affirmed.

MILLS, C. J., and McFIE, POPE, and ABBOTT, JJ., concur. PARKER, J., having heard the cause below, did not sit.

McKENZIE v. KING.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 17, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE — BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

Section 3031 of the Compiled Laws of New Mexico of 1897 supplemented the law governing the introduction of books of account in evidence, but did not destroy or wholly supersede it, and the conditions imposed by it do not apply to books kept by a clerk of the one in whose business they were kept, if such clerk is produced as a witness and testifies that he made the entries in the account offered in evidence as bookkeeper in the regular course of business and substantially at the time of the transactions recorded.

2. APPEAL — REVIEW — OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

This court will not ordinarily reverse the judgment of a trial court for error in the admission of evidence, unless the objection made to its admission at the trial was well founded, although on other grounds it might have been inadmissible.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Union County; before Chief Justice William J. Mills.

Action by John King against Alexander McKenzie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action on a promissory note given by the defendant, McKenzie, here the appellant, to the firm of H. J. Collins & Co., September 18, 1901, payable December 1, 1901. At the time when the note was given, the plaintiff, King, here the appellee, was a member of the firm of H. J. Collins & Co., which was dissolved November 23, 1901. The plaintiff alleged the making of the note to Collins & Co., that it was transferred to him with the other property of that firm November 23, 1901, and had not been paid. The defendant admitted the making of the note to Collins & Co., but alleged that he paid it October 28, 1901, to Collins, the other member of the firm, and that if it was transferred to the plaintiff, which he did not admit, it was with full knowledge on the plaintiff's part that it had already been paid. The case was tried with a jury at the March, 1906, term of the district court of Union county, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled and judgment entered on the verdict, from which the defendant appealed.

Charles A. Spless and S. B. Davis, Jr., for appellant. J. Leahy, for appellee.

ABBOTT, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the brief for the appellant but two of the errors assigned in his behalf are discussed, and only those need be considered.

The first is the admission of evidence of certain entries in the ledger of H. J. Collins & Co., relating to the account between said firm and the defendant; the contention of the appellant being that it was, in effect, the admission of the plaintiff's books of account, and that the statute requirements for such admission had not been met. Even if the contention for the appellee be sound that the entries objected to were offered to corroborate the testimony of the bookkeeper, Gaylord, that no interest had been paid on the note, and not for the purposes covered by the statute, and so were not subject to the conditions imposed by it, yet we prefer to deal with the question broadly, and declare what seems to us to be the rational and necessary meaning of the important statute in question. Section 3031 of the Compiled Laws of 1897. It provides that "the books of account of any merchant, shopkeeper, etc., may be admitted in evidence as proof of such accounts upon the following conditions: First. That he kept no clerk or else the clerk is dead or inaccessible. Second. Upon proof, the party's oath being sufficient, that the book tendered is the book of original entries. Third. Upon proof, by his customers, that he usually kept correct books. Fourth. Upon inspection by the court to see if the books are free from any suspicion of fraud." The contention for the appellant is that these four conditions must in all cases "be complied with before books of account can be admitted in evidence in this territory"; that is, that the statute superseded whatever law theretofore existed on the subject. That there are expressions in opinions by this court which lend support to that claim cannot be denied; but we think that, so far as they have come to our notice, they were inadvertent, and not essential to the conclusions reached in the decisions in which they occur. The argument for the appellant as to the applicability of the first condition in the case at bar leads to a conclusion so manifestly against reason that we are forced to question the soundness of its premises. "There is no proof that H. J. Collins & Co. kept no clerk. In fact, the proof is exactly to the contrary, that the firm did keep a clerk who was present and testified;" and thereby the contention is the book was rendered inadmissible. This is on the assumption that the statute contains the entire law of New Mexico on the subject. To so hold would be to say that the best kept and most reliable books of account in the territory cannot be used in evidence solely because those who were employed to keep them because of their skill, who have no interest in the litigation in which it is sought to use the books, are present or obtainable as witnesses, while books unskillfully kept by the parties to the litigation themselves may be introduced in evidence. Such an intention could not be imputed to the Legislature, unless it is clearly necessary. An examination of the statute itself and of the law on the subject as it was when the statute was enacted relieve us of that necessity. The statute is not in terms exclusive. It provides that books of account may be admitted in evidence on certain conditions, but not that they shall be admitted only on those conditions. That it was designed to supplement, and not to abolish the rule of law that already existed, is in accord with the principle of construction usually applied in such cases. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1520; Lewis' Suth. Stat. Con. §§ 267, 487. And, as we have seen, the adoption of the opposite view of its meaning would lead to a manifest absurdity. At the time the statute was enacted it had "long been the common-law rule that entries made in the regular course of business in shop books, by the clerk or agent of a person, are, with proper restrictions, admissible in evidence after the death of such clerk on proof of his handwriting," and this has been extended by the general practice of the American courts to the admission of such entries during the life of the person who made them when authenticated by his oath. This has been done sometimes on the ground of necessity, and sometimes on the view that the entries are a part of the acts they purport to record; in other words, a part of the res gestæ. Jones on Evidence, § 582; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (12th Ed., 1866) § 117 et seq. Wigmore, § 1560, however, declares that the modern and sound basis of admission of such entries is that they are the records of past recollections. To be such, they must, of course, have been made when the one who made them did have the knowledge on which they were based, not necessarily, for instance, of an actual sale made in a great mercantile establishment, but of the fact that such a sale was reported to him by one whose business it was to make and report such sales in the course of his employment there, and that he, the bookkeeper, made the entry in the course of his employment at the time. Obviously it is impossible that any one should remember for any great length of time more than an inconsiderable fraction of the transactions which occur in the immense business houses of to-day, and the doctrine advanced by the learned author we have quoted commends itself to us as sound in theory and necessary in practice. The general removal in this country of the disqualification to testify in his own behalf of a party to a suit had the effect of allowing the introduction in evidence of his books kept by himself on the same ground on which those kept for him by his clerk were admitted. That proved to be open to serious objections. Such, then, having been the state of the law, the purpose of such statutes as that under consideration becomes obvious. For one who would produce books of account, kept in the regular course of his business by a clerk who was present to testify to the entries he had made, the law remained as it was; but, if he offers in evidence merely the books without the testimony of a clerk who kept them, he must conform to the conditions prescribed by the statute, and prove that he had no clerk, or, if he kept one, that he cannot be produced as a witness. He must also prove by his customers that he usually kept correct books, and the court must be satisfied upon inspection of the books that they are free from any suspicion of fraud. The provision for proof that the book tendered is the book of original entry made no substantial change in the law as it then was. In the case at bar the witness Gaylord testified that he kept the account which was admitted in evidence as bookkeeper for the firm of H. J. Collins & Co., and, after its dissolution, for the plaintiff.

The defendant offered in evidence two receipts from said firm which he claimed had a bearing on the issues between the parties. The entries which were admitted in evidence tended to explain those receipts and some of them related directly to the note in suit. We think there was no error in admitting the account.

It is objected in the brief for the appellant, although that question was not very clearly raised at the trial, that the ledger containing the account in question was not a book of original entry. It appeared that the entries which were especially in point were copied into the ledger from loose slips of paper on which they were originally made in duplicate, and that the slips retained by the plaintiff or his firm had been destroyed by fire. As to those entries, the ledger was a book of original entry within the meaning of the law. Jones on Evidence, § 584.

The appellant further claims that the trial court erred in refusing to strike out as hearsay the testimony of a witness for the plaintiff, O. T. Toombs, who acted as attorney in the matter of the dissolution of the firm of Collins & Co., that he saw the note in question on the list of the property of the firm which had been prepared for the purpose of enabling the partners to make a "give or take" offer. The objection made to the admission of the evidence at the time it was offered was that it was not "material," and the appellant cannot now be allowed to substitute a different objection. Coleman v. Bell, 4 N. M. 21, 27, 12 Pac. 657; Lamy v. Catron, 5 N. M. 373, 380, 23 Pac. 773; Coler v. Board of County Commissioners, 6 N. M. 88, 115, 27 Pac. 619; Pearce v. Strickler, 9 N. M. 467, 471, 54 Pac. 748.

Under the pleadings in the case, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the note had been transferred to him by Collins & Co., and that he was the sole owner of it at the time suit was brought. He testified that, when he took over the property of Collins & Co., November 23, 1901, the note was there, and was examined as a part of the property, and was then delivered to him either by Collins, or by Toombs, as his attorney. If the note was listed, as Toombs testified it was, that certainly tended to corroborate the plaintiff on a material question.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

STEARNS-ROGER MFG. CO. et al. v. AZTEC GOLD MIN. & MILL. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 13, 1908.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—EVIDENCE.

Under the facts disclosed by the record, it is held that the appellees were entitled to mechanics' liens for the material furnished and the labor performed by them, respectively.

2. SAME—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

The trial court did not err in holding that the lien extended to the Aztec mine as well as the mill site, where the evidence showed the title in the same parties, and that the one was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the other, and that the mill and mine were connected by a tramway, the mill being used and capable of being used only for the sole purpose of treating the ores extracted from the mine, under our statute which makes it the duty of the trial court to determine upon what amount of land the lien attaches in rendering judgment.

3. SAME—POSTING NOTICE—LIEN OF MORTGAGE.

The mortgagee of a mortgage, or the trustee and cestuis que trust of a trust deed in the nature of a mortgage, have no such interest in the real estate upon which a mechanic's lien is claimed as to compel them to post the notice required under section 2226, Comp. Laws, where the mortgage or trust deed was given and duly recorded as required by law, prior to the time the work was performed, or the materials commenced to be furnished for which the mechanic's lien is claimed.

4. SAME—CORPORATIONS—NOTICE TO MANAGER.

Notice to the general manager of a corporation of the erection of improvements upon the lands owned by it, or to which it has or claims some interest, is sufficient notice to the corporation, so that its interest will be subject to a mechanic's lien in the absence of the posting of the notice required by section 2226, Comp. Laws 1897.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"GENERAL MANAGER."

A "general manager" is the person who has the most general control of the affairs of a corporation, with knowledge of its business and property, and who can act in emergencies on his own responsibility, and may be considered the principal officer.

Appeal from District Court, Colfax County; before Chief Justice William J. Mills.

Action by the Stearns-Roger Manufacturing Company and others against the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and decree rendered.

This is a suit brought by appellees the Stearns-Roger Manufacturing Company, a corporation of Denver, Colo., and one Smith McKay, also of Denver, to foreclose certain mechanics' liens claimed by them on a certain mine in Colfax county known as the "Aztec Mine" and the mill site adjoining said Aztec mine, together with the mill and machinery, tramway, etc., in and about said mine and mill. The Stearns-Roger Company claims a lien by virtue of certain materials and machinery furnished by it to the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company for use in said mill and a tramway which connects said mill and the working shaft of the Aztec mine, while McKay claims his lien by reason of labor performed and furnished by him in supervising and constructing the mill, hereinbefore referred to. The record and pleadings are quite voluminous, but the principal facts appearing thereby are as follows:

The Aztec mine and the adjoining mill site are situated on the Maxwell land grant, and the fee to an undivided seven-twelfths interest hereto is in said company. Some time in the year 1884 the Maxwell Land Grant Company executed a lease on their interest in said Aztec mine to one Valentine S. Shelby for 35 years. The remaining five-twelfths of the Aztec lode or mine appears to have been vested in James Lynch and Thomas B. Catron, and on August 15, 1893, Shelby, Lynch, and Catron, who then appear to have been the joint owners of the lease from the Maxwell Company to Shelby, and of the remaining five-twelfths of the fee, conveyed the same, viz., the undivided five-twelfths of the Aztec lode or mine and the lease, to one Clinton Butterfield, which deed was duly acknowledged and recorded in the same month, and on the same day Butterfield executed a deed of trust to Henry F. Moote, trustee of Valentine S. Shelby, James Lynch, and Thomas B. Catron, on the same property to secure the sum of $135,000, as shown by the terms thereof. This deed of trust was duly filed for record and recorded in the records of Colfax county, N. M., August 16, 1893. It further appears (although the deed is not set out in the record) that Butterfield in some manner transferred and conveyed all his interest in the Aztec mine or lode to the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company about the 21st of September, 1903. As the deed of trust from Butterfield to Moore is of vital interest in the outcome of this case, we set it out in full, as follows:

"This indenture made this fifteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, between Clinton Butterfield, of the county of Arapahoe and state of Colorado, party of the first part, and Henry F. Moore, of Trinidad, Las Animas county, Colorado, trustee, party of the second part, witnesseth: That said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained and sold, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell and convey unto said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, all the following described real estate in the county of Colfax and territory of New Mexico, to wit: The undivided five-twelfths (5/12) part of that certain mine, quartz, lode or lead situate on the eastern slope of Baldy Mountain, near the head of Ute creek, and known and called by the name of the Aztec mine, being three thousand feet in length and extending in direction nearly east and west, as far as can be ascertained without an exact survey, being the same lead or lode discovered by Timothy Faley, Mathew Lynch and Mamey Dougherty, and extending two thousand feet on the eastern side of the discovery shaft sunk on said lead from said shaft and one thousand feet on the western side of the discovery shaft from said shaft, said mine and quartz, lode or lead, being situate and lying within the limits of the grant and tract of land formerly known and called the Beaubien and Miranda grant, and now better known and called by the name of the Maxwell land grant, together with all the dips, spurs, angles and variations thereof, and with all the rights of water, timber and other privileges appertaining and belonging thereto; also, the leasehold estate of the party of the first part in and to the undivided seven-twelfths (7/12) of said mine and tract of land which the said party of the first part holds and owns by virtue of an assignment of that certain deed or lease made and executed by the Maxwell Land Grant Company, on the 16th day of July, A. D. 1884, to and in favor of Valentine S. Shelby for the period of thirty-five years from said 16th day of July, 1884, together with the reversion, reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits of all and singular the said premises and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances. To have and to hold unto the said party of the second part his heirs and assigns forever; in trust, nevertheless, to the intent and purpose following, to wit:

"Whereas, the said Clinton Butterfield has made, executed and delivered his three (3) certain promissory notes, bearing even date herewith, payable to Valentine S. Shelby, James Lynch, and Thomas B. Catron, or order, for the sum of one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars ($135,000) the first of said notes being for the principal sum of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) and payable on or before January 15, 1894, the second of the notes being for the principal sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) payable on or before July 1, 1894, and the last of said notes being for the principal sum of seventy thousand dollars ($70,000) payable on or before January 1, 1895, with interest thereon in the manner following to wit: On said first note for fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) from July 1, 1893, until paid at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, on said note for fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) from date until January 1st, 1894, at six per cent. (6%) per annum, and after January 1, 1894, at twelve per cent. (12%) per annum, and on said note for seventy thousand dollars ($70,000) at the rate of six per cent. (6%) per annum from date until July 1, 1894, and on twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) thereof at the rate of twelve per cent. (12%) per annum from January 1, 1894, and with interest upon all of said notes after maturity at 12 per cent. per annum principal and interest payable at the office of the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company, Denver, Colorado. And the party of the first part, for himself, his heirs and assigns, agrees that he or they will, on or before the 25th day of each and every month, commencing with the month of September, 1893, deposit in the Colorado National Bank, Denver, the amount of the net earnings of said mine for the then preceding month, such net earnings to include all earnings over and above the cost of development, maintenance, operation and all necessary improvements placed upon said property from and after the date when the party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, shall take possession thereof and it being agreed that such improvements shall remain upon and shall become part and parcel of said premises, the amount of such net earnings, when as received by said bank shall be credited and applied upon said note for fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) in reduction thereof, and in order to enable said bank to make such application said note for fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) shall be deposited in said bank and shall be held by it until the amount of said net earnings shall be sufficient to cancel and discharge said note, whereupon it shall be delivered up to the said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns. Provided, however, that if the amount of such net earnings shall not have been sufficient to cancel such note on or before the 15th day of March, 1894, it shall then be delivered up to the said Shelby, Lynch and Catron, their heirs and assigns.

"Now, therefore, if the said party of the first part shall well and truly pay said notes when the same shall become due and payable according to their tenor and effect, with interest as aforesaid, then this indenture shall become void and of no effect, but in case default be made in the payments of the said notes or either of them or the interest thereon or any part of such principal or interest, then the party of the second part may at any time thereafter take possession of said property and the improvements which may then be thereon, give notice by advertisement published once each week for four successive weeks in one weekly newspaper then published in said county of Colfax, and in one weekly newspaper published in the city of Denver, Colorado, that he will sell the premises, property and improvements therein conveyed by public outcry, at a day and hour to be by him fixed, at the front door of the building at that time used as a courthouse in said county of Colfax, and territory of New Mexico, for cash, to the highest and best bidder, and thereupon shall proceed to sell the same according to the terms of such notice, and shall make, execute, acknowledge and deliver to the purchaser at such sale a good and sufficient deed in fee simple, absolute, conveying the hereinbefore described premises, without liability, upon such purchaser for the subsequent disposition of the proceeds of such sale, provided, nevertheless, that no sale of said premises shall be made by reason of such default in the payment of said notes or either of them or the interest thereon, until ninety (90) days after such defaults have occurred; and out of the proceeds of such sale, the said trustee shall pay, first, the costs incident to such notices, sale and conveyance, together with a reasonable attorney's fee; second, the amount of said notes and interest remaining unpaid or so much thereof, as such proceeds shall amount to, and the balance, if any, he shall pay to the party of the first part, his heirs and assigns. In case of default in the payment of any one or more of said notes or the interest thereon when the same shall become due and payable according to the terms thereof, and such default shall continue for the period of ninety (90) days from and after the date when such notes shall become due and payable according to the terms thereof, then the whole of said notes shall become immediately, thereupon, due and payable.

"In witness whereof the said party of the first part has hereunto set his hand and seal.

On September 4, 1894, the Maxwell Land Grant Company entered into a contract of sale with the Aztec Gold Mining Company to sell said company its seven-twelfths interest in the Aztec lode and other property adjoining and surrounding same, containing in all about 320 acres of land, reserving some property included in the boundaries, but including the Aztec mine, and, as we understand it, the mill site and all other property involved in this suit. In March, 1894, the Aztec Company having acquired the Butterfield interests to the Aztec lode or mine, contracted with the Stearns-Roger Company for certain tramway material, stampmill material, and mill extras, and stock material, amounting in all, to $17,332.96. Of this sum all was paid except a balance of $5,000, and on December 8, 1894, the Stearns-Roger Company filed a verified statement for a lien, and on said date filed a duly verified statement for a further mechanic's lien of $810.41 as a balance due it for further machinery sold and furnished over and above that enumerated in the written contract of March, 1894. On June 14, 1894, the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company entered into a contract with one Smith McKay, as follows:

"This agreement made and entered into this 14th day of June, A. D. 1894, by and between Smith McKay, of the city of Denver, state of Colorado, party of the first part, and the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Colorado, party of the second part, witnesseth: Said party of the first part hereby agrees: First, to furnish all tools, labor, and to pay all expense of every character for such labor, for the erection complete, of a certain 40 stampmill on site to be selected by the party of the second part, which said mill is more fully described in a certain contract between the said party of the second part and the Stearns-Roger Manufacturing Company, and by a certain set of drawings furnished by the Stearns-Roger Manufacturing Company, all the machinery, with pipings, settings, whether of timber or masonry, and the placing of all bolts, and in short, the complete erection of all the machinery comprising the said mill from the grizzly through to the copper tables; to start up and run said machinery complete for a term of not less than ten (10) days, and to turn over same to the satisfaction of said party of the second part, or its representatives, subject, however, to the proviso herein-after contained. And said party of the first part hereby guarantees that should any part of the work be wrong or incomplete that he will at his expense make same good. Second, to supervise the construction of the mill building as per plans furnished by the Stearns-Roger Manufacturing Company, or such modifications of such plans as may be agreed upon by the parties hereto. In consideration of which the said party of the second part hereby agrees to furnish to said party of the first part all materials of every character whatsoever for the construction of the mill building, the machinery and the material for the setting thereof, as above specified, to be delivered on the site of the mill to said party of the first part, and pay unto said party of the first part the sum of three thousand dollars (\$3,000.00) as follows, to wit: One-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) on the completion of the boilers set in place, and of the engine foundation, and of the stamp battery foundation; one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) on completion of the stamp battery frame with stamp-mill set in place, and of the pulleys, boxes and line shafts; balance on the satisfactory completion and turning over of the entire work in first class running order. In witness whereof said parties have hereunto attached their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"By Sherman G. Sackett, Supt."

On December 11, 1894, McKay filed a duly verified statement and claim of lien for a balance of $575, claimed to be due him on his contract. These mechanics' liens are all claimed on the mill site where said mill was situated, and also on the Aztec lode or mine, and it is alleged that they were all filed within 90 days from the completion of the contracts or furnishing of the materials as above set forth. This suit was brought to foreclose the mechanics' liens thus claimed, and the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company, the Maxwell Land Grant Company, James Lynch, receiver, Henry F. Moore, trustee, Valentine S. Shelby, James Lynch, and Thomas B. Catron are made defendants. The case was referred to a master who found for the lien claimants, and his findings of fact and conclusions of law were in the main confirmed, and a decree entered in favor of the appellees sustaining their liens and adjudging them first and prior to the lien of the trust deed from Butterfield to Moore, and from the decree of the district court of Colfax county appellants, the Maxwell Land Grant Company, Thomas B. Catron, and Mary Lynch, administratrix of the estate of James Lynch, deceased, bring the case here for review on appeal.

T. B. Catron, C. A. Spiess, and E. V. Long, for appellants. W. L. Hartman, C. A. Bailreick, and Veeder & Veeder, for appellees.

MANN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Counsel in this case have filed very able and exhaustive briefs discussing and presenting every phase and feature of the mechanic's lien laws, and indeed nearly every possible question arising under that branch of the law has been raised by the record in this case, making it necessary for the court to examine at some length our mechanic's lien laws in order to answer the following questions presented: (1) Did the Stearns-Roger Company acquire a mechanic's lien for the materials furnished the Aztec Mining & Milling Company, and did McKay acquire such lien for the labor furnished and performed by him for such company? (2) If such liens were acquired, what property was subjected thereto? (3) Were such liens, if acquired, superior to the trust deed from Butterfield to Moore, trustee, for the benefit of Shelby, Catron, and Lynch? (4) Was the interest of the Maxwell Land Grant Company subject to such liens? While the case may be disposed of before all of these questions are disposed of, yet they are all fairly raised and argued by counsel in the briefs that we feel they are entitled to the full consideration of the court, especially as they are of vital interest to a complete understanding of the mechanic's lien law of the territory.

Taking up, then, the first question referred to, it is contended by counsel for appellants that the contract having been made in Colorado, and, as they contend, performed there by delivery of the materials f. o. b. at Pueblo, in Colorado, it thereupon became the property of the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company, in Colorado, and was placed in the mill and tramway as the property of the Aztec Company, and that therefore no lien attaches, the sale and delivery being complete, and the property being vested in the Aztec Company before it entered the territory where the lien must attach, if at all. Section 2217, Comp. Laws, provides that "every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration or repair of any mining claim, building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road or aqueduct to create hydraulic power, or any other structure, or who performs labor in any mining claim, has a lien upon the same for the work or labor done or materials furnished by each respectively, whether done or furnished at the instance of the owner of the building or other improvement, or his agent, and every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of any mining, or of the construction, alteration or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement, as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this act." This court passed upon the very question presented upon the furnishing and delivery of materials outside the territory in Genest v. Las Vegas Bldg. Ass'n, 11 N. M. 251, 67 Pac. 743. In that case Mr. Justice Crumpacker, delivering the opinion of the court, says (pp. 269, 270 of 11 N. M., p. 743 of 67 Pac.): "It is fifthly contended by counsel for appellants that as the contract between the Newton Lumber Company and the Contractor Kean was made out of the territory, and the materials used in the construction of the building were delivered by it to the contractor, f. o. b. cars Pueblo, no lien in the company's favor can arise under the New Mexico statute. We are of the opinion that under the circumstances presented by the record in this case the rights of the subcontractor to enforce the lien claimed are not destroyed or impaired by the fact that by said contract the Newton Lumber Company agreed to and did sell and deliver the goods in another state. It appears from the complaint, the copy of notice of lien therein set forth, and the proofs that the Newton Lumber Company agreed to furnish the materials for use in the construction of the building, and that it agreed to perform certain labor to and for the Contractor Kean and for use in the construction and completion of said Masonic Temple, and that it did so furnish the material, perform certain work in Las Vegas on the building, put up the stairs, set the front, and finish the Montezuma Club. * * * It is the furnishing of materials to be used in the construction and the putting them into the building which entitles the subcontractor to the lien upon the premises to the extent of the value of that material. The case cited by counsel for appellants of Birmingham Iron Foundry v. Glencon Starch Mfg. Co., 78 N. Y. 30, is under a statute much more restrictive in its terms than ours, * * * and these cases are therefore not a guide to correct judgment in the present case. The statute of New Mexico is general, and does not restrict the right of lien to cases where materials are sold and delivered in this territory, and we conclude that the contention of counsel for appellants in this regard is not tenable. Malory et al. v. Abbatoir Co., 80 Wis. 170, 49 N. W. 1071; Campbell v. Coon, 149 N. Y. 556, 44 N. E. 300, 33 L. R. A. 410; Gaty v. Casey et al., 15 Ill. 189." We have quoted extensively from this case for the reason that it discusses and decides the very point raised by counsel, and seems to us sound in principle and fully sustained by authority. 27 Cyc.—citing Great Western Mfg. Co. v. Hunter, 15 Neb. 32, 16 N. W. 759; Parker Land, etc., Co. v. Reddick, 18 Ind. App. 616, 47 N. E. 848; Badger Lumber Co. v. Mayes, 38 Neb. 822, 57 N. W. 519; Mallory v. La Crosse Abattoir Co., 80 Wis. 170, 49 N. W. 1071; Atkins v. Little, 17 Minn. 342 (Gil. 320). But counsel contend that the contract between the Aztec Company and the Stearns-Roger Company does not show specifically that the materials were to be used in the construction of the identical stampmill and tramway in question, the same not being described or mentioned in the written contract set out in the claim of lien and in the complaint, and that therefore it cannot be shown by parol that such materials were to be used. We think, however, that as a written contract is wholly unnecessary to entitle appellees to its liens, under the statutes of the territory, it may show by parol testimony, which neither disputes nor alters the terms of the writing, that such material was furnished for use in the construction of the improvement of the property on which the lien is claimed. The written contract not being the basis of the action, it may be shown by any competent proof, the contract need not describe the land unless the statute requires it. 27 Cyc. Law & Pro. 69—citing Montandon v. Deas, 14 Ala. 33, 48 Am. Dec. 84; Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 1111; San Diego Lumber Co. v. Wooldredge, 90 Cal. 574, 27 Pac. 431. See, also, Mountain Electric Co. v. Miles, 9 N. M. 512, 56 Pac. 284. The bill and notice of lien state specifically that the materials were furnished for the identical mill and tramway in controversy, and this is sustained by the oral evidence of the witness Stearns (page 51, Record) and other witnesses, including the correspondence between the parties, and there seems to be no doubt from the evidence that the materials were duly received by the Aztec Company and placed in the mill and tramway. The notices of lien of the Stearns-Roger Company were filed within the time required by law, as found by the trial court, and we see nothing in the record that would justify a reversal of that finding. As to the McKay lien, the contention of counsel is that part of his services were for superintendence and part for labor, and that he cannot acquire a lien for superintendence, and, further, that as his notice of lien does not disclose what portion was for actual labor performed, and what part was for superintendence, therefore he cannot maintain his lien, and in support of their contention counsel cite the case of Boyle v. Mountain Key Mining Co., 9 N. M. 237, 50 Pac. 347. We think, however, that the distinction between the nature of the employment between Boyle in that case and McKay in the case at bar is clearly distinguishable, and that the right of the latter to a lien for his services is clear. In the case of Mining Co. v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 176, 28

L. Ed. 704, cited with approval by this court in the Boyle Case, Mr. Justice Woods used the following language, which is applicable to this case: "The finding of the district court makes clear the character of the services rendered by the defendant in error. He was not the general agent of the mining business of the plaintiff in error. That office was filled by Patrick. He was not a contractor. His services were not of a professional character, such as those of a mining engineer. He was the overseer and foreman of a body of miners who performed manual labor on the mine. He planned and personally superintended and directed the work, with a view to develop the mine and make it a successful venture. His duties were similar to those of a foreman of a gang of track hands upon a railroad, or of a force of mechanics engaged in building a house." In the Boyle Case the lien claimant was the general superintendent of the mining company on a salary of $3,000 per year, and had general oversight of the company's business, its mine, mill, boarding house, etc., and was in fact a salaried general agent of the company, not charged with a special oversight of the improvement of the property itself as the foreman of certain development work, while under this contract McKay was charged by his contract with the erection of this mill by a certain set of drawings furnished him by the Aztec Company, thus showing that he was engaged in the personal oversight of building the mill according to plans and specifications furnished him. The difference in the two cases is obvious, and we think there can be no question but McKay was and is entitled to a lien for the services performed by him.

2. Having decided that the Stearns-Roger Company and McKay were each entitled to mechanics' liens under the statute of the territory, the next question which naturally arises is, to what property do such liens attach? It will be observed that the stampmill which McKay built for the Aztec Company and the materials for which, in the way of machinery, were furnished by the Stearns-Roger Company, was located about 1,000 feet from the mouth of the tunnel or working shaft of the Aztec mine. It is described in the latter's claim for lien as being "situated at a point 1,350 feet south 53° 30' west, from the southeast corner No. 1 of the Aztec mining claim or lode," and as that lode ran 3,000 feet in an easterly and westerly direction the mill was not located between the side lines of lode claim, if indeed there were any well-established surface lines. There was, however, a tramway from the mouth of the tunnel or workings on the Aztec mine from which the ores were taken to the mill, and as the materials for this tramway were furnished by the Stearns-Roger Company, and as both the Stearns-Roger Company and McKay claim that the Aztec mine is "required for the convenient use and occupation" of the mill, they claim that their lines attach to the mine as well as the mill site. The master to whom this case was submitted found as one of his findings of fact as follows: "Eighteenth. That said 40 stampmill, mill building, tramway, tracks, and all other of said buildings, erections, and improvements were made, constructed, and erected under one general design and plan, and all to be used solely for the purpose of altering, constructing, and repairing said mining claim, and for working and developing the same and extracting the ores from said Aztec mine, and for transporting the same to said mill, and for treating such ores and extracting the gold therefrom, in and by said 40 stampmill, and that said mine and mill are of very little value or practical utility separate and apart from each other, and that therefore said Aztec lode or mining claim and said mill site or tract of land adjacent to said Aztec lode, and on which said mill is located, together with said mill, mill building, tramway, track, and other improvements constitute and are 'one mining claim,' and that all of the said Aztec lode or mining claim, and all of said mill site or tract of land adjacent thereto, on which said mill or other erections and tramway are located, are necessary for the convenient use, occupation, operation, and enjoyment of said mining claim or Aztec lode, and also are necessary for the convenient use, occupation, and operation of said tramway and 40 stampmill." The amount of land upon which the building, improvement, or structure is constructed, and which is to be included in the lien, is to be "so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment." Section 2219, Comp. Laws, 1897. Under the pleadings and proofs in this case it appears quite clearly that the fee to all this land, including the mill site and Aztec mine or lode, was in either the Maxwell Land Grant Company or the Aztec Gold Mining & Milling Company, and that that portion to which the former company held the fee the latter company held and occupied under lease or contract at the time the improvements were made. It was perfectly competent for the trial court to determine the amount of land to which the liens should attach in rendering judgment, and it did do so by adopting and confirming the master's report. As is said in Springer Land Association v. Ford, 168 U. S. 513, 530, 18 Sup. Ct. 170, 176 (42 L. Ed. 562): "The truth is that what area of land is subject to lien in a given case depends upon the character of the improvement." The Supreme Court of the United States was then construing the very statute here under consideration, and it held that the lien for building and constructing the ditch system there involved covered the entire amount of lands irrigated by the system, saying of the land and ditches: "Each was dependent upon the other, and both were bound together in the accomplishment of a common purpose," viz., the irrigation of the lands susceptible of irrigation from the system of ditches which were the improvements on which the lien claimants there contended for a lien. In the case at bar the findings of the master, which were adopted and confirmed by the court, are to the same effect, and we cannot say that from the pleadings and record before us such finding was not justified. If the record showed that these properties, the mill site and the mine, were in every sense separate and distinct and owned by different parties as appellants' counsel contend in their brief, we might be confronted by a very different question; but it seems certain that the mine and mill were operated by the same company and for the sole purpose of treating the ores taken from the Aztec mine, and there is at least no evidence that it was a custom mill, or used for any other purpose than the treatment of its own ores, taken from this one certain mine.

3. The next question is a far more serious one, that is, whether or not the mechanics' liens of the Stearns-Roger Company and McKay are superior to and take precedence over the trust deed from Butterfield to Moore for the benefit of Shelby, Lynch, and Catron. Section 2220, Comp. Laws, reads as follows: "The liens provided for in this act preferred to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished; also to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time the building, improvement or structure was commenced, work done; or the materials were commenced to be furnished." Section 2226 reads: "Every building or other improvement mentioned in section two thousand two hundred and seventeen, constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner or the person having or claiming any interest therein, shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner or person having or claiming any interest therein, and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this act, unless such owner or person having or claiming an interest therein, shall within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, alteration or repair, or the intended construction, alteration or repair, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing to the effect, in some conspicuous place upon said land, or upon the building or other improvement situated thereon."

latter as section 11, of the laws of 1880 (pp. 65, 67, c. 16), when the present mechanic's lien statutes were enacted, and were therefore passed by the same Legislature and at the same time. It is the contention of appellees that section 2226 makes it obligatory upon the mortgagee of a prior recorded mortgage, in order to maintain the priority of his lien, to give the notice therein provided, and that on failure to do so within the three days, as prescribed in that section, a subsequently accrued mechanic's lien takes precedence over the mortgage. They contend that the term "having or claiming any interest" in the land upon which the improvement is erected is broad enough and was intended to cover the lien of a mortgage upon the property. But we cannot concur in this contention, nor do we think the mechanic's lien law of 1880 is susceptible of such a construction. The fact that section 2220 (section 5 of the act in question) explicitly made the liens provided for in the act preferred "to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance, which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement or structure was commenced, work done or materials commenced to be furnished; also to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time"—just as effectually prefers the liens and incumbrances not coming within the class enumerated as though so enacted in express terms under a well-settled rule of statutory construction. Sutherland on Stat. Con. §§ 326-328. We think the Legislature clearly intended to and did make a distinction between mortgagees, lienholders, and those having an incumbrance, duly recorded and accrued prior to the accruing of the mechanic's lien, and those having or claiming any interest in the lands upon which the lien is claimed. This court, in Cleland v. Alexander (N. M.) 86 Pac. 425, speaking through Chief Justice Mills, makes use of the following language: "However created, a lien (and a mortgage is a lien) is not an interest in land, but merely a security for the payment of a debt"—citing numerous authorities in support of that statement; and, while the court did not then have this statute under consideration, yet the principle is the same, and is sustained by the great weight of authority in the United States, and may be said to be the modern doctrine and generally accepted as the true one in this country. 27 Cyc. 961, and authorities cited; 1 Jones on Mortgages (2d Ed.) § 58. This has always been the doctrine held to by the courts of equity, and "the equitable view has largely encroached upon and sometimes quite superseded the legal even in courts of law." 1 Jones on Mts. § 8. The mortgagee has no interest in the land described in his mortgage until default in the terms of the mortgage. He cannot take the possession, nor interfere in its management or control, unless his security may be diminished. A transfer of the indebtedness as the indorsement and delivery of the note secured carries with it the mortgage, which is only an incident to the debt, and, unless the mortgage carries with it a power of sale, he must foreclose by a suit in equity before he can apply the proceeds to the payment of his debt when due. The Legislature evidently had in mind the difference between the mortgagee or other lienholder and those having or claiming an interest when the two sections (2220 and 2226) were both included in the act. The first was evidently intended to secure a preference to prior recorded mortgages and liens, and to give the benefit of the statutes against unrecorded mortgages and liens, of which the lien claimant had no knowledge, while the latter section (2226) referred to lessees, vendees under contract of sale, and like persons, who claim the fee or some estate or interest in the land itself. The trust deed from Butterfield to Moore was in effect a mortgage. "A deed of trust to real estate, executed for the purpose of securing a debt conditioned to be void upon payment of the debt, and containing a power of sale upon default, is essentially a mortgage, and does not differ in its legal operation and effect from an ordinary mortgage with power of sale. Like a mortgage, such a deed is a mere security for a debt, or for the performance of certain undertaking by the grantor. It is a mere incident to the debt which it secures, upon which it depends, and which it follows and will pass with an assignment of the debt to the holder." 27 Cyc. 967—citing numerous authorities, including Arkansas, California, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Massachusetts, Nebraska, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Texas, Utah, and Wisconsin. Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U. S. 68, 24 L. Ed. 967; 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 1769. It is contended that this trust deed is a grant coupled with an interest, and is not in the nature of a mortgage; but a scrutiny of the instrument, which is set out in the statement of facts, must convince one of its nature. There appears on its face no other intention of the parties than that of security for the debt named therein, and the court will always look at the substance rather than the form. The Legislature in thus securing to the bona fide mortgagee who had complied with the recording acts a preference over the person performing labor or furnishing material for improvements on the land, acted justly and in accordance with equity and common sense. The laborer or materialman has notice of the prior lien, or may have by searching the records, before his labor is performed or his material furnished, and it is only just that he use the ordinary caution of ascertaining as to prior liens beforehand, while, on the other hand, if the mortgagee had filed his mortgage for record, and thus given notice of it to the world, it would be absurd to compel him to watch his security lest some laborer or materialman enter the premises and "improve" him out of it. Indeed to compel a mortgagee living more than a three days' journey from his security to post a notice thereon within three days of his obtaining knowledge of such improvement would be very near to confiscation of it.

4. The Maxwell Land Grant Company, in its answer, admits its interest in the property upon which the mechanics' liens of the Stearns-Roger Company and McKay are sought to be enforced, but denies any knowledge of the improvements being made, so that the only question as to whether or not its interests are subject to these liens is the question of notice. The evidence offered by appellees on this point is to the effect that Mr. M. P. Pels, the general manager of the Maxwell Land Grant Company, knew of the improvements at the time they were being constructed, and so informed Mr. Stearns, and that said Pels told him personally that he knew of no notice being posted. There also appears in the record a contract between the Aztec Company and the Maxwell Land Grant Company, which is signed by Mr. Pels as general manager, on behalf of the last-named company. Nowhere in the record is there any denial by the Maxwell Company of the fact that Pels was its general manager during that time. "The general rule is that notice of a fact acquired by an agent while transacting the business of his principal operates constructively as notice to his principal. As corporations from their nature can never act except through the instrumentality of their agents, and can never be acted upon except through the instrumentality of their agents or their property, this principle applies with peculiar force to them." 10 Cyc. 1063, and cases cited. The general manager of a corporation is defined in 4 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined (p. 3073) as "the person who really has the most general control over the affairs of a corporation, and who has knowledge of all its business and property, and who can act in emergencies on his own responsibility, and who may be considered the principal officer"—citing Robert Lee Silver Min. Co. v. Omaha & G. S. Co., 16 Colo. 118, 26 Pac. 828, 327; Kansas City v. Cullinan, 65 Kan. 68, 68 Pac. 1099, 1102. We think, in the absence of any evidence tending to dispute Pels' authority as general manager and of his knowledge of the improvements being made and the materials furnished as shown by appellees, the trial court was justified in finding that the Maxwell Land Grant Company had due notice, and, as it is not claimed that it posted any notice under section 2226, Comp. Laws, it follows that its interests in the property are subject to the liens of the appellees.

Numerous questions are discussed in the briefs of counsel, such as the reasonableness of the amount of attorney's fees by the trial court which we have not commented upon, but suffice it to say that, with the exception of the questions of priority of the liens created by the deed of trust from Butterfield to Moore and the mechanics' liens of the appellees, we think the trial court was fully justified in its findings of fact and conclusions of law as finally adopted, and that there was no error in its decree, except in that respect.

For the reasons given, the decree of the trial court is reversed, and a decree will be rendered in this court in accordance with the views expressed herein, and it is so ordered.

McFIE, PARKER, POPE, and ABBOTT, JJ., concur. MILLS, C. J., having heard this cause below, did not participate.

POPE, J. (concurring). The opinion of the court contains an announcement of the doctrine that under the laws of this territory a mortgage passes no legal estate but is a mere lien. While assenting fully to this conclusion, the practical importance of this question, which has been a much mooted one in this territory for many years, leads me to record my reasons for concurring in this decision of the court, and in so doing to trace briefly the history of the doctrine thus adopted as the rule in our own jurisdiction. At common law the rule was undoubted that a mortgage vested the title to real estate in the mortgagee with the accompanying right of possession, and as between mortgagor and mortgagee the latter was the legal owner. Brobst v. Brock, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 519, 19 L. Ed. 1002; Cotton v. Carlisle, 85 Ala. 175, 4 South. 670, 7 Am. St. Rep. 31. This doctrine has been superseded in many jurisdictions by statute, in others without statute, and, even in those jurisdictions which have retained the common-law rule, it has been limited so that the mortgagee's interest is treated as real estate only so far as is necessary for his protection and to give him the full benefit of his security. Hutchins v. King, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 53-60, 17 L. Ed. 544; Waterman v. MacKenzie, 138 U. S. 259, 11 Sup. Ct. 334, 34 L. Ed. 923; Lightcap v. Bradley, 186 Ill. 510, 58 N. E. 221. And it has been held that a sale or conveyance of the estate is not one of the purposes for which the mortgagee's interest is to be so treated. Bell v. Morse, 6 N. H. 205. The tendency of the decisions is shown by Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 275, 21 L. Ed. 313, where it is held that "the debt is the principal thing and the mortgage an accessory," and by Waterman v. MacKenzie, supra, where it is said that mortgages of real estate have "come to be more and more considered as a mere security for the debt, leaving the title in the mortgagor." The New York courts at an early date led in a departure from the common-law rule, and their influence is shown in the fact that practically all of the states west of the Mississippi now hold that a mortgage is a mere lien, passing no title. The views of the various state courts are fully set out in 1 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) §§ 13-50, where it is said, after reviewing the several state doctrines (section 50): "Grouping the states geographically, it will be noticed that the English doctrine of the nature of mortgages, with slight modifications, prevails east of the Mississippi in a large majority of the states, while west of the Mississippi, except only in the states of Missouri and Arkansas, the doctrine everywhere prevails that a mortgage passes no legal estate or right of possession." This condition of things is ascribed by the same learned author (section 59) not so much to statute as to the influence of the early New York cases and the civil law, and in California, whose Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Fields, has been most potent in implanting the New York doctrine west of the Mississippi, the courts, in addition to holding that "a mortgage is mere security for the debt and vests no title either before or after condition broken" (McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 410, 70 Am. Dec. 655; Nagle v. Macy, 9 Cal. 426), indicate that such holding is not the result of statute, but is equally applicable upon sound principle to mortgages executed prior to the California statute (Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 623, 82 Am. Dec. 785; Mack v. Wetzlar, 39 Cal. 255). It is undoubtedly true, however, that the divergence from the common law not only in New York but in the Western jurisdictions has been largely the result of statutes, some of them declaring that the right of possession shall continue in the mortgagor, and others declaring in terms that a mortgage shall be construed as a mere lien. McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 410, 70 Am. Dec. 655, and Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 592, indicate the influence of the New York and California statutes on the subject. The Oregon statute is discussed in Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 250, 4 Sup. Ct. 420, 28 L. Ed. 415, and is held to "cut up by the roots" the common-law doctrine and to "give effect to the view of the American courts of equity that a mortgage is a mere security for a debt." The same statute is considered in Savings Society v. Multnomah Co., 169 U. S. 426, 18 Sup. Ct. 392, 42 L. Ed. 803. Among the cases developing the doctrine, mostly as to the result of statutory provisions, are Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 384; Caruthers v. Humphrey, 12 Mich. 270; Humphrey v. Hurd, 29 Mich. 44; Hoffman v. Harrington, 33 Mich. 392; Gallatin v. Beattie, 3 Mont. 173; Balduff v. Griswold, 9 Okl. 438, 60 Pac. 223; Stevens v. South Ogden Company, 20 Utah, 267, 58 Pac. 843; State v. Superior Court, 21 Wash. 564, 58 Pac. 1065; Wood v. Trask, 7 Wis. 566, 78 Am. Dec. 230; Wright v. Henderson, 12 Tex. 43; Drake v. Root, 2 Colo. 685; and cases cited in 1 Jones on Mortgages, §§ 13-50. While the precise question has never been expressly decided by this court, it is held in Territory v. Co-operative Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 10 N. M. 337, 62 Pac. 1097, that real estate mortgages are personal property, and this court in speaking in this case, through Mr. Justice McFie, uses expressions which indicate the views of the court to be that a mortgage is primarily a security. There are expressions to the same effect in Cleland v. Alexander (N. M.) 86 Pac. 425, cited supra, in the opinion of the court. Considering the question, however, as an open one up to the present time, and recognizing the common-law rule as prevailing in this territory, unless altered by statute, I am of the opinion that the Legislature by Comp. Laws, § 2365, has changed the common-law rule, and that the reason of all the cases above cited from Western jurisdictions applies to this territory. At common law, as we have seen, the making of the mortgage conferred the right of immediate possession upon the mortgagee as in the case of any other grantee. But our Legislature has provided by Comp. Laws, § 2365, that, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, "the mortgagor of real * * * property shall have the right of possession thereof." This, by withholding from the mortgagee the right of possession until foreclosure, sale, and purchase, "cuts up by the roots the common-law doctrine" (Teal v. Walker, supra), and "deprives the mortgagee of the only material advantage which remained to him from being considered the owner of the fee" (Chief Justice Emmett in Adams v. Corriston, 7 Minn. 456 [Gil. 365]). This statutory provision in my judgment changes the common-law rule and places the law in this territory upon the same bases as in California and the other Western jurisdictions.

This is the view evidently taken by the learned author of Jones on Mortgages, for at section 43 he quotes our Comp. Laws, § 2365, and at sections 58 and 59 names New Mexico expressly as being among the jurisdictions in which the mortgage "passes no title or estate * * * to the mortgagee, and gives him no right of possession before foreclosure." It is not a cause for regret that this statutory provision makes it possible to declare the law in New Mexico to be thus in accord with common sense, as opposed to a common-law fiction. In popular opinion a mortgage is universally regarded as a lien. Men buy and sell mortgaged realty, and always consider that they are purchasing, not a mere equity of redemption, but the property itself, subject only to the obligation to pay off the lien of the mortgage. The nearer law can be brought to the bases of common sense and every day comprehension, the nearer it will be a rule of conduct lived up to in public and private life, and the stand taken by the Western courts on this subject has tended very strongly to this salutary result. As is well said by the Supreme Court of Kansas in Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 386: "In this state a clean sweep has been made by statute. The common-law attributes of mortgages have been wholly set aside; the ancient theories have been demolished; and, if we could consign to oblivion the terms and phrases—without meaning except in reference to those theories—with which our reflections are still embarrassed, the legal profession on the bench and at the bar would more readily understand and fully realize the new condition of things." For these reasons I concur in the doctrine announced by the opinion of the court on this subject.

RICHARDSON et al. v. PIERCE.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 13, 1908.)

1. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—ORDER OF PROOF.

In the discretion of the court the declaration of a partner may be received, to become competent against himself and the remaining partner, should a partnership relation become established later in the trial.

2. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON—VERIFICATION—EVIDENCE.

Under section 2931, Comp. Laws 1897, a verified account attached to a complaint was properly admitted in evidence to prove the debt, when the answer does not, under oath, deny its correctness, and it was not necessary to prove the account by the books of original entry.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Account, Action on, § 37.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

There being substantial evidence in the record to sustain the findings of the court as to the existence of the partnership between Richardson and Cravens, this court will not disturb the judgment to that effect given by the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3979-3982.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to District Court, Otero County; before Justice Edward A. Mann.

Action by R. H. Pierce against George Richardson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. E. Wharton, for plaintiffs in error. Byron Sherry, for defendant in error.

MILLS, C. J. This is a suit brought by R. H. Pierce against George Richardson and J. C. Cravens, formerly partners doing business under the name of Richardson & Co. The suit is based on a balance claimed to be due for goods and merchandise sold by Pierce to Richardson & Co. between September 9, 1902, and February 20, 1903, and the sum claimed to be due is $393.68, with interest from February 1, 1904, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Attached to the complaint and made a part thereof is an itemized copy of the account sued on. The complaint is duly sworn to. A jury was waived, and the cause was tried by the court, and on September 28, 1905, a judgment was entered against the defendants for the sum of $436.31.

The transcript of record in this case is an imperfect one, as an examination of it discloses that it was filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court on December 28, 1906, while the certificate of the clerk of the district court of Otero county, certifying to its correctness, is dated December 29, 1906, and the certificate of the presiding judge of the Sixth judicial district of this territory is dated December 31, 1906, which is after the transcript of record was filed in this court. If a transcript is not certified to as correct by the proper persons, it should not be received and filed by the clerk of this court, and if it is inadvertently so received and filed it will not be considered by this court, if objection is made thereto; for, as it is not certified to as correct, there is no proof before us that it is a true record of the proceedings held before the trial court. We have held in a criminal case (Haynes et al. v. United States, 9 N. M. 519, 56 Pac. 282) that when a district judge signs and seals a bill of exceptions at a later date than authorized by the statute he exceeds his authority, and, on motion, the bill of exceptions will be stricken from the record; and this rule would seem to apply to the case at bar, although it is a civil proceeding. More than the statutory time also elapsed between the taking out of the writ of error and the filing of the same in this court; but, as no objection has been made by the defendant in error, we have concluded to consider the case on its merits.

1. The first error assigned by the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in permitting R. H. Pierce to testify that Richardson told him that Cravens was a member of the firm of Richardson & Co.; Cravens not being present at the conversation. In support of this proposition the plaintiff in error cites no authorities; but we incline to the opinion that, if this was all of the evidence as to the partnership introduced at the trial, the court would not have been justified in giving a judgment in favor of Pierce. But this is not the case, as Pierce testifies that prior to the beginning of this suit he had several conversations with the defendant Cravens in relation to the claim against Richardson & Co., and that Cravens promised to pay it; that in one conversation in relation to the claim Cravens stated that he could not pay it then, but that he would be able to do so later on; that in a talk had in April or May, 1904, Cravens told him that he was going to send him some money on account, and that he afterwards did send him $200, which was credited on the account. He also testified that at no time during these conversations did Cravens ever deny being a partner of the firm of Richardson & Co. Mr. Richardson, one of the partners comprising the firm of Richardson & Co., testified that Cravens was a member of that firm, and James Boone also testified to the existence of the partnership, and that plaintiff in error admitted the existence of the indebtedness and expressed the desire to settle it.

This evidence of Pierce, as to the statement made by Richardson as to Cravens being his partner, may have been admitted in evidence somewhat prematurely; but the learned judge who tried the case below no doubt admitted it under the rule that in the discretion of the court the declaration of a partner may be received as against himself, to become competent against the remaining partners, should a partnership relation become established later in the trial. Jennings v. Estes, 16 Me. 323; Fogerty v. Jordan, 2 Rob. (N. Y.) 319. It is true that plaintiff in error denied that he was a member of the firm of Richardson & Co., and introduced some evidence to corroborate his statement; but the trial court heard the witnesses testify, noted their manner on the stand, and was better able to weigh the evidence than we, who only read it. In accordance with the rule which we have frequently laid down, we will not disturb the judgment given by the trial court, when there is substantial evidence in the record to sustain it. Green v. Browne & Manzanara Co., 11 N. M. 658, 72 Pac. 17, and cases cited therein.

2. The second assignment of error is that the court committed error in admitting the verified account attached to the bill of complaint to prove the amount due. We do not consider this point well taken, for the answer of the plaintiff in error is almost solely made up of the denial of the fact that he was a partner of the firm of Richardson & Co. at the time the debt was contracted. He nowhere directly denies the truth of the verified statement attached to the complaint. If he had done so, then it might have been necessary to prove the truth of the account by the original books of entry. Pierce swears that the account is correct, and the only paragraph of the answer that in any way attacks its correctness is the fourth, which reads: "This defendant says, in answer to the plaintiff's fourth paragraph of his said amended complaint, that he has not sufficient knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether or not the plaintiff sold and delivered to the said firm of Richardson & Co. the goods, wares, and merchandise, or any item of the same, contained and set out in his itemized account, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of his said amended complaint." We submit this is not a denial under oath of the correctness of the verified account sued on, and, while it would probably be good under the Code practice as it exists in many of the states of the Union and in this territory still we have another statute in addition to the Code, to wit, section 2931 of the Compiled Laws of 1897, which provides that "accounts duly verified by the oath of the party claiming the same, or his agent, * * * shall be sufficient evidence in any suit to enable the plaintiff to recover judgment for the amount thereof, unless the defendant, or his agent shall deny the same under oath." The account is sworn to, and we do not think that the mere statement of the defendant, although made under oath, "that he has not knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether or not the plaintiff sold and delivered to the said firm of Richardson & Co. the goods, wares, and merchandise," is such a denial of the verified account as is contemplated by our laws. The very purpose of retaining section 2931 of the Compiled Laws of 1897, which was passed some five years before the enactment of our Code of Civil Procedure, and which subsection 123 of section 2685 (our Code) recognizes as still being in force, would seem to be to obviate the necessity of the introduction of the books of original entry, often a tedious proceeding, in the proving up of verified accounts in the trial of cases, where the truth of such accounts is not directly denied under oath. This view also seems to us to be in accord with the dictates of common sense and reason, for a litigant may often be willing to swear that he had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief of the correctness of an account, when he would not be willing to deny under oath the truth of an account sued on.

3. The third error assigned is that the court erred in permitting H. E. Chipman to testify that Richardson told him that Cravens said it was all right for him (Richardson) to buy Chipman out; such testimony being admitted to show the interest of Cravens in the firm of Richardson & Co., the same being hearsay and incompetent. We have already referred to the declarations made by a partner as to who composed the partnership in passing on the first error assigned, and in disposing of this alleged error we will simply quote from the brief of the defendant in error, which we think correctly states the law: "Evidence had already been adduced showing the partnership between Richardson and Cravens, so that it was clearly competent to show what one of the partners said in relation to the partnership. Now, while it is true that the declarations of one partner, not made in the presence of his copartner, are not competent to prove the existence of the partnership, it is also true that, when the partnership had been otherwise proved, the declarations of one partner are evidence against the other as to the conduct of the partnership business. Defendant contends that, as the evidence of the witnesses Pierce, Richardson, and Boone, which preceded the testimony of the witness Chipman, proved the existence of the partnership of Richardson & Co. as alleged in the petition. Then the testimony of Chipman as to what one of the partners said to him in relation to the partnership was competent."

4. The last error assigned is that the court erred in adjudging that a partnership existed between Richardson and Cravens at the time the account sued on was made. There certainly is much evidence in the record to sustain the findings of the court as to the existence of the partnership between Richardson and Cravens, and, such evidence being of a substantial nature, this court will not disturb the judgment given by the trial court. Greene v. Browne & Manzanares Co., 11 N. M. 658, 72 Pac. 17, and cases cited therein.

There is no such error apparent in the record as would justify us in reversing this case, and the same is therefore affirmed; and it is so ordered.

R. H. PIERCE CO. v. RICHARDSON et al. (Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 13, 1908.)

WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—MISTAKE IN CITATION.

When a writ of error is improperly directed, and the defendant in error is cited to appear before this court under the name of "R. H. Pierce," and not under the name of "R. H. Pierce Company," who was plaintiff in the court below, the case will be dismissed on the ground that the real defendant in error has not been cited to appear before this court and is not before us.

Action by the R. H. Pierce Company against George Richardson and J. C. Cravens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Dismissed.

J. E. Wharton, for plaintiffs in error. Byron Sherry, for defendant in error.

MILLS, C. J. The transcript of record in this case contains all of the imperfections which are referred to in the case of Richardson et al. v. R. H. Pierce (decided at this term of court) 93 Pac. 715, and in addition thereto no writ of error seems to have ever been sued out in the Supreme Court, as the writ of error attached to the transcript in this case is made out in the name of "R. H. Pierce," and not "R. H. Pierce Company," a corporation, who was the plaintiff in the court below; and therefore, as the defendant in error is not before us, we will dismiss this case. We would ordinarily dislike to take this course, based upon what is apparently only a clerical error; but in the case of Richardson et al. v. R. H. Pierce, supra, there is a stipulation to the effect that the evidence in that case shall be the evidence in this, and as, with that evidence before us, we would have to affirm the judgment of the trial court in this case, we do not think that we are doing the plaintiff in error any injury, and the case will therefore be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

SANDOVAL v. ALBRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 13, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A judgment in quo warranto against the incumbent of an office which adjudges that relator is the de jure officer is conclusive on his right to the office in an action for the fees of the office received by the incumbent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 1234-1251.]

2. COMMON LAW—ADOPTION.

The common law is in force in New Mexico, except as modified by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Common Law, § 10.]

3. OFFICERS—COMPENSATION—RECOVERY BY DE JURE OFFICER.

By the common law, not modified by statute, a de jure officer may recover the fees of the office received by a de facto officer intruding into the office.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Officers, § 134.]

4. SAME.

In an action by a de jure officer for the fees of the office received by the incumbent thereof holding the office in good faith, the reasonable expenses of the incumbent in administering the office should be allowed him.

Appeal from District Court, Bernalillo County; before Justice Ira A. Abbott.

Action by Jesus Ma. Sandoval against George F. Albright. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals, and plaintiff cross-appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit brought by the appellee to recover from the appellant the sum of $6,184.16, alleged to be the amount of fees and emoluments of the office of assessor of Bernalillo county, to which the appellee had been duly elected and qualified, received by the appellant between the 27th day of March, 1908, and the 19th day of November, 1904, during which time the appellant had usurped the said office. It is further alleged that a judgment of ouster was obtained against the appellant; but that he refused to pay over to the appellee said fees and emoluments. Demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, answer was filed. At a later period this answer was withdrawn and an amended answer was filed, the second paragraph of which is as follows: "The defendant admits that the plaintiff was elected at the general election held in the territory of New Mexico to the office of assessor of Bernalillo county, for the term of two years, from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1903, and duly qualified as such assessor, as alleged in paragraph 1 of said complaint, but this defendant denies so much of said paragraph of said complaint as is in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'And plaintiff alleges that he has ever since been, and still is, the only person lawfully authorized to discharge the duties and enjoy the emoluments and privileges appertaining to said office.'" The appellant admitted in the ninth paragraph of his amended answer that he had received $6,648.-

80, but alleged that he had expended $2,142.25 for clerical assistance and other necessary expenses. By a series of allegations, appellant sought to set up his title to the office in question and the ineligibility of the appellee, and by the closing paragraph of the answer he alleged that he became the incumbent of the office in good faith, believing he had a right thereto, and claimed a set-off for the amount of his necessary expenses against the claim of the appellee. Upon demurrer, the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth grounds were sustained, and the sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds overruled. This left nothing of the answer except the plea of set-off to which the appellee replied, denying the claim and right of set-off, and enlarging his demand, to that admitted by appellant. A trial by jury was had, and the jury, by direction of the court, returned a verdict for the appellee for $5,360.53, for which judgment was rendered. Appeal and cross-appeal were prayed, and granted.

McFIE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The parties to this suit have been before this court on two former occasions as contestants for the office of assessor of Bernalillo county, the fees and emoluments of which are now sued for. Territory ex rel. Sandoval v. Albright (N. M.) 78 Pac. 205; Albright v. Territory ex rel. Sandoval (N. M.) 79 Pac. 719; Albright v. Territory ex rel. Sandoval, 200 U. S. 9, 28 Sup. Ct. 210, 50 L. Ed. 346. The right of office and that the appellee was the de jure officer were fully determined in the former suits, and cannot be considered in this. Therefore the court below properly sustained the demurrer to all such parts of the answer as sought to raise this issue. Counsel for appellant, evidently conceding the correctness of the ruling below, admitted that the appellee was the lawful incumbent of the office, but contends that, even so, the appellee cannot recover the fees and emoluments for the period of appellant's incumbency, but that, if the court should hold otherwise, appellant would still be entitled to recover as a set-off the actual and necessary expenses incurred by him while he was in possession of the office, upon the ground that he took possession in good faith, believing that he was the rightful incumbent thereof. The cross-appellant denies the correctness of this position.

Counsel for appellant, in support of his position that the appellee cannot recover, refers this court to the case of Sturh v. Curran, 44 N. J. Law, 181, 43 Am. Rep. 353. This case, according to the opinion of the majority of the court, does not sustain appellant's contention, for in the concluding paragraph the court says: "Under the facts disclosed in this case, an action will not lie against a de facto officer. He yielded obedience to the law when he performed the services, and on principles of natural justice he may retain the reward he has received." In deciding this case, the New Jersey court, divided seven to five, and the dissenting opinion, written by chief justice and concurred in by four of the associate justices, is such a complete answer to the opinion of the majority that practically all of the courts passing upon this question since that case was decided have adopted the views expressed in the dissenting opinion; so that it may be said that the great weight of authority, both in England and America, is contrary to the doctrine declared to be the law by the majority of the court in that case. The case of the United States v. Addison, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 291, 18 L. Ed. 910, holds that there can be a recovery, and, while the amount of the recovery is limited, the reason is that the suit was brought upon a supersedeas bond given upon appeal; but the principle decided by the court was that contended for in the dissenting opinion in the case of Sturh v. Curran, supra. Chief Justice Beasley refers to many of the cases referred to in the majority opinion, and, after stating that the English authorities sustain the right of recovery, says: "With regard to the American cases, I can say, after an extended research, that not one of them that has come to my attention denies the right of the de jure officer to recover in some form for an intrusion into his office. Dolan v. Mayor of New York, 68 N. Y. 274, 23 Am. Rep. 168; Hunter v. Chandler, 45 Mo. 452; Glascok v. Lyons, 20 Ind. 1, 83 Am. Dec. 299; Douglass v. State, 31 Ind. 429; People v. Miller, 24 Mich. 458, 9 Am. Rep. 131; Dorsey v. Smyth, 28 Cal. 21; Nichols v. McLean, 101 N. Y. 533, 5 N. E. 347, 54 Am. Rep. 730; Kreits v. Behrensmeier, 149 Ill. 503, 36 N. E. 983, 24 L. R. A. 59.

Counsel for appellant in his brief says: "It is said the weight of authority is the other way. Much depends in New Mexico upon what was the common law, as we have no statute on the subject, and it is an open question for the court to decide." It is true that we have no statute in this territory governing this subject, but the common law, in the absence of statute, authorizes a recovery by the de jure officer in such cases. In speaking of the common law upon this subject, Selwyn, 1 N. P. 81, says: "That where a person has usurped an office belonging to another, and taken the known and established fees of office, an action for money had and received will lie at the suit of the party really entitled to the office, against the intruder, for the recovery of such fees." Chitty, also, in his work on Pleadings, says that an action will lie "against a person who has usurped an office and received the known and accustomed fees of office." The state of Illinois, like

New Mexico, adopted the common law, and still retains it except as modified by statute. The case of Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 149 Ill. 496, 36 N. E. 983, 24 L. R. A. 59, is a very instructive case upon this subject, as the state of the law, at the time, was similar to our own. The court says: "It is conceded that no statute exists in this state declaring the right of a de jure officer to recover from a de facto officer the salary paid such de facto officer who has discharged the duties of the office under a wrongful or mistaken purpose. There is no legislation on that subject in this state. The right of recovery, if it exists, depends, therefore, on the principles of the common law. * * * By reference to the decision of the common-law courts of England, the common law of that country is to be found. An examination of the decisions of the courts of that country shows a uniform declaration of the principle that a de jure officer has a right of action to recover against an officer de facto by reason of the intrusion of the latter into the office and his receipt of the emoluments thereof. Among others the following opinions of English courts may be referred to as sustaining this right of recovery: Vaux v. Jefferson, 2 Dyer, 114; Arris v. Stukley, 2 Mod. 260; Lee v. Drake, 2 Salk, 468; Webb's Case, 8 Rep. 45. By the adoption of the common law of England, the principle announced in these cases was adopted as the law of this state; for the principle is of a general nature and applicable to our condition. On the basis of a sound public policy, the principle commends itself, for the reason that one would be less liable to usurp or wrongfully retain a public office, and defeat the will of the people or the appointing power, if no benefit but a loss would result from such wrongful retention or usurpation of an office. The question has frequently been before the courts of the different states and of the United States, and the great weight of authority sustains the doctrine of the common law, as shown by the opinions of the judges in different states, and which, in most of the states, are based on the common law, without reference to any statute. * * * Whilst it is true that in this state a public office is not a franchise or an incorporeal hereditament, but a mere public agency created for the benefit of the state, yet the salary or emoluments annexed to a public office are incident to the right to the office, and not to the mere exercise of its duties, or its occupancy. * * * " In support of the views expressed by the court in this case, many cases are cited, but we do not deem it necessary to refer to them, as we regard this case conclusive of the law of the case now before us, and, being applied, disposes of the case so far as the appellant is concerned. There being no doubt of the right of recovery by the appellee, and no conflict of evidence concerning the amount the appellee was entitled to recover, it was not error for the court to direct a verdict as was done in the court below.

A cross-appeal was taken by the appellee, and will now be considered. The court below allowed to be set off against, and deducted from, the total amount received by the appellant during his incumbency of office the sum of $2,142.25, which was shown to be the amount of expenses incurred in administering the affairs of the office. Counsel for cross-appellant does not question the amount of the set-off, nor seeks relief upon any technical ground of error; but, on the contrary, takes the broad ground that cross-appellant is entitled to recover the full amount of the fees and emoluments received by appellant, Albright, during his incumbency, without any allowance whatever for the expenses incurred in conducting the affairs of the office. In other words, that cross-appellant is entitled to the gross receipts, and not the profits of the office. There is some conflict of authority on this subject; but the weight of authority is to the effect that where the de facto officer entered in good faith, believing he was entitled to the office, the profits, and not the entire amount received, are recoverable. A leading case to this effect is Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 428, 5 Am. Rep. 52. Counsel for cross-appellant has expressed criticism of this case, but we find the law as therein declared adhered to in the latter cases. Farwell v. Adams, 112 Ill. 57; Waterman v. Chicago & Iowa R. Co., 139 Ill. 669, 29 N. E. 689, 15 L. R. A. 418, 32 Am. St. Rep. 228; Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 149 Ill. 496, 36 N. E. 983, 24 L. R. A. 59; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, pp. 403-404; 9 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cases (Tex.) p. 91. The acts of the Legislature providing for the appointment of an assessor for Bernalillo county, and the testimony of Albright as to his appointment and that he entered upon the office under advice of counsel, were before the court when the court directed the jury to allow the set-off, and we think the good faith of Albright must be conceded from these facts, aided, as they were, by the stubborn contest in the courts to settle the title to the office in dispute, disclosed by the decisions of this court, of which the trial court took judicial notice. The question of good faith seems to be the controlling consideration for the allowance of expenses to an ousted de facto officer in a majority of cases thus holding, and the rule would doubtless not be applied in case of an intruder entering in bad faith and without color of right.

We feel disposed to adhere to this rule in this case, and therefore hold that the court below did not commit error in allowing the amount shown by the evidence as the reasonable expenses of appellant's administration of the office, and instructing the jury to that effect.

The judgment of the court below, both upon the original and cross appeals, will be affirmed, with costs. It is so ordered.

MILLS, C. J., and MANN, PARKER, and POPE, JJ., concur. ABBOTT, A. J., having heard this case in the court below, did not participate in this decision.

STATE ex rel. DAVIS v. EDWARDS, State Auditor.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—DEMURRER—WAIVER OF DEMURRER.

Under the statute, an answer may be filed with a demurrer without waiving the demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 404-407.]

2. COURTS—STENOGRAPHERS—COMPENSATION—AUDIT BY BOARD OF EXAMINERS.

Laws 1899, pp. 111, 112, c. 72, §§ 1, 2, authorize a district court judge to appoint a stenographer to hold during his pleasure, and to agree on the compensation to be paid by the state, not exceeding a maximum fixed, and provide that such stenographer may also be paid mileage not to exceed a fixed amount a mile, and that the amount of such mileage shall be certified by the court to the State Auditor, who shall draw his warrant for the same. Const. art. 7, § 13, creates a board of examiners with power to examine all claims against the state, except salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law. Rev. St. 1898, § 946, enacted pursuant to Const. art. 7, § 13, forbids the State Auditor to draw his warrant for any claim unless approved by the board, except for salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law. Held, that a claim by a stenographer for mileage was a claim for compensation fixed by contract, not by law within the exception to Const. art. 7, § 13, and Rev. St. 1898, § 946, and hence the State Auditor could not be required to draw a warrant for the same until first approved by the board of examiners.

3. MANDAMUS—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ALLOWANCE AND PAYMENT OF SALARIES.

The allowance and payment of salaries or compensation of public officers fixed by law may be enforced by mandamus against auditing and disbursing officers.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, §§ 211-216.]

4. MANDAMUS—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—AUDIT OF CLAIMS.

The board of examiners created by Const. art. 7, § 13, with power to examine all claims against the state, except salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law, may in a proper case be subject to mandamus.*

Original application for mandamus by the state, on the relation of Justin R. Davis, against J. A. Edwards, State Auditor. Writ denied.

Thurman, Wedgwood & Irvine, for petitioner. M. A. Breeden, Atty. Gen., and A. R. Barnes, Asst. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

FRICK, J. On the 29th day of June, 1907, Justin R. Davis (hereinafter styled "petitioner") made an application to this court for an alternative writ of mandate to be directed to J. A. Edwards, as State Auditor of the state of Utah (hereinafter designated "respondent"), in which the petitioner asked that said respondent show cause why a peremptory writ should not issue against him requiring him to allow a certain claim against the state, and in favor of petitioner, and to issue a warrant upon the State Treasurer for the amount claimed. The petitioner based his claim upon certain facts which, in his petition, are stated, in substance, as follows: That on the 3d day of January, 1905, he duly entered into a contract with Hon. C. W. Morse, one of the judges of the district court of the Third judicial district of this state; that said contract was entered into in pursuance of the provisions contained in sections 1, 2, c. 72, pp. 111, 112, Laws Utah 1899; that by virtue of said contract and the law referred to said C. W. Morse, as such district judge, on the 3d day of January, 1905, duly appointed the petitioner as court stenographer of said district court, and that the petitioner ever since said date has been, and now is, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting court stenographer of said court, during all of which time he has faithfully discharged the duties of court stenographer for said court in pursuance of said contract and appointment; that said contract and appointment ever since said date have been and now are in full force and effect; that, by the terms of said contract, it is provided that the petitioner shall be paid the sum of 10 cents per mile for each mile actually traveled by him in the discharge of his official duties; that in the months of April and May, 1907, the petitioner in the discharge of his official duties necessarily traveled a distance of 336 miles, for which he is entitled to receive, under the terms of said contract, from the state of Utah the sum of $33.60; that in compliance with the provisions of section 2, c. 72, p. 112, Laws Utah 1899, the petitioner obtained from the said C. W. Morse, as judge of said district court, a certificate in which said judge duly certified that the number of miles as claimed by the petitioner was correct, and that he had actually traveled said distance; that thereupon petitioner presented said claim for mileage, duly certified, to the respondent, as State Auditor, for allowance, and requested him to allow the same, and to issue his warrant drawn upon the State Treasurer, in favor of petitioner, for said sum of $33.60, which respondent refused, and still refuses to do; that there is due the petitioner from the state of Utah for the mileage aforesaid the sum of $33.60. An alternative writ was duly issued by this court, to which the respondent appeared. Respondent attacks the petition by general demurrer for want of facts. He also filed an answer at the same time, which under the statute he was permitted to do without waiving his demurrer. A reply to the answer was also filed by the petitioner.

In view of the law in force in this state, the first question that arises is as to the sufficiency of the petition. This question is raised by the general demurrer. The petitioner relies upon sections 1, 2, c. 72, pp. 111, 112, aforesaid, which, so far as material, are to the effect that the judges of the district court of this state may enter into contracts with and appoint competent persons as stenographers to report the proceedings of said courts. These sections enumerate what shall be specified in the contract, and, among other things, authorize the judges to agree upon the compensation to be paid by the state to the stenographers for services not exceeding the sum of $8 for each sitting of the court. It is further provided in section 2 that "such contract shall further provide that the said stenographer shall hold his employment at the pleasure of the judge of the court appointing him, or his successor, and may also provide that said stenographer shall be paid not to exceed ten cents per mile for each mile actually traveled by him in the performance of his part of said contract, and the amount of such mileage shall be certified by the court to the state auditor, who shall draw his warrant upon the state treasurer for the amount so certified, and the same shall be paid out of the state treasury." The petitioner, in substance, contends that, if it be made to appear to the State Auditor by the certificate referred to in the statute that the services were rendered, or that the claim for mileage arises by virtue of the contract and appointment made by the district judge and the amount is certified to by him as correct, that it then becomes the duty of the Auditor to draw his warrant upon the State Treasurer for the amount stated in the certificate in favor of the stenographer named in the certificate. He urges further that it appears from the petition that he has complied with the provisions of sections 1 and 2, above referred to, and that, therefore, he is entitled to the relief prayed for. In this contention we at first blush were inclined to agree with the petitioner, and, if it were not for a constitutional provision, which we think stands in the way, we would be inclined to hold that the petitioner should prevail in this proceeding. Section 13 of article 7 of the Constitution provides for a board of examiners "with power to examine all claims against the state, except salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law." Pursuant to this constitutional provision the first state Legislature passed an act which is designated as title 19, and comprises sections 920 to 963 of the Revised Statutes of 1898. In these sections the duties of the board of examiners are more particularly specified. Section 946, which relates to the duties of the respondent, as State Auditor, with respect to claims against the state, provides: "The State Auditor shall not draw his warrant for any claim, unless it has been approved by the board, except for salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law, or for moneys expressly appropriated by law." The powers conferred upon the board of examiners, with regard to claims against the state, by the constitutional provision quoted above, are general and sweeping. The power would include all claims against the state, were it not for the exception which excludes salaries or compensation of officers fixed by law. An exception of this character may not be enlarged nor extended by implication. An exception which specifies the things that are excepted from a general provision strengthens the force of the general provisions of the law. 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 494. It is an elementary doctrine that, if there are any provisions in a statute which in any way conflict with a constitutional provision, the Constitution controls. Does the claim of the petitioner come within the constitutional exception? If it does not, then by virtue of section 946, Rev. St. 1898, above quoted, the respondent cannot legally be required to draw his warrant upon the State Treasurer therefor until it has been approved by the board of examiners. The petitioner does not state in his petition that the claim has been so approved. In order to state a complete cause of action against the State Auditor for relief in case the auditor refuses to draw a warrant, it must appear from the application either that the claim has been approved by the board of examiners, or that it is one that comes within the constitutional exception. Is the claim presented by the petitioner a claim for salary or compensation of an officer fixed by law? It certainly is not for an official salary. It seems equally clear that it is not for official compensation which is fixed by law. Conceding that the petitioner falls within the designation of public officer for certain purposes, as held in Dull v. Mining Co., 28 Utah, 467, 79 Pac. 1050, and assuming, further, that mileage may, under certain circumstances, constitute or form a part of official compensation, as held in Marloneaux v. Cutler (Utah) 91 Pac. 355, still the claim in question is not for a compensation that is fixed by law.

It must not be overlooked that the exception in the Constitution does not apply to every claim for official compensation, but applies only to those that are fixed by law. If we assume that the amount claimed by the petitioner is ascertained and fixed by the court's certificate, this still does not meet the objection that it is not fixed by law. How does the claim arise? As stated by the petitioner, it arises out of a contract entered into by him with the district judge, who by law is made the agent of the state for that purpose. The amount that the petitioner is to receive from the state, both for services and for mileage, is a matter that he and the judge agreed upon and fixed. If the law had authorized the district judge to enter into contracts with stenographers, and to agree upon the compensation and mileage for such an amount, as under the circumstances might seem fair and reasonable, and had directed the judges to certify to the amount agreed upon and to the miles actually traveled, no one could successfully contend that the compensation agreed upon was fixed by law. The only difference between such a law and the one we are dealing with is that the present law limits the authority of the judges, while the supposed law would not. The mere fact that the law imposes limitations, which the judges may not exceed, in no way changes the fact that it is a limitation of authority, and not the fixing of compensation by law. This is made clearer still by the fact that the compensation and mileage may be one amount in one district, and a different amount in another district. It may be the maximum amount for services and less than that for mileage, or vice versa. Moreover, the contract remains in force only at the pleasure of the judge. He may recall it at any time, and may increase or reduce the stipulated amount so long as it is not increased beyond the highest amount he may contract for. While the compensation of stenographers, to some extent, is regulated by law, it nevertheless is not a compensation within the constitutional provision fixed by law. It is a compensation fixed by the contract made between the stenographer and the judge. If this should be held to constitute compensation fixed by law, then any compensation authorized by law which was agreed to in an authorized contract would also be fixed by law. The authority conferred by the state upon certain officials to enter into contracts with other persons, and to agree upon the compensation to be paid for public services contemplated by the contract, not exceeding a specified sum, as we view it, falls far short of fixing such compensation by law as contemplated by the Constitution. That the allowance and payment of the salaries or compensation of public officers fixed by law may be enforced by mandamus proceedings against auditing and disbursing officers is well settled. Merrill on Mandamus, § 105; High, Extra. Leg. Rem. (3d Ed.) §§ 101, 113; Mechem on Public Officers, § 968; Fowler v. Peirce, 2 Cal. 165; Reynolds v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 420; Bryan v. Catell, 15 Iowa, 538; Black v. Auditor of State, 26 Ark. 237. But all these authorities simply make it clear that the salary or compensation, of which payment may be compelled in such a proceeding, must be certain and fixed by law, and, further, that it must appear that it is the legal duty of the officer, upon whom the demand is made, to allow or pay the amount claimed. We have not been able to find any case where the compensation was fixed by contract, or where the amount is subject to change at the pleasure of the person authorized to agree upon and fix it, wherein it was held that such compensation is one fixed by law. The mere fact that the Legislature has, in effect, made the certificate of the judge the only evidence that is required to fix the amount due, cannot affect the conclusion that it is not fixed by law. It is the judge, and not the law, that determines and fixes the amount to be allowed under the particular contract under which the stenographer claims. The attempt by the Legislature to require the Auditor to allow a claim which by the Constitution must first be approved by the board of examiners can avail nothing. The Auditor is bound by the constitutional provision. The Legislature is so bound, and so are we. The Legislature may make certain evidence conclusive with regard to a specific matter, but it may not interfere with powers conferred or duties imposed by the Constitution. This, in effect, is what is attempted to be done in section 2, c. 72, p. 112, aforesaid. To the extent that the provisions of that section are in conflict with the constitutional provision governing salaries and compensations of officers fixed by law, the Constitution must prevail. The conclusion is, therefore, forced upon us that the petitioner's claim is not within the constitutional exception, and therefore comes within the general class of claims which must be submitted to the board of examiners, and that the respondent, as State Auditor, cannot be compelled to draw a warrant therefor until the same is approved by that board. As there is no allegation in the petition that the claim has been so presented and allowed, the petition does not state sufficient facts to authorize us to issue a peremptory writ of mandate against the respondent. The demurrer, therefore, is well taken, and should be sustained.

In view that the writ must be denied for the reasons stated, we cannot now pass upon the other questions raised by the respondent. The board of examiners whose duty it is under the Constitution to pass upon the claim is not before us; and hence would not be concluded by a decision upon these questions. Merrill on Mandamus, § 315. No doubt the board of examiners, in a proper case, may be subject to a proceeding in mandamus. Merrill on Mandamus, § 126; Mechem on Public Officers, § 968; High, Ex. Leg. Rem. (3d Ed.) §§ 101, 113; Marloneaux v. Cutler (Utah) 91 Pac. 355.

From the foregoing, it follows that the writ must be denied, and the petition dismissed. It is so ordered. Respondent to recover costs.

CLAYTON v. DINWOODEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE AND PAYMENT OF CLAIMS—PRESENTATION—CLAIMS WHICH MUST BE PRESENTED—TIME FOR PRESENTATION.

Plaintiff purchased from defendant's testator property by warranty deed. After paying the taxes on the property due before the testator's death, he sued defendants for the amount of the taxes so paid. Held, the claim arose from a breach of a covenant in a deed, and was a claim arising on contract within Rev. St. 1898, § 3851, providing that "all claims arising upon contracts * * * must be presented within the time limited in the notice" given by the executor or administrator to creditors of the estate.

2. SAME—TAXES.

The taxes were not claims which need not be presented to the executor within the exception of Rev. St. 1898, § 3858, providing that an action may be brought against the representatives of the estate without notice by any holder of a lien to enforce it against the property of the estate subject thereto, the lien of the taxes being against the land bought and not against any property of the estate.

3. SAME.

Rev. St. 1898, § 2613, requiring the district court to require executors and administrators to pay all taxes due from the estate and forbidding discharge till such taxes are paid, does not affect the necessity of presenting to the representatives of a deceased vendor of land by warranty deed a claim by the purchaser for reimbursement for taxes paid by him which were liens on the land at the time of the purchase.

4. SAME.

An administrator or executor is affected with notice of taxes levied against property of the estate in his custody, or against property of the decedent in his lifetime which has become property of the estate, and such claims need not be presented to the representative for allowance.

5. SAME.

The executor or administrator is not affected with notice of unpaid taxes on property which the decedent conveyed in his lifetime, and in which he had no interest at the time of his death.

6. SAME—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—ACTIONS.

Rev. St. 1898, § 3851, provides that "all claims" against an estate "arising upon contracts * * * must be presented within the time limited in the notice." Section 3852 provides that every claim when presented to the executor or administrator must be supported by the affidavit of the claimant, that the amount is justly due, etc., and a copy of the instrument on which the claim is based must accompany it. Held, the commencement of a suit, the complaint in which contains substantially all the averments required for a regularly verified claim, to have a claim established and paid out of the general funds of the estate and the service of the complaint upon the executors within the time in which a claim could have been properly presented, operated as a presentation of the claim.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 823.]

7. SAME—NECESSITY FOR PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS.

More knowledge on the part of the executor or administrator of the existence of the debt or claim against the estate is not sufficient to dispense with the necessity of presentation.

8. SAME—JURISDICTION.

The presentation of the claim to the executors is not jurisdictional to such an action.

9. SAME—ACTIONS—DEFENSES BY EXECUTORS OR ADMINISTRATORS.

The defense that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations cannot be waived by the executor or administrator.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, §§ 750, 750½.]

10. SAME—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—ACTIONS—COSTS.

Where a suit is begun against executors without a presentation of the claim, and the executors find the claim to be just, and confess the demand within the time to appear and plead to the merits, there should be no judgment for costs, but, if issue is joined on the merits and plaintiff is required to prove his claim, costs should follow as though suit had been brought on a rejected claim.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 1943.]

11. SAME—ACTIONS—TIME TO SUE.

Where an action on a claim against an estate is brought against the executors within the time in which a claim could have been presented, but without a previous presentation of the claim, the action, at most, is only prematurely brought, which is merely ground for a plea in abatement but not for a plea in bar.

12. PLEADING—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—TIME TO PLEAD—WAIVER OF RIGHT.

Where a suit on a claim against the estate of a decedent was brought without a previous presentation of the claim and no plea of that fact either in abatement or in bar was made by defendants, but they pleaded to the merits, on which issues the case stood until too late for the presentation of the claim when the failure to present the claim was pleaded in bar of the action, such a plea was addressed to the merits, and, not being effectual at the commencement of the suit, could not be so later, under the rule, that a defendant having the right to plead matter in abatement must do so at the first opportunity and before or at the time of pleading to the merits or it will be waived, nor can it be made available by a plea in bar.

13. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS—JUDGMENT.

Under Rev. St. 1898, § 3862, providing "a judgment rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator * * * must be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due," a judgment against executors on a claim against the estate is improperly entered against them personally.

Appeal from District Court, Third District; M. L. Ritchie, Judge.

Action by W. Clayton against Henry M. Dinwoodey and other executors of a will. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed, with a modification in conformity with the statute.

*Fullerton v. Bailey, 17 Utah, 85, 53 Pac. 1020.

STRAUP, J. On the 20th day of July, 1905, Henry Dinwoodey, in consideration of the sum of $42,500, by warranty deed sold and conveyed to the plaintiff certain realty, free from all incumbrances, situate in Salt Lake City. By statute it is provided that every tax upon real property is a lien against the property assessed, which attaches as of the first Monday in February of each year. On July 19, 21, 25, 28, and 31, 1905, the rates were fixed as provided by law, and the amount of taxes against the property ascertained to be $1,078.14. The taxes became delinquent November 15, 1905. Henry Dinwoodey died on October 1, 1905. The taxes had not been paid by him. On the 28th day of October his will was admitted to probate. Letters testamentary were issued to the appellants, who qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties as executors. On the 28th day of October, 1905, the first publication of notice to creditors was made. The estate exceeded in value the sum of $10,000. Creditors were required to present their claims to the executors on or before September 10, 1906, the time fixed in the published notice. On the 3d day of January, 1906, the plaintiff paid the taxes to the county treasurer. On the 23d day of March, 1906, the defendants accepted service of summons issued in this action and a copy of a verified complaint, the original of which was filed in the district court by the plaintiff on the 31st day of March. The substance of the complaint is: That on the 20th day of July, 1905, the deceased, by warranty deed, conveyed to the plaintiff certain real estate, fully described, free from all incumbrances; that at the time of the making and delivery of the deed the property was not free from all incumbrances, but was subject to county, state, and school taxes, specifying the amount of each, which aggregated the sum of $1,078.14; that said taxes were at the time of the making and delivery of the deed due and remained unpaid, and were liens and incumbrances on the property; that the plaintiff was obliged to pay, and did pay on the 3d day of January, 1906, the sum of $1,078.14, in extinguishing the liens and incumbrances; that the deceased died on the 1st day of October, 1905, leaving a will, and that the defendants were appointed executors, and letters testamentary issued to them, etc. To the complaint was attached a copy of the deed and made a part thereof. The defendants were required to appear and plead to the complaint 20 days after the service of summons. On the 11th day of April they appeared and demurred to the complaint for want of facts. The hearing on the demurrer was set for the 21st day of April, at which time counsel for both parties appeared. The demurrer was submitted without argument, and overruled. The defendants were given five days in which to answer the complaint. In due time they answered, admitting the death of the decedent and their appointment as executors. Respecting the allegations of the execution of the deed, the taxes due and unpaid, and that they were liens and incumbrances on the property and had been paid by the plaintiff, they averred they had not sufficient knowledge or information, and on that ground denied them. The case was set for trial on the 24th day of October. On the 17th day of October the defendants filed an amended answer, in which it was alleged that the cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by sections 3851, 3852, 3853, and 3356, c. 9, tit. 74, of the Probate Code, Rev. St. 1898. The plaintiff's demurrer to the amended answer was sustained. Plaintiff applied for and was given leave to file an amended complaint, which was done on the 3d day of November, 1906. The amendment contained the following additional allegations: That the taxes became delinquent November 15, 1905, and, were due and should have been paid prior to that date out of the funds of the estate in the due course of administration, but that the defendants, notwithstanding the request of the plaintiff, refused to pay them. The defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint was overruled. They thereafter answered on the 20th day of December, and, in addition to their original answer, averred that notice had been published to creditors, the first publication appearing on the 28th day of October, 1905, and that creditors were required to present their claims on or before the 10th day of September, 1906; that the plaintiff failed to present any claim, and because thereof he was estopped from asserting his claim and his action was barred.

On the trial, evidence was given in support of the allegations of the complaint. There was no substantial conflict in the evidence respecting them. Proof was also made that notice to creditors was given by the defendants, as executors, and as alleged in their answer. The evidence further shows that the plaintiff did not present any claim prior to the commencement of the action. The court found the facts respecting the sale of the property by the deceased to the plaintiff, the execution and delivery of the warranty deed, the conveyance of the property free from all incumbrances, that the taxes were unpaid by the deceased, and that the plaintiff paid them, as alleged in the complaint. As conclusions of law the court held that the taxes were incumbrances on the property at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed; that they became delinquent on the 15th day of November, 1905, and "were due from and should have been paid prior to that date out of the funds of the estate of the said Henry Dinwoodey by the defendants, as executors as aforesaid, in due course of administration"; and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in the sum of $1,188.14, and costs taxed at $10. The judgment, however, is entered: "Adjudged and decreed that said plaintiff do have and recover of and from the said defendants the sum of $1,188.14, together with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 16th day of April, 1907, until paid, together with $10, plaintiff's costs incurred in this action."

From this judgment the defendants have appealed. They assail the conclusions of law, the judgment, the rulings of the court overruling their demurrers to the plaintiff's complaints and sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to their amended answer. These alleged errors are all predicated on the theory that the plaintiff's claim required presentation to the executors as by statute in such case made and provided, and that the plaintiff failed to make such. On the other hand, it is argued by the plaintiff that his claim was not of such character as, under the statute, required presentation. The statute provides that the executor or administrator must publish notice to creditors, in which must be expressed the time within which claims may be presented. This was done. The time fixed was September 10, 1906. Section 3851, Rev. St. 1898, provides: "All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever; provided, that when it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant, to the satisfaction of the court, or judge thereof, that the claimant had no notice as provided in this chapter, by reason of being out of the state, it may be presented at any time before a decree of distribution is entered; provided further, that nothing in this title contained shall be so construed as to prohibit the foreclosure of liens or mortgages as hereinafter provided." By section 3852 it is further provided that every claim when presented to the executor or administrator must be supported by the affidavit of the claimant, or some one in his behalf, that the amount is justly due, no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of the affiant. If the claim be founded on a bond, bill, note, or any other instrument, a copy of such instrument must accompany the claim, and the original instrument must be exhibited, if demanded, unless it be lost, etc. Section 3853 provides that when a claim accompanied by the required affidavit is presented to the executor or administrator he must indorse thereon his allowance or rejection, with the date thereof. If he refuses or neglects to indorse such allowance or rejection for 10 days after the claim has been presented to him, such refusal or neglect may, at the option of the claimant, be deemed equivalent to a rejection on the tenth day. It is further provided that when the claim is rejected the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the executor or administrator within three months after the date of its rejection. Section 3858 provides as follows: "No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except that an action may be brought without notice by any holder of a mortgage or lien to enforce the same against the property of the estate subject thereto, where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint; but no counsel fees shall be recovered in such action unless such claim be so presented." The following sections of the statute in regard to taxes are also relied on: Section 2613 which provides that "the district court must require every administrator or executor to pay out of the funds of the estate all taxes due from such estate; and no order or decree for the distribution of any property of any decedent among the heirs or devisees shall be made until the taxes against the estate are paid"; and section 2597, which provides that every tax upon real property is a lien against the property assessed, and attaches as of the first Monday in February of each year.

The arguments made by the respondent that he was not required to present his claim (1) because the taxes were a lien upon the property at the time of its conveyance, and (2) for the reason that the taxes were due from and against the estate within the meaning of section 2613, are not tenable. Plaintiff's claim arose from a breach of a covenant in the deed. It is a claim arising on contract. It is very clearly expressed by the statute that all claims arising on contracts, whether due, not due, or contingent, must be presented. The only exception made by the statute is that a mortgage or lien "against the property of the estate subject thereto" may be enforced without first presenting a claim to the executor or administrator "where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint." But this was not an action to enforce a lien. It was not one seeking to have the claim satisfied out of specific property of the estate, or to subject any particular property of the estate to the satisfaction thereof. It was one seeking compensation out of the general funds of the estate. Furthermore, the taxes upon the realty were a lien "against the property assessed." It was not a lien against the general property of the decedent or any property of the estate. The property subject to the lien was not owned by the deceased at the time of his death. It was not, and never became, property of the estate. Plaintiff's claim does not fall within the exception contained in section 3858. Nor do we think the case falls within the provisions of section 2613. That section pertains to taxes assessed against, or which are due upon, property of the estate. Taxes on such property are not claims against the estate which need presentation to the administrator or executor for allowance, as is well illustrated by the case of People v. Olivera, 43 Cal. 492. To the same effect are the cases cited by the respondent. In the case of Bonaparte, Ex'r, v. State, etc., 63 Md. 465, it was held that executors and administrators were held affected with notice of taxes due upon property in their custody, and that it was their legal duty to ascertain and pay them, after funeral expenses, before proceeding to the further administration of the estate. In Re Goodheart's Estate (Sur.) 81 N. Y. Supp. 1030, it was held that taxes levied on real estate in the lifetime of the decedent and which was owned by him at the time of his death, but which was devised to the executor in his individual capacity, were entitled to be treated as debts of the decedent, and to be paid out of his personal estate. To the same effect is Findley v. Taylor, 97 Iowa, 420, 66 N. W. 744. On an examination of all the cases cited by the respondent on this point, we find that they all pertain to taxes against property which was owned by the deceased at the time of his death, and which came into the custody of the administrator or executor as property of the estate, or which were levied against such property while in his custody. In such case a presentation of the claim is not required. As stated by the authorities, the administrator or executor is affected with notice of taxes levied against property of the estate in his custody, or which was levied against the property of the decedent in his lifetime and became property of the estate. In such case it is his legal duty to pay them in due course of administration, and before the property is distributed. But we cannot understand upon what theory it may be said that the executor or administrator should be charged with notice of unpaid taxes on property which the deceased had conveyed in his lifetime, and in and to which he had no interest at the time of his death, and which did not become property of the estate nor come into the custody of the administrator or executor. If such were the case, he would be required to ascertain from the records, or from other sources, what realty was owned and conveyed by the deceased in his lifetime, whether at the time of the conveyance there were unpaid taxes against the property, whether the deceased by his deed of conveyance had agreed to pay them, and whether they remained unpaid. Such a requirement would be onerous and unreasonable. It seems quite clear to us that the executor or administrator is affected with notice of unpaid taxes on property only of the estate, property which was owned by or in which the deceased had an interest at the time of his death, and of which the administrator or executor was entitled to the custody for administration and distribution. We are therefore of the opinion that plaintiff's claim required presentation.

This brings us to the further question as to whether the proceedings had in the premises were equivalent to the presentation of a claim. As before observed, no claim was presented to the executors before the commencement of the suit. The plaintiff had until the 10th day of September, 1906, in which to present his claim. Without first presenting it to the executors, he commenced this action on the 23d day of March, 1906. The complaint filed by him was verified. To it was attached a copy of the deed. The complaint contained substantially all the averments necessary to be set forth in a regularly verified, presented claim, and was served upon the executors. The action was brought to have the claim established and paid out of the general funds of the estate. We are of the opinion that the commencement of the suit and the service upon the executors of the verified complaint within the time in which a claim could have been properly presented operated as a presentation of the claim. In this we are amply sustained by the authorities. On this question, in 18 Cyc. 452, it is said: "According to the weight of authority, the commencement of a suit and its continuous prosecution operates as a presentation of the claim or obviates the necessity of presentation." The text, among other cases cited there, is supported by the following: Fillyau v. Lavery, 3 Fla. 72; Roberts v. Flatt, 142 Ill. 485, 32 N. E. 484; Floyd v. Clayton, 67 Ala. 265; Moore v. McKinley, 60 Iowa, 367, 14 N. W. 768. The case of Fillyau v. Lavery, supra, is much in point. There the statute provided that "all debts and demands, of whatsoever nature, against the estate of any testator or intestate, which shall not be exhibited within the said two years, shall be forever barred." As to the necessity of presenting claims, and what will be regarded as equivalent to a presentation, the court said: "As to the question, what shall constitute an exhibition of a debt or demand against an estate, we think there should be actual presentation of the claim within the time prescribed, or something done by the party equivalent to it. The presentation need not be in any particular form, but sufficient to give such notice to the executor or administrator of the existence of the debt or demand, its character and amount, as would enable him with reasonable certainty to provide for its payment. Mere knowledge on the part of the executor or administrator of the existence of the claim is not enough. The party holding the claim or demand must pursue some measures to present his demand, and not remain passive, or sleep upon his right. The bringing of a suit or action at law or in equity we would regard as equivalent to an actual presentation." Cases from the courts of New Jersey are cited in Cyc., supra, as being contrary to the text, principally Newbold v. Fenimore, 53 N. J. Law, 307, 21 Atl. 939, and Robins v. Arnold, 42 N. J. Eq. 511, 8 Atl. 721. The second case does not appear to be much in point, for it seems the bill filed in chancery was unverified, and it was observed that "there was therefore neither verification nor admission of the claim in question within" the period in which a claim could have been properly presented. The reason given in the first case doubtless has much force when applied to the procedure there, but it is not persuasive when applied to our procedure.

It is: "The presentation of claims of creditors within the limited time is, moreover, important to enable the personal representative to determine whether the estate is to be settled as a solvent or insolvent estate, or whether real estate must be resorted to for payment of debts. Upon the construction contended for, such determinations could not be made until after final judgment in every suit brought during the time limited in the rule to bar creditors."

The reason given why claims are required to be presented is proper enough, but the statement that "such determinations could not be made until after final judgment" has no force when applied to our probate procedure. The apparent purpose of the statute requiring presentation of claims is said to be: "First, to furnish the administrator with pertinent evidence touching their validity and justness, by means of which he may determine for himself whether they ought to be paid out of the funds of the estate; and, second, to enable him to justify his acts, in some measure at least, in accounting with the county court." Willis v. Marks, 29 Or. 493, 45 Pac. 293. And, as stated in 1 Abbott's Probate Law, § 468, "to give creditors and other persons interested notice of the condition of the estate and to expedite its settlement." Of course, mere knowledge on the part of the executor or administrator of the existence of a debt or claim against the estate is not sufficient to dispense with the necessity of presentation. But when, as here, the executors are served with a copy of a verified complaint in an action commenced seeking to establish a claim, and which substantially contains all the averments required in a regularly presented claim, and such suit is commenced and the summons and complaint served upon the executors within the time in which a claim could be properly presented, we can perceive no good reason why they were not afforded equal opportunity and given every means to determine the justness of the claim, and whether it ought to be paid out of the funds of the estate, as fully as though the claim had been regularly presented within the time fixed in the published notice without suit. When a claim is regularly presented, the administrator or executor has 10 days to determine whether he will allow or reject the claim. Presented in the form it was, the executor had 20 days before he was called on to act to determine the justness of the claim and whether it ought to have been paid out of the estate. If the plaintiff had not filed his suit, but had waited until the 1st day of September, 1906, and then had regularly presented his claim to the executors, in what way would they have been afforded better means to investigate the justness of the claim, and in what manner could they better have determined whether it ought to have been paid out of the estate, or in what respect would it better have facilitated or expedited the settlement of the estate? If such had been done, and if the executors had then denied what they denied here in their answer, the claim would have been rejected and the plaintiff would have been required to establish it in court, as was done by him. If, on the other hand, the executors in such case had allowed the claim and avoided the necessity of a suit to establish it, they equally had the opportunity in April, 1906, after the suit had been commenced, to confess the demand, if, on investigation, they found it to be just, and end the litigation.

It cannot be said that the presentation of the claim to the executors was jurisdictional. O'Brien v. Larson, 71 Minn. 371, 74 N. W. 148. It is quite true that it was held in Harp v. Calahan, 46 Cal. 222, that, without having first presented a claim for allowance, the claimant had no cause of action, and that the administrator could not waive the necessity of presenting a claim for allowance. But the particular question under consideration—whether the commencement of a suit within the time in which a claim could have been properly presented operates as a presentation of the claim—was not there involved. What was said by the court was in respect of a fact which was a material, and not a jurisdictional, averment. This is apparent from both prior and subsequent holdings of that same court. In the case of Bank of Stockton v. Howland, 42 Cal. 129, and in Drake v. Foster, 52 Cal. 225, it was held, under statutes identical with ours, that an objection to a recovery on a claim against the estate of a deceased person on the ground that it was not presented to the executor for allowance cannot be made for the first time in the Supreme Court, nor on motion for a new trial. In McCann v. Pennie, 100 Cal. 547, 35 Pac. 158, in speaking of section 1500 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, which corresponds with section 3858 of our Code, and where it is provided that no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon unless the claim was first presented to the executor or administrator, the court said it was "analogous to the statute of frauds, which declares that no action shall be maintained on, etc., unless, etc.; and the bar of the statute must be pleaded in defense, unless the complaint shows upon its face that the contract is void under the statute; and a similar rule prevails in regard to the statute of limitations." And in Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 40 Pac. 21, 386, it was held that proof of the presentation of the claim was not essential to the validity of the judgment. This case was cited with approval in the subsequent case of Frazier v. Murphy, 133 Cal. 95, 65 Pac. 326. This principle, however, must not be confused with that involved, where the claim is barred by the general statute of limitations, and because of the bar cannot be allowed by the executor or administrator or the judge, as provided in section 3857, or where the claim was neither presented nor suit commenced within the time in which the claim could properly have been presented. For the defense that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations cannot be waived by the executor or administrator. Fullerton v. Bailey, 17 Utah, 85, 53 Pac. 1020; Reay v. Heazleton, 128 Cal. 335, 60 Pac. 977.

Had the claim here been barred by the general statute of limitations, or by the special statute, such as where a claim had been presented and rejected by the executors and suit was not commenced within the time provided by the statute, or where no claim had been presented nor suit commenced within the time in which a claim could have been properly presented, the bar of the statute would be a complete defense. But where the suit is commenced under the circumstances heretofore shown, the commencement of the suit operates as a presentation of the claim. In such case, if the executor or administrator, on investigation, finds the claim to be just, and determines that it ought to be paid by the estate, he may confess the demand within the time in which he is required to appear in the action and plead to the merits, and, if he does so, there should be no judgment for costs. If, however, issues are joined as to the merits of the claim and material allegations with respect thereto are denied, and the plaintiff is put upon his proof to establish his claim, then costs should follow as though suit had been brought on a rejected claim. The plaintiff having commenced the action within the time in which a claim could have been presented, before giving the executors an opportunity to pass on the claim, the action at most was only prematurely brought. A premature institution of a suit may be ground for a plea in abatement, which, if interposed, has the effect to defeat or suspend the suit for the time being; but it is not ground for a plea in bar, and cannot have the effect to impair or defeat the action altogether. Giboney v. German Ins. Co., 48 Mo. App. 185; Collette v. Weed, 68 Wis. 428, 32 N. W. 753; Moore v. Sargent, 112 Ind. 484, 14 N. E. 468.

No plea in abatement was interposed. Without pleading this matter either in abatement or in bar, the defendants, in April, pleaded to the merits, and, on oath, denied all the constituent elements of the claim set forth in the complaint. Upon such issues the case stood until after the time in which a claim could have been regularly presented had expired. The defendants then, and after the case had been set for trial, for the first time pleaded the failure to present a claim in bar of the action. Had such fact been pleaded before joining issues in April, or at any time prior to the 10th day of September, 1906, and, though it should be that the commencement of the suit was not equivalent to the presentation of the claim, the plaintiff could have presented a verified claim to the defendants and thus utterly destroyed the pretended plea in bar. Such a plea in bar is addressed to the merits, and, not being effectual when the suit was commenced, could not become so after the suit had been pending for nearly six months. It is apparent the matter was here in abatement and not in bar. It is a well-recognized principle of pleading that a defendant having a right to a plea in abatement must avail himself of it at the first opportunity and before or at the time of pleading to the merits, and, if he does not do so, it is waived. Nor can that which is available by plea in abatement be made available by plea in bar.

We are of the opinion that the conclusion reached by the trial court, that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment and to have his claim paid out of the funds of the estate, was correct. We are, however, of the opinion that the judgment must be modified for the reason that the judgment as entered is a personal judgment against the defendants. By section 3862 of the statute it is provided that: "A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator, upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate, only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge; and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due. A certified transcript of the original docket of the judgment must be filed among the papers of the estate in court. No execution must issue upon such judgment, nor shall it create any lien upon the property of the estate, or give to the judgment creditor any priority of payment."

The cause is therefore remanded to the trial court, with directions to modify the judgment in conformity with the statute. With such modification the judgment of the court below is affirmed. Neither party is given costs on appeal.

MCCARTY, C. J., and FRICK, J., concur.

CLAWSON v. CLAYTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—MEMBERS AND STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTION OF CORPORATE BOOKS AND RECORDS.

Under section 329, Rev. St. 1898, providing that the books of every corporation organized in this state shall at all reasonable hours be subject to the inspection of any bona fide stockholder of record, the right to make an inspection and examination of the books at reasonable times, by a stockholder, is an absolute, and not a qualified, right.

2. SAME.

The fact that the right of a stockholder to inspect the corporate records is sought to be strictly enforced by section 4415, Pen. Code, providing that a refusal to allow a stockholder to inspect the books is a misdemeanor, emphasizes the existence of the right, rather than qualifying it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 674-685.]

3. SAME.

The right of a stockholder to inspect the corporate books is qualified only, in that he must examine them at reasonable times, and shall not unnecessarily interfere with the corporation's work.

4. MANDAMUS—INSPECTION OF CORPORATE BOOKS—RIGHT OF STOCKHOLDER—ENFORCEMENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a stockholder demands an inspection of the corporate books from a bad motive, or at a time and in a manner which unnecessarily interferes with the corporate officers or their work, the exercise of the right will not be enforced by the court, but these objections are matters of defense, and not things the stockholder must negative in the first instance, nor will they be presumed because he selects an agent to make the inspection for him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 264.]

5. CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTION OF CORPORATE BOOKS.

The doctrine that an act which is not a mere personal privilege or which does not involve a personal trust may, as a general rule, be done through another, applies to the right of a stockholder to inspect corporate books.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 674-685.]

6. SAME.

The business hours of a corporation are "reasonable hours" in which to inspect its books, within the meaning of section 329, Rev. St. 1898, providing that the books of every corporation organized in this state shall at all reasonable hours be subject to the inspection of any bona fide stockholder of record.

Appeal from District Court, Third District; T. D. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Spencer Clawson against I. A. Clayton and the Clayton Investment Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Young & Snow, for appellants. Young & Moyle, for respondent.

FRICK, J. The plaintiff, as a stockholder, made application to the district court for an order requiring the defendants to permit him to inspect the books of the defendant company. The plaintiff, after alleging the incorporation of the defendant company, in substance, states that he is a bona fide stockholder of record of the defendant corporation; that at various times during business hours of the corporation he had applied to the corporation and its secretary for permission to inspect the corporate books, through an accountant, in his behalf; that the defendant I. A. Clayton is the secretary and treasurer of said corporation, and as such has charge of all of its books; and that said defendants have, at all times, refused, and still refuse, to permit the plaintiff to inspect the books of said corporation through an accountant as aforesaid. The defendants admitted the corporate existence of the defendant company; admitted that I. A. Clayton was the secretary and treasurer thereof, and that as such, at all times, had the custody and control of all of the books of the corporation; and further admitted that the plaintiff is a bona fide stockholder of record of the defendant corporation. The defendants denied all the other allegations, and averred that the plaintiff at all times was acquainted with the system of bookkeeping adopted by said corporation, and that he was well qualified and competent to examine and inspect said books personally; that the defendants always were ready and willing to have the plaintiff make a personal examination and inspection of said books, but that they refused the plaintiff the right to make such examination and inspection through an agent and accountant. Upon a hearing to the court, it made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and, as a conclusion of law, found that the defendant unlawfully denied the plaintiff the right to examine and inspect the books of said corporation through an accountant, and ordered the defendants, their agents, servants or employees forthwith to permit the plaintiff, through an accountant, to examine and inspect the books of the corporation during business hours at its office and in the absence of the plaintiff. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

All the assignments of error may be determined upon the one that the court erred in making the order permitting an inspection of the books of the corporation through an accountant, where, as in this case, the right to a personal inspection by the stockholder is not denied. At common law the inspection of corporate books by the stockholder was held to be a matter of privilege, rather than a matter of right. At all events the right, if we call it such, was held to be a qualified right, and to some extent at least discretionary. In this view, it was sometimes held that the right of inspection was personal to the stockholder, and, unless he made it appear that he was physically unable or otherwise disqualified to make a proper examination of the corporate books, that such an examination by an agent or attorney would not be permitted. In some cases it was further held that the stockholder should make it appear what the purpose of the examination was, and that he had some good reason for demanding an inspection. The foregoing doctrine is invoked by the defendants as applicable to this case. Most of the states have enacted statutes upon the subject. These statutes while somewhat varied in phraseology are in harmony with regard to their purpose. Section 329, Rev. St. 1898, as contained in the chapter devoted to private corporations, reads as follows: "The books of every corporation organized under the laws of this state must be so kept as to show the original stockholders, their interests, the amount paid on their shares, and all transfers thereof; all books of any corporation shall, at all reasonable hours, be subject to the inspection of any bona fide stockholder of record." This section is supplemented by section 4415 of the Penal Code, which, in substance, provides that every officer or agent of any corporation who has in his custody or control any book, paper, or document of such corporation, and who refuses a stockholder, upon lawful demand, during office hours, the right to inspect or take a copy of the same, or any part thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor. It is contended by the defendants that, since a refusal of inspection involves a penal offense, the statute should receive a strict construction, and that a reasonable construction of it would limit the right of inspection to the stockholder personally, unless some good reason is shown by him why he cannot make it.

It is further contended that the stockholder should be required to give some reason why he desires an inspection of the books. We cannot assent to these contentions. As we view the matter the right to make an inspection and examination of the corporate books, at reasonable times, by a stockholder, is an absolute, and not a qualified, right. The right is given by statute without a qualification, except that it be made at reasonable hours. The fact that the right is sought to be strictly enforced by a penal statute emphasizes the existence of the right, rather than qualifies it. The officers of the corporation, while directly its agents conducting its affairs, are nevertheless selected and chosen by the stockholders. The corporation is the creature of the stockholders. They are not the creatures of the corporation. The stockholder thus having a beneficial interest in the corporate property is interested in the conduct of its affairs, and he also has an interest in knowing whether or not the officers of the corporation, for whose selection he is in part, at least, responsible, are faithfully discharging their respective duties. In what way may he ascertain this fact better than by an inspection of the books and records in which all the proceedings and transactions of these officers, as agents of the corporation, are recorded? Is he not entirely within his rights, as well as within the provisions of the statute, when he demands an inspection of the books and records at any reasonable time? We think he is. But it is asserted that the right is personal to the stockholder. What reason is there for this contention in view of what we have said above? The purpose of inspection and examination of the books is to give the stockholder all the information he may desire with regard to the corporate affairs. To obtain this information is his absolute right. Since he had a choice, with the other stockholders, and, if he held the majority of the stock, he had this choice alone, in selecting the officers and agents of the company, we think that he also has the right to say whom he will choose in obtaining the information he desires. Nor do we think it lies with the officers or agents of the corporation, whose acts bind the stockholder, to say in what way or through whom he shall ascertain the manner in which the corporate affairs are conducted by them, provided he does this at reasonable times, and does not unnecessarily impede or interfere with their work. Nor may they pass upon the motives that prompt him in seeking the information. At all events, it will not be presumed, in the first instance, that the stockholder in seeking the information to which he is entitled as a matter of right does this with bad motives, or that he thereby intends to inflict an injury upon the corporation, or upon any one. If there be such a motive, and this is the only reason why an inspection is desired, or if the stockholder demands inspection at such times, and in such manner as unnecessarily interferes with the corporate officers, or unduly impedes their work, no doubt this would not be a proper exercise of the right, but an abuse of it, and would not be permitted by the court. These things, however, are matters of defense, and not matters that the stockholder must negative in the first instance. Nor are these things presumed from the fact that the stockholder selects some agent to make the inspection or examination in his behalf. An act which is not a mere personal privilege, or which does not involve a personal trust may, as a general rule, be done through another. This doctrine, we think, applies to the right of a stockholder to inspect corporate books.

In 10 Cyc. 958, the law upon this subject is stated in the following language: "The stockholder is not confined to a personal inspection by himself, but may exercise the right through an agent, attorney, solicitor, counselor, or expert." The case of Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 56 N. E. 1033, 48 L. R. A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707, involved this very question. In passing upon it at page 199 of 62 Ohio St., page 1035 of 56 N. E. (48 L. R. A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707) the court say: "The contention is that whatever right of examination the statute gives is a personal right, and must be exercised by the stockholder in person. Since when, we would inquire, has it been the law that one who has given him a clear right as to property may not exercise it by any proper agent? The proposition has the quality of novelty, but it is not sound. It must be apparent, on reflection, that, if so circumscribed a limit were placed on the right, its exercise in many instances would be futile." That the right of inspection may be exercised through an agent or an attorney is also held by the following authorities: Foster v. White, 86 Ala. 467, 6 South. 88; Clason v. Nassau Ferry Co., 86 Hun, 128, 33 N. Y. Supp. 244; Mitchell v. Rubber Co. (N. J.) 24 Atl. 407; Burke v. Citizens' Bank, 51 La. Ann. 426, 25 South. 318; 2 Cook on Corporations (5th Ed.) § 516. The following authorities hold that the right is an absolute one, and that the motives of the stockholder are not material, except, perhaps, defensively: State v. Sportsman's Park Ass'n, 29 Mo. App. 326; People ex rel. McDonald v. U. S. Merc. Rep. Co., 20 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 192; Ellsworth v. Dorwart, 95 Iowa, 108, 63 N. W. 588, 58 Am. St. Rep. 427. While the question of the inspection of corporate books was presented from a somewhat different point of view in Harkness v. Guthrie, 27 Utah, 248, 75 Pac. 624, 107 Am. St. Rep. 664, yet we think the views we have expressed herein are supported in that case. The English case cited by counsel—In re West Great Consols Mine, 27 Ch. Div. 106—in no way conflicts with the doctrine announced in the foregoing authorities. Under the statute passed upon in that case, the English court held that discretionary powers were vested in the court to whom the application was made, and, such discretion having been exercised, the appellate court would not review it in that case. It is true that one of the judges stated that the right should be held to be a personal one of the stockholder, and should be exercised by him only. But this was not necessary to the decision. The court in the case of Clarke v. Eastern

Bldg. & Loan Ass'n (C. C.) 89 Fed. 779, held that in that case an inspection would not be ordered for the reason that the books could be produced by a subpoena duces tecum, and the same result obtained as if an inspection were had. It may also be stated that in some of the other cases, in discussing the proposition, the language of some of the judges may be taken as indicating that the right was in some respects qualified and contingent. But the judgments pronounced are to the contrary, and are emphatic that the right is an absolute one.

The contention that the court exceeded the provisions of the statute in giving the right of inspection during business hours, instead of "at all reasonable hours," as stated in the statute, seems to us untenable. The business hours of the corporation, it would seem, are reasonable hours in which to inspect its books. It is during these hours that the officers and agents of the corporation are supposed to be present at the office of the company, and the books accessible. The claim that inspection might unduly interfere with the work of the employees of the corporation is more apparent than real. Undoubtedly, if all the stockholders of the corporation made it a practice to continuously demand the books and to keep them from the employees, it might so interfere. The demand, however, must be at reasonable hours, and must be reasonably exercised. The court, in this case, found the demand to have been reasonable, and authorized the inspection to be made only in a reasonable manner. When a demand is made which, under the circumstances, is unreasonable, and is sought to be exercised in an unreasonable manner, or for illegitimate purposes, the corporation may refuse it. The court, upon proper allegation and proof being made of such facts, no doubt would protect the interests of the corporation, and either sustain it in its refusal, or require the inspection to be made at reasonable times, and in a proper manner. But the officers of the corporation may not cast the burden in this regard upon the stockholder, but must assume it themselves.

We are of the opinion that the judgment appealed from should be, and it accordingly is, affirmed; respondent to recover costs.

LEWIS v. MAMMOTH MINING CO.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 20, 1908.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT —VIOLATION OF INSTRUCTIONS—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

That an engineer in charge of a donkey engine in a mine had no authority to vacate his post as engineer, or to permit another to operate the engine, and in so doing violated his contract of employment, and that the employé, who was incompetent, attempting to operate the engine, likewise violated his instructions, and did that which he was forbidden to do when he took charge thereof, does not relieve the employer from liability for injury to another employé due to such attempted operation of the engine; the test being not whether an employé was acting in accordance with the instructions given him, but whether he was performing a service in furtherance of the employer's business.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1210-1225.]

Appeal from District Court, Third District;
T. D. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Almira Lewis against the Mammoth Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwards, Smith & Price, for appellant.
Powers & Marioneaux, for respondent.

MCCARTY, C. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the death of her son Edward Lewis, alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant while said Lewis was at work for defendant in its mine at Mammoth, Juab county, Utah. The complaint alleges in part as follows: "That on or about the 13th day of October, 1904, while said Edward Lewis was in the employ of said defendant and in pursuance of its directions, engaged at work in a shaft in said mine, about 2,160 feet beneath the surface, said defendant, without notice or warning to said Lewis, and without fault on his part, wrongfully, negligently, and carelessly caused and suffered a bucket to fall down said shaft from a station therein about 160 feet above where said Lewis was at work, and to then and there strike said Lewis with great force." Then follows a description of the injuries inflicted, from which injuries, it is alleged, Lewis died on or about September 22, 1905, at Richfield, Utah. Defendant in its answer admitted that Lewis was in its employ and at work at the time and place alleged in the complaint; but denied that he was killed through any negligence upon its part. A trial was had which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $5,000. From the judgment entered on the verdict, the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

At the time of the accident described in the complaint, Edward Lewis, the deceased, was at work in the bottom of the shaft in defendant's mine, 2,160 feet below the surface. A cage was operated in the shaft between the 300 and 1,900 foot level by machinery located in the 300-foot level. It was the duty of one Forcey to run cars off and on to the cage at the 300-foot level, and sometimes, in the absence of the employé whose duty it was to put the loaded cars on the cage at the lower levels, Forcey would be directed by the superintendent or shift boss to "cage the cars," or "ride the cage," as the work was sometimes called. On the day in question he was at work on the 1,900-foot level, putting cars on the cage and sending them up to the 300-foot level, known as the "tunnel level." The shaft extended downward from the 1,900-foot level about 160 feet, but the cage did not run below the 1,900-foot level. An iron bucket, attached to a cable which was operated by means of a donkey engine situated at the 1,900-foot level, was used in the shaft below said level. Defendant had in its employ one Jesse Meyers, who was a competent engineer, whose duty it was to operate this donkey engine, and by means thereof to raise and lower the bucket up and down the shaft below said level. This he would do upon bell signals from the men at work in the bottom of the shaft. The engineer had no other duties aside from operating the engine. And Forcey's duties on the day in question were, as stated, to "cage" the ore cars at the 1,900-foot level. This was the only work assigned to him by defendant, and his duties did not require him to operate the donkey engine. The testimony given by Forcey shows that he was not an engineer, and that he did not understand the method of operating an engine. On the day in question Forcey proposed to exchange work with the engineer, who was in charge of, and whose duty it was to operate, the donkey engine mentioned. To this proposition Meyers, the engineer, assented, and at once placed Forcey in charge of the engine. The facts in relation to what then took place are fully set forth by Forcey in his testimony, wherein he says: "I started to lower the bucket down the shaft below the 1,900. Lewis [referring to the deceased] was working down the shaft that is below the 1,900 in the bottom. * * * I had received no signal to lower the bucket. * * * After I started to do it, I got rattled and let it go, and the bucket went down to the bottom. I don't know whether I put on the brakes or not. * * * It has been a long while, and I kind of got frightened, and I don't remember about it. The bucket went to the bottom. When I started to run the engine, there was a mark there to stop it by, and I didn't know how to stop it I guess. * * * I didn't do anything. I was too scared to do anything. I had never lowered a bucket before that time. It was the first time I ever tried." Counsel for appellant, defendant below, in their brief concede that, when Forcey undertook "to run said engine, he lost control of it, and the bucket fell down the shaft at a high rate of speed, striking the said Edward Lewis and injuring him." And there is abundant evidence in the record to support the finding of the jury that his death was the result of the injuries received.

The court, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: "(12) Under the facts of this case, and the statutes of Utah [referring to section 1343, Rev. St. 1898], neither the engineer who had charge of the engine, who raised and lowered the bucket, nor Forcey, who manipulated the engine at the time of the accident, were fellow servants of the deceased, and, if the deceased was injured by the negligence of either the engineer or Forcey, or the combined negligence of both, the defendant is liable therefor; and, if the deceased died from injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the engineer or of Forcey, or both combined, and he himself was free from contributory negligence, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff in such sum as will compensate her for such damages as she has proven.

"(13) That the engineer and Forcey in allowing Forcey to manipulate the engine acted contrary to the express orders of the defendant company does not relieve the defendant from liability for the results of any negligence, if any is shown by the evidence, of said engineer or Forcey while Forcey was so manipulating the engine."

Counsel for appellant do not challenge the correctness of the first part of the foregoing instructions, wherein the court charged that, under the statutes of this state, the engineer and Forcey were not fellow servants with the deceased, but they insist that the giving of the balance of the said instructions was error. It is contended that, when Forcey took charge of and proceeded to operate the donkey engine referred to, he acted without authority and outside of the scope of his employment, and that, therefore, appellant cannot be held liable for any damage resulting from the negligent manner in which the engine was operated on the day in question. It may be conceded—in fact, we think the record shows—that Meyers had no authority to vacate his post as engineer, nor to permit some other person to operate the engine, and that, when he placed Forcey in control of the engine on the day in question, he did so in violation of the duties imposed upon him by his contract of employment, and that Forcey likewise violated the instructions of his employer, and did that which he was forbidden to do when he assumed control of the engine and attempted to operate it; but it does not follow necessarily that when Meyers and Forcey thus violated the instructions, and did something which the rules and regulations of their employment forbade, they, or either of them, acted beyond the scope of their employment. The important question is not whether they acted in accordance with the instructions given them by the defendant, but were they at the time of the commission of the alleged negligent acts performing a service for the defendant in furtherance of its business. If they were, then, under all of the authorities, the defendant is responsible for their negligent acts. It was the duty of the engineer, Meyers, to operate the engine, and to raise and lower with care the buckets in the shaft, and, when he placed an incompetent person in charge of the engine, he violated a duty in the line of his employment, but did not act beyond the scope of his employment; that is, he was authorized, in fact it was his duty, to perform the service in which he was engaged, and in the course of which he put Forcey in control of the engine, who, it is conceded, was incompetent to properly operate it. Therefore his negligence in this regard was the negligence of the defendant. "The master is responsible for the negligent acts or omissions of his servants in the course of their employment, though unauthorized or forbidden by him, and although outside of their 'line of duty,' and without regard to their motives. He cannot limit his responsibility for any servant by employing him only with reference to a single branch of the business." 1 Shear. & Redf. Neg. § 146. This same doctrine is well illustrated in the case of Railway v. Shields, 47 Ohio St. 387, 24 N. E. 658, 8 L. R. A. 404, 21 Am. St. Rep. 840, wherein the court says: "A servant * * * cannot depart from the duty intrusted to him when that duty regards the right of others in respect to the employment of dangerous instruments by the master in the prosecution of his business, without making the master liable for the consequences; for the first step in that direction is a breach of the duty by the master, and his negligence in this regard becomes at once the negligence of the master, otherwise the duty required of the master in respect to the custody of such instruments employed in his business may be shifted from the master to the servant, which cannot be done so as to exonerate the master from the consequences of a neglect of duty." Likewise in the case of Barmore v. Vicksburg, S. & P. Ry. Co., 85 Miss. 426, 38 South. 210, 70 L. R. A. 627, it is said: "If the master intrusts the custody of dangerous agencies to his servants, the proper custody as well as the use of them becomes a part of the servant's employment by the master, and his negligence in any regard is imputed to the master in an action by one injured thereby. And, where the injury received results from the negligence of the servant in the custody of the instrument, it is immaterial, so far as the liability of the master is concerned, as to what use may have been made of it by the servant." Railway v. Shields, 47 Ohio St. 387, 24 N. E. 658, 8 L. R. A. 404, 21 Am. St. Rep. 840. In such cases the duty of the servant is to carefully guard and control such instrument, and a failure in this respect is not a departure from the master's service, but a negligent discharge of that service." The following authorities illustrate and declare this same doctrine: 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 163; Reynolds v. Witt, 13 S. C. 5, 36 Am. Rep. 678; Philadelphia, etc., R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. (U. S.) 468, 14 L. Ed. 502; Duggins v. Watson, 15 Ark. 118, 60 Am. Dec. 500; Lakin v. Railroad Co., 15 Or. 220, 15 Pac. 641; Birmingham W. C. Co. v. Hubbard, 85 Ala. 179, 4 South. 607, 7 Am. St. Rep. 35; Erie Ry. Co. v. Salisbury (N. J.) 50 Atl. 117, 55 L. R. A. 578; Tex. & Pac. R. R. Co. v. Scoville, 62 Fed. 730, 10 C. C. A. 479, 27 L. R. A. 179; Alsever v. Minn. & St. L. R. Co., 115 Iowa, 338, 88 N. W. 841, 56 L. R. A. 748; Dimmitt v. Hannibal & St. J. Ry. Co., 40 Mo. App. 654; Althorff v. Wolfe, 22 N. Y. 355; Quinn v. Power, 87 N. Y. 535, 41 Am. Rep. 392; Wharton, Negligence, § 160.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs.

ACORD v. BOOTH et al.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PROCEEDINGS OF COUNCIL—RIGHT OF PUBLIC TO BE PRESENT—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Rev. St. 1898, § 202, requiring a city council to sit with open doors, extends to a session of the council while sitting as a "committee of the whole," and the public cannot be excluded therefrom.

Appeal from District Court, Fourth District; J. E. Booth, Judge.

Action by A. F. Acord against A. L. Booth and others, members of the city council of Provo City, and William K. Henry, marshal, for damages for exclusion from a session of the council while sitting as a committee of the whole. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. H. Thomas, Booth & Cluff and Thurman, Wedgwood & Irvine, for appellants. J. W. N. Whitecotton, for respondent.

FRICK, J. The plaintiff in his complaint, after alleging his citizenship, the corporate existence of Provo City as a municipal corporation, and the official positions of the defendants, proceeds in substance as follows: That on the 18th day of June, 1906, the defendants, except William K. Henry, were holding a regular session of the city council of Provo City in the council chamber provided by that city; that plaintiff was present and attended said council meeting; that during the session of said council, for the purpose of carrying on the deliberations of said council in secret, and to prevent the public, and especially the citizens of Provo City, from knowing what was being done by said council in said session, upon motion made and carried for that purpose, said council resolved itself into a committee of the whole council, and wrongfully and unlawfully ordered that all persons, except the members thereof, the mayor of Provo City, and the defendant William K. Henry, as city marshal, be excluded from said council chamber while said defendants as the city council of Provo City were discussing matters affecting the general welfare of said city; that plaintiff was lawfully present at said session, and his conduct was quiet and inoffensive, and he desired to remain in attendance on said session, and so informed said defendants; that, notwithstanding his right to be present and his insistence upon such right, said defendants, as members of and constituting said council, unlawfully and wrongfully instructed said William K. Henry, as city marshal, to remove the plaintiff from said chamber and said session; that in pursuance of said order said Henry, as city marshal, told the plaintiff that he must leave said chamber, and that, if he did not leave immediately, he, said Henry, would forcibly eject the plaintiff from said chamber; that, to avoid forcible ejection, plaintiff left said chamber, and that he, by the means and manner aforesaid, was excluded from said session of said council; that, if plaintiff had not left said chamber, said marshal would have put the plaintiff out by the use of force and violence; that by reason of being forced to leave said council chamber and the session of said council the plaintiff did suffer great humiliation, chagrin, and indignity, and was deprived of his right to be present at and hear the deliberations of said council, to his damage in the sum of $50. The defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants answered jointly, admitting the official capacity of the defendants, the corporate existence of Provo City, and denying all the other allegations of the complaint. A trial was had to a jury upon the issues joined, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, in which the jury assessed his damages at one cent. Judgment was duly entered upon the verdict. Defendants appeal.

It is urged that the court erred in not sustaining the demurrer, for the reason that the complaint does not directly nor sufficiently allege that the plaintiff was either forcibly ejected from or against his will compelled to leave the council chamber while the council was in session as in committee of the whole council. It will be observed that the plaintiff does not predicate his right of recovery upon an assault and battery, nor for an injury arising from such a cause. The right of action is based upon his right to be present during the session of the city council as a public body while discharging public duties. The action is for the purpose of vindicating a right rather than for the purpose of recovering damages as compensation for injuries sustained. If the plaintiff had not a legal right to be present and the city council had the right to hold secret sessions and exclude the public therefrom, then the complaint perhaps is vulnerable to the objection urged. Chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes of Utah of 1898 covers the subject of council meetings, of which section 202 is a part, and provides: "It shall sit with open doors and keep a journal of its own proceedings." The question, therefore, is: Did the city council have the right to exclude the public, including the plaintiff, from its sessions while sitting in the capacity of what, in parliamentary law, is termed the "committee of the whole"? The practice of conducting business through the committee of the whole has for many years prevailed in legislative and deliberative bodies. Such a committee is no more than the assembly or body itself transacting a part of its business through what is termed the committee of the whole. The committee, therefore, as its name implies, amounts to this: That the particular body or assembly is carrying on a part of its legislative or deliberative functions as a committee composed of all its members. The committee, as is well known, cannot be in session unless the legal or parliamentary body of which it is composed is in session. It cannot adjourn to meet again at some other time or place. Whenever it rises, it must at once report its conclusions to the main body, and that body either rejects, approves, or modifies any matter reported to it. It is quite true that, since a majority of the committee is also generally a majority of the whole body, any matter agreed to in committee of the whole will likely be agreed to when it comes before the main body. The committee of the whole has, in modern times, in legislative and deliberative bodies become almost a matter of necessity. When the main body resolves itself into such committee, it does so for the purpose of escaping from the restraint that is placed upon its members under the rules governing the procedure of the main body. Debate and discussion are freer, and the secretary or clerk is relieved from recording all motions made and proceedings had, since all these are finally incorporated into the report which the presiding officer of the committee makes to the presiding officer of the main body. The report is addressed to the presiding officer of the main body, and is made to the same assembly and to the same members from whom it emanates. The whole purpose, therefore, of forming the committee of the whole, is to consider matters coming before the main body in an informal manner, as it is sometimes called. The committee of the whole, therefore, is nothing but the main body considering its business under suspended rules applicable to the main body. It is the same body transacting business in an informal instead of a formal manner under strict rules. All this is made clear by L. S. Cushing in his work entitled "Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies," pp. 1009-1018, in paragraph 32 of Roberts' Rules of Order, and likewise at pages 220 and 237 of Waples' Handbook of Parliamentary Practice. Mr. Cushing, in the work referred to, after tracing the history of the committee of the whole at some length, in speaking of its modern purpose, at page 1013, says: "In the foregoing remarks, the history of the introduction and establishment of this form of proceeding has been traced. It remains now to be seen what advantages, if any, it possesses over the ordinary mode; for, except that it furnishes an occasional relief to the speaker and that members are allowed in committee to speak more than once to the same question, it is difficult at the present day to perceive any other difference between the house and the committee of the whole house than that the speaker presides in the former and a chairman in the latter."

The foregoing remarks with regard to the difference between the procedure of the committee of the whole house of Congress and the House itself is as applicable in principle to other legislative or deliberative bodies. No one would seriously contend that the lower house of Congress was not actually in session when sitting as the committee of the whole house. This, it seems to us, is true of all bodies when transacting business through a committee of the whole. That the committee of the whole city council of Provo City conformed, in a general way at least, to the usual methods pursued by such committees, the record leaves no room for doubt. The city council of Provo City, while sitting as a committee of the whole, still was the city council and conducting public business, which, we think, the public, including the plaintiff, had a legal right to hear. The statute would be robbed of nearly all of its force if it were construed to mean that the sessions of the city council should be open only so long as it transacted its business under the strict rules applicable to legislative bodies, but when it relaxed those rules so as to make debate and discussion freer it could close the doors against the public. To this the contention that no public business may actually be completed and no ordinances adopted or passed in the committee of the whole, and that the yeas and nays must be recorded so that any one may know just how each councilman casts his vote upon any question, is no answer. No one need be present to ascertain the councilmen's vote. These are matters of record, and may be ascertained at any time. This the Legislature knew when it adopted the statute requiring sittings to be open. The purpose was not that the public might know how the vote stood, but the purpose evidently was that the public might know what the councilmen thought about the matters in case they expressed an opinion upon them. Moreover, the public have the right to know just what public business is being considered, and by whom and to what extent it is discussed. These discussions and deliberations could thus all be taken up in committee of the whole, and the public be excluded from the very proceedings which the statute intended should be conducted with open doors.

It is, however, urged that there are certain matters pertaining to the city's business that, in the nature of things, might adversely affect public interests if conducted and discussed openly. This no doubt is true. In this regard, all such matters may be referred to and considered by special committees which may convene at any time and adjourn from time to time to consider and discuss any matter referred to them. To these committee meetings the statute does not apply. It does not follow, as is urged by the defendants, that, since the statute does not apply to these committee meetings, therefore it does not apply to the sessions of the whole body when it calls itself the committee of the whole. If there are matters which require special attention from the whole membership of the council, we know of no law, nor of any rule of procedure, which prohibits the mayor from including all the members in such a special committee which must hear and consider the facts and report its findings thereon to the council the same as any other committee must do. While this would be a committee composed of all the members, it still would not be a committee of the whole, as that term is used in parliamentary law and procedure; nor could such a committee be formed as the committee of the whole is formed, nor could it transact the business in the manner as is done by the committee of the whole. We are of the opinion, therefore, that city councils have not the right to exclude the public, or any individual, from its sessions while sitting as a council under the ordinary rules, nor while sitting as a committee of the whole council. In either form of session public business is being discussed and transacted which the statute contemplates shall be open to the public. In this view the complaint stated a good cause of action.

It also follows from what has been said that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, since the evidence supports the allegations contained in the complaint. From these views it further follows that the other errors assigned need no special consideration. The defendants could not have been prejudiced by the questions put to and the answers elicited from the defendant Henry. If the principle insisted upon by defendants' counsel were as broad as they claim it to be, then there might possibly be error with regard to the questions and answers aforesaid, but it is not so broad, and, as we view it, is not applicable to this case.

The judgment therefore is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

MATNEY v. KING, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. CLERKS OF COURT—OFFICERS OF COURT.

The clerk of the district court is an officer of the court, and, in order to properly perform the duties devolving on him by law, it is the duty of the judge of the court to recognize him as such officer.

2. SAME—RECOGNITION—MANDAMUS.

The office of clerk of the district court, under the law, is to be filled by election, and the respondent had no authority to fill the office by appointment. One of the persons voted for at the election was entitled to be recognized by the respondent as clerk, and that one was the person holding the prima facie title to the office. When the respondent refused to recognize the person holding prima facie title, mandamus was the proper remedy to compel such recognition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Clerks of Courts, §§ 4-7.]

3. SAME—SCOPE OF INQUIRY—QUO WARRANTO—TITLE TO OFFICE.

Quo warranto is the proper method of determining disputed questions of title to public office, yet a mere groundless assumption of an election on the part of a person claiming title to public office, and the apparent exercise of the functions of the office de facto, will not deter the court, as a preliminary question, from examining the uncontroverted facts before it for the purpose of determining who has prima facie title, notwithstanding the person claiming adverse title may not be a party to the proceedings.

4. CLERKS OF COURTS—TITLE TO OFFICE—DETERMINATION BY JUDGE.

Where two persons claiming title to the office of clerk of the district court present their credentials on which they base their claim to the office to the judge of the district court, and each requests the judge to recognize him as such clerk, it is the duty of the judge to examine such credentials for the purpose of determining which one of the claimants holds the prima facie title to the office, and such examination does not constitute passing upon the title to public office.

5. MANDAMUS—RESTORATION TO PUBLIC OFFICE.

Title to public office, based upon mistakes of fact or misconceptions of law, may impart a color of right which will bar the allowance of a mandamus; but palpable disregard of law renders the action whereby an office is seized merely colorable, and in a clear case will be brushed aside as affording no obstruction to the exercise of a plain legal duty.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Toney Matney for writ of mandamus to John H. King, judge of the district court of Muskogee county. Writ granted.

This matter was presented to the court upon the petition of the relator, the response of the respondent, and the agreed statement of facts, signed by counsel for the relator and respondent, respectively, all of which are hereafter set out in full in the above order:

Petition.

"Comes now the plaintiff, Toney Matney, and represents and shows to this court that at the general election held in the state of Oklahoma on the 17th day of September, 1907, he was duly and legally elected to the office of district clerk of the county of Muskogee, state of Oklahoma, having received a majority of the votes of said county cast at said election for said office, and that he has since received his certificate of election from the clerk of said county, and has taken the oath of office and given the bond as required by law; that on the 30th day of October, 1907, in a mandamus proceeding in the United States court for the Western District of the Indian Territory at Muskogee, in which Carl Bucher et al. were plaintiffs and the county commissioners of said county of Muskogee were defendants, which was a proceeding to require said defendants as such commissioners to canvass the vote of said county for all the county offices of said county, said court rendered judgment against said plaintiffs and in favor of said defendants by then and there discharging the rule and dismissing said cause upon said defendants' response in obedience to the terms of the alternate writ of mandamus issued by said court, in which response said defendants stated that they had canvassed the vote of said county; that said commissioners found by canvassing the vote of said county that your petitioner had been duly elected to the office of district clerk of said county, and that the certificate issued by the clerk of said county to your petitioner was in obedience to the canvass of said commissioners; that there has been no appeal taken from the judgment of said court; that said court had jurisdiction to determine the question of the petitioner's right to said office, and that said judgment was in favor of your petitioner; that after having qualified as required by law, and as above stated, to wit, on the 18th day of November, 1907, your petitioner entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office as such district clerk, and has remained in the active discharge of said duties up to this time; that the records belonging to his office as district clerk of said county are in the control and custody of John H. King, judge of the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma, which district is composed of the counties of Muskogee and Wagoner in said state; that on the 21st day of November, 1907, your petitioner presented to the said John H. King, sitting as a court at Muskogee in said county, his petition in writing, stating that he was the duly elected clerk of said court; that he had qualified as such and requested said court to turn over to him as such clerk the records and papers which properly belong to him as clerk of said court. And he further states that said court refused to recognize your petitioner as said clerk, and refused to turn over to him any of the papers or records which belonged to him as clerk of said court; that the said Carl S. Bucher has no legal right to hold said office, and is a usurper. The plaintiff further states that he is remediless in the premises, by or through ordinary process or proceedings at law, and he therefore prays this honorable court to award against the said district court a writ of mandamus, commanding and requiring it to recognize your petitioner as the district clerk of said court and to vacate all orders heretofore made inconsistent therewith, and to turn over to your petitioner all papers and records which legally belong to him, and for such other process and orders and remedies as may to the court seem meet.

Response of Defendant to Plaintiff's Petition.

"Comes now the respondent, John H. King, judge of the Third judicial district for the state of Oklahoma, composed of the counties of Muskogee and Wagoner, by and through his counsel George S. Ramsey, and for answer to the plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandamus in this case says that he neither denies nor admits that the petitioner, Toney Matney, was duly and legally elected to the office of district clerk of the county of Muskogee, state of Oklahoma, on the 17th day of September, 1907, but he states in response to this allegation by the petitioner that said Toney Matney was a candidate before the people at said election for the office of clerk of the district court of said county of Muskogee on the Democratic ticket, and that Carrol S. Bucher was a candidate for the office of district clerk in and for the said county of Muskogee at said election held on September 17, 1907; and this respondent further states in this connection that both said Toney Matney, the petitioner, and said Carrol S. Bucher, claim to be clerk of the district court in and for Muskogee county by the result of the said election held on September 17, 1907. In so far as this respondent is concerned it is of no importance to respondent as to which of said candidates, that is, Toney Matney or Carrol S. Bucher, was elected to the office of district clerk at said election; but this respondent here states that he has a well-founded opinion as to which of the two said candidates was elected to said office, and that this opinion disqualifies him from hearing and adjudicating any contest by either of said applicants in a suit to try the title to said office.

"Respondent states that on November 21, 1907, under the order of this court he convened the district court at Muskogee in and for Muskogee county, as judge of the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma, and was confronted by contending candidates for each county office in the county of Muskogee. Respondent states that it seems to be the impression of all the candidates and claimants for county offices in the county of Muskogee that he possessed, as judge of said judicial district, authority to determine, upon convening his court, who were entitled to each county office in Muskogee county, and that each claimant for county office in Muskogee county presented to him, upon the opening of his court, certificates of election, and asked that he recognize them as county officials. Respondent states that upon said date, that is, November 21, 1907, Carrol S. Bucher presented to him a certificate of election, dated November 8, 1907, and signed by Frank R. Applegate as county clerk of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, a copy of which certificate of election is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit No. 1' to this response, and made a part hereof. Respondent also states that the petitioner, Toney Matney presented to him upon said November 21st a certificate of election, dated October 30, 1907, and signed by Porter Spaulding as county clerk, Muskogee county, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, a copy of which certificate your respondent cannot furnish.

"Your respondent also states in this connection that Fred Cook presented on that occasion a certificate of election, dated November 8, 1907, and signed by Frank R. Applegate as county clerk of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that said Fred Cook had been elected to the office of sheriff in and for Muskogee county at the election held on September 17, 1907, said certificate being filed herewith as Exhibit No. 2. Respondent also states in this connection that Remus B. Ramsey presented on that date a certificate of election, dated October 30, 1907, and signed by Porter Spaulding as county clerk of Muskogee county, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that said Remus B. Ramsey had been elected sheriff in and for Muskogee county at said election. Respondent also states that Alexander Richmond on said date presented to him a certificate of election, dated November 8, 1907, and signed by Frank R. Applegate, county clerk of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that Alexander Richmond was elected county judge in and for the said county of Muskogee at the election held on November 17, 1907. Respondent also states that on the same date W. C. Jackson presented a certificate of election, dated October 30, 1907, and signed by Porter

Spaulding as county clerk of Muskogee county, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that said W. C. Jackson was elected county judge in and for Muskogee county at said election, a copy of which certificate is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit No. 3,' and made a part of this response. Respondent also states that on said date, November 21, 1907, W. F. Rampendahl presented to him a certificate of election, dated November 8, 1907, and signed by Frank R. Applegate as county clerk of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that said W. F. Rampendahl had been elected county attorney in and for said county of Muskogee at the said election held September 17, 1907. Respondent also states that on said date, November 21st, W. J. Crump presented a certificate of election, dated October 30, 1907, signed by Porter Spaulding as county clerk, Muskogee county, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, certifying that said W. J. Crump was elected county attorney in and for said county of Muskogee at said election on the 17th of September, 1907, a copy of which certificate of election is hereto filed as Exhibit No. 4 to this response, and made a part hereof.

"Your respondent further states that there was upon that occasion presented to him certificates of election by adverse claimants for each county office in the county of Muskogee, none of which he received and acted upon, except for district clerk, sheriff, county judge, and county attorney. Your respondent states that it was necessary for him to convene the district court in Muskogee county; that the public welfare required the organization of his court; that in order to organize his court it was necessary for him to have a clerk, for him to recognize some one as sheriff, some one as county attorney, and some one as county judge, each of these offices, as above shown, were claimed by two parties under certificates of election in due form. Your respondent states that he was then of the opinion and is now of the opinion that he had no power to judicially determine who the rightful claimants to any of the said county offices were and are, but that from necessity it was required of him that he recognize some one as such official in each case, that is, for district clerk, for sheriff, for county attorney, and for county judge. Your respondent then made and filed an order recognizing as district clerk Carrol S. Bucher, as sheriff Fred Cook, as county attorney W. J. Crump, and as county judge W. C. Jackson.

"Your respondent states that the Republican candidates for county offices had each a certificate of election, and the Democratic candidates for county offices had each a certificate of election, and not desiring to appear partisan in his action this respondent made an order recognizing two Republican claimants and two Democratic claimants. A copy of said order of the court, signed and entered, is herewith filed as Exhibit No. 4 to this response, and made a part hereof. Your respondent at the time he organized his court did not have in his possession any of the records of the United States Court for the Western District of the Indian Territory at Muskogee, and could not, and did not, take judicial notice of any proceedings had in said United States court at its October term, 1907, in regard to the mandamus proceedings alleged in the plaintiff's petition filed in this case. Your respondent admits that a mandamus proceeding was had in the United States Court for the Western District of the Indian Territory, in which Carrol S. Bucher was plaintiff and the county commissioners of the county of Muskogee were defendants; said proceedings being instituted for the purpose of compelling said county commissioners to canvass the vote of said county for county officers. Your respondent states that upon an examination of the record in that proceeding he finds it difficult to tell what was done or what was accomplished, but he admits that J. E. Wyand and William Noel filed on October 30, 1907, a response, being one among many responses, wherein they stated that they had canvassed the votes and determined the persons who had received the greatest number of votes in Muskogee county for the several county and township offices, and that such findings were reduced to writing, signed by the commissioners, and the work of said commissioners entirely completed, and the board adjourned on October 29, 1907, sine die. Said J. E. Wyand and William Noel in this report stated that they had not delivered to the several candidates who received the greater number of votes for the county and township offices any certificates of election, because they were not authorized by law to do so, such power being lodged exclusively in the county clerk. A copy of said response is herewith filed as Exhibit No. 5 to this response, and made a part thereof. On October 31, 1907, the records of the United States Court for the Western District of Indian Territory, at Muskogee, show in that case that upon the response signed by J. E. Wyand and William Noel, as shown by Exhibit No. 5 to this response, the rule was discharged by the court and the proceedings dismissed.

"Respondent states further that during the mandamus proceedings had in the United States court heretofore referred to it was judicially determined by decree of the court, made on October 16, 1907, and accordingly entered, that on the 25th day of September, 1907, J. E. Wyand, J. W. Brady, and William Noel were the legal county commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee, a copy of which judgment as entered is herewith filed as Exhibit No. 6, and made a part of this response. Your respondent further states that Carrol S. Bucher, claimant to office of district clerk, and Fred Cook, as claimant to office of sheriff, contend and allege that on October 9, 1907, J. W. Brady and William Noel, under the provisions of section 16 of the election ordinance made by the constitutional convention, removed Porter Spaulding as county clerk for having failed and refused to do his duty under said election ordinance, and appointed Frank R. Applegate to the position of county clerk. A copy of said records of the county commissioners removing said Porter Spaulding is herewith filed as Exhibit No. 7, and made a part of this response. Respondent states that it is claimed that Frank R. Applegate was the legal county clerk in and for Muskogee county from October 9, 1907, up to the date of the statehood proclamation. Your respondent avers and pleads that said Frank R. Applegate acted as such county clerk and signed the commissions or certificates of election held by said Carrol S. Bucher and Fred Cook, as heretofore set out. Your respondent, therefore, denies that petitioner, Toney Matney, has received his certificate of election from the clerk of said county of Muskogee. Your respondent further states that both the plaintiff, Toney Matney, and Carrol S. Bucher, have claimed to be the district clerk for Muskogee county ever since statehood went into effect on November 16, 1907. Your respondent also states that both the plaintiff, Toney Matney, and the said Carrol S. Bucher, have not only each claimed to be district clerk, but have each undertaken to maintain offices as such district clerk, and each had held himself out to the world and to the public as such district clerk since statehood became effective.

"Your respondent avers and pleads that this is a proceeding to try the title to office, which cannot be tried by a mandamus proceeding. Your respondent states that since November 21, 1907, Carrol S. Bucher has been recognized by him as the district clerk, and has been discharging all the duties of such office, and is in possession and has custody of the records of the district court in and for Muskogee county. Your respondent avers and pleads that the plaintiff, Toney Matney, has a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law by a proceeding to try title to the office in the nature of a quo warranto proceeding. Respondent denies that the plaintiff is remediless in the premises by or through ordinary process or proceedings at law. Respondent, therefore, asks that the complaint be dismissed and the rule discharged.

Mandamus.

"And now on this 16th day of October, A. D. 1907, the same being one of the judicial days of the October term of this court, the above-styled cause came on for hearing. The relator appears by G. W. Wheatley, Esq., Waldron & Cramer, and Deroos Bailey, Esq., his attorneys. The respondents J. W. Brady and William Noel appear by William F. Shuermeyer, Esq., their attorney; and, this cause having been heretofore heard upon the amended petition and responses thereunto hereinbefore filed together with the agreed statements of fact, the court had the matter under advisement, and finds as follows, viz.:

That on the 25th day of September, A. D. 1907, the said respondents J. E. Wyand and J. W. Brady and William Noel were the legal county commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, and authorized to canvass the votes cast in the said county of Muskogee, in the said state of Oklahoma, at the election held on the 17th day of September, A. D. 1907; that no legal canvass thereof had been had; and that it is the duty of the said J. W. Wyand, J. W. Brady, and William Noel, or their lawful successors in office, to at once proceed with the canvass of the returns of the said election in the said county, and cause to be prepared and forwarded the proper abstracts and certificates of election to the persons found to be elected. Therefore it is ordered by the court that you, J. E. Wyand, and you, J. W. Brady and William Noel, or the duly commissioned and legally qualified successors of either of you, do forthwith proceed to canvass the returns of the votes cast at the election held in the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, on the 17th day of September, A. D. 1907, and do promptly certify the result of said canvass, as required by law, by causing to be forwarded to Charles H. Filson, secretary of the territory of Oklahoma, an abstract showing the total number of votes cast at said election, and abstract showing the total number of votes cast in the said county for each of the candidates for the various state offices, for congressman of the Third and Fourth congressional district, for judge of the Third judicial district, and for members of the Legislature of the proposed state of Oklahoma; also that you canvass the returns of votes cast for candidates for the various county and township offices, and cause to be prepared and delivered to each candidate found to have the highest number of votes a proper certificate of his office, and that you thereafter make due and proper return of your compliance with this order. Also it is further ordered that the county clerk of the said county of Muskogee, of the proposed state of Oklahoma, do expose the returns of said election unto the said county commissioners for canvass. To all of which the respondent, J. E. Wyand, excepted, and his exception is noted.

And it appearing from the statement of Charles McLees, deputy United States marshal, who had the "Carrol S. Bucher, Relator, v. J. E. Wyand et al., County Commissioners et al., Defendants. No. 7,909.

"Come now J. E. Wyand and William Noel, and for their answer to the notice served on them on the evening of the 29th of October, 1907, alleging that the board of county commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee had unlawfully failed and refused to canvass the election returns from precinct No. 2 of township No. 1, polling place Yahola, and from precinct No. 1 of township No. 5, polling place Fort Gibson, and requiring said board to canvass said returns from said precincts, and enumerate the same along with the other election returns of said county, and enter same along with the other election returns of said county, and enter the result thereof, and cause the proper abstract to be forwarded of the vote on representatives, and cause to be delivered unto the several candidates who received the highest votes for county and township offices the proper certificates thereof, or to show cause why the same has not been done, respectfully respond that the board of county commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee had, prior to the service of said notice, canvassed the returns of the two precincts mentioned therein along with all other returns placed in their hands, and had determined the persons who had received the greatest number of votes in the county of Muskogee for the several county and township offices, and that such findings were reduced to writing, signed by the commissioners, and the work of said commissioners, under the law, was entirely completed, and said board of commissioners had adjourned, and did on the 29th day of October, 1907, adjourn sine die. Further responding, they say that they have not delivered to the several candidates who received the greatest number of votes for the county and township offices any certificates, because they are not authorized by law so to do, such power being lodged exclusively in the county clerk.

Agreed Statement of Facts.

"It is agreed by J. E. Wyand, counsel for plaintiff, and George S. Ramsey, counsel for defendant, that this case may be heard and determined by the court upon the plaintiff's petition and defendant's response as the only pleading in the cause, the response being treated as a return to an alternative writ of mandamus. It is also agreed that respondent's answer be taken as true on the statements and allegations of fact set up therein, and it is agreed that the exhibits attached to the answer are true and correct copies of the actual records they purport to be copies of. It is also agreed that the following is a correct copy of an order signed by J. E. Wyand and William Noel as county commissioners on October 30, 1907, and before their sine die adjournment, addressed to Porter Spaulding, which is in words and figures as follows:

"We, the undersigned commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, recognize Porter Spaulding as the county clerk of the said proposed county of the proposed state of Oklahoma, and hereby authorize him to issue certificates of election to the candidates receiving the highest number of votes, as found by the canvass made by us and completed on the 29th day of October, 1907, under the order of the judge of the United States Court of the Western District of the Indian Territory. And we further instruct him to deliver to all said candidates certificates of election, as provided by law, the votes to be determined by abstract made by us from said canvass.

"Given under our hands and seal this 30th day of October, 1907.

"[Signed] J. E. Wyand. [Seal.]
"Wm. Noel."

"It is agreed that after October 30th, and while the returns were still in the possession and custody of R. P. Harrison, clerk of the United States Court for the Western District at Muskogee, Indian Territory, the following order was made and signed by the court, to wit:

"It is hereby ordered that the clerk of this court do turn over to the county clerk of the provisional county commissioners of the proposed county of Muskogee, in the proposed state of Oklahoma, or Morgan Garaway, his deputy, the election returns of said county of the election held therein on the 17th day of September, A. D. 1907, now in his custody, for the purpose of the canvass thereof, taking his special receipt therefor.

"Given this the 15th day of November, A. D. 1907, at Muskogee, Indian Territory.

"[Signed] William R. Lawrence,
"Judge of Said Court."

"The said Harrison, as said clerk, turned the returns over to Morgan Garaway, acting deputy clerk for Frank R. Applegate, on November 5, 1907, and thereupon another canvass of the returns was made by Irvin Blanchard, one of the county commissioners, and by — Russell, holding appointment as county commissioners, to fill an alleged vacancy, created by the alleged nonresidence of Wm. Noel. It is agreed that the Republican candidates, Carroll S. Bucher, Fred Cook, and others, claim and counted that Noel was not legally a commissioner at the time the canvass was made, under which Porter Spaulding was ordered by the commissioners above set forth to issue certificates as shown by order heretofore set out. It is also agreed that on the application of L. E. Smith, Republican candidate for register of deeds, the United States court did, on October 29, 1907, make the following order, to wit:

"In the United States Court for the Western District of the Indian Territory,

Defendants. No. 7,909. Notice.

relator showing that the board of county commissioners have unlawfully failed and refused to canvass the election returns from precinct No. two (2) of the township No. one (1), polling place Yahola, in the proposed county of Muskogee, of the proposed state of Oklahoma; also from precinct No. one (1) of township No. five (5), polling place at Fort Gibson, in said county:

"Now, therefore, you, the said J. E. Wyand, William Noel, and Irvin Blanchard, county commissioners as aforesaid, are hereby required to forthwith canvass the returns from the said precincts and enumerate the same along with the other election returns of said county and enter the result thereof, and cause the proper abstract to be forwarded of the vote on representatives, and cause to be delivered unto the several candidates who received the highest votes for county and township offices the proper certificates thereof, or that you show cause why you have not done so to the court sitting in Muskogee on the 30th day of October, A. "It is agreed that Frank R. Applegate, as alleged county clerk under the appointment alleged to be made by Noel and Brady on October 9, 1907, never had possession of the election returns until November 5, 1907. It is also agreed that on November 5, 1907, Carol S. Bucher filed motion in the United States court at Muskogee to vacate order of dismissal entered October 31, 1907; that affidavits were filed, motion heard, and denied by the court. We agree that this cause may be heard and determined on this statement of facts, plaintiff's petition, and respondent's answer as a return, this November 29, 1907.

"It is agreed that the result of this case shall control and be judgment of this court in cases of Remus B. Ramsey v. John H. King, 93 Pac. 754, and that this statement of facts be considered in the Ramsey Case. It is also agreed that the response of John H. King in case of Charles H. Eberle, 93 Pac. 748, be and the same is admitted to be true in fact, that is, facts alleged in that answer are true, and that said case of Charles H. Eberle be submitted on this statement of facts, complaint, and answer as whole accord, the answer to be treated as a return to an alternative writ.

In addition to the pleadings and agreed statement of facts the court takes notice that by the election ordinance providing for the election of state, district, county, and township officers Porter Spaulding was appointed county clerk for the county of Muskogee.

J. E. Wyand, Thomas H. Owen, and Baker & Purcell, for relator. George S. Ramsey, for respondent.

KANE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Section 2, art. 7, of the Constitution, provides that: "The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to a general superintending control over all inferior courts, and all commissions and boards created by law. The Supreme Court shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, prohibition and such other remedial writs as may be provided by law, and to hear and determine the same." This provision practically places the Supreme Court in the same relation to the inferior courts of the state as the court of King's Bench bore to the inferior courts of England, under the common law. Chief Justice Marshall in an early case (Ex parte Crane et al., 5 Pet. [U. S.] 190, 8 L. Ed. 92), discussing the supervisory powers of the Supreme Court of the United States over the proceedings of the inferior courts by the writ of mandamus according to the principles of the common law, said: "In England the writ of mandamus is defined to be a command issued in the King's name from the court of King's Bench and directed to any person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature within the King's dominions, requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified which appertains to their office or duty, and which the court of King's Bench has previously determined, or at least supposes, to be consonant of the right and justice. Blackstone adds that: 'It issues to the judges of any inferior courts, commanding them to do justice according to the powers of their office whenever the same is delayed. For it is the peculiar business of the court of King's Bench to superintend all other inferior tribunals, and therein to enforce the due exercise of those judicial or ministerial powers with which the Crown or Legislature have invested them, and this, not only by restraining their excesses, but also by quickening their negligence and obviating their denial of justice.'" The Supreme Court of New York, in Sikes v. Ransom, 6 Johns. 279, discussing the power of the Supreme Court of that state to compel judges of the court of Common Pleas to amend a bill of exceptions according to the truth of the case, uses the following language: "Why cannot the writ of mandamus issue from this court? We have the general superintendence of all inferior courts, and are bound to enforce obedience to the statutes, and to oblige subordinate courts and magistrates to do those legal acts which it is their duty to do." At common law the writ of mandamus is a writ of right every day made use of to oblige inferior courts to do justice, but it will not be made use of to control the exercise of discretion. In general, it lies where one has refused to be admitted or turned out wrongfully from any office or franchise. People v. Superior Court, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 126; Commercial Bank v. Canal Commissioners of New York, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 29, 3 Burr. 1266. The clerk of the district court is an officer of the court, and in order to properly perform the duties devolving on him by law it is the duty of the judge of the court to recognize him as such officer.

In the case at bar the respondent states in his return that he did not pass judicially upon the certificates of election presented to him by the relator, or Carroll S. Bucher, giving as his excuse therefor that by reason of the claim of Carroll S. Bucher to the same office, the respondent could not pass upon the claim of either party without passing upon the title to the office. So the question of interference with judicial discretion is not in this case, as I view it. This case is quite distinguishable from In re Parsons et al., 150 U. S. 150, 14 Sup. Ct. 50, 37 L. Ed. 1034. It will be seen by the statement of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in the Parsons Case that the court below "considered, in connection with the evidence introduced by the respondent, the commission of O'Neal under which he had duly qualified, which was exhibited to the court on the 19th of June, 1893, when he was recognized as United States Attorney. This commission bore date May 26, 1893, and appointed O'Neal the attorney for the United States for the Northern District of Alabama, in due form." After hearing all the evidence offered by the parties the court entered its judgment in due form. In the case at bar the respondent states in his return that he did not take into consideration any of the evidence or certificates offered by the various claimants, and did not pass judicially on the claim of the relator, or Carroll S. Bucher. The following is taken from the response of the respondent: "Your respondent states that he was then of the opinion and is now of the opinion that he had no power to judicially determine who the rightful claimants to any of the said county offices were and are. Your respondent states that the Republican candidates for county offices had each a certificate of election, and the Democratic candidates for county offices had each a certificate of election, and, not desiring to appear partisan in his action, this respondent made an order recognizing two Republican claimants and two Democratic claimants." The respondent was in error in refusing to consider the evidence offered by the relator to support his claim. The office of clerk of the district court, under the law, is to be filled by election, and the respondent had no authority to fill the office by appointment. One of the persons voted for at the election was entitled to the office, and that one was the person holding the prima facie title to the office. When the respondent refused to recognize the person holding prima facie title, mandamus was the proper remedy to compel such recognition.

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in Cameron v. Parker, 2 Okl. 277, 38 Pac. 14, laid down this rule: "In an elective office the law requires that the credentials of the persons declared duly elected shall be a certificate of election, or, in an appointive one, as in the case at bar, a commission from the Governor. This is the highest evidence of title the law requires, and it is not for an individual to assert the invalidity of the law authorizing it, the want of authority for its issuance, or the legal exercise of the power conferring it. These are questions for the courts to determine. But in the meantime the person holding the commission or certificate of election, legal upon its face, evidencing the absolute prima facie title to the office, is entitled to the possession of the books, records, and official belongings thereto, notwithstanding the actual title may be in controversy at the time, and in the same or another tribunal." This case has a good many of the features of the case at bar. It is true that in the Cameron Case the writ ran against Parker, the adverse claimant to the office, but in the case at bar the respondent makes the certificate of Carroll S. Bucher part of his response. So both certificates, and all the facts on which respondent bases his refusal to act, are before the court, as were the certificates and facts upon which the parties based their respective titles in the Cameron Case. In that case the court went far enough into the claim of each of the parties to determine which held the prima facie title to the office, not for the purpose of trying the title to the office, for this it is well settled may not be done in a mandamus proceeding. Quo warranto is the proper method of determining disputed questions of title to public office, yet a mere groundless assumption of an election on the part of a person claiming title to public office, and the apparent exercise of the functions of the office de facto, will not deter the court, as a preliminary question, from examining the uncontroverted facts before it for the purpose of determining who has prima facie title, notwithstanding the person claiming adverse title may not be a party to the proceeding.

On this point the case of Delgado v. Chavez, 140 U. S. 586, 11 Sup. Ct. 874, 35 L. Ed. 578, is strongly in point. The facts in the Delgado Case, as stated by Justice Brewer, are as follows: "On the 13th of January, 1891, Abraham Staab, William Nesbitt, and Juan Garcia filed in the district court of the First judicial district of the territory of New Mexico, and presented to the judge thereof, their petition showing, as they claimed, that they had been elected at the general election in November preceding members of the board of county commissioners of Santa Fé county, in the territory of New Mexico; and further alleged that on the 2d day of January, 1891, they had duly qualified as such commissioners; that at the same election Pedro Delgado had been duly elected probate clerk of said county, and had qualified as such officer; that by virtue thereof he became and was the acting clerk of the board of county commissioners, and had possession of the records, books, files, and papers of that office; that after their qualifications as such board they demanded of him to produce the books, and to record their proceedings as such board; and that he refused so to do, or to in any manner recognize them as the board of county commissioners. They prayed that a writ of mandamus might issue commanding him to recognize them as the board of county commissioners, that he act with them as such board, and that he enter of record their proceedings as a board. Upon this petition an alternative writ was issued; and on the 15th day of January, in obedience to such writ, appellant appeared and filed his answer, alleging facts, which, as he claimed, showed that three other persons were at the November election elected county commissioners, and that the petitioners were not, and further averring that two of those other persons on the 1st of January, 1891, duly qualified as members of the board of county commissioners, entered into possession and assumed the duties of such office, met on that day in the courthouse of the county as the board of county commissioners, and proceeded to transact the business of the county, and that they were still in possession of their offices of county commissioners. He admitted that he refused to recognize the petitioners as a board of county commissioners, and alleged as his reason therefor that they were not the legally elected commissioners, and had never been in possession of such offices. On the same day, January 15th, the matter came on to be heard on these pleadings, and a peremptory mandamus was ordered commanding the appellant that he record on the records of the county the proceedings of the petitioners as the board of county commissioners of the county, and that in all things he recognize them as the only lawful county commissioners of the county." After noticing other questions involved in the case, Justice Brewer continues: "This brings us to the principal question in the case; and that is, the real import of the proceedings was to try the title to office, that quo warranto is a plain, speedy, and adequate, as well as the recognized, remedy for trying the title to office, and that the familiar law in respect to mandamus, reinforced by statutory provisions in New Mexico, is that mandamus shall not issue in any case where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. On this the invalidity of the proceedings is asserted. But the obvious reply is that this was not a proceeding to try the title to office. The direct purpose and object was to compel the defendant to discharge his duties as clerk, and to forbid him to assume to determine any contest between rival commissioners. It was enough in this case for the court to determine, and it must be assumed, that the evidence placed before it was sufficient to authorize an adjudication that these petitioners were commissioners de facto. As such, the clerk is bound to obey their commands and record their proceedings. It is true the pleadings disclose the existence of a contest between these petitioners and other parties, and it is true that the answer would tend to show that the others were the commissioners de facto; but that was a question of fact to be determined by the court hearing this application, and it, as must be assumed from the decision, found that these petitioners, rather than their contestants, were the commissioners de facto. It was proper for it, then, to issue a mandamus to compel the defendant to recognize them as the commissioners of the county, and this irrespective of the question whether or not the petitioners were commissioners de jure. No one would for a moment contend that this adjudication could be pleaded as an estoppel in quo warranto proceedings between the several contestants. If that has not already been determined in a suit to which all the contestants are parties, it is still a matter open for judicial inquiry and determination." The foregoing case undoubtedly sustains the doctrine that, where two persons claiming title to the office of clerk of the district court present their credentials on which they base their claim to the office to the judge of the district court, and each requests the judge to recognize him as such clerk, it is the duty of the judge to examine such credentials for the purpose of determining which one of the claimants holds the prima facie title to the office, and such examination does not constitute passing upon the title to the public office.

Having reached the conclusion that the court has the power to examine all the facts presented by the parties for the purpose of determining which of the claimants has prima facie title to the office, we will briefly set out the claim of each as gleaned from the response and agreed statement of facts: The relator has a certificate signed by Porter Spaulding, who was appointed county clerk by the election ordinance passed by the constitutional convention. This certificate was based on a canvass of the vote cast, made by J. E. Wyand, J. W. Brady, and William Noel, who, all parties seem to concede, were the legal county commissioners of Muskogee county; and the canvass was made in pursuance to a writ of mandamus issued out of the United States Court of the Western Judicial District of the Indian Territory, at Muskogee. It also appears, by the pleadings and agreed statement of facts, that after the canvass was made as above stated, to wit, on the 30th day of October, 1907, J. E. Wyand and William Noel, two of the county commissioners, entered an order recognizing Porter Spaulding as county clerk, and specifically ordering him as county clerk to issue certificates of election to the candidates receiving the highest number of votes. After this, on the same day, to wit, the 30th day of October, 1907, this board of county commissioners adjourned sine die. Carroll S. Bucher, according to the response and agreed statement of facts, holds a certificate of election signed by Frank R. Applegate, who claims to have been appointed by J. W. Brady and William Noel, two of the members of the board of county commissioners, after they had, as they stated, removed Porter Spaulding from office, for the reason that Spaulding refused to turn over to them or expose the returns for canvass. These commissioners claim to derive their power to remove Mr. Spaulding and appoint Mr. Applegate from section 16 of the election ordinance, which reads as follows: "In the event any county clerk shall fail or refuse to perform or discharge any of the duties aforesaid, or be disqualified, the county commissioners shall appoint some one to act as county clerk in the performance of such duties." The election certificate issued by Mr. Applegate is based upon a canvass "made by Irvin Blanchard, one of the county commissioners, and by ——— Russell, holding appointment as county commissioner to fill an alleged vacancy, created by the alleged nonresidence of William Noel." This canvass seems to have been made on the 5th day of November, 1907.

The only irregularity apparent in the certificate of the relator is that it was signed by Mr. Spaulding after his alleged removal by the two commissioners above named. I am of the opinion that section 16 of the election ordinance does not give the county commissioners power summarily to remove the county clerk for the reasons stated; but, as disclosed by the response and agreed statement of facts, as the same board of county commissioners, after the order of removal was made and after the vote was canvassed, recognized Mr. Spaulding as county clerk, and specifically authorized and directed him to issue the certificates of election, and under this authorization and direction he did issue them, I do not deem it necessary to enter into a lengthy discussion of the powers of the commissioners to remove the county clerk. It is enough to say that, in my opinion, under the circumstances of this case, Mr. Spaulding, as county clerk, had authority to issue the certificate of election to the relator in this case, and its possession by the relator is prima facie evidence of his title to the office.

A careful scrutiny of the response and the agreed statement of facts fails to show the authority under which the alleged commissioners, who made the canvass on which Mr. Bucher's certificate of election was presumably based, acted when they made their recount of the vote. It was not only judicially determined that the board that made the canvass on which the relator's certificate of election was based was the legally constituted board of county commissioners, but all the parties recognized them as such. There cannot be two legally constituted boards at the same time, each authorized to canvass the returns and order certificates of election issued. From the response and statement of facts there can be but one conclusion drawn on this point, and that is that the board that canvassed the returns on which the relator's certificate of election is based was the legally constituted board. But, admitting that the board that canvassed the vote upon which Mr. Bucher's certificate of election was based was the legally constituted board, still there appears to be no reason why there should be a recanvass of the vote. The old board made their canvass in pursuance to a writ of mandamus directing them to do so. Unless the facts disclose circumstances justifying another canvass, and in this case they do not, the canvass so made would be illegal and void.

From the facts before the court it must be found that the relator has a prima facie title to the office; that the certificate of election of Carroll S. Bucher is palpably without legal warrant, and absolutely void. "Title to public office, based upon mistakes of fact or misconceptions of law, may impart a color or right which will bar the allowance of a mandamus; but palpable disregard of law renders the action whereby an office is seized merely colorable, and in a clear case will be brushed aside as affording no obstruction to the exercise of a plain legal duty." State of New Jersey v. Mayor, 52 N. J. Law, 332, 19 Atl. 780, 8 L. R. A. 697. This is also a rule at common law. Thus in Rex v. Bankes, 3 Burr. 1452, Lord Mansfield proposed, upon the argument, that affidavits be laid before him that he might determine whether it was a doubtful election and fit to be tried upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, or whether it was merely colorable, and clearly void; saying that in the former case the court might not grant a mandamus, while in the latter case they ought. This case falling fully within the rule sanctioned by the common law, and well supported by decisions of courts of last resort, both state and federal, and this court having all the facts before it, should render effective relief. This proceeding does not in any way affect the title to the office; but the person having prima facie title to it is entitled to recognition as clerk of the district court by the respondent as judge of the court until his title is upset by a proper proceeding.

The relator is entitled to a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the respondent, as judge of the district court of Muskogee county, to recognize the relator as clerk of the district court of Muskogee county and to permit said relator to record such proceedings of said court as it is the duty of the clerk to record, and to do and perform such other services as are required by law of the clerk of the district court and to turn over to the relator such books, records, papers, files, seals, and other property belonging to said office as may be in his possession. It is so ordered. All of the Justices concur.

EBERLE v. KING, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 10, 1908.)

1. MANDAMUS—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—SPECIFIC DUTY.

To entitle relator to a peremptory writ of mandamus, he must show that the act, to compel the performance of which the writ is invoked, is one which the law specially enjoins on respondent as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 39.]

2. SAME—TITLE TO AND POSSESSION OF OFFICE.

Mandamus will not lie at the instance of relator holding prima facie title to the office of register of deeds to compel the judge of the district court to enter an order recognizing him as such.

3. STATES—NEW STATES—ADMISSION OF TERRITORY—RECORDS.

Prior to the admission of this state into the Union the records of the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court in the Indian Territory, as ex officio recorder, at Muskogee, were the property of the United States. As such, it required the concurrent action of both the federal and state governments to pass them under the jurisdiction of the latter when organized. Irrespective of the intent of the enabling act, or the act of Congress amendatory thereto, approved March 4, 1907, Act March 1, 1907, c. 2285, 34 Stat. 1026, was sufficient on the part of the federal government, and article 4, § 1274, Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. Okl. 1903, extended and put in force throughout the state, eo instante, on the admission of the state into the Union, together with sections 8 and 9 of the schedule of the Constitution, were sufficient concurrent action on the part of the state government to pass said records under its jurisdiction when organized, and vest their legal custody and right of possession in relator as register of deeds, upon relator qualifying and giving bond as required by law.

4. SAME.

For the reason just stated, respondent could not, by receiving unauthorized possession of said records from the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States Court in the Indian Territory as ex officio recorder, after the state was admitted into the Union and consequent abolition of that court, and when said office of clerk or deputy clerk as ex officio recorder had become functus officio, thereby pass said records under his jurisdiction as judge of the district court and, hence the custody and control over said records, alleged and admitted to be exercised by respondent, was such as was done in his individual capacity and not in his official capacity as a court.

5. MANDAMUS—INDIVIDUAL DUTIES—RECORDS OF OFFICE.

Mandamus will not lie at the instance of relator holding prima facie title to the office of register of deeds, and who has qualified and given bond as such, as required by law, to compel the judge of the district court to turn over to him the books, papers, and records belonging to the office of register of deeds, the unauthorized custody of which respondent holds, not as a court, but as an individual, and refuses to surrender on demand.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 275.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Original application for mandamus by Charles H. Eberle against John H. King, judge of the district court, to compel him to recognize relator as register of deeds and to deliver to him the records of that office. Application denied.

In the case of Toney Matney v. John H. King, Judge, etc., recently decided by this court, it was, by counsel on both sides, "agreed that the response of John H. King in case of Charles H. Eberle be, and the same is admitted to be, true in fact; that the facts alleged in that answer are true; and that the case of Charles H. Eberle be submitted on this state of facts—complaint and answer as whole record—the answer to be treated as return to alternative writ." The petition for the writ in this case is by relator, "Charles H. Eberle, and represents and shows to this court that at the general election held in the state of Oklahoma on the 17th day of September, 1907, he was duly elected to the office of register of deeds of the county of Muskogee, state of Oklahoma, having received a majority of the votes of said county cast at said election for said office, and that he has since received his certificate of election from the clerk of said county and has taken the oath of office and given the bond as required by law; * * * that after having qualified as required by law, as above stated, to wit, on the 18th day of November, 1907, your petitioner entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office as such register of deeds, and has remained in the active discharge of the duties of said office up to this time; that the records belonging to his office as register of deeds of said county are in the control and custody of John H. King, judge of the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma, which district is composed of the counties of Muskogee and Wagoner in said state; that on the 21st day of November, 1907, your petitioner presented to the said John H. King, sitting as a court at Muskogee in said county, his petition in writing stating that he was duly elected register of deeds of said county; that he had qualified as such, and requested said court to turn over to him, as such register of deeds, the records and papers which properly belong to him as register of deeds of said county; and further states that said court refused to recognize your petitioner as said register of deeds, and refused to turn over to him any of the papers or records which belong to him as such register of deeds of said county; * * * that he is remediless in the premises, by or through ordinary process or proceedings at law, and he therefore prays this honorable court to award against the said district court a writ of mandamus commanding and requiring it to recognize your petitioner as register of deeds of said county, and to vacate all orders heretofore made inconsistent therewith, and turn over to your petitioner all papers and records which legally belong to him," etc. In his answer "the respondent, John H. King, judge of the district court for the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma, * * * says: That he neither admits nor denies that the plaintiff, Charles H. Eberle, was duly and legally elected to the office of register of deeds of Muskogee county, in the state of Oklahoma, at the election held in the state of Oklahoma and in the county of Muskogee on September 17, 1907; but respondent states that L. E. Smith, not a party to this proceeding, does deny the election of Charles H. Eberle, and claims with equal earnestness that he (L. E. Smith) was duly and legally elected register of deeds in and for Muskogee county at said election held on September 17, 1907; * * * that Charles H. Eberle was the Democratic candidate at said election for the office of register of deeds of Muskogee county, and that L. E. Smith was the Republican candidate for register of deeds at said election for Muskogee county, and that each claims to have received the larger number of votes, and each claims to hold title to said office by a certificate of election, signed by the county clerk in and for Muskogee county; * * * that he has taken no action in regard to said register of deeds in and for Muskogee county, and has recognized neither L. E. Smith nor plaintiff, Charles H. Eberle, as register of deeds; * * * that the facts set up in his answer to the petition filed by Toney Matney against him in this court are equally applicable to this case; * * * that both these matters grew out of the same election, and same court proceedings, and he now asks that this cause be consolidated and heard with the case of Tony Matney against himself (93 Pac. 737), in so far as his response in that case is applicable in this case; * * * that he has no records in his possession which the plaintiff is entitled to possession of, whether he be the legally elected register of deeds or not; * * * that there is no law in the state of Oklahoma, either in the enabling act or in the Constitution, requiring the district court, as successor of the United States Court in the Indian Territory, to turn over to the register of deeds for any county the books, papers, and records received by the court from the clerk of the United States court, or deputy clerk of the United States court, as ex officio recorder, for the respective district of the Indian Territory."

J. E. Wyand, Thomas H. Owen, and Baker & Purcell, for relator. George S. Ramsay, for respondent.

TURNER, J. (after stating the facts as above). By this it will be seen that the same statement of facts in the case of Matney v. King, 93 Pac. 737, so far as applicable, governs in this. In that case the relator successfully invoked the aid of the writ to be recognized by the respondent, as clerk of the district court of Muskogee county, and by virtue of a certificate of election dated October 30, 1907, signed by Porter Spaulding, county clerk of Muskogee county, showed prima facie title to the office as against Carrol S. Bucher, who claimed title thereto by virtue of a certificate of election dated November 8, 1907, signed by Frank R. Applegate. In this case the relator invokes the aid of the writ to be recognized by the respondent, as register of deeds of Muskogee county, and, like the relator in that case, by virtue of a certificate of election dated October 30, 1907, signed by Porter Spaulding, county clerk of Muskogee county, shows prima facie title to the office as against L. E. Smith, who claims title thereto by virtue of a certificate of election dated November 8, 1907, signed by Frank R. Applegate, alleged county clerk of Muskogee county, which latter certificate is merely colorable, if not void. Having thus shown prima facie title to the office of register of deeds of Muskogee county, without attempting to inform this court as to just what records are intended, relator simply states "that the records belonging to his office as register of deeds of said county are in the control and custody of John H. King, judge of the Third judicial district, etc.; * * * that said court refused to recognize your petitioner as said register of deeds," and refused to turn them over to him, as such, and prays that the writ of mandamus issue requiring him to do so.

We might be at a loss to know just what records are intended but for that part of the answer of the respondent wherein he states "that he has no records in his possession which the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of, whether he be the legally elected register of deeds or not; * * * that there is no law in the state of Oklahoma, either in the enabling act or the Constitution, requiring the district court, as successor of the United States Court in Indian Territory, to turn over to the register of deeds for any county the books, papers, and records received by the court from the clerk of the United States court, or the deputy clerk of the United States court, as ex officio recorder, for the respective recording district in Indian Territory." By this the issue herein appears to be that the respondent is alleged and admitted to be in possession of certain "books, papers, and records received by" him, as a "court, from the clerk of the United States court, or deputy clerk of the United States court, at Muskogee, as ex officio recorder," to which relator, as register of deeds of that county, claims the right of possession, and which respondent has refused to turn over to him on demand. Now let us determine the legal status of these records and see who, under the law, is entitled to their possession, and if it be relator we will then determine whether the writ should run requiring respondent to turn them over to him. In order to do this let us review briefly the legislation out of which these records grew. On March 1, 1889, the Congress of the United States passed an act, entitled "An act to establish a United States Court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes" (Act March 1, 1889, c. 333, 25 Stat. 783), and therein, among other things, provided for a judge, marshal, clerk, etc., and prescribed its jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and "that two terms of said court shall be held at Muskogee in said territory." On May 2, 1890, Congress passed another act, entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States Court in Indian Territory, and for other purposes" (Act May 2, 1890, c. 182, 26 Stat. 81), which, among other things, for the purpose of holding terms of court, divided Indian Territory into three divisions, known as the First, Second, and Third divisions; provided that Muskogee should be the place of holding court in the First division, and that the judges of said court should hold at least two terms of said court each year in each division; provided for deputy clerks in each division, and "that the general laws of the state of Arkansas in force at the close of the session of the General Assembly of that state of 1883, as published in 1884 in the volume known as Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, * * * are hereby extended and put in force in the Indian Territory, * * *" naming them by chapter, including chapter 110 on "Mortgages"; and in section 38 provided that "clerks and deputy clerks shall be also ex officio recorders within their respective divisions, and as such they shall perform such duties as are required of recorders of deeds under the laws of Arkansas. * * *" On March 1, 1895, Congress passed another act, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges for the United States Court in Indian Territory and for other purposes" (Act March 1, 1895, c. 145, 28 Stat. 693), which, among other things, divided Indian Territory into three judicial districts, known as the Northern, Central, and Southern; provided for the holding of at least two terms of the United States court each year in each place of holding court in each district, of which there were four in the Northern, four in the Central, and five in the Southern; designated Muskogee as one of the places of holding said court in the Northern district; and provided for the appointment of two additional judges, and "that the clerk of the United States Court in the Indian Territory now in office shall be the clerk of the Southern district, and the clerk of the Central and Northern districts shall be appointed by the respective judge thereof * * * and keep his office at one of the places of holding court in his district. He shall perform the same duties * * * as clerk of the district courts of the United States. * * *" And "each of said clerks shall appoint a deputy clerk for each court in his district where he himself does not reside."

Other and further legislation by Congress affecting the United States courts in Indian Territory from the passage of this act up to February 19, 1903, included, among other things, the appointment of additional judges and the carving out of an additional district, known as the Western district (Act May 19, 1902), wherein Muskogee was retained as a place of holding court, and perhaps additional places designated, the recital of none of which is material to this inquiry. On February 19, 1903, Congress passed another act, entitled "An act providing for record of deeds and other conveyances and instruments of writing in Indian Territory" (Act Feb. 19, 1903, c. 707, 32 Stat. 841), the material part of which (omitting the enacting clause) is as follows:

"That chapter twenty-seven of the Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, known as Mansfield's Digest of eighteen hundred and eighty-four, is hereby extended to the Indian Territory, so far as the same may be applicable and not inconsistent with any law of Congress: Provided, that the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court of each of the courts of said territory shall be ex officio recorder for his district and perform the duties required of recorders in the chapter aforesaid, and use the seal of such court in cases requiring a seal, and keep the records of such office at the office of said clerk or deputy clerk.

"It shall be the duty of each clerk or deputy clerk of such court to record in the books provided for his office all deeds, mortgages, deeds of trust, bonds, leases, covenants, defeasances, bills of sale, and other instruments of writing of or concerning lands, tenements, goods or chattels; and where such instruments are for a period of time limited on the face of the instrument they shall be filed and indexed if desired by the holder thereof and such filing for the period of twelve months from the filing thereof shall have the same effect in law as if recorded at length. The fees for filing, indexing and cross-indexing such instruments shall be twenty-five cents, and for recording shall be as set forth in section thirty-two hundred and forty-three of Mansfield's Digest of eighteen hundred and eighty-four. * * *

"Such instruments heretofore recorded with the clerk of any United States court in Indian Territory shall not be required to be again recorded under this provision, but shall be transferred to the indexes without further cost, and such records heretofore made shall be of full force and effect the same as if made under this statute. * * *

"All instruments of writing the filing of which is provided for by law shall be recorded or filed in the office of the clerk or deputy clerk at the place of holding court in the recording district where said property may be located, and which said recording districts are bounded as follows: [Designating twenty-five recording districts and naming Muskogee as the place of record for District No. 10.]"

Thus it will be seen that the records in controversy were, at the time of the passage of the so-called enabling act (Act June 16, 1906, c. 3335, 34 Stat. 267), in the custody and under the control of the clerk or deputy clerk as ex officio recorder of the United States Court in the Indian Territory at Muskogee, and were the property of the United States, subject to be disposed of, on admission of that territory into the Union and the consequent abolition of that court, by that or some other act of Congress, as Congress should see fit. As is usual in such cases Congress might see fit to turn them over to the state government, when formed; but, in order to make this transfer effectual, it seems that concurrent action on the part of the state is necessary to pass them under state jurisdiction. Benner et al. v. Porter, 9 How. (U. S.) 235, 13 L. Ed. 119, we think, correctly states the rule. In that case the court said: "The territorial courts were the courts of the general government, and the records in possession of their clerks the records of that government; and it would seem to follow necessarily from these premises that no one could legally take the possession or custody of the same without the assent, express or implied, of Congress. Such assent is essential, upon the plainest principles, to authorize change of custody. On the admission of a territorial government into the Union as a state the concurrence of both the federal and state government would seem to be required in the transfer of the records in cases of appropriate state jurisdiction from the old to the new government. An act of Congress would be incapable of passing them under the state jurisdiction, as would be an act of the Legislature of the state to take the record out of the custody of the federal government. Both must concur." See, also, Hunt v. Palao, 4 How. (U. S.) 589, 11 L. Ed. 1115; In re Inerarity, Adm'r. v. Curtis & Griswold, Trustees, 4 Fla. 175.

Whatever might have been the intent of the enabling act, or the act of Congress amendatory thereto, approved March 4, 1907, c. 2911, 34 Stat. 1286, with reference to the transfer of these records from the federal to the state government, when organized, there is no doubt as to the intent of the act of March 1, 1907, commonly called the "Indian Appropriation Bill" (Act March 1, 1907, c. 2285, 34 Stat. 1026), which, in part, is as follows: "The Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized to make all necessary arrangements for the transfer from the clerks of the United States courts in the Indian Territory and their deputies in their capacities as clerks and as ex officio recorders, to the proper state or county officials of the state of Oklahoma when organized, all records, papers, and files now in the custody of said clerks and their deputies, and he is authorized to pay the necessary expense incident thereto out of the excess emoluments earned by said clerks, and their deputies whether as clerks and deputy clerks or as ex officio recorders of deeds and other instruments. * * * By virtue of this act, and that part of section 13 of the enabling act which provides " * * * that the laws in force in the territory of Oklahoma, so far as applicable," when admitted as aforesaid, "shall extend over and apply to said state until changed by the Legislature thereof," which later act put in force, eo instante, on the admission of this state into the Union, article 4 Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. Okl. of 1903, which provides for the office of register of deeds for each county in the state, and, after providing for his term of office, qualification, and bond (section 1274), provides: "That the register of deeds shall have the care and custody of all books, records, deeds, maps, papers and fixtures deposited and kept in his office. * * * We are of the opinion that the right to the possession of the records in controversy in this case passed immediately, on the admission of these territories into the Union, from the federal to the state government, and thus to relator, on his qualifying and giving bond as required by law. As to concurrent action on the part of the state intended to accept and pass these records under the jurisdiction of the state, we think that section 8 and 9 of the schedule of the Constitution of this state is ample for that purpose.

Having determined that relator has shown prima facie title to the office of register of deeds of Muskogee county, and that he has qualified and given bond as such, as required by law, and that he is entitled to possession of the records in controversy, let us next inquire whether mandamus will lie to compel this respondent to turn them over to him. Before doing so, however, let us again examine the issue in this case, and somewhat more closely, in order to determine in what capacity respondent holds and controls these records—whether as a court or as an individual. Relator alleges "that the records belonging to his office as register of deeds of said county are in the control and custody of John H. King, judge of the Third judicial district; * * * that said court refuses to recognize your petitioner as said register of deeds," and refuses to turn them over to him as such. Respondent, answering, alleges "that he has no records in his possession which the plaintiff is entitled to possession of, whether he be the legally elected register of deeds or not; * * * that there is no law in the state of Oklahoma, either in the enabling act or the Constitution, requiring the district court as successor of the United States Court in Indian Territory to turn over to the register of deeds for any county the books, papers, and records received by the court from the clerk of the United States court, or deputy clerk of the United States court, as ex officio recorder, for the respective recording districts of the Indian Territory." In short, the facts affirmed on one side are that respondent holds and controls, as a court, the records to which relator is entitled. To this respondent answers, in effect, that he does hold and control them as a court; that he, as such, rightfully received them from the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court at Muskogee, as ex officio recorder; and that there is no law by which relator can compel respondent to turn them over to him. The one thing agreed upon between these parties is that respondent is in control of the records in controversy as a court. Let us see if this is true in point of law. We take judicial notice of the fact that this state was admitted into the Union on November 16, 1907; that at that time the United States courts in Indian Territory ceased to exist (In re Curtis, 4 Fla. 175), and the office of clerk or deputy clerk as ex officio recorder of the United States Court in Indian Territory at Muskogee became functus officio; and that the district court for the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma was organized and held its first session at Muskogee on November 21, 1907, with respondent presiding as judge. Up to that time, if indeed it could ever be done, it was a legal impossibility for these records to be received by the district court at Muskogee and passed, under its jurisdiction, from the clerk or deputy clerk as ex officio recorder of the United States Court in Indian Territory, not only for the reason, as stated, that he as such was functus officio and disqualified to act as such, but for the further reason that the act of March 1, 1907, supra, had, in effect, directed them to be turned over "to the proper state and county officials of the state of Oklahoma when organized," which proper "state and county official" we have just held was the relator in this case. It might be plausibly contended in the absence of that act that the district court at Muskogee, as successor of the United States Court in the Indian Territory at Muskogee, came in possession of and extended its jurisdiction over these records by reason of that fact. But this is assuming that the records of the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court as ex officio recorder were a part of the records of the United States Court in Indian Territory, which we are not willing to concede. But let that be as it may, if such they were prior to that act (March 1, 1907), that act cuts them off as such, and sends them in another direction and divests the district court at Muskogee of the custody, control, or jurisdiction over them. It follows that the custody respondent is alleged and admitted to be exercising over these records is the unauthorized custody and control of an individual and not of a court, and certainly not of the district court of the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma.

The question, then, to be determined is, can the aid of this writ be invoked by relator holding prima facie title to the office of register of deeds, and, as such, entitled to the records pertaining to said office, against a private individual claiming no right to the office who is wrongfully in possession of said records and refuses to turn them over to relator on demand? It will be noted that respondent is not in possession of these records as a former incumbent in office, or under color of being elected thereto. If that were the case, the rule is clear that: "Mandamus is a proper remedy to compel the delivery by a former incumbent of a public office of the books, papers, records, seals, money, and other paraphernalia thereof to the person having a clear prima facie title to the office and its belongings. The writ has been used to compel the surrender of public buildings and the delivery over of prisoners by a sheriff. In this class of cases mandamus is granted upon the theory that it is the official duty of every officer to surrender possession of the office and its belongings to his lawfully chosen and qualified successor." 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 776, citing cases from a number of states in the Union, also from England and Canada; High on Ex. Legal Rem. §§ 73-76; Merrill on Mandamus, §§ 142, 152, 154. But the case under consideration does not come within that rule, but falls within a very well-defined exception thereto, for further on (page 776, 19 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law, cited supra) we read: "Such a duty does not rest upon a mere private individual who happens to be in possession of official books, etc., and it has accordingly been held that mandamus will not lie in such a case to compel their delivery to the officer entitled thereto." See, also, Merrill on Mandamus (1892) §§ 23, 24.

State of Missouri ex rel. Cooper County, Respondent, v. Wilson W. Trent, Appellant, 58 Mo. 571, was an appeal to the Supreme Court of the state from Cooper county circuit court in which that court issued a writ of mandamus to compel a private person, not acting in any official capacity, to deliver to the county clerk a book of surveys and plats of county roads, made under order of the court, and paid for by the county, but which respondent had refused to surrender on demand. The judgment of the lower court was reversed, and in passing on this point the court said: "An examination of the authorities show that, although the granting of the writ referred to is of common occurrence, where there is no other specific legal remedy, in case an ex-officer, whether of a public or private corporation, company, church, or soclety, or the executor or widow of such officer, refuses, upon demand made, to deliver to his successor in office the insignia, books, papers, etc., pertaining to such office (Town Clerk in Nottingham's Case, Sid. 81; Anon., 1 Barn. 402; Rex v. Willman, 2 Stra. 879; Kings v. Ingram, 1 W. Bl. 50; Rex v. Clapham, 1 Wils. 805; Walter v. Belding, 24 Vt. 658; People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492, 60 Am. Dec. 769; People v. Head, 25 Ill. 825; Burr v. Norton, 25 Conn. 103), yet the most thorough search has signally failed to discover a single instance where a private person, as in the case at bar, has ever been held answerable in such a method of procedure for books of a public nature which were detained by him."

People ex rel. Lyman Austin et al. v. Orin S. Curtis, Register of Deeds of Kalkaska County, 41 Mich. 723, 49 N. W. 923, was where "a conveyance, executed by a married woman, was left with respondent, who was register of deeds, but who did not receive it in that capacity, in escrow, upon an alleged understanding that upon the performance of certain conditions the conveyance should become completely operative, and he should record it. That grantor before it had been recorded notified Curtis not to record it, and he accordingly withheld it from record and made no further delivery of it. A mandamus is now asked to compel him to put it on record." The court, in rendering its opinion, said: "The return shows, and the case made by relator is to the same effect, that the respondent did not receive the paper officially, but as a private person, and to hold it in escrow. * * * He never had possession of the document in his official capacity, and has no official duty to perform concerning it" and the writ was refused.

State of Georgia ex rel. Henry Hodges v. A. P. Powers, Judge of the Superior Court of Macon Circuit, 14 Ga. 388, was an application before the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus. "The application of Henry Hodges in this case shows that he was the defendant in a cause tried in Dooley superior court; that to the decision of the court in that case he had filed a bill of exceptions, which was duly signed and certified by Hon. A. P. Powers, the presiding judge; * * * that after filing the bill of exceptions he was informed and believed that Judge Powers had applied to the clerk and obtained the bill of exceptions, and materially changed the same by taking out thereof two of the sheets and substituting three others in lieu thereof," and prayed for a mandamus nisi to require Judge Powers to show cause why the original leaves should not be restored to the bill of exceptions. In its opinion the court on this point said: "This application for a mandamus must be refused. In Heard v. Heard, 8 Ga. 380, this court held that the circuit judge had no right to interfere with the bill of exceptions after it had been signed and certified by him and filed with the clerk; that his duty is then performed, and his control over the bill of exceptions is at an end. Adhering to the opinion there expressed, and we see no cause to change it, the alteration made in the bill of exceptions in this case, after the same had been filed with the clerk, together with the original notice, writ of error, and citation, as required by law, must be deemed to have been done by the judge individually, and not in his official character. He had no more authority to make it than any other person. * * * It is scarcely necessary to remark that mandamus does not lie against a private citizen." See, also, 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 744, and note, citing authorities.

In other words, where the writ is sought to be invoked, the proper inquiry is, does the duty sought to be enforced clearly result from an office, trust, or station? If so, the writ should run; otherwise not. 26 Cyc. pp. 103, 104. This is the common law, and is embodied in Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. Okl. 1903, § (4884) 686, which is as follows: "The writ of mandamus may be issued by the Supreme Court or the district court, or any justice or judge thereof, during term or at chambers, to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person, to compel the performance of any act which the law specially enjoins as a duty, resulting from an office, trust or station. * * *"

This statute was taken from Kansas, and in Charles L. Hussey v. Oliver P. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 462, on application for the writ, the application set forth substantially: "That at the general election held November, 1868, Hamilton received a majority of the votes cast for probate judge of the county of Saline. That the vote then cast was afterwards, at the proper time, duly canvassed, and Hamilton declared duly elected probate judge for two years from January, 1869. A certificate of his election was properly issued to him by the county clerk. Hamilton then gave a bond as required by law, which bond was approved by the proper officer. Hamilton thereupon took the oath of office prescribed by law, and entered upon the discharge of its duties. Hussey was Hamilton's immediate predecessor in office, and as soon as Hamilton gave bond and took the oath Hussey turned over to him the county seal, and a part, if not the whole, of the books, records, papers, and furniture belonging to the office. Hamilton took possession of the office February 3, 1869, and continued to discharge the duties of the same, and remained in possession of the books, papers, and seal thereof, until February 12, 1869. On that day Hussey clandestinely entered the office of Hamilton, and surreptitiously removed a part or the whole of the books, records, papers, and furniture pertaining to said office, and also the seal thereof to his own house, or some other place. The pretense therefor was that Hamilton's bond was not legal. On the 20th of February, 1869, Hamlton demanded the seal, books, records, papers, and furniture belonging to said office of Hussey, who refused to deliver them up. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted to recover the possession of said records, etc. Upon the filing of the affidavit and motion by Hamilton, Hussey came in and by his counsel waived the usual preliminary proceeding to obtain the peremptory writ, and made motions to dismiss the proceeding, which motions were overruled by the court. Hussey then filed an answer denying generally the matters set forth in the petition or affidavit, and setting forth other grounds of defense. In order to expedite matters it was then admitted by Hussey that all the matter set forth in the affidavit and petition was true, except as to the sufficiency of the bond, and Hamilton admitted that the bond was not signed by him until more than 30 days after the second Monday in January, 1869. Upon this state of facts * * * a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed and duly issued, and Hamilton placed in possession of the seal, records, and other property pertaining to his office. From decision Hussey brings that petition in error."

In its opinion the court said: "The court below granted a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the plaintiff in error to deliver up to the defendant in error the books, papers, records, seal, and insignia of office pertaining to the office of probate judge of said county of Saline. Of the several errors alleged we shall notice but one, as that disposes of the whole case. The case was tried on the affidavit and petition of the relator, to which the respondent answered as to an alternative writ, and this case was tried as though such writ had issued. The petition which was sworn to and formed the affidavit in the case did not state facts that would authorize the award of the peremptory writ of mandamus. If it be conceded that the relator, Hamilton, was duly elected and qualified, and his bond good and sufficient, and duly and properly approved, and his right to the office and its insignia perfect and complete, and his possession and enjoyment thereof as absolutely right and perfect in law as in any conceivable case, and the taking possession by Hussey of the books, papers, seal, etc., belonging to the office, as wrongful as is alleged in the affidavit, still the writ ought to have been refused. The affidavit nowhere alleges in terms, or by any fair or reasonable implication, that Hussey, the respondent, took possession of the books and other property of the office under any pretense of a color of right to such property or the possession thereof, or to the office itself, or that he was in any way exercising the duties of the office, or pretended that he had any right to do so. * * * There is no allegation that he pretended any right to the office, or exercised any functions pertaining to it. He had been probate judge, but had surrendered the same and delivered over the property to the relator 10 days before he took the property into possession, as above mentioned. * * * A writ of mandamus may only issue to an inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, and may not issue in such cases where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law. The affidavit in this case does not profess to show that Hussey held or pretended to hold any office, trust, or station from which any duty resulted. He is nowhere represented as any other than a private person, with no more special duty than pertains to any and every inhabitant. For this insufficiency of the affidavit the writ ought to have been refused. * * * Did the pleadings or evidence anywhere show that the respondent was acting as probate judge, or that he was pretending to hold the records, books, and papers, etc., by any color or pretense of right as such officer, then the cases referred to would be applicable, and entitled to careful consideration. * * * The judgment of the district court is reversed, with directions to refuse the writ of mandamus."

We are therefore of the opinion that relator, as register of deeds of Muskogee county, not being an officer of the court and entitled to recognition as such by respondent as judge of the district court for the Third judicial district of the state of Oklahoma, does not come within the rule laid down in Matney v. King, Judge, etc., and, as the turning over and delivery of the possession of the records in controversy to relator is not a duty such as the law specially enjoins upon respondent, as an individual, resulting from an office, trust, or station, the writ of mandamus should be refused.

KANE and DUNN, JJ., concur. WILLIAMS, C. J., and HAYES, J., concur as to the result.

RAMSEY v. KING, Judge of the District Court of Muskogee County.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 15, 1908.)

Application by Remus B. Ramsey for writ of mandamus to John H. King, judge of the district court of Muskogee county. Writ granted.

J. E. Wyand, Thomas H. Owen, and Baker & Purcell, for relator. George S. Ramsey, for respondent.

KANE, J. This proceeding was submitted to the court upon the same response and agreed statement of facts as the case of Toney Matney v. John H. King, Judge of the District Court of Muskogee County, State of Oklahoma, 93 Pac. 737; the only difference in the cases being that the relator in the Matney

Case sought, by mandamus, to be recognized as clerk of the district court, and in this case the relator seeks recognition as sheriff of Muskogee county. Both relators being officers of the court, the same rule will apply in both cases. On the authority of the Matney Case, let a peremptory writ of mandamus issue commanding the respondent as judge of the district court of Muskogee county, state of Oklahoma, to recognize the relator as sheriff of said county and state, and to permit said relator to do and perform all the duties which, under the law, he is required to do and perform as sheriff of said county and state.

It is so ordered. All the Justices concurring.

CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO. v. GROVES.
(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—VERDICT CONTRARY TO LAW.

When the evidence on the trial establishes the fact so clearly and indisputably that the court may instruct the jury to bring in a particular verdict, but neglects so to do, and is not requested to do so, and the jury returns a verdict contrary to what the law demands, then and then only should the court set aside the verdict of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 132-134.]

2. COURTS—RULES OF DECISION—PREVIOUS DECISIONS AS PRECEDENTS—CIVIL LAW.

The common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions, and the condition and wants of the people, in aid of the general statutes, being in force in this state, precludes the following of decisions based on the civil law as governing authority in this jurisdiction.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—NATURAL WATER COURSES—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNER—COMMON LAW.

Where the common law prevails, every proprietor, upon water flowing in a defined channel, so as to constitute a water course, has the right to insist that the water shall continue to run as it has been accustomed, and no one can change or obstruct its course injuriously to him without being liable to damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, §§ 42, 43.]

4. SAME—SURFACE WATERS—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES.

Surface water flowing naturally or falling upon the soil may be diverted in its course, and even thrown back on the dominant estate whence it came, but with certain qualifications.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, §§ 127, 128.]

5. SAME.

The exercise of such right by a lower proprietor must be reasonable, for proper purposes, in good faith, and with due care to inflict injury only when necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 128.]

6. SAME.

The doctrine that the right may not be exercised wantonly, unnecessarily, or carelessly is a common-law doctrine, resting upon the common law, as well as upon the civil law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 128.]

7. SAME.

A class of cases, based upon the adoption of the old common-law rule, hold without qualification that no cause of action can arise from throwing back surface waters upon the land of the dominant estate; but this is not supported by the weight of common-law authority.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 128.]

8. SAME.

The weight of authority in England and in the United States, though the cases are often difficult to reconcile, supports the proposition that one must so use his own property with due regard to the rights of another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 128.]

9. SAME.

Where the surface water has been accustomed to gather and flow along a well-defined channel, which by frequent running it has worn or cut into the soil, so as to have well-defined banks, it may not be obstructed to the injury of the dominant proprietor.

10. SAME—WATERWAY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where the natural conformation of the surrounding country necessarily collects therein so large a body of water, after heavy rain or the melting of large bodies of snow, as to require an outlet to some common reservoir, and where such water is regularly discharged through a well-defined channel which the force of the water has made for itself, and which is the accustomed channel through which it flows or has ever flowed, it constitutes a water course or waterway.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 30.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Comanche County; Frank E. Gillette, Judge.

Action by Alva Groves against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company for damages due to the overflow of land, caused by the negligent construction of defendant's roadbed. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

On the 17th day of February, 1903, Alva Groves, the herein defendant in error, as plaintiff, commenced an action in the probate court of Comanche county, in the territory of Oklahoma. Afterwards, on the 18th day of April, 1903, plaintiff filed his amended petition, and on the same day the plaintiff in error, the defendant in the court below, filed his answer, which was a denial of each and every allegation, except that the defendant was a corporation. The case was tried in the probate court, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, and was appealed to the district court. Thereafter, on the 21st day of October, 1904, the case was tried, and a judgment resulted in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $443.75.

For cause of action the plaintiff's petition consisted of three paragraphs or counts. In the first count he alleged: That the defendant constructed a line of railway across his homestead in the month of May, 1902, and in constructing it threw up an embankment on said land "in crossing a draw or ravine thereon, which draw or ravine was in a natural water course created by the flow of surface water caused by the fall of rain in that community, and was and is the natural outlet for such water." That defendant in constructing said embankment failed to make a sufficient provision for the outlet of the water that might reasonably accumulate in said draw or ravine, but put in a small tilting, wholly insufficient to carry off said water, and that it accumulates about the track of said defendant after each heavy rain, and stands upon and covers for some length of time about 35 acres of plaintiff's land, killing all vegetation and making said amount of land valueless. He further alleged that the same was good agricultural land, and worth $11.25 per acre, or the total value of $393.75. That prior to the construction of said embankment said water course was unobstructed, and water did not stand upon said land, but naturally flowed off; and plaintiff alleges, as a result of said obstruction, the destruction of the whole value of said land, in the sum of $393.75. In the second count the same facts are alleged with reference to the building of the road, the obstruction of the ravine, the accumulation of the water, and the rendering of the land valueless, with the additional allegation that the said 35 acres of land rendered valueless extended in a strip almost the entire width of his homestead, thereby dividing the remainder of his homestead or claim in two parts, and damaging the balance of the homestead independent of the 35 acres, which were absolutely rendered valueless, in the sum of $200 additional. In the third count substantially the same allegations are made with reference to the construction of the road and the obstruction of the ravine, with the further allegation that on the 21st day of September the water which came down the draw or ravine was caused, on account of this construction of said embankment with insufficient outlet, to stand above the embankment, flooding 35 acres of the land to such an extent as to flow in his residence, a half dugout, a depth of four feet or thereabout, damaging the dugout to the value of $40, household goods to the value of $10, and wearing apparel to the value of $20, carrying away wood and posts to the value of $4, two saddles and three sets of harness to the value of $30, and injuring his well to the value of $50; also claiming damage to his pasture to the amount of $150, and causing the necessity of moving his fence, to his damage in the sum of $50. Plaintiff therein prayed judgment in the total sum of $947.45.

On the trial the plaintiff withdrew his claim for damages to the pasture, and limited his claim for damages from the overflow in September, 1902. The defendant on the trial admitted that the railroad company constructed the line or lines mentioned in the petition, and that it was, at the time of the trial, owned and operated by said railway corporation. On the part of the plaintiff, without objection on the part of defendant in error, he testified in his behalf that at the time of the institution of said action he was the owner of said land; that he, having homesteaded the same, had lived on the place ever since the 6th day of September after the opening, which was in August, 1901. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that he entered and filed on said quarter section of land under the homestead laws, and that he had proved up his claim. He further stated that he could not tell the date of his filing, but his best recollection was it was the 6th of September, 1901, and, further, that he had made no conveyance or mortgage to the same prior to the time of the alleged damage in 1902. It was admitted that plaintiff made no conveyance whatever to the railway company, but that the railway company acquired right of way prior to plaintiff's homestead entry, and that the railroad embankment was constructed after plaintiff filed and entered upon said land. The testimony of plaintiff tended to show that the defendant's road and the embankment were constructed about May, 1902; that there were heavy rains, equal to the September, 1902, rain, causing the overflow in question, prior to the time of the construction of said embankment, but that the same, prior to the construction, did not flood or overflow the said land; that the embankment was 13 or 14 feet high and about 200 yards long, practically the entire width of the homestead; that the distance from said embankment to the head of said creek or ravine is about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; that, after the overflow had reached to the channel, said ravine would run for several days; that the creek below the said road was something like it was above; that below the same the water spread out over the flat lands; that where they scraped dirt to make a fill the water was run around through the fill and on over a little bottom to the section line, the outside line of plaintiff's land; that, as a result of said overflows as a result of said embankment, said 35 or 40 acres had been rendered valueless for farming and grazing purposes; that for such purposes it formerly had a value ranging from \$11.25 to \$15 per acre; that said house or dugout was damaged in the sum of \$40, household goods, \$10, wearing apparel, \$20, bridles, harness, and saddle, \$21, and well in the sum of \$50. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that the tilling or sewer was not of such a size as might have reasonably been considered sufficient to carry off the volume of water that might naturally have been anticipated at times to flow through Snake creek or this ravine.

The testimony on the part of plaintiff as to the stream in question being a water course is as follows: "Q. State whether or not there is any water course or ravine running through that land. A. Yes, sir; there is. Q. Has it any name? A. Yes, sir; called 'Snake Creek.' * * * Q. Describe to the jury the nature of that ravine there, as to banks, how far from one bank to the other, and about the nature of the channel. A. Well, the channel some places is cut out deep and broad, and runs crooked, and it will go right across after it strikes a rocky place, and finally there will not be any channel there for a little ways. Q. State if there is any natural reason why it has not worn a channel in all the places. A. It is because the creek bed is crooked, and there is rock there, and when it reaches that rock it shoots right across. Q. How far is it to the head of this creek, or what is the lay of the land where it drains the water into the creek? A. It is about 3 miles—I mean to the head of the creek. Q. About 3 miles to the head of the creek? A. It drains about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles—I don't know exactly—right across there. Q. You may state the distance of the drain on either side of the channel. A. On the west side about a mile and a half a little northwest, and on the east about a mile and a half north and east. Q. State whether or not you lived there on this land prior to the construction of this railroad across it. A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. State whether or not, during the time you lived there, or prior to the construction of this road, there were any heavy rains. A. Yes; lots of them. Q. State whether or not these rains overflowed your land. A. No, sir; nothing to amount to anything at all. Q. State whether or not, prior to the month of September, 1902, there were any rains. A. Yes, sir. Q. State what effect it had on your land, as to whether it flooded. A. Yes, sir; flooded about 35 acres. * * * Q. How deep is that creek? A. Some places it is over waist deep, and some places it is shallow. Q. Is it running now? A. No, sir. Q. How much of the time does it run? A. It don't run very much at a time. Q. Just after rains? A. Yes, sir; when it does run, it will probably run for a week or such a matter. I could not say exactly how long it does run. Q. Did you ever know it to run a week? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was a week when it had been raining a week? A. It had been raining some. Q. Rained for several days? A. Yes, sir; it rained quite a bit. Q. Where does the water come from that comes down that ravine? A. Part of it shoots off from the west side, and part of it from the east. Q. Is there not a little slough there in your land where the water stands? A. You mean Snake creek? Q. Yes, sir. A. Yes, sir; there is water standing there in Snake creek. Q. A little water hole? A. Pretty good-sized water hole; lasts the year around. Q. Did you ever see it last the year around? A. It lasts the year around. * * * Q. Did you ever make any measurement of the height or depth of the creek? A. Do you mean how deep the creek is? Q. Did you ever actually measure that creek with a yardstick or tapeline? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ever measure it with anything that was intended to measure height or distance? A. No, sir; never measured it. Q. The creek has no channel all the way? I understood you to say it washes out the soil in some places where it is soft, and made little holes where it runs over? A. In some places there is a channel, and in some places there is not."

J. A. Vanderford, on the part of plaintiff, among other things, testified: "Q. Is that creek straight or crooked? A. It is crooked. Q. Is that water course through there natural or artificial? A. It is a natural water course. * * * Q. You speak of pools of water along that ravine or depression there on plaintiff's land. How many pools of water are there there? A. I never counted them. Q. When was you there last? A. About a month ago. Q. Was water running then? A. No, sir. Q. Have you seen it since a month ago? A. No, sir. * * * Q. Well, now, do you know of any pools of water along there, except the one down close to the railroad track? A. Yes, sir; I know in particular of three. Q. When were they there? A. They were there about— I believe it is one year since I have been along there. Q. You say they were there a year ago? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was there any running water there at that time? A. No; not at that time. Q. How long since had there been any running water there at that time? A. That was sort of dry spell. I could not say just how long. Q. Is that a live stream that goes down through there? A. No, sir; I don't consider it a live stream. Q. When does the water run down there? A. After heavy rains. Q. Does the water that falls in that scope of country drain down through there? A. Yes, sir."

D. J. McCoy, on the part of defendant, testifies in part as follows: "Q. What is the character, or what are the surface features, of plaintiff's land? A. When I first saw his land it was rolling prairie, draining from the west side gently toward the depression. Q. And how was the slope to the east of the depression? A. To the east of the depression on another gentle slant about the same way. Q. Describe that depression. A. It was a natural depression in the ground. I should call it a ravine. Taking clear across, it was an average of about 400 feet wide. There are no marked banks to this, or any known channel, otherwise than a few pockets of water, pools, and puddles. Q. You say there are no banks? A. Nothing I should call that. Q. How does the land lie? Does it slope from the lowest point out? A. No, sir; you might say that, in the lowest line of it, which is about 400 feet wide, that is just a wide slough—the way I would call it—or a ravine. Q. At the time of the construction of the railroad did the water stand in that slough? A. Yes, sir. Q. To what depth? A. We drove our teams into the middle sometimes; and the water never did at any time come over the hub. Q. How long was that slough? A. I should judge it was about 500 feet. Q. Were there any abrupt banks to it? A. No, sir. Q. How were the edges? A. The edges looked like the banks had simply broke away, and it had got into softer ground underneath. Q. How was the slope or rise or fall of the land from the outer edges of the slough each way? A. Gradual. Q. Now, between these banks of the slough, what was the formation? A. It seemed to be just the usual formation of the land; never noticed anything different. Q. Was there any channel there? A. No, sir. Q. By what were those banks made? How were they formed? A. I couldn't say. All I know was that they appeared to me to be natural, or the water at some time had started a place under the grass roots. Q. How wide were those places? A. No more than 25 feet. Q. Any living water there? A. No, sir. Q. Any springs you know of? A. None that I know of. Q. What was between these banks you speak of (meaning banks of the pools)? Was there any channel? A. No channel at all; just natural ground and grass. Q. What was the character of the lowest place in there between those banks? A. Just seemed to be natural soil such as we found in building the dam. Q. Did you find it changed in that respect when you examined it after the flood? A. No, sir."

At the close of taking testimony in the case the defendant moved the court for an order to the jury to return a verdict in its favor. Said motion was taken under advisement, and the record fails to show that it was ever ruled upon by the court, or that any exception was taken in regard to said motion whatever. The following instruction, among others, was given to the jury: No. 3: "The jury are instructed that, under the laws of this territory, 'every corporation, constructing, owning, or using a railroad shall restore every stream of water, watercourse, street, highway, plank road, toll or wagon road, turnpike, or canal, across, along, or upon which said railroad may be constructed, to its former state, or to such conditions that its usefulness shall not be materially impaired, and thereafter maintain the same in such condition, against any effect in any manner produced by such railroad.' The provision of our statute here quoted is mandatory in its terms, and the failure to comply therewith in the construction of a line of railroad renders the person or corporation so failing liable to damages to any person injured by reason of such failure."

The plaintiff in error relies upon the following assignments of errors: (2) "That the court erred in refusing the peremptory instruction offered by plaintiff in error." (1) "That the evidence was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, for the reason that he did not show the existence of a watercourse or waterway." (3) "That the court erred in its instruction defining a watercourse." (4) "That the court erred in its instructions in assuming the existence of facts which were in issue." (5) "That the court erred in directing the consideration of the jury to overflow subsequent to the alleged overflow of September 2, 1902." (6) "That the court erred in instruction No. 8, by submitting improper elements of damage." (7)

"That the court erred in admitting incompetent evidence to show damage by the alleged destruction of the well." (8) "That the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of the amount of damages to land caused by the overflow." (9) "That by reason of the errors above enumerated the court erred in refusing to grant the plaintiff in error a new trial."

M. A. Low, C. O. Blake, E. E. Blake, H. B. Low, and W. C. Stevens, for plaintiff in error. Cherryholmes & Norman, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended by plaintiff in error that the evidence was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff below, the defendant in error here, to recover, for the reason that he did not show the existence of a "water course" or "waterway." The defendant below moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor. However, the motion was never acted upon, nor was there any exception reserved, either on account of the failure of the court to act or to sustain the same. In defendant's motion for a new trial he alleges that the verdict was contrary to law, and not supported by sufficient evidence. The question, then, arises, when is a verdict contrary to law? "Where the evidence on the trial establishes the fact so clearly and indisputably that the court may instruct the jury to bring in a particular verdict, but neglects to do so, and is not requested so to do, and the jury returns a verdict contrary to what the law directs in such a state of facts, then and then only can the court set aside the verdict of the jury." Marshall's Kana. Trial Brief, p. 607, § 3080. By this record the question is presented as to whether or not the obstruction of the servitude of the lower heritage to the injury of the owner of the dominant estate, subjects him to liability for the resulting damage. Some of the adjudicated cases seem to go to the full extent of the civil-law doctrine of the servitude of the lower tenement, holding that the superior or dominant tenement has the absolute right to the discharge of its surface waters on the lower, under all or any circumstances in the nature of a common easement. Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. 415; Miller v. Laubach, 47 Pa. 155, 86 Am. Dec. 521; Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 347, 13 Am. Rep. 213; Kauffman v. Griesemer, 26 Pa. 407, 67 Am. Dec. 437; Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 280, 72 Am. Dec. 305; Martin v. Jett, 12 La. 501, 82 Am. Dec. 120; Butler v. Peck, 16 Ohio St. 339, 88 Am. Dec. 452; Mayor v. Sikes, 94 Ga. 30, 20 S. E. 257, 26 L. R. A. 653, 47 Am. St. Rep. 132. However, the common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions, and the condition and wants of the people, in aid of the General Statutes of Oklahoma (section 4200, Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. 1903), being in force in this state, we feel that we are precluded from accepting decisions based on the civil law as governing authority in this jurisdiction. Wherever the common law prevails, every proprietor upon water flowing in a definite channel so as to constitute a water course has the right to insist that the water shall continue to run as it has been accustomed, and that no one can change or obstruct its course injuriously to him without being liable to damages. With regard, however, to surface water not confined to marked channels or banks, there has been a recognized difference. At common law, for the purpose of drainage, construction, or any other lawful purpose, every proprietor had the right to elevate the surface of his own land, or to erect embankments whereby the natural flow of the water from the upper ground shall be stopped, without liability. However, as a result of new conditions and the loathness of the courts to apply principles or conditions to which they were not applicable, and not from any intrinsic force of the civil law as the rule of decisions, modifications or qualifications of the ancient common-law doctrine have been adopted.

Practically all of the common-law courts agree that the surface water, flowing naturally or falling upon the soil, may be diverted in its course, and even thrown back upon the dominant estate whence it came. But is this right absolute at the will of the lower proprietor, or must such exercise be reasonable, for proper purposes, and with due care to inflict injury only when it is necessary? The question of good faith and the manner of doing it are necessarily involved in determining whether or not such right may be exercised. When necessary, and with due care and regard as to the rights of others, although injury may accompany its exercise, under the common law there is no relief. The doctrine that the right may not be exercised wantonly, unnecessarily, or carelessly does not rest upon the civil law so much as upon the common law. This qualification, being based upon that golden maxim of the common law that one must so use his own property as not to injure the rights of another, also finds expression in the civil law, in the words of Pothier: "Each of the neighbors may so do upon his own heritage what seemeth good to him, in such manner, nevertheless, that he doth not injure the neighboring heritage." If for any purpose of improving and cultivating his land the landowner raises or fills it so that the water which falls in rain or snow upon an adjacent owner's land, and which formerly flowed upon the first-mentioned parcel, is prevented from so doing to the injury of the adjacent parcel, the owner of the latter is without remedy. Washburn on Easements (3d Ed.) § 353 et seq. However, the improvement may not be made carelessly, but must be done with a just regard to the rights of others. Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co., 43 N. H. 569; Swett v. Cutts, 50 N. H. 439, 9 Am. Rep. 276; Porter v. Durham, 74 N. C. 767; Raleigh & A. R. R. Co. v. Wicker et al., 74 N. C. 220; Yazoo & Miss. V. R. R. Co. v. Davis, 73 Miss. 678, 19 South. 487, 32 L. R. A. 262, 55 Am. St. Rep. 562; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. R. Co. v. Chapman, 39 Ark. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 280; Jungblum v. M. N. U. & S. W. R. R. Co., 70 Minn. 156, 72 N. W. 971; Sheehan v. Flynn, 59 Minn. 436, 61 N. W. 462, 26 L. R. A. 632.

But the right thus qualified has also exceptions. One is that the owner of the land cannot collect the water into an artificial channel or volume and pour it upon the land of another to his injury. Davis v. Fry, 14

Okla. 340, 78 Pac. 183, 69 L. R. A. 460; Davis v. City of Crawfordsville, 119 Ind. 1, 21 N. E. 449, 12 Am. St. Rep. 361; City of Evansville v. Decker, 84 Ind. 325, 43 Am. Rep. 86; Patoko Township v. Hopkins, 31 Am. St. Rep. 417; Rychlicki v. City of St. Louis, 98 Mo. 497, 11 S. W. 1001, 4 L. R. A. 594, 14 Am. St. Rep. 651; Fremont, etc., R. R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, 40 N. W. 948, 13 Am. Another exception to the right, which is practically converse to the foregoing exception, is that the owner of the land cannot interfere with the flow of surface water in a natural channel. Where the water has been accustomed to gather and flow along a well-defined channel, where, by frequent running it has worn or cut into the soil, it may not be obstructed to the injury of the dominant tenement. Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 280, 72 Am. Dec. 395; L. R. & F. S. R. R. Co. v. Chapman, 39 Ark. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 280; Rowe v. St. P. Ry. Co., 41 Minn. 384, 43 N. W. 76, 16 Am. St. Rep. 706; Sinai v. L., N. O. & T. R. R. Co., 71 Miss. 552, 14 South. 87; Jungblum v. M. N. U. & S. W. R. R. Co., 70 Minn. 158, 72 N. W. 971; Boyd v. Conklin, 54 Mich. 590, 20 N. W. 595, 52 Am. Rep. 831; N. & W. R. Co. v. Carter, 91 Va. 587, 22 S. E. 517.

In Norfolk & Western R. R. Co. v. Carter, supra, the surface water on the land of the plaintiff prior to the building of the road escaped from it over what is now the right of way of the defendant railway company by natural channels into Clinch river, and the flow was obstructed by the failure of said defendant to construct the necessary channels under its roadbed, and consequently the plaintiff was damaged by the accumulation of water. In the case of Jungblum v. M. N. U. & S. W. R. R. Co., 70 Minn. 157, 72 N. W. 972, the depression was the usual and natural course of channel along which the surface water was accustomed to flow before the roadbed was constructed for a mile or two east of the roadbed, and the channel bears marks of water having flowed through it. Whether this channel is a natural water-course within the strict definition of the term we need not determine, for the evidence justifies the finding that it was the natural and usual channel for surface water, and afforded a reasonable way for the defendant to construct a culvert for the escape of the surface water without injury to any landowner. In the case of Boyd v. Conklin, 54 Mich. 583, 20 N. W. 595, 52 Am. Rep. 831, it is said: "The narrow definition of water courses as natural living streams, which appears in a few cases in the United States, is not an ancient or universal definition. On the contrary, water running in a natural or artificial bed is very frequently, if not generally, so regarded. But names are of small importance, inasmuch as the only consideration that need be looked at is the character and surroundings of the flowage. The following authorities recognize valuable rights in water, and some of them are spoken of expressly as water courses which are entirely distinct from natural living streams. 3 Woolrych on Waters, 146, 147; Wright v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 77; Rawstron v. Taylor, 11 Exch. 309; Broadbent v. Ramsbotham, 11 Exch. 602; Beeston v. Weale, 5 El. & Bl. 986; Ivimey v. Stocker, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 396; Watts v. Kelson, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 166; Nuttall v. Bracewell, L. R. 2 Exch. 1; Holker v. Poritt, L. R. 8 Exch. 107; Taylor v. Corp. of St. Helen's, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 264; Magor v. Chadwick, 11 Ad. & E. 571; Chadwick v. Marsden, L. R. Exch. 284. * * * Whatever may be the rights of adjoining proprietors as to the use and diversion of waters, there is no right in any one, by raising artificial obstructions, to flood his neighbor's lands by stopping the escape of water that cannot escape otherwise."

In the case of Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 280, 72 Am. Dec. 395, a water course is defined to be a channel or canal for the conveyance of water, particularly in draining lands. It may be natural, as where it is made by the natural flow of the water, caused by the general superficies of the surrounding land from which the water is collected into one channel, or it may be artificial, as in the case of a ditch or other artificial means used to divert the water from its natural channel, to carry it from lowlands from which it will not flow from the consequence of the surface of the surrounding land; and if such water is regularly discharged through a well-defined channel, and is the accustomed channel through which it flows and has flowed from time immemorial, it is an ancient natural water course. In the case of Sinai v. L., N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 71 Miss. 552, 14 South. 88, it is said: "At the ancient common law every landowner fought and fenced against surface water as suited his necessities. It was a common enemy, with which the landowner dealt according to his own pleasure, for his own protection; but this strict rule had its origin when the soil was used for agricultural purposes, in that primeval day of the law's birth and growth, and a railroad corporation as a landowner was undreamed of. Now, with a network of railway lands spread all over the face of the country, we are called to deal, in the application of legal principles, with a condition of affairs not thought of. When every man fought surface water to suit his own fancy, still then, as now, the rule was that each must so use his own property as not to do unnecessary harm to another. Each proprietor has the right to the use and possession of his own soil; each has equality of proprietary rights, and upon each is imposed in organized society, regulated by law resting on mutual concession, reciprocal duties and correlative obligations. No one, natural or artificial, has the absolute dominion and unlimited control of his own lands. Blending these harmonious rules of the common law, and adopting them in their flexibility to the new order of society, we shall do no violence to either while we apply both to the case in hand." In the case of Town v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 50 Neb. 771, 70 N. W. 403, the facts were as follows: "A body of land—the plaintiff says about a section (640 acres), one witness says a half section, and others fix it at 200 or 300 acres—within the corporate limits of the city of Lincoln, including some of the improved portions of the city, and all platted or laid out in lots and blocks, etc., on a lot on which was the plaintiff's place of business, has such a surface conformation or is sloped so that, in time of rains or melting of snows, any waters caused thereby flow toward and come together in a body at a place in what witnesses called a 'draw,' others a 'depression in the prairie,' and others a 'channel' or 'waterway,' having its course near the store of plaintiff, and in or directly across which an embankment was made by or for the railway company, and which stopped the flowage of waters in the channel. The company made a culvert by placing at the base of the embankment, in the course of which the surface waters had apparently taken their flow, a tile of the required length, and of an internal diameter of 24 inches." The jury found from the foregoing state of facts that the "depression" in the land complained of was a water course or natural channel, with banks clearly defined; and the undisputed proof was that the water was surface water, and the verdict of the jury was sustained.

If the water, whether surface water or not, had been accustomed to gather and flow along a well-defined channel, although said channel may have been cut or worn into the soil by the frequent running or flowing of such surface water, yet the same could not be obstructed by the railway company; but it was the duty of said railway company, in the construction of its said road, to reasonably provide sufficient drainage and an outlet to carry off such water as might be reasonably expected to flow along said channel and through such drainage outlet, but, however, in such a manner to do no wrong to the servient tenement—in other words, to provide the outlet as near as reasonably practicable, so as to force the water off the servient tenement in like manner and in the same channel or place as it flowed prior to the construction of said embankment. From the foregoing it is evident that neither was the verdict contrary to the law nor was the defendant below entitled to a peremptory instruction of its favor.

This brings us to the third assignment of error, to the effect that the court erred in its instructions defining a water course. Said instruction was in words and figures as follows: "The jury are instructed that the word 'water course,' as used in the statute quoted in instruction No. 3, means such a course as that where the natural conformation of the surrounding country necessarily collects therein so large a quantity of water, after heavy rain or after the melting of large bodies of snow, as to require an outlet to some common reservoir, and when such water is regularly discharged through a well-defined channel which the force of the water has made for itself and which is the accustomed channel through which it flows and has ever flowed." The plaintiff in error has no ground to complain of the same. It was sufficiently favorable to it. Town v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 50 Neb. 771, 70 N. W. 402; Boyd v. Conklin, 54 Mich. 583, 20 N. W. 595, 52 Am. Rep. 831, and authorities therein cited; Jungblum v. M. N. U. & S. W. R. R. Co., 70 Minn. 157, 72 N. W. 971; N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Carter, 91 Va. 583, 22 S. E. 517; Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 280, 72 Am. Dec. 395; Sinal v. L. N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 71 Miss. 552, 14 South. 87.

In the same assignment of error plaintiff complains of the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that, if they find from the evidence that the waterway through which plaintiff's land drains a large area of the surrounding country, about 3 to 3½ miles long, and 1 to 2 miles in width, and carries off, after heavy rains in its channel, large volumes of water, and that the drainage of the surrounding country is such as to cause rain falling thereon to run off very rapidly and accumulate in the waterway across plaintiff's land, which waterway is well defined and the accustomed channel through which such water flows, and so marked as to present on casual glance to every one the unmistakable evidence of the frequent action of running water, such waterway is a water course within the meaning of the statute quoted in paragraph 3 of these instructions." For the same reason, and under the same authorities, the plaintiff in error has no just ground for complaint.

The fourth assignment of error is unsupported by the record.

It is further contended in the fifth assignment of error that the court erred in directing the consideration of the jury to overflow subsequent to the alleged overflow of September, 1902. There is nothing in the charge of the court submitting any issue as to any overflow subsequent to the date alleged in the petition. There was testimony, however, introduced on the part of the plaintiff as to subsequent overflows, that was competent. Just as it was competent to introduce testimony as to whether or not there had been overflows of such land prior to the date of the construction of the embankment, in order that the jury might determine whether or not the overflow was the primary cause of the construction of the embankment, so it is in like manner competent to make proof as to subsequent overflows, in order that the jury might determine as to whether or not the defendant had exercised reasonable care in providing outlets to carry off water that might accumulate in said water course.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments of error are without merit.

Let the cause be affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

DE BERGERE et al. v. CHAVES et al.
(Supreme Court of New Mexico. Jan. 14, 1908.)

1. TENANCY IN COMMON—ACTION BY CO-TENANT.

Tenants in common need not join in a suit in ejectment to recover possession of lands, although they may do so if they so desire.

2. SAME—RECOVERY IN EJECTMENT.

A tenant in common may sue separately in ejectment, and, if the defendant shows no title, he is entitled to recover possession of the entire estate, in subordination, however, to the rights of his co-tenants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Tenancy in Common, §§ 143–150.]

3. SAME.

The case of Neher v. Armijo, 9 N. M. 325, 54 Pac. 236, is reversed so far as it holds that, if a tenant in common sues alone in ejectment, he can recover only his own interest in the estate.

4. DEEDS—WHAT CONSTITUTE—EXECUTORY CONTRACTS.

In the case at bar the paper relied on is not a deed, but is an executory contract, for the giving of a deed to the Galisteo ranch, by Manuel A. Otero, to Jesus M. Sena y Baca, upon the approval of the Bartolome Baca grant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 6.]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION—WHEN LIMITATIONS RUN.

The instrument in writing under which Jesus M. Sena y Baca took possession of the Galisteo ranch, being an executory contract, the statute of limitations, under which title by adverse possession might be gained, would not begin to run until Sena y Baca, or those claiming under him, distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of Manuel A. Otero to the Galisteo ranch.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 343, 344.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Santa Fé County; before Justice Edward A. Mann.

Action by Eloisa Luna de Bergere and others against Luciano Chaves and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is a suit in ejectment, brought by the plaintiffs, to recover the possession of a certain tract of land situated in Santa Fé county, N. M., and known as the "Galisteo Ranch." A jury was waived and the evidence in the case was taken by Hon. John R. McFie, judge of the First judicial district court of the territory of New Mexico, but on March 3, A. D. 1906, the said judge disqualified himself, and by consent of all the parties the cause was referred to the honorable Edward A. Mann, associate justice of the Supreme Court of this territory, who heard the arguments and rendered a judgment in the case. It will be unnecessary to trace the title to the Galisteo ranch back of June 22, 1878, at which time the title to the ranch was in Manuel Antonio Otero, as all of the parties to this controversy trace their claims to him as the common source. On June 22, 1878, Manuel A. Otero and one Jesus M. Sena y Baca entered into a contract or agreement, written in Spanish, a translation of which reads as follows, to wit: "Know all men by these presents, that I, the undersigned, Manuel Antonio Otero, resident of the county of Valencia, in the Territory of New Mexico, for consideration, have sold and transferred in favor of Jesus M. Sena y Baca and Agapita Ortiz, his wife, a ranch known as the ranch of Galisteo, which is situated in the county of Santa Fé and territory aforesaid, known as the ranch which was formerly of the deceased Don Miguel E. Pino, and that I will give and execute the documents of conveyance of the said ranch in favor of Jesus M. Sena y Baca and Agapita Ortiz, as soon as there shall be adjudicated and approved by the Surveyor General the grant of Bartolome Baca of a tract which was ceded to him by the Governor Melgarez in the year 1819, and the which is situate in the county of Valencia in the territory of New Mexico, and, furthermore, they will take possession of the aforesaid ranch and will have and enjoy all the products of the same until the proper documents may be executed, and in conformity with the above stated; and the said Jesus M. Sena y Baca so agrees and has signed here jointly with me. In witness whereof, we sign the present in La Constancia, county of Valencia, this 22d day of June, A. D. 1878. Manuel A. Otero. Jesus M. Sena y Baca." Under this contract or agreement Sena y Baca went into possession of the lands in controversy, and so remained until his death in the year 1885, when his rights descended to his widow, who continued in possession until July 10, 1888, when she quitclaimed her rights in it to one Jesse D. Rumberg, and at the same time delivered to him the original contract or agreement between her husband and Otero, both of which instruments Rumberg had placed of record. Rumberg continued in possession of the property until July 18, 1889, when he quitclaimed the same to Jose de la Cruz Chaves, and from Jose de la Cruz Chaves the property came into the possession of his heirs at law, the defendants herein. The contract or agreement between Sena y Baca and Otero, and which is set out above, was handed over to the several occupants of the property, and was introduced in evidence on the trial of this case. Indeed, the contract or agreement seems to have been executed in duplicate, as both the plaintiffs and defendants have one, which are identical, except that the one held by the defendants has certain interlineations in it setting out a consideration of $1,000 for the alleged sale. During all of the time that the property was in the possession of Sena y Baca and his privies their possession was continuous. They farmed the land, made certain improvements on it by building fences and acequias, have received rentals for parts of it which was farmed on shares, and have exercised all of the control over the property which its owner might do. The evidence discloses that Manuel Antonio Otero attempted to get the Bartolome Baca grant, approved by the Surveyor General of New Mexico, but that official made an unfavorable report on the validity of the grant, and recommended that it be rejected, but before Congress took any action on this report of the Surveyor General the Court of Private Land Claims was created, and empowered to adjudicate and determine the validity of land grants made by the governments of Spain and Mexico in New Mexico and other territories. The Oteros prosecuted their claim for the confirmation of the Bartolome Baca grant before the Court of Private Land Claims, and secured a favorable decision from that court, for a part of the grant, but on appeal the Supreme Court of the United States in 1897 finally rejected the grant. After the creation of the Court of Private Land Claims the successors of Sena y Baca brought a proceeding in such court for the confirmation of the Galisteo grant, and succeeded in getting that part of it known as the "Galisteo Ranch," the property in controversy, confirmed. On April 3, 1901, after the final rejection of the Bartolome Baca grant, the plaintiffs herein, as heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero, brought this suit to recover the possession of the Galisteo ranch. Judgment was finally entered by the learned judge below in favor of the plaintiffs, and, from such judgment, the defendants appealed to this court.

A. B. Renahan, for appellants. T. B. Castron and Robert C. Gortner, for appellees.

MILLS, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). It is evident from an examination of the record that this case was ably contested by the attorneys for both the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that every effort was used to secure and present to the trial court all of the evidence which minds trained in the subtlety of legal procedure by many years of active practice before the courts believed would be useful to the respective sides which they represented in the controversy now before us.

The questions discussed by counsel in their briefs are numerous and involve complicated points of law, but in our opinion the real questions on which this case must finally be decided can be compressed into a small compass, by brushing to one side what under our opinion of this case are collateral and comparatively unimportant matters, many of which are elaborately argued in the briefs submitted to us by counsel. We will endeavor to dispose of this case along these lines.

1. We do not consider as well taken the contention of the appellants that the plaintiffs below could not maintain this suit without joining their tenants in common as parties. No provision of our laws, so far as we are aware, requires that all of the tenants in common should join in a suit to recover possession of real property. In fact, this court has held in Neher v. Armijo, 9 N. M. 325, 54 Pac. 236: "Defendant insists that these plaintiffs as tenants in common could not be joined as parties plaintiff, and their having so joined is fatal to their case. We do not interpret the law to be as defendant contends, but believe the better rule to be that tenants in common may join in ejectment and recover the whole property demanded as held by them in common, or they may sue separately and recover each one only his whole interest." The opinion in the Neher v. Armijo Case, that tenants in common may join in an ejectment case and "recover the whole property demanded so held by them in common or they may sue separately and recover," is we think correct, but we think that that case is incorrect in limiting such recovery in case a suit is brought by one of several tenants in common to "each one only his whole interest," and to that extent the case of Neher v. Armijo is reversed. We think the true rule to be that a tenant in common may sue separately in ejectment, and that, if the defendant shows no title, he is entitled to recover possession of the entire estate, "in subordination, however, to the rights of his co-tenants." As is well said in Hardy v. Johnson, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 371, 17 L. Ed. 502: "The action of ejectment determines no rights but those of present possession; and that one tenant in common has such right as against all parties but his co-tenants, or persons holding under them, is not questioned." That a tenant in common may sue without joining the other tenants in common is also held as late as 1898, when the Supreme Court of the United States quotes approvingly from Davis v. Coblenz, 12 D. C. App. 51, 61, as follows, to wit: "The original rule at common law was that tenants in common could only sue separately, because they were separately seized, and there was no privity of estate between them. Mobley v. Bruner, 59 Pa. 481, 98 Am. Dec. 360; Corbin v. Cannon, 31 Miss. 570, 572; May v. Slade, 24 Tex. 205, 207; 4 Kent Com. 368. * * * The practice soon became general, however, in the United States to permit them to sue either jointly or severally as they might elect. 7 Ency. P. & P. 316, and cases cited. This seems to have been the practice in the District of Columbia, and, so far as we are advised, has never been questioned. Tenants in common may join in an action if they prefer to do so, but it is with the risk of the failure of all if one of them fail to make out a title or right to possession." And the Supreme Court adds to this quotation the words: "These remarks express the rule correctly." Davis v. Coblens, 174 U. S. 719, 19 Sup. Ct. 832, 43 L. Ed. 1147. The law is also laid down in 15 Cyc. 8 to be that it is not necessary that all the tenants in common should unite in the action, although they may join in it for their common estate.

2. We will now consider the agreement in writing signed by Otero and Sena y Baca, on which this controversy is largely based, to determine whether it is a deed or an agreement to convey, for the decision of this point is of vital importance to the parties to this case. From the standpoint of performance contracts have been divided into two classes—executed and executory. "A contract is executed where everything that was to be done is done, and nothing remains to be done. A grant actually made is within this category. Such a contract requires no consideration to support it. A gift consummated is as valid in law as anything else. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 513, 4 L. Ed. 629. An executory contract is one where it is stipulated by the agreement of minds upon a sufficient consideration that something is to be done or not to be done by one or both of the parties. Only a slight consideration is necessary. Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr, 1663; Forth v. Stanton, 1 Saund. 210, note 2, and the cases there cited." Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 24 L. Ed. 558. An examination of the contract or agreement entered into between Otero and Sena y Baca, and which is set out in full in the statement of facts preceding this opinion, convinces us that it was an executory contract (although it contains words of present purchase and sale), for the conveyance of the Galisteo ranch by Otero to Sena y Baca depends upon the happening of a certain contingency, viz., the adjudication and approval of the Bartolome Baca grant. The wording of the contract provided that Sena y Baca could take possession of the Galisteo ranch and enjoy the products of the same until the proper documents were executed to convey the title to him, which documents were to be executed on the favorable adjudication and approval (confirmation) of the Bartolome Baca grant. The wording of the agreement is unequivocal and plain that the deed of conveyance to the Galisteo ranch was to be made when the Bartolome Baca grant was favorably adjudicated and approved. Nor can it be contended that the contract of June 22, 1878, was a deed, for it is signed by both Otero and Sena y Baca, and not alone by Otero, the then owner of the Galisteo ranch. If the instrument in question had been signed by Otero alone, there would have been more force than now exists in the contention of the appellants that it was a deed transferring the title to real estate, rather than a mere agreement to execute deeds to convey on the happening of certain events. Another thing which leads us to conclude that the writing was an executory contract, and not a deed, is that it is not acknowledged before any officer having the power to take acknowledgments to deeds, nor before any one, and as long ago as 1852 our Legislature passed an act which was approved on January 12th of that year which provided in section 5 that "every instrument in writing by which real estate is transferred or affected, in law or equity, shall be acknowledged and certified to in the manner herein-after prescribed." Laws 1851-52, p. 374. Section 6 of the same act sets out the officers before whom such acknowledgments might be taken. This law was in force at the time of the signing of the agreement or contract on June 22, 1878, and must have been known to the parties who signed it, for the evidence discloses that one of them at least was a man of affairs, and one who was familiar with the working of the legislative bodies of the territory. In arriving at a conclusion as to whether or not the writing which is the basis of this controversy is a deed or contract, we must consider it as an entirety. We cannot pick out a few words or a line here and there, and determine from them what it is. As the Supreme Court of the United States says: "We agree generally that although there are words of conveyance in present in a contract for the purchase and sale of lands, still, if from the whole instrument it is manifest that further conveyances were contemplated by the parties, it will be considered an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance. The whole question is one of intention to be gathered from the instrument itself. Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 26; Ogden v. Brown, 33 Pa. 247; Phillips v. Swank, 120 Pa. 76, 13 Atl. 712, 6 Am. St. Rep. 691; Williams v. Paine, 169 U. S. 55, 18 Sup. Ct. 279, 42 L. Ed. 658." We have gone over the written instrument dated June 22, 1878, very carefully, and have come to the conclusion that it is not and was not intended to be a deed for the conveyance of the Galisteo ranch, but that it was an executory contract, by the terms of which a deed for its conveyance was to be delivered by Manuel Antonio Otero to Jesus Sena y Baca, on the favorable adjudication and confirmation of the Bartolome Baca grant. As the Bartolome Baca grant was finally rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States, no necessity arose for Otero or his heirs to give deeds of conveyance for the Galisteo ranch.

3. Holding that the instrument in writing under which Sena y Baca took possession of the Galisteo ranch and held the same was an executory contract, we must determine the nature of the possession of the said ranch by Sena y Baca and his successors in title, with the view of determining whether or not title has been acquired by adverse possession.

The evidence in this case discloses that Sena y Baca in obtaining the confirmation of the Gallisteo grant deraigned his title through Manuel Antonio Otero by virtue of the executory contract, and thus recognized the title of his vendor to the premises. No claim was made by the defendants that their title arose from any other source. Sena y Baca then entered into the possession of the lands in controversy by virtue of the contract, and with the permission of Manuel Antonio Otero, and it is generally held that a possession by permission or license from the owner is not adverse and cannot ripen into title, no matter how long continued or however exclusive it may be. 1 Cyc. 1030, and cases cited in note 66, from 27 states, and from England, Canada, and the Supreme Court of the United States. The possession of the occupant under such circumstances is considered as the possession of him upon whose pleasure it continues. Pulaski County v. State, 42 Ark. 118, and again in 1 Cyc. 1044, the rule is stated to be, and many cases are cited in its support, that, "where one enters into and holds possession of lands under an executory contract of purchase or bond for title, the entry and possession are in subordination to the title of the vendor until payment or performance of all the conditions by the vendee, or until the vendee has distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of his vendor, which repudiation is brought expressly or by legal implication to the vendor's knowledge." The reason for this rule forbidding a person who has gone into possession under a contract to purchase is the injustice of allowing a person who has obtained possession by admitting title of another, to enjoy that title, and, in case of failure of proof of it, hold the premises himself. Howard v. McKenzie, 54 Tex. 171; Kirk v. Taylor, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 262; McKelvain v. Allen, 58 Tex. 383; Clouse v. Elliott, 71 Ind. 302. The evidence in this case nowhere discloses that Sena y Baca, or his assigns, ever distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of Manuel Antonio Otero. When Sena y Baca disposed of whatever title he had in the Gallisteo ranch to Rumberg, he did so by a quitclaim deed, and handed Rumberg the executory contract which he had in his possession, and this contract appears to have always been given to the occupants of the real estate in controversy down to the present day, for we find it in the possession of the defendants when this suit is brought, and it is introduced by them in evidence to support their claim that they own the property in fee.

We are aware that many points are raised in the briefs of both appellants and the appellees which we have not discussed; but, as before stated, under the view which we have taken of this case, we do not think that it is necessary for us to discuss or determine them, and we therefore refrain from so doing, although we have read and considered them with much care.

Finding no reversible error in the judgment of the court below, the same is therefore affirmed; and it is so ordered.

POPE, PARKER, and ABBOTT, JJ., concur. McFIE, J., having heard a part of this case below, and MANN, J., having decided the case below, took no part in this decision.

VALLEY LUMBER & MFG. CO. v. DRIESSEL et al.

(Supreme Court of Idaho, Dec. 7, 1907. On Rehearing, Jan. 22, 1908.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—TIME FOR FILING—SEPARATE CONTRACTS—KNOWLEDGE BY SUB-CONTRACTOR.

D. contracted with M. to construct a dwelling house, and M. contracted with the V. L. Company to furnish the material, which it did, and M. completed the dwelling on the 16th day of January, 1905. Thereafter, on the 13th day of March, 1905, D. contracted with M. to erect a porch to said dwelling, and M. on that day ordered lumber for said porch from the V. L. Company, which was furnished by them, the last of it being furnished on the 15th of March, 1905. Thereafter, on the 11th day of May, 1905, the V. L. Company filed its materialman's lien on said premises. Held, that the erection of the dwelling and the porch was done under separate contracts, but it is not shown by the evidence that the V. L. Company had notice or knowledge that said dwelling and porch were erected under separate contracts, and for that reason held that the V. L. Company's lien was filed in time.

2. SAME.

A materialman who furnishes material for the erection of a building under two separate contracts, and has knowledge of such contracts, cannot tack one contract to the other by filing his claim of lien within the required time from the date of furnishing material pursuant to one of the contracts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 202, 203.]

3. SAME.

The time for filing a lien cannot be extended by furnishing on a new contract or request additional articles, and adding them to a completed account and statement of material furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 202, 203.]

4. SAME.

Where materials are furnished for the same building or improvement in installments and at intervals, and the parties intend them to be included in one account and settlement, the entire account will be treated as a continuous and connected transaction, and the time in which to file the lien begins to run from the date of the last item of the account.

5. CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—PLEADING—FOREIGN CORPORATION—COMPLIANCE WITH LAW—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Under the laws of this state, a foreign corporation, in order to maintain an action in the courts of this state, must allege a compliance with the Constitution and statutes in regard to designating an agent upon whom service of process may be had, and in filing its articles of incorporation as required by law, and a complaint by such corporation that fails to allege such facts is subject to demurrer. However, the defendant will waive the question of noncompliance if he fails to raise the same by demurrer or answer, and cannot raise it for the first time in the appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 2647.]

6. SAME.

The case of Katz v. Herrick, 12 Idaho, 1, 86 Pac. 873, cited and approved.

7. PLEADING — DEMURRER — GROUNDS OF — STATEMENT.

Section 4174, Rev. St. 1887, provides that a defendant may demur to the complaint on seven separate and distinct grounds, the second being "that plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue"; and the sixth is "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The clear intent of the provisions of that section is, if one desires to demur to a complaint on the ground that the plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue, he must so state in his demurrer, and cannot raise the question of the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action.

8. SAME.

A cause of action may exist in favor of a corporation or person who has not the capacity to sue, and an action brought by such person or corporation on a complaint alleging a good cause of action would not be obnoxious to a demurrer on the ground that it does not state a cause of action.

9. SAME—DEFECTS IN COMPLAINT—WAIVER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

If, as in the case at bar, a foreign corporation fails to allege its compliance with the domestic law, the complaint is demurrable on the ground that it fails to allege the capacity of the plaintiff to sue. The objection on that ground may also be taken by answer under the provisions of section 4177, Rev. St. 1887. Under the provisions of section 4178, Rev. St. 1887, if no objection to the complaint is taken either by demurrer or answer, the defendant is deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

10. SAME.

Where the complaint on its face shows the want of capacity of the plaintiff to sue, the question of want of capacity cannot be raised by demurrer on the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

11. SAME.

A corporation or individual may have a good cause of action and still have no capacity to sue, and may have a capacity to sue, and no cause of action.

12. SAME.

The demurrer must be confined to the specific grounds stated therein.

13. SAME.

Held, that the question of the capacity of the respondent to sue was not raised in the court below by demurrer or answer, and for that reason was waived.

On Petition for Rehearing.

14. MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a defendant seeks to defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by showing that the material was furnished on two separate and distinct contracts, and that the lien was therefore not filed in time to secure the claim for the material furnished on the first contract, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show either that the plaintiff had actual notice that the material was furnished and used on two separate contracts or else show such circumstances as would impute to plaintiff constructive notice, and put him on his inquiry to ascertain that two or more contracts did in fact exist.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Nez Perce County; Edgar C. Steele, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by the Valley Lumber & Manufacturing Company against John Driessel, administrator, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. L. McDonald, for appellants. C. H. Lingenfelter, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This is an action brought to foreclose a materialman's lien under the provisions of the mechanic's lien law of this state. One Driessel was the owner of the premises, and contracted with one Morrison for the construction of a dwelling house on the premises described in the complaint. It is alleged in the amended complaint that the plaintiff, who is respondent here, is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Washington, and doing business in the town of Lewiston, Idaho; that said Driessel is the owner of the premises described in the complaint, and that the defendant Morrison was the contractor and agent of Driessel, and as such agent entered into a contract with the respondent, whereby it was to furnish the material for the construction of a certain dwelling house; that the respondent furnished the material between the 23d day of November, 1904, and the 15th day of March, 1905, which material was actually used in the construction of said building of the agreed value of $552.47; that there was thereafter paid on said account $300.98, leaving a balance due of $251.49, together with interest thereon, and that the plaintiff within 60 days from March 15, 1905, the date of furnishing the last item of said lumber, duly filed its claim of lien on the 11th day of May, 1905, in the office of the recorder of Nez Perce county. The defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled by the court. They thereafter filed a joint answer, denying the material allegations of the complaint, except the corporate existence of the plaintiff, and admitted that Driessel was the owner of the premises described in the complaint. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the respondent. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

It appears from the testimony in the case that there were two contracts entered into between Morrison and Driessel. The first was for the building and construction of a dwelling house, which was completed on January 16, 1905, and the respondent rendered him a bill or a statement on the 20th of January for all the lumber that he had used in the construction of said dwelling house. It also appears from the record that Driessel rented the house before or about the time it was completed, and the tenants took possession thereof. Thereafter they desired a porch built on to said house, and it would appear that they expressed their desire to Driessel and he consented to have a porch built, and on the 13th of March, 1905, 59 days after the delivery of the last item of material under the first contract, he entered into another contract with Morrison for the construction of said porch, and on that date Morrison ordered the lumber for its construction from the respondent, to the amount of about $25, and the respondent furnished the lumber for said porch on the 13th and 15th days of March. The respondent filed its materialman's lien on the 11th day of May, 1905, 57 days after furnishing the last material for the porch.

It is first contended by counsel for appellant that as there were two separate contracts, one for the construction of the house and the other for the construction of the porch, that said contracts had no connection with each other and were entirely separate and severable, and that the last one cannot be tacked on to the first and thus keep alive the materialman's lien for the material furnished for the construction of the house for more than 60 days after its completion under the first contract. The evidence shows beyond a doubt that the house was constructed under one contract and the porch under another and separate contract. It also shows that the house was completed about the 16th day of January, 1905, and that the owner leased the house about the time of its completion and the tenants took possession. It also appears that the owner lived in Genessee, Latah county; that he went to Lewiston on the 13th of March, and his tenants persuaded him to have said porch constructed, and on that date he made a contract with the appellant Morrison to erect said porch. The contract for the porch was not made until about 59 days after the respondent had furnished the last material for the construction of the house. The court in its findings of fact virtually finds that the house and porch were constructed under one contract, but that finding is not supported by the evidence. The secretary of the respondent company testified that he did not know the house was completed on or about the 16th day of January, but his testimony is not very clear on that point. He testified, further, that Morrison told him that he put the lumber furnished on the 13th and 15th of March into the porch; while Morrison swears positively that the house was built under one contract and the porch under another and separate contract. The fact that the respondent furnished Morrison with an itemized statement of all the lumber furnished for the construction of the house on the 20th of January, 1905, is very suggestive of the fact that the respondent was informed that the building was completed, as Morrison testified on the completion of a building the company furnished him an itemized statement of the material furnished, and that he checked it over to ascertain whether or not it was correct, but does not testify that he informed respondent that the contract was completed, or that it had knowledge of that fact. There is no positive testimony in the record showing that the respondent had information that the house and the porch were constructed under separate contracts. The circumstance of respondent's furnishing an itemized statement of the lumber used in the construction of the house, to say the least, is suggestive and significant. If the record showed that the respondent had such information, the rule laid down in Central Loan & Trust Co. v. O'Sullivan, 44 Neb. 834, 63 N. W. 5, would apply. In that opinion the court said: "A materialman cannot tack one contract to another so as to procure a lien for all the materials furnished under separate contracts by filing his claim within the required time from the date of furnishing material pursuant to one contract." And in Schulenburg v. Vrooman, 7 Mo. App. 133, the court said: "Where all the items of an account except the last few were supplied under one contract and that contract was executed and the transaction closed, held, that the time for filing a lien could not be extended by furnishing on a new request additional articles and adding them to the completed account." On this point, see, also, Fay v. Muhler, 1 Misc. Rep. 321, 20 N. Y. Supp. 671; Scott v. Cook, 8 Mo. App. 193; Sanford v. Frost, 41 Conn. 617; Frankoviz v. Smith, 34 Minn. 403, 26 N. W. 225.

It is contended by counsel for respondent that it had no knowledge that Morrison and Driessel had one contract for the house and one for the porch, and that the contract, so far as it was concerned, was continuous and entire, and the time within which to file a lien dated from the date of the last item of material furnished. That, no doubt, was the theory upon which the trial court rendered its decision. Among other authorities cited by respondent is the case of Darlington Lumber Co. v. Harris, 107 Mo. App. 148, 80 S. W. 688. In that case the company and one Taylor agreed to the estimate of the lumber to be used in the Harris building. Considerable extra lumber was furnished all along during the continuance of the original contract, and the undisputed testimony showed that the lumber was ordered for the extra work for which Taylor had a separate bid; that the respondent company had no fresh arrangement with him, and knew nothing about there being another contract between Taylor and Harris, or that they were furnishing material for a job to be done under a separate contract. The court said: "The interval between October 25th, when the last item was furnished for the completion of the original plan, and December 10th, when the lumber for the extras was sold, was too short a time to affect respondent with constructive notice of Taylor's new arrangement with Harris." That decision, no doubt, would have been different had the court found that Taylor had entered into a separate contract with Harris for doing a part of the work in the construction of said building, and the materialman had notice of that fact. Where materials are furnished for the same building or improvement in installments and at intervals, and the parties intend them to be included in one account in settlement, the entire account will be treated as a continuous and connected transaction, and the lien limitation begins to run from the last item of the account. Jones & Magee Lumber Co. v. Murphy, 64 Iowa, 105, 19 N. W. 808; Darlington Lumber Co. v. Harris, supra; Lumber v. Myers, 87 Mo. App. 671. But, where there are two separate and distinct contracts for the erection of a building and the materialman knows that there are two contracts, he cannot tack the last contract to the first so as to procure a lien for all the materials furnished under the separate contracts where the time had expired for filing a lien for the material furnished under the first contract. While there are some facts and circumstances tending to show that the respondent had notice of the two contracts referred to in this case, the evidence is not such as to warrant the reversal of the judgment on the ground that the respondent knew or had notice of those two contracts. The fact as to whether the respondent had information that the porch was built under a separate contract was within the possession and knowledge of the appellants, and they should have proved that fact by a preponderance of the evidence if they relied upon it, which they failed to do.

The question whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action, it being a foreign corporation, is raised by the record. The paragraph of the complaint alleging the corporate existence of the respondent is as follows: "That the plaintiff is and was at all the times herein mentioned a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Washington, with its principal place of business at Clarkston, Wash., and doing business at Lewiston, Idaho." It will be observed that it is not alleged that the plaintiff had complied with the provisions of section 10 of article 11, of the state Constitution in designating an agent upon whom process may be served; and with the provisions of section 2653 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, as amended by the Laws of 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 49), which provides that a foreign corporation shall file with the county recorder of the county in this state, in which is designated its principal place of business in the state, a copy of the articles of incorporation of said corporation, duly certified by the Secretary of State of the state in which said corporation was organized, and a copy of such articles of incorporation duly certified by the county recorder with the Secretary of State. It is contended that the allegations of said complaint places the respondent in the status of an individual whose contracts and dealings in this state are absolutely void, unless it affirmatively appears that it has complied with the above-mentioned provisions of our statute and Constitution. The question presented may be stated as follows: When it appears from the complaint that the plaintiff is a foreign corporation, whether the fact of its not having complied with the laws of this state in reference to designating an agent and filing its articles of incorporation is a matter of defense to be pleaded affirmatively in the answer and proven by the defendant, or whether the plaintiff has affirmatively placed itself in a position so that it is incumbent upon it to allege and prove that it has complied with the laws of this state, and is entitled to do business in the state or maintain an action in its courts.

Counsel for the respondent contends that the right of the plaintiff to do business in this state is not disputed by the pleadings; that the defendant, neither by demurrer nor answer, questioned the authority of the company to do business in this state nor to maintain this action, and that that question could only be raised by demurrer or answer, and, if not so raised, it is waived, and cites in support of that contention Ontario State Bank v. Tibbits, 80 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 86; Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. 313, 15 Pac. 451; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Purcell, 77 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 886-889; Dahl v. Montana Copper Co., 132 U. S. 204, 10 Sup. Ct. 97, 33 L. Ed. 825; Wetzel & T. R. Co. v. Tennis Bros. Co., 145 Fed. 458, 75 C. C. A. 208. The first case above cited, the Ontario Bank v. Tibbits, involved the foreclosure of a mortgage by a corporation, and the court there held that the complaint did not show that the plaintiff had complied with the provisions of section 209, Civ. Code Cal., requiring foreign corporations to file their articles of incorporation and designate an agent upon whom process could be served, and could not maintain an action or proceeding in relation to property owned by it in such county "until such articles of incorporation shall be filed in the place directed by the general law and by the provisions of that section." The court there said, in considering that section of the statute: "The failure of the plaintiff to file a copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk, being mere matter of abatement, should be specially pleaded by the defendants; otherwise, it was waived." Said section 209 is different from the provisions of our own statute, in that it does not make it unlawful for a foreign corporation to acquire property in the counties of that state, but it provides that they must file their articles of incorporation within 50 days after the purchase, and it also further differs from our provisions of the statute, in that it provides that such corporation shall not maintain any action or proceeding until their articles of incorporation have been filed as provided by law. Under the provisions of that section, a corporation that had failed to comply with the law in regard to filing its articles of incorporation could begin an action, and the day before the action was tried might file its articles of incorporation, and thereby have the right to maintain said action. Under the provisions of our Constitution and law, it was held in the case of Katz v. Herrick, 12 Idaho, 1, 86 Pac. 873, that foreign corporations which had failed to comply with the Constitution and law in regard to designating an agent upon whom process may be served, and filing its articles of incorporation with the county recorder and Secretary of State, cannot maintain an action on a contract made prior to their compliance with the law, and for that reason the California citations are not in point, as a compliance with the law, after an action is commenced, would not remove the disability in this state as it does under the California statute. The case of Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. 313, 15 Pac. 451, involves the failure of a partnership to file a certificate of partnership as provided by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of California, which sections attach a legal incapacity to maintain an action upon a contract made or a transaction had in the partnership name on a failure to file such certificate, and the court there held that the objection that no such certificate had been filed must be taken by answer; otherwise, under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 434, it was waived. In the case of Southern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Purcell, supra, which was a case under section 299 of the Civil Code of California, above referred to, the court held that the noncompliance of the railway corporation to file its articles of incorporation should be raised by answer, and, unless specifically set up therein, want of proof of noncompliance with that law was not fatal to the verdict. In the case of Wetzel & T. R. Co. v. Tennis Bros. Co., supra, decided by the Supreme Court of West Virginia, it was there held under the provisions of the Code of that state, providing that a foreign corporation not having complied with the laws of the state shall not be entitled to maintain any action in the courts of that state, that the failure of a foreign corporation, plaintiff, to so qualify, may be pleaded in abatement in any action, suit, or proceeding. The court held that such failure was a matter which the defendant was entitled to raise or waive at its election. In Dahl v. Montana Copper Co., 132 U. S. 264, 10 Sup. Ct. 97, 33 L. Ed. 325, which is a case from the Supreme Court of Montana, taken by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, the plaintiff alleged in its complaint that it was a corporation created under the laws of the state of New York, doing business in Silver Bow county, in the territory of Montana. It will be observed that that allegation is very much like the allegation of the complaint in this case in regard to the corporate capacity of the plaintiff. In that case the answer of the defendant did not deny the incorporation of the plaintiff or its right to do business in Silver Bow county, but only its ownership of the mining claim involved. Justice Field in the opinion in that case stated, among other things, as follows: "No question is therefore raised on the pleadings as to its competency to do business within the territory for want of compliance with the provisions of the territorial law. The question at issue on the pleadings and on the trial in the court below was confined to the ownership of the mining ground. Without, therefore, considering the validity and force of the provisions of that law * * * or whether, if they are valid, any parties except the government of the territory can allege a disregard of them to defeat the title of the corporation to its property (Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 10 Sup. Ct. 93, 33 L. Ed. 317), it is sufficient in this case to say that such incompetency cannot be considered unless set up in the pleadings in the court below. A failure to comply with the provisions of the law will not be presumed in the absence of any allegation on the subject. The objection cannot be urged for the first time in this court." As we understand that decision, the Supreme Court of the United States holds the question of noncompliance by a foreign corporation with the laws of the domestic state must be raised by demurrer or answer in the trial court, and cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court. In Welsbach Co. v. Norwich Gas & Electric Co., 96 App. Div. 52, 89 N. Y. Supp. 284, the court holds under the general corporation laws of the state of New York, providing that no foreign corporation shall maintain an action in the state on any contract made by it in the state, unless it has procured a certificate from the Secretary of State entitling it to do business in the state; that the procuring of the certificate is a condition precedent which must be averred in the complaint. In that case it appeared from the complaint that the plaintiff was within the category of those parties who must procure the certificate before they make the contract in order to sustain an action thereon. The court said: "The intent that the procurement of such certificate before the contract was made shall be a condition precedent to the maintaining an action thereon is as plain as any language could make it—certainly as plain as is the language in the Buffalo charter above referred to—and hence, being a condition precedent, it is a fact necessary to be proven, and therefore necessary to be alleged, within the authority of the above case." The court quoted from the Reining Case as follows: "It is competent for them [the Legislature] to attach a condition to the maintenance of a common-law action, as well as one created by statute; and, when they have done so, its averment and proof cannot safely be omitted." It further said: "It is to be noticed that by the amendment of 1901 the enforcement of a contract made by a foreign corporation before it has obtained the required certificate is entirely abrogated. It is made incapable of enforcement because of the omission to procure the certificate before the contract was made." The demurrer in that case was sustained, and the decision was based upon the theory that the complaint should have contained an averment that such certificate had been procured before the making of the contracts which were the basis of the action. That decision was by the appellate division of the Supreme Court of the state of New York, and on appeal the case was taken to the Court of Appeals. See 72 N. E. 1152. It appears from the short opinion by the Appellate Court that there were two questions certified to it for decision, to wit: (1) "Was the complaint demurrable on the ground that it appeared upon the face thereof that the plaintiff did not have the legal capacity to sue? (2) Was the complaint demurrable on the ground that facts are not therein stated sufficient to constitute a cause of action?" Both of said questions were answered in the affirmative by the Court of Appeals. There the question of the corporation's capacity to sue was directly raised by the demurrer upon the ground that it appeared upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff did not have legal capacity to sue. In the case of Cumberland Land Co. v. Canter Lumber Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 35 S. W. 886, the court held that a bill by a foreign corporation doing business in the state of Tennessee should be dismissed; it not being alleged that it had complied with the statute as to filing charter and registering abstract of the same. In that case the court said: "With respect to the first error assigned by the defendants, it is proper to state that in our opinion it should be sustained. It is true the point was not made in the court below, nor does it appear in the evidence, that the complainant had failed to file its charter, and have an abstract thereof registered, as required by our statutes. But it does appear that it is a foreign corporation, and that it was doing business in this state. This being so, in order to obtain any relief in any of the courts of this state, it was incumbent on complainant to show affirmatively that it had complied with our statutes, on a compliance with which it was alone authorized to do business here."

Thus it will be observed that one line of the above-cited authorities hold that noncompliance with the law of the domestic state is a matter of defense to be pleaded affirmatively by the defendant in his answer. The statutes upon which that line of decisions rest are construed by those courts to mean that a failure of a corporation to comply with the statutory conditions upon which it may enter a state and do business does not operate to render its contracts wholly void, but merely operates to suspend the remedy of such corporation in the courts of the state where such contracts are made until it shall have complied with the statutory conditions. Such are the decisions of California. The second line of decisions requires the foreign corporation to affirmatively allege and prove its compliance with the statutory requirements of the domestic state, and is based upon a construction of their statutes that makes compliance with the terms thereof a condition precedent to the right to maintain the action in the courts of the domestic state. Other authorities hold, as did the Supreme Court of the United States in Dahl v. Montana Copper Co., supra, that the incompetency of a foreign corporation to sue cannot be considered unless set up in the pleadings in the court below, and that a failure to comply with the provisions of the law will not be presumed in the absence of any allegation on the subject, and that objection cannot be first urged in the appellate court. It therefore remains for this state to adopt one or the other line of those authorities as the rule governing such actions in this state.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that this court held in the case of Katz v. Herrick, 12 Idaho, 1, 86 Pac. 873, that contracts of a noncomplying foreign corporation were illegal and void. Counsel evidently misapprehended the effect of that decision. The court there held that the noncomplying foreign corporation had no legal existence in this state, and, under the law, was without a remedy for the enforcement of any contracts made by it within the state, but did not hold that its contracts were absolutely void. In the course of that opinion the court said: "Courts of equity are always able to protect innocent and honest persons in legitimate transactions, and we are satisfied that the courts of this state can and will protect all persons who have had honest dealings with noncomplying foreign corporations where they deserve protection." The court did not hold in that case that such contracts were absolutely void, but held that such contracts were not enforceable in the courts of this state by a noncomplying corporation. If a foreign corporation fails or neglects to allege in its complaint that it has complied with the laws of this state, in regard to designating an agent upon whom service may be had, and filing its articles of incorporation, it is demurrable on the ground that it fails to allege its legal capacity to sue; for, after alleging that it is a foreign corporation, it then places itself in the category of a plaintiff, who cannot maintain a suit in this state without alleging that it has complied with the law that must be complied with before such corporation can maintain an action. The failure of a foreign corporation to comply with the law of the state before it may maintain an action goes to its capacity to sue; that is, unless it complies with the law, it has no capacity to sue. A corporation or an individual may have a good cause of action and still have not the capacity to sue; and may have capacity to sue and no cause of action. Pratt v. N. P. Ry. Co (Idaho) 90 Pac. 341, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 499. If it merely alleges that it is a foreign corporation, and fails to allege its capacity to sue by alleging that it has complied with the law of the state, the complaint is demurrable on the ground of want of legal capacity to sue. Section 4174 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 provides seven grounds of demurrer, and the second ground is "that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue." It was evidently intended by the Legislature that the specific grounds of demurrer to a complaint must be stated in the demurrer. The only ground of demurrer stated in the demurrer to this complaint is the failure to allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which is the sixth ground of demurrer provided in said section 4174. Under that ground of demurrer; neither of the other specific grounds of demurrer can be considered. Suffice it to say in this case that neither the demurrer nor the answer raised the question of the want of the respondent's capacity to sue. That question might have been raised by either demurrer or answer. Section 4175 declares that the demurrer must distinctly specify the grounds on which any of the objections to the complaint are taken, and that unless it does so, the demurrer must be disregarded. Section 4177 provides that, whenever any of the matters enumerated in section 4174 do not appear on the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer. Thus, under the law of this state, the question of the want of capacity of the respondent to sue could have been raised by demurrer or answer. That being true, and the appellants having failed to raise the question, we think that they have waived it. Section 4178 provides that, if no objection is taken either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only to the jurisdiction of the court and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We are therefore of the opinion that, where objections may be taken to allegations of the complaint by either demurrer or answer, if they are not so taken, they are waived as provided in said section 4178. We therefore hold with that line of authorities which holds that, unless the fact of the compliance of a foreign corporation with our state law is put in issue by a demurrer to the complaint or by answer, it is waived. In the case at bar the only ground stated in the demurrer was that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It therefore did not raise the question of the capacity of the respondent to sue, and that question was not raised by the answer, and was therefore waived. We therefore hold that the question of the capacity of the respondent to sue was waived on the trial; and that it is too late to raise it on appeal.

From the foregoing we conclude that the judgment of the lower court must be sustained; and it is so ordered, with costs in favor of the respondent.

On Petition for Rehearing.

AILSHIE, C. J. Appellants have filed a petition for rehearing, and insist that, since the court in the original opinion held that there was no evidence in the record to support the finding made by the trial court to the effect that the house and porch were constructed under one and the same contract, the findings are therefore necessarily rendered insufficient to support the judgment. In order for the plaintiff to recover, it was necessary for it to establish that it furnished the material to the contractor under one continuous contract with him, and that the lien was filed within the statutory time after furnishing the material. It is possible for this to be true, and still two or more contracts to have been made and to have existed between the owner of the building and the contractor or builder. Now, in so far as this finding has reference to the contract or contracts between the owner of the premises and the contractor, it is not supported by the evidence for the reason that the evidence clearly shows that there was one contract for the main building and another and separate contract for the porch. On the other hand, in so far as the finding had reference to the contract between the builder and the company furnishing the material, we hold that the finding is supported by the evidence. In this view of the case, the findings are still sufficient to support the judgment.

But the appellants insist that, as soon as they succeeded in establishing the fact that the material furnished was used by the contractor upon two separate and distinct contracts which he had with the owner of the building and premises, they then shifted the burden of showing want of knowledge that two separate contracts existed onto the materialman, the respondent in this case. We do not think that would be a correct view to take of the law or the proper practice to adopt. When the plaintiff, who is seeking to foreclose his lien, establishes the fact that he furnished the material to the contractor under one arrangement and contract with him, and has presented sufficient evidence to make his case on that theory, then, if the defendant seeks to defeat the right of recovery on the ground that there were two separate and distinct contracts, after showing their existence, he should be required to either show that the materialman had actual knowledge that two contracts existed, or else prove such facts and circumstances either by way of lapse of time, cessation of work, occupation of the building and premises by the owner, settlement of accounts, or other circumstances that would amount to constructive notice to the materialman, and put him on his inquiry to ascertain that two contracts did in fact exist. In this case, as said in the original opinion, there are a number of circumstances which tend to show that the plaintiff had notice of the completion of the original contract, and that another contract had been entered into between the owner and the builder; but the court found, in substance, against the appellants' contention and in favor of the respondent, and we would not be justified under the evidence as disclosed in interfering with that finding.

Appellants urge that they ought to be granted a new trial in order to enable them to establish the fact that the lumber company had actual notice of the completion of the contract and the making of the second contract. We are unable, however, to find anything in the record that would justify us in doing so. The court seems to have admitted all the evidence that appellants offered tending to establish the fact that the company had notice. There is nothing in the record which indicates or tends to indicate that the appellants could make any stronger case on that issue than they have already made. We do not find anything in the petition which changes our view of the case, or that would justify us in granting a rehearing. The petition is denied.

YOUNG v. EXTENSION DITCH CO.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. COSTS—ON APPEAL—PREVAILING OR SUCCESSFUL PARTY—REPORTER'S FEE.

Under the rules of this court and the provisions of section 5 of an act providing for the appointment of stenographic reporters of the district court, approved February 9, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 163), the statutory fee paid by a party to an action to the reporter for a transcript of the evidence to be used on motion for a new trial and appeal may be taxed as costs against the party finally defeated on appeal.

2. SAME.

The general theory of our law and the rules of the court in regard to costs is that the losing party shall pay them; and the prevailing party, on appeal, is entitled to recover the amount paid by him to the reporter for a copy of the evidence whenever that is needed on appeal. McDonald v. Burke, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 266, 28 Pac. 440, 35 Am. St. Rep. 276, cited and approved.

3. SAME.

In the passage of said act, approved February 9, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 163), the legislative intent was not to amend either of the several provisions of the Revised Statutes in regard to the losing party paying the costs necessarily incurred in the proceedings in which such costs are made.

4. SAME.

Only necessary costs and disbursements can be recovered. The general rule is that the party who wins on appeal is entitled to recover his necessary costs and disbursements on such appeal, although the case finally goes against him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, §§ 869-876.]

5. SAME—PRINTING BRIEF.

Under the provisions of rule 6 of the rules of this court (32 Pac. vi), 40 pages of printed brief may be allowed and taxed as costs on appeal, and under paragraph 3 of rule 8 (32 Pac. viii), the expense of printing the transcript on appeal in civil cases must be allowed as costs.

6. SAME—MAPS.

Under paragraph 6 of rule 27 (32 Pac. xi), maps used on the hearing and necessary to be examined on the appeal form a part of the transcript, and copies thereof must be attached thereto, and the necessary expense of making the same may be taxed as costs on the appeal.

7. SAME.

Under the provisions of rule 19 (32 Pac. ix), the judge may order the transmission of maps and other original papers to the Supreme Court for its inspection, and that method of presenting maps ought to be pursued whenever practicable, and thus save costs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Canyon County; Ed. L. Bryan, Judge.

Action by Lee Young against the Extension Ditch Company. A judgment for plaintiff having been reduced on appeal (89 Pac. 296) by defendant, on the filing of a remittitur, plaintiff moved to strike out certain items of the cost bill filed by defendant, and from an order refusing to strike those items plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stone & McLane, for appellant. Richards & Haga, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This action was before this court at its February term, 1907, on an appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. 13 Idaho, 174, 89 Pac. 296. The judgment appealed from was for $1,750. This court reduced that judgment $750, leaving the judgment $1,000. When the remittitur was filed in the lower court, the respondent here, who was appellant on the first appeal, filed a memorandum of costs of appeal that included, among other items, one of $130 paid the stenographic court reporter for a transcript of the evidence used in preparing his statement on motion for a new trial and on appeal, and an item of $20 paid for prints of exhibits of maps for use on appeal. This appellant, who was respondent on the former appeal, moved to tax the costs by striking out those two items and certain others from the cost bill. The motion was denied as to said two items. This appeal is from the order of the court refusing to strike out those two items.

We will first consider the item of $130 paid the court reporter for the transcript of the evidence. Under the provisions of section 5 of an act entitled, "An act to provide for the appointment, duties and compensation of stenographic reporters of the district courts," approved February 9, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 163), it is made the duty of such reporters to furnish, on the application of the Attorney General, district attorney, or any party to a suit in which a stenographic record has been made, a typewritten copy of the record, or any part thereof, for which he shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his salary, a fee of 15 cents per hundred words, to be paid by the party requesting the same, and to be taxed as costs in the case against the party finally defeated in the action. The act of 1899 was again amended in 1907. Sess. Laws 1907, p. 542. However, the amendment of 1907 does not apply to this case.

It is most earnestly contended that, although the respondent won on the former appeal and succeeded in having the judgment reduced nearly one-half, he must nevertheless pay the stenographer for a transcript of the evidence that was used in the preparation of the transcript on appeal, because he was finally defeated in the action. He was compelled to take the appeal to protect his rights, and succeeded in reducing the judgment $750. It was necessary for him to have a transcript of the reporter's notes in order to prepare his transcript on appeal. As he was successful in that proceeding, at least to a certain extent, he is entitled to recover his costs on such appeal, and a part of those costs were $130 paid for a transcript of the reporter's notes. We think the provision of said section 5 of the act referred to contemplates that the cost of the reporter's notes shall be taxed against the defeated party in the proceeding in which they are used. To illustrate: If a plaintiff procure judgment for $5,000 against a defendant, and the defendant appeals, and in order to prepare his transcript on appeal it is necessary for him to procure a copy of the reporter's notes, and he pays therefor, and on the appeal reduces the judgment to $500, that is a final determination of that action on that appeal, and appellant is entitled to recover of the respondent the amount paid for the reporter's notes. The general theory of our law in regard to costs is that the losing party shall pay the costs, and it would be most unjust to compel the winning party on an appeal, especially where there is any considerable change in the judgment appealed from, to pay the costs of the appeal. And we do not think that the Legislature intended in this class or kind of costs or fees to compel the successful party on the appeal to pay them. The determination of the appeal is a final determination of the action on appeal, and the costs made thereon are separate and distinct from costs made in the trial court.

We have not overlooked the fact that the payment of costs in certain cases is left discretionary with the judge or court. In the case of Raft River Land & Cattle Co. v. Langford, 6 Idaho, 30, 51 Pac. 1027, the right of the prevailing party to recover the amount paid by him for a copy of the evidence from the court reporter was considered. The fees paid for the procuring of a transcript of the evidence from the court reporter to be used on motion for a new trial, in case an appeal is taken, are costs incurred on the appeal and are taxable as such. In McDonald v. Burke, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 266, 28 Pac. 440, 35 Am. St. Rep. 276, where a question similar to the one under consideration was passed upon and the fees of the stenographer were there disallowed because the services charged for were not rendered by the court stenographer, the party employed a private stenographer, and charged as fees such stenographer's compensation for work done as a private stenographer. We do not think in the passage of said act the Legislature intended to amend the various provisions of the Revised Statutes regarding taxation of costs. If it did do so, the title of the act is clearly insufficient for that purpose. The provisions of said act in regard to the taxation of costs should be construed harmoniously with the other provisions of the statute. It is only necessary costs and disbursements that can be recovered either under the statute or rules of the court; and, when a plaintiff has recovered a much larger judgment in the trial court than he is entitled to, and the defendant is required to appeal to protect his rights and wins on the appeal, he is entitled to the necessary costs incurred by him on the appeal, although the case ultimately goes against him.

It is contended by counsel that the item of $20 for the prints of maps for use on appeal should not be allowed. Under rule 6 of the rules of this court (32 Pac. vi), the cost of printing, not to exceed 40 pages of brief, must be allowed taxed as costs, and under paragraph 3 of rule 8 (32 Pac. viii) the expense of printing the transcript on appeal in civil cases and the pleadings, affidavits, or other papers constituting the record in original proceedings in this court must be allowed as costs. Paragraph 6 of rule 27 (32 Pac. xi) provides that, whenever a map forms a part of the transcript, the appellant must furnish six copies thereof, one to be attached to each of the six copies of the transcript filed with the clerk. That provision was complied with in this case by furnishing blue prints of maps and attaching them to the transcript, and it is a necessary cost on appeal, and we think should be allowed as such; it being considered a part of the printed transcript. Maps introduced in evidence on the trial need not be printed, if the parties will take advantage of the provisions of rule 19 (32 Pac. ix), by getting an order from the trial judge for the transmission of such maps to the Supreme Court for inspection there, or by stipulation of counsel that the originals may be used on the appeal. In order to avoid costs, this procedure should be adopted whenever it is practicable. We think the court did not err in allowing the item of $20 for prints of maps.

The order taxing costs must be affirmed; and it is so ordered. Costs of this appeal are awarded to the respondent.

BOARD OF COUNTY COM'RS v. BASSETT.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS — DUTIES.

Under the provisions of an act entitled "An act fixing the qualifications, and prescribing the powers and duties of county attorneys," approved February 2, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 25), it is made the duty of the prosecuting attorney to defend all actions, applications, or motions, civil or criminal, in the district court of his county, in which the people of the state or the county is interested or a party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, District and Prosecuting Attorneys, §§ 34-37.]

2. COUNTIES — COUNTY COMMISSIONERS — DUTIES.

Under the provisions of subdivision 13, § 1759, Rev. St. 1887, the board of commissioners is given the power to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party in interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, District and Prosecuting Attorneys, §§ 34-37.]

3. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS — POWERS — RIGHT TO APPEAL.

The foregoing provisions of the law in regard to the duties of the county attorney and the powers of the board must be read together, and under those provisions the prosecuting attorney must look after and defend any and all litigation instituted against the county, and has the power to take an appeal in any such cases from the district court to the Supreme Court, and it does not require an order of the board of commissioners to authorize him to do that.

4. APPEAL — DISMISSAL — ACTION AGAINST COUNTY.

Under the powers given to the board of commissioners, it may settle a case pending against the county, on appeal, and where they do settle such case, and it appears from the record that no beneficial results can accrue to the county from a determination of the appeal, the appeal will be dismissed on motion.

Appeal from District Court, Twin Falls County; Edward A. Walters, Judge.

Application of George Bassett to the board of county commissioners for a liquor license. From a judgment reversing an order of the board, and directing that a license be issued, the board appeals. Dismissed.

F. A. Hutto, Pros. Atty., for appellant. Sweeley & Sweeley, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court reversing an order of the board of county commissioners of Twin Falls county, and directing that a liquor license be issued to the respondent. It is an appeal on behalf of the board of county commissioners. A motion has been made to dismiss the appeal on three several grounds, the first of which is that the appeal was not taken upon the authority or order of the board of county commissioners, but upon the volunteer action of the county attorney; second, that the appeal was not legally taken for the reason that it was not taken by the Attorney General of the state; and, third, that the judgment and order have been fully executed and complied with and satisfied by the said board of county commissioners.

There is nothing whatever in the first two contentions, for the reason that it is made the duty of the prosecuting attorney, under Laws 1899, p. 25, to prosecute or defend all actions, applications, or motions, civil or criminal, in the district court of the county in which the people of the state or the county is interested or a party. The prosecuting attorney is the legal adviser of the board of county commissioners. Under the provisions of subdivision 13, § 1759, Rev. St. 1887, as amended, the board of commissioners is given the power to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party in interest, and employ counsel to conduct the same, with or without the prosecuting attorney, as they may direct. Those provisions must be read in connection with the provisions of the statute, which prescribe the duties of the county attorney. Under the law it is made his duty to look after and defend any and all litigation instituted against the county, and, if it becomes necessary to take an appeal, he has full authority to take it, and it is unnecessary for him to wait for the action of the board of county commissioners to give him directions and orders in regard to the same. The statute gives the board of commissioners the right to direct the litigation, and, if that board sees fit to compromise or settle the case pending against the county, they have the right to settle or direct the case to be dismissed, and it appears from the record in this case that the board of county commissioners complied with the order and judgment of the district court without consulting the county attorney, which they had the legal right to do. As the case has been fully settled, no beneficial results can come from a determination of the issues made on this appeal.

It is true, as appears from the record presented on this motion, that the board acted without knowledge of an appeal having been taken, and, under the facts, this court might proceed and determine the case under the authority of Warner Bros. Co. v. Freud, 131 Cal. 639, 63 Pac. 1017, 82 Am. St. Rep. 400, and 2 Cyc. 647, but under all the facts of this case, and considering that the time for which the license was issued is about to expire, we have concluded to sustain the motion and dismiss the appeal.

The appeal is therefore dismissed, with costs in favor of the respondent.

ARMSTRONG v. SLICK et al.

ATTACHMENT—WHEN ALLOWED—“DIRECT PAYMENT OF MONEY.”

The contract of an indorser of a promissory note or guarantor of a bill of exchange is a contract “for the direct payment of money,” and an attachment may issue against the property of such indorser or guarantor when action is brought to enforce payment of the debt the same as against the acceptor or maker, under the provisions of section 4302, Rev. St. 1887.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Bannock County; Alfred Budge, Judge.

Action by W. W. Armstrong against W. B. Slick and others. From an order denying the dissolution of an attachment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gray & Boyd and E. C. Lackner, for appellants. Clark & Budge, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This action was brought to recover upon four bills of exchange and two promissory notes for a sum aggregating approximately $54,000, including interest and attorneys' fees. Said bills of exchange were dated February 20, 1906, and were executed by the appellants to the order of themselves and drawn on the Glenn's Ferry Land & Irrigation Company, and were indorsed on that date by the appellants under the name of Slick Bros., as follows, to wit: “For value received, we hereby guarantee payment of the within note, waiving demand of payment, protest, and notice of nonpayment. [Signed] Slick Bros., by W. B. Slick.” On the same day said bills were accepted by the Glenn's Ferry Land & Irrigation Company by the following indorsement upon their face: “Accepted this 20th day of February, 1906, payable at the Bannock National Bank, Pocatello, Idaho. [Signed] Glenn's Ferry Land & Irrigation Co., by Ernest Pierson, Pres., by E. L. Rigg, Secy.” Promissory notes were executed by the Glenn's Ferry Land & Irrigation Company, payable to the order of Slick Bros., and were indorsed by Slick Bros. in the same manner as were the bills of exchange. One of said notes bore date of July 19th, and one July 20, 1905, the indorsement thereon bearing date of July 20th. The complaint states six causes of action—four on bills of exchange, and two on said promissory notes. At the time of filing the complaint the plaintiff secured several writs of attachment directed to the sheriff of several different counties in Idaho and against all of the defendants jointly; the plaintiff averring in the affidavit for attachment that the causes of action set forth in the complaint were founded upon certain express contracts for the direct payment of money. The property of the defendants Slick Bros. was attached in several different counties. Thereafter

Slick Bros. moved to vacate and discharge said writs of attachment, the principal ground of which was that the alleged negotiable instruments set forth in the complaint were not, as to the liability of the appellants, contracts express or implied for the direct payment of money, but that, on the contrary, the liability for the payment thereof was wholly contingent, indirect, secondary, and conditional to the liability of their codefendant the Glenn's Ferry Land & Irrigation Company. The Irrigation Company did not appear in the action, and did not join in the motion to dissolve the attachment, and has not joined in this appeal. After a hearing the court denied the motion to dissolve the attachments, and this appeal is from that order.

The contention of appellants is that their liability upon the instruments sued upon is conditional, contingent, indirect, and collateral, and therefore as to them the said contracts are not for the “direct payment of money,” within the meaning of the phrase “for the direct payment of money,” as used in section 4302, Rev. St. 1887, which section has reference to the issuance of writs of attachment. There is nothing in that contention, as the contract of an indorser or guarantor of a bill of exchange or promissory note is a contract for the direct payment of money. There is no distinction between the contract of a maker of a promissory note and the acceptor of a bill of exchange as to their being contracts for the direct payment of money. After the obligation becomes due, and suit is brought to collect the same, attachment may issue under the laws of this state against the indorser and guarantor of such paper the same as against the acceptor or maker. Elbring v. Mullen, 4 Idaho, 199, 38 Pac. 404.

The order of the trial judge refusing to dissolve the attachment must therefore be affirmed, and it is so ordered, with costs in favor of the respondent.

PIERSON v. STATE BOARD OF LAND COM'RS.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 27, 1908.)

PUBLIC LANDS—CONTESTS—APPEAL FROM DECISION OF LAND BOARD.

The statutes of this state do not authorize an appeal from the decision of the State Board of Land Commissioners in a land contest case heard and determined by such board.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Twin Falls County; Edward A. Walters, Judge.

Application by J. H. Pierson for writ of mandamus to the State Board of Land Commissioners. From an order denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff herein brought a contest before the State Board of Land Commissioners against the entry of Charles S. Loveland, made under the Carey act, on the Twin Falls segregation. After notice of contest was issued by the board and service thereof, it seems that the contest was dismissed by the board without a hearing. The contestant thereupon attempted to take an appeal from the action of the State Board of Land Commissioners to the district court in and for Twin Falls county, that being the county in which the land was situated. The board refused to send up any transcript or furnish any record of proceedings, and the contestant and appellant applied to the district court for a writ of mandate to compel the board to send up a transcript of the record. Notice of the application for a writ was served on the board, and the Attorney General appeared on behalf of the board and contested the application. After the hearing the court made an order denying the writ on the ground that an appeal does not lie from the action of the State Board of Land Commissioners in such case. Plaintiff appealed from the order.

Shields & Ashton, for appellant. J. J. Guheen, Atty. Gen., and Edwin Snow, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question presented for our determination in this case is whether an appeal will lie from the decision of the State Board of Land Commissioners on a land contest had before them. The State Board of Land Commissioners is a constitutional body, organized and existing under and by virtue of the provisions of section 7 of article 9 of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The Governor, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Secretary of State and Attorney General shall constitute the State Board of Land Commissioners, who shall have the direction, control and disposition of the public lands of the state, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." To this board the Constitution has assigned the "direction, control and disposition of the public lands of the state." In furtherance of the powers conferred by the Constitution, the state Legislature, by section 2 of the act of March 2, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 284), conferred upon the same board "the selection, management, and disposal" of all lands received by the state under the grant from the general government, commonly known as the "Carey act." The statute of the state prior to 1905 contained no provision for hearing contests over the right to purchase or enter state lands; but by the act of March 2, 1905 (Sess. Laws 1905, p. 131), the Legislature created the office of register of the State Board of Land Commissioners, and provided for hearing contests, and by section 5 of the act requires the register to set a time for hearing evidence and taking testimony, and requires that after the hearing the register shall furnish "a full transcript of the proceedings to the State Board of Land Commissioners, who shall render a decision in accordance therewith." Section 24 of the same act is as follows: "The State Board of Land Commissioners may hear and determine the claims of all persons who may claim to be entitled, in whole or in part, to any lands owned by this state, and the decision of said board shall be final until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the board shall have power to establish such rules and regulations as in their opinion may be proper or necessary to prevent fraudulent applications." Appellant rests his contention for the right of appeal upon the grounds: (1) That it is the duty of the board to hear and determine the contest upon the evidence submitted; and (2) that "the decision of said board shall be final until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction."

It must be conceded in the outset that "the right of appeal is statutory and unknown to the common law. It cannot be extended to cases not within the statute." General Custer Min. Co. v. Van Camp, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 40, 3 Pac. 22. In the case at bar, if any right of appeal exists, it must be found in the statute. This latter proposition, we think, narrows itself down to the question as to whether that authority is to be found in section 24 of the act of March 2, 1905 (Sess. Laws 1905, p. 142). Section 5 of the act provides that the practice and procedure in contest cases shall be the same as that established by the United States in the district land office, and the whole tenor of the act indicates that the Legislature intended to provide a similar mode and method for contests over state land and for state purposes to that established by the general government for contests over government lands. Under similar legislation in other states a like view has been entertained by the courts. Corpe v. Brooks, 8 Or. 222; Routt v. Greenwood Cemetery Land Co., 18 Colo. 132, 31 Pac. 858. The United States Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the decisions of the land department of the government are final and conclusive as to all facts found in a case, and that they would only be reviewed as to errors of law or on account of fraud. Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 72; 20 L. Ed. 485; Burfenning v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., 163 U. S. 321, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, 41 L. Ed. 175; Gonzales v. French, 164 U. S. 342, 17 Sup. Ct. 102, 41 L. Ed. 460; 7 Notes on U. S. Reports, 618. In other words, that, where the land department had misapplied the law to the facts found, or in cases of fraud, the court would furnish relief. We think the Legislature had a similar purpose in view when they said: "The decision of said board shall be final until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction." This language indicates the idea of a review of questions of law rather than questions of fact. If the board should refuse to act, a contestant has an adequate remedy to compel them to act. If they should act in a matter without jurisdiction, there is a remedy; if they misapply the law to the facts found, or in case of fraud, there is a remedy; but those remedies are not by appeal. The fact that the Legislature never provided any procedure to be followed or designated any court to which the appeal could be taken is further indicative of an absence of intention to grant the right of appeal. Of course, if the Legislature had in direct terms authorized an appeal, and designated the court to which such appeal might be taken, the court would assume jurisdiction, and prescribe the procedure to be followed. Such, however, is not the case here.

We are satisfied that the order and judgment of the trial court was correct, and it is hereby affirmed, costs awarded in favor of respondent.

BOOTH MERCANTILE CO. v. MURPHY et al. (GRIFFIN et al., Interveners).

(Supreme Court of Idaho, Feb. 4, 1908. On Rehearing, Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONTRACTS OF WIFE—SEPARATE ESTATE.

Where a married woman purchases hotel furniture, furnishings, and fixtures for conducting a hotel business, and executes her promissory note therefor, and at the same time executes a mortgage on her separate real property to secure the payment of such promissory note, the contract is one for her own use and benefit, and the mortgage constitutes a contract with reference to her separate property, and the debt and obligation thus incurred is enforceable against her and against her separate estate so mortgaged.

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT—DEFECTIVE CERTIFICATE—CORRECTION.

Where a certificate of acknowledgment was not made in compliance with the provisions of section 2960, Rev. St. 1887, prior to the amendment thereof, and it appears that the acknowledgment was, in fact, taken in conformity with the substantial requirements of that provision of the statute, and the facts actually existed which would have enabled the notary to have attached the proper certificate of acknowledgment, the court should decree the correction of such certificate so as to comply with the statute.

3. SAME.

The facts in this case considered, and held sufficient to authorize and require a decree reforming the certificate of acknowledgment so as to make it conform with the requirements of the statute.

4. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF HEIRS AND DISTRIBUTEES.

Where a deceased husband's estate is found upon return of the inventory to be of less value than $1,500, and the probate court thereafter duly and regularly makes an order and decree setting the entire estate aside for the use and support of the family of the deceased, in compliance with section 5445, Rev. St. 1887, and the widow thereafter mortgages all her interest in and to such estate, held, that the mortgage so executed covers whatever right, title, or interest she has in or to the estate by right of succession as an heir of her deceased husband, and that the interest so granted and incumbered is commensurate only with her rights of succession, and that a purchaser under a foreclosure sale can only acquire such rights and privileges as she has by reason of being an heir to such estate.

Appeal from District Court, Bannock County; Alfred Budge, Judge.

Action by the Booth Mercantile Company against Julia Murphy and others, and Mary Griffin and others intervene. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

D. Worth Clark, for appellant. J. R. S. Budge, for respondents.

AILSHIE, C. J. This action was instituted to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate situated at Pocatello, Idaho. The note and mortgage were executed on the 29th day of May, 1903, at West Jordan, Salt Lake county, Utah, by the defendant Mrs. Julia Murphy. The defendant Mrs. Murphy, who was then residing in Utah, purchased from the plaintiff some furniture, fixtures, and supplies for the purpose of running and conducting a hotel business, and executed the note and mortgage in question in payment of the purchase price. At the time of entering into this contract, Mrs. Murphy was the wife of Timothy Murphy. She had, however, previously been married to Michael D. Griffin. At the time of the death of Griffin, her first husband, they were living at Pocatello, in this state. An administration was thereafter had on the Griffin estate, and, upon the return of the inventory, it appeared that the estate was of less value than $1,500, and the court, after due notice, in pursuance of section 5445, Rev. St. 1887, proceeded to and did make an order in due and regular form setting aside the entire estate, including the real property covered by the mortgage in question, for the use and benefit of the widow and minor children. At that time the family consisted of the widow, Mrs. Griffin, and her seven minor children. The proceedings in setting aside this estate appear to have been regular and in conformity with the statute, and are not questioned in this case. The Widow Griffin thereafter married Murphy, and early in the year of 1903 they moved to Utah, where Murphy engaged in railroad work, while Mrs. Murphy conducted the hotel business. Mrs. Murphy and the minor children contested the foreclosure of this mortgage upon sundry grounds, and obtained a judgment in their favor, refusing the plaintiff any relief whatever either upon the promissory note or the mortgage executed as security therefor. The plaintiff has appealed and assigns numerous errors which are argued in the brief under five general heads. In the first place, it is contended that the contract was a Utah contract, and that under the statutes of that state (section 1199, Rev. St. 1898) a married woman may contract in all respects as if she were a feme sole. Second. It is insisted that the findings of the court that the residence of Mrs. Murphy was in Idaho, instead of in Utah, is erroneous, and contrary to the evidence. Third. That the evidence in the case shows clearly and without contradiction that the debt was contracted for the use and benefit of Mrs. Murphy and concerning her separate estate, and that the finding of the court that it was in fact not for her use or benefit or with reference to her separate estate is wholly unsupported by the evidence. Fourth. That the evidence shows that the mortgage was duly and properly acknowledged, and was entitled to be so certified, and that the finding of the court that it was not duly and properly acknowledged was contrary to the evidence and erroneous. Fifth. That Mrs. Murphy had a mortgagable interest in the property covered by the mortgage, and that the court erred in holding otherwise.

As we view this case, it is immaterial for the purpose of this decision whether the contract was a Utah or an Idaho contract, and it is likewise immaterial whether Mrs. Murphy was as a matter of law at the time of entering into the contract domiciled in Utah or Idaho. The contract was her own debt, incurred for her use and benefit. She received the consideration therefor—the goods and merchandise for which the note and mortgage were executed. Not only that, but the purchase price was secured by a contract with direct reference to her separate estate, namely, a mortgage executed by her on her separate property. Bank of Commerce v. Baldwin (Idaho) 93 Pac. 504. It has been uniformly held by this court that a married woman could bind her separate estate by a contract executed in this manner. Dernham v. Rowley, 4 Idaho, 753, 44 Pac. 643; Jaekel v. Pease, 6 Idaho, 131, 53 Pac. 399; Strode v. Miller, 7 Idaho, 16, 59 Pac. 893; Holt v. Gridley, 7 Idaho, 416, 63 Pac. 188; Bank of Commerce v. Baldwin, 12 Idaho, 202, 85 Pac. 497; Bank of Commerce v. Baldwin, supra. The fact that the property purchased may have inured to the benefit of the whole family, or, rather, of the community, does not make it any less her own individual contract, nor does it do away with the fact that she received the goods for which the contract was made. In a sense, it would be difficult to name a contract a married woman might make that would not in some respects inure to the benefit of the community, but that fact alone does not lessen her obligation thereon. Edminston v. Smith (Idaho) 92 Pac. 842. The acknowledgment to the mortgage is as follows: "State of Utah, County of Salt Lake—ss.: On the fourth day of June, A. D. Nineteen Hundred and three, personally appeared before me, Mrs. Julia Murphy and the Booth Mercantile Co. (R.

L. Booth, Gen. Manager.) The signers of the above instrument, who duly acknowledged to me that she executed the same. Eugene P. Wheelon, Notary Public. My commission expires April 27, 1903." This acknowledgment was taken prior to the amendment of section 2960, Rev. St. 1887, and is not in conformity with the requirements of that section, in that it does not show that the acknowledgment was taken without the hearing of the husband, and that the woman was made acquainted with the contents of the instrument. The plaintiff in its complaint alleged that the acknowledgment was duly and regularly taken, but that the certificate was imperfect, and not in proper form, and prayed that the same be corrected and amended so as to comply with the statute. There is no substantial conflict in the evidence as to what occurred at the time of the execution of this mortgage. In substance it is as follows: After the deal had been made, the papers were drawn, and were taken by one of the employes of the plaintiff company to Mrs. Murphy at her place of business, and she read them over and signed the note there, and either signed the mortgage at that time or later on in the office of the company. On this latter fact there is some uncertainty. At any rate, the notary went into the office where there were two or three persons present, and read the mortgage to Mrs. Murphy, and asked her if the signature was hers. She told him it was, that she knew the contents of the instruments, and that it was a mortgage on some property she had in Pocatello, and that it was given as security for the note she had just executed. She testifies that she knew its contents and all about it, and that she executed it. The husband was not present during any of these transactions, and was not present at the time the mortgage was executed and the acknowledgment taken. Now, it is true that the notary was not aware of the requirements of the Idaho statute with reference to acknowledgments of married women, and did not take this acknowledgment with any view to a compliance with the Idaho statute; and that evidently accounts for the certificate being in the form as above set out. It would be immaterial, however, whether he actually knew what the Idaho statute was or not, if the acknowledgment had been properly taken and he had attached a proper certificate. He failed, however, to attach a proper certificate, for the reason that he was not aware of the provisions of our statute. It does quite clearly appear to us, on the other hand, that the acknowledgment was taken in substantial compliance with our statute. The woman was made acquainted with the contents of the instrument. She already, in fact, knew its contents and the nature of the transaction. It was her transaction. It was taken in the absence of her husband, and without any coercion or compulsion on his part. First Nat. Bank of Halley v. Glenn, 10 Idaho, 224, 77 Pac. 623, 109 Am. St. Rep. 204. It satisfactorily appears to us that the facts existed upon which the notary could have attached a proper certificate of acknowledgment. Where such facts already exist, and it is shown that the acknowledgment was proper, the certificate should be so reformed as to conform with the statute, and it was error to refuse a reformation of the acknowledgment so as to entitle the mortgage to be foreclosed in this case. Section 2971, Rev. St. 1887; Bunnell & Eno L. Co. v. Curtis, 5 Idaho, 652, 51 Pac. 767.

This brings us to the last question presented. Did Mrs. Murphy have a mortgagable interest in the property covered by the mortgage? As previously stated, this property had been set aside by a decree of the probate court for the use of the widow and her minor children. The interest the wife acquired under this decree is a separate and distinct interest from that which she had as an heir to the estate. By such a decree the property was set aside as an entirety for the use of the family of the deceased as a whole. The wife could do no act that would relieve this property of its burden, or free it from the obligation and purposes to which it was set aside until the children had reached their majority. This proposition is very clearly set forth in Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437, and in Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 158, 34 Pac. 667. On the other hand, Mrs. Murphy had a vested interest in this estate which will or may at some time become available to her under the laws of succession, and by reason of her being an heir to her deceased husband's estate. There can be no question as to her right to alienate or incumber that interest. Such alienation or incumbrance is subject, however, to the superior and paramount right conferred by the decree of the probate court, and will confer no rights and grant no privileges that she did not possess herself by reason of being an heir to the estate as distinguished from her duties as the widow and member of the family of her deceased husband, and head of such family after the death of her husband. Phelan v. Smith, supra.

We are not called upon in this case to determine what rights the mortgagee may acquire in the mortgaged property by a foreclosure sale, or when, in the course of time, the purchaser at such sale may be able to realize or enjoy any of the fruits of, or benefits from, his purchase. We content ourselves by simply holding that Mrs. Murphy, as the heir of her deceased husband, acquired such a right in this property, under the law of succession, as she could alienate or incumber.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered and a new trial granted. The cause is remanded, with costs in favor of the appellant.

SULLIVAN and STEWART, JJ., concur.

On Petition for Rehearing.

STEWART, J. The respondent files a petition for a rehearing, and contends, first, that the note sued on was not a contract for the use and benefit of Julia Murphy; second, that the mortgage was not a contract with reference to her separate estate. This court fully considered these questions in the principal opinion. We now add that a contract made by a married woman, by which she secures property for which the contract is executed, is for her own use and benefit, and that such use and benefit is a fact resulting from the contract itself. Where it appears, as it does in this case, that a married woman purchases property and receives such property, and executes a promissory note therefor, she is liable upon such note, and the contract is made for her own use and benefit, because she receives the consideration for which such note was made. It is not necessary that a party selling property to a married woman shall pursue the property after it is delivered to her, and ascertain whether or not the same ultimately results in a benefit to her personally, or proves a profitable investment. The fact of making the contract and receiving the consideration therefor is sufficient to create a liability on the part of a married woman, and she may be held personally liable on such contract. Second. The mortgage was executed by her, on property which it is admitted was her separate estate. That she may make such a contract and bind her separate estate would seem to be no longer in doubt in this state. Authorities cited in principal opinion.

Counsel for respondent in his petition for rehearing relies with much confidence upon the case of Jaeckel v. Pease, 6 Idaho, 131, 53 Pac. 399. In that case Pease and wife jointly executed a promissory note for the debt of the husband, and executed a mortgage upon community property as security therefor. Suit was brought upon said note, and for a foreclosure of the mortgage. The trial court held the mortgage void because of a defective acknowledgment, but rendered a personal judgment against Pease and wife. Mary A. Pease, the wife, appealed, and this court held that a personal judgment could not be sustained against her, for the reason that the debt was a debt of the husband. In that case the debt was not contracted by the wife, nor for her use or benefit, nor did she receive the consideration, nor with reference to her separate estate. In the case at bar it clearly appears that the contract was made for the use and benefit of the wife, and with reference to her own separate estate. It would seem that the case of Jaeckel v. Pease would be clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. In the principal opinion this court does not depart from the well-recognized rule which has been adopted in this state, that, in order to charge the separate property of the wife, or render it liable to levy and sale, it must be alleged in the complaint and proven on the trial that the debt was incurred for the use and benefit of her separate property, or was a contract by her for her own use and benefit. It is specifically alleged in the complaint in this case "that the note was given and the indebtedness of said Mrs. Julia Murphy evidenced thereby, was incurred for the use and benefit of the separate property of said Mrs. Julia Murphy, and was contracted by her for her own use and benefit." The facts as proven upon the trial clearly show that this allegation was proven by the evidence. She made the contract personally, and received the goods for which the note was given; and executed the mortgage upon her own personal estate as security therefor. The note was executed for her own use and benefit, and was clearly such a contract as she had authority to make. The mortgage was upon her own separate property and with reference thereto, and she had power and authority to make and execute the same.

Counsel argues next that the mortgage was invalid, for the reason that it covered the separate property of a married woman, and required that she and her husband both join in its execution, as provided in section 2021 of the Revised Statutes of 1887. The estate Mrs. Murphy had in the property mortgaged was not a homestead as contemplated in section 2021, supra. The estate was one set aside for the benefit of the family and bestowed by the beneficence of the law. The interest, however, which Mrs. Murphy mortgaged, was such interest as might come to her under the law of succession by reason of being an heir to her deceased husband. This interest, whatever it might be, is not a homestead, and the law does not require that her husband join her in the execution of the mortgage of the same. The mortgage cannot in any way interfere with the rights of the family to occupy said property as a home. This is very clearly set forth in the principal opinion.

No reason appearing for granting a rehearing, the same is denied.

MESERVEY, Road Overseer, v. GULLIFORD.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. HIGHWAYS—OBSTRUCTIONS—ABATEMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Held, that this action was brought concerning a road that has become a highway by user as defined by the provisions of section 851, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by the act of 1893 (Sess. Laws 1893, p. 12).

2. SAME.

The provisions of section 960, Rev. St. 1887, apply to encroachments upon highways "duly laid out or erected," and the penalty prescribed in section 963, Rev. St. 1887, for making encroachments upon public highways, applies to such highways, and does not apply to highways established by prescription or user before such highways have been recorded as provided by law.

3. SAME—ESTABLISHMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Roads are defined by section 851, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by Sess. Laws 1893, p. 12, as "roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board"; and also all roads "used as such for a period of five years," provided the latter shall have been worked and kept up at the expense of the public, or located and recorded by order of the board of county commissioners, are declared to be highways.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, § 23.]

4. SAME.

Roads used as such for a period of five years, that have been worked and kept up at public expense, are public highways, whether they are recorded or not.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, § 23.]

5. SAME—PERSONS ENTITLED TO REMOVE OBSTRUCTION—ROAD OVERSEER.

The road overseer is the proper party, under our statute, to bring an action to abate a nuisance when such nuisance consists of an obstruction to a public highway within his district.

6. SAME—COMPLAINT—ALLEGATION OF ADVERSE POSSESSION.

It is not necessary, in an action to remove an obstruction from a highway established by user, to allege title to a highway by adverse possession, under the provisions of section 4039, Rev. St. 1887, as the only right acquired by the public is an easement in the land, consisting of a right to pass over the same and keep the highway in repair. The legal title to the land remains in the owner of the abutting land.

7. SAME—PRESCRIPTION.

The public use of a highway for the statutory period and the keeping of it in repair at public expense is all that is necessary to establish a highway by prescription. The consent of the owner of the land, or his dissent, makes no difference.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, §§ 1-10.]

8. SAME—APPOINTMENT AS ROAD OVERSEER—EVIDENCE.

Either the "Minute Book" or the "Road Book" required to be kept by the board of county commissioners, under the provisions of sections 853, 1754, Rev. St. 1887, is competent evidence to show the appointment of a road overseer, and his testimony may be received upon that question.

9. EVIDENCE—OFFICERS—PRESUMPTION OF PERFORMANCE OF DUTY.

There is no presumption of official irregularity, and the one asserting such official irregularity has the burden of proving it.

10. HIGHWAYS—OFFICERS—APPOINTMENT.

The road overseer is an elective officer, and the board of county commissioners has the appointing power in case of a vacancy in that office.

11. SAME—PRESCRIPTION—WIDTH.

Under the provisions of section 932, Rev. St. 1887, all highways, except alleys and bridges, must be at least 50 feet wide, excepting those existing prior to the enactment of that section of a less width, and the width of roads or highways established by prescription or public use must be determined from a consideration of the facts and circumstances peculiar to the case, and is presumed to be 50 feet in width, unless the facts and circumstances of the case clearly indicate that the owner, over whose land the road runs, has limited the width of said road to a less width than 50 feet prior to the time said road became a highway by user.

12. SAME — OBSTRUCTION — ABATEMENT — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

Where it is alleged in the complaint that for more than 10 years immediately preceding the commencement of the action the road had been traveled by the public generally, it is error for the court to admit evidence that such road was established by public user for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of the action, and find that a highway had there been established by user under a law that did not require such highway to be kept up at public expense, which law had been amended more than 13 years prior to the commencement of this action, and under which amendment this action was brought.

13. SAME — FINDING.

As this action was brought under the provisions of the law requiring roads to be used by the general public and kept up at public expense for five years, it was error for the court not to find whether said road had been kept up at public expense for that period.

14. SAME.

It was error to hold that said road had been established under a law which did not require it to be kept up at public expense, and had been repealed more than 13 years prior to the commencement of this action.

15. SAME.

The allegation that a road has been used as a public highway for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of an action cannot be treated as definitely describing a longer period than 10 years and 1 day.

Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; J. M. Stevens, Judge.

Action by O. K. Meservy, road overseer, to remove an obstruction in a public highway, against S. K. Gulliford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Caleb Jones, for appellant. Soule & Soule, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff as road overseer against the defendant, who is appellant here, to compel him to remove certain fences and gate which it is alleged constitute an obstruction to a highway. This action was commenced on the 23d day of May, 1906, and it is alleged that for more than 10 years 'immediately preceding the commencement of this action, "continuously and uninterruptedly, except when interfered with during the past two years by the defendant," the public generally have enjoyed and used a public highway over, across, and through certain lands, describing them, and that with the exception of the past two years, when interfered with by the defendant, said road has been used and worked and kept up at the expense of the public as a highway for the convenience of the public under the direction and supervision of the board of county commissioners of Fremont county. It is also alleged that more than 10 days prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff served personally upon the defendant written notice requiring him to remove said obstruction from said highway within 10 days from the service of notice, and prays that the defendant be restrained from maintaining such obstructions to said highway, and that they be abated as a public nuisance, and that he have judgment against the defendant for $10 per day as damages for every day that such obstructions remain upon said public highway after the service of said notice. Those allegations were denied by the answer. The answer also denies on information or belief that the plaintiff is road overseer of road district No. 20 in Fremont county, as alleged in the complaint, and denies that said gate and fences are obstructions to any highway or encroachments thereon. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that the plaintiff was the duly qualified and acting road overseer of Road District No. 20 in Fremont county; that said district was created by order of the board of county commissioners on April 24, 1902; that the defendant was the owner of a certain tract of land in said road district, describing it, and that from 1887 to the spring of 1905 the road described in the complaint was continuously and uninterruptedly used and traveled by the public as a public road, and that the same was necessary for the convenience and use of public travel; that some time during the spring of 1905 the defendant erected fences and other obstructions across the north end of said highway, and also maintains various structures, fences, and obstructions in and across said highway, and thereby shuts off and segregates the same from the public highway extending on either end of the same, and thereby shuts out and prevents the public from using such highway for public travel; that written notice was properly served on the defendant, requiring him to remove such obstructions more than 10 days prior to the commencement of this action. As conclusions of law the court finds that the fence and obstructions placed upon said highway are a nuisance and should be abated, and the defendant be enjoined from further obstructing said highway; that the strip of land described in the findings has been used and traveled by the public for such length of time that the same has become a highway by user; and that said strip of land is a public highway. Judgment was entered in accordance with said findings and conclusions of fact in favor of the plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment.

Counsel for appellant assigns a great many errors going to the action of the court in overruling a demurrer to the amended complaint, the admission and rejection of evidence, and that the findings of fact are not sufficient to support the judgment; that such findings are not supported by the evidence, and are in direct opposition thereto and are not responsive to the issues in the case. At the outset, it is contended by counsel for appellants that this action is brought under the provisions of sections 960, 963, Rev. St. 1887, which sections are as follows:

"Sec. 960. If any highway duly laid out or erected is encroached upon by fences, buildings, or otherwise, the Road Overseer of the district may, orally or in writing, require the encroachment to be removed from the highway."

"Sec. 963. If the encroachment is denied, and the owner, occupant, or person controlling the matter or thing charged with being an encroachment, refuses to remove or to permit the removal thereof, the Road Overseer must commence in the proper Court an action to abate the same as a nuisance; and if he recovers judgment, he may, in addition to having the same abated, recover ten dollars for every day such nuisance remained after notice, as also his costs in such action."

This action was brought concerning a road that had been established under the provisions of section 851, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by Laws 1893, p. 12, by user and by being kept up at public expense, and not in regard to a road that had been duly laid out, erected, or recorded by order of the board of county commissioners. The provisions of said section 960 apply to encroachments upon highways "duly laid out or erected," and it is not alleged in the complaint that the highway referred to therein had been duly laid out or erected, but that it had been used, worked, and kept up at the expense of the public as a public highway for a period of more than 10 years prior to the commencement of this suit. There is nothing in this contention; for, under the allegations of the complaint, the highway referred to was one established by user, and not one that had been "duly laid out or erected" by the board of county commissioners. Said section 963 provides for a penalty against one who has made encroachments upon a public highway, and refuses to remove them after notice has been served upon him for the removal thereof. There is a distinction between an encroachment and an obstruction. A penalty was asked for in the prayer of the complaint; but the court, no doubt, taking the view that the penalty there prescribed applied only to highways that had been duly laid out or erected by the board of county commissioners, or recorded as provided by law, and not to highways that had been established by prescription or user, did not enter any judgment against the defendant for the penalty. However, the court failed to give the road overseer judgment for any penalty whatever, and the defendant has no cause of complaint because of the court's refusal to enter judgment against him for the penalty. Under a statute like our sections 960 and 963, the Supreme Court of California in Freshour v. Hihn, 99 Cal. 443, 34 Pac. 87, held that the right of a road overseer to recover the penalty of $10 per day for obstructing a highway does not extend to a case where the highway is established by user or abandonment to the public, and has not been recorded as a highway, and we think that is the correct view of that matter under our statute. Parker v. People, 22 Mich. 93; State v. Babcock, 42 Wis. 138. Under the provisions of subdivision 2, § 870, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by Laws 1899, p. 127, the board of county commissioners are required to cause to be surveyed, viewed, laid out, recorded, opened, and worked such highways as are necessary for public convenience. There is no allegation in the complaint showing that the highway referred to therein has been duly recorded as provided by said section. Roads are defined by section 851, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by Sess. Laws 1893, p. 12, as follows: "Roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of county commissioners, and all roads used as such for a period of five years, provided the latter shall have been worked and kept up at the expense of the public, or located and recorded by order of the board of county commissioners, are highways." It will be observed from those provisions that, in order to establish a road as a highway, it does not necessarily need to be recorded; that is, that class of roads used as such for a period of five years that have been worked and kept up at the expense of the public are highways, whether they are recorded or not.

It is next contended by counsel for appellant that the road overseer has no authority to bring an action to remove obstructions from a highway. Under the provisions of section 873, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by Sess. Laws 1899, p. 128, the road overseer, under the direction, supervision, and pursuant to the order of the board of county commissioners, must take charge of the public highways within their respective districts, and keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair. The highways established by user or prescription are thereby placed under the control of the road overseer subject to the order of the board, and it is made his duty to keep such highways clear from obstructions and in good repair. Under the provisions of said section, the road overseer is authorized to remove obstructions from highways established by user, and we think he has full authority, under the orders of the board, to maintain an action to remove obstructions placed therein. At the date of the passage of said amendatory act, the road overseers were appointed by the board of county commissioners, but an act was thereafter passed which provided for their election, thereby making them public officers. Sess. Laws 1899, p. 306. In the case of Freshour, Road Overseer, v. Hihn, supra, a road overseer was the plaintiff, and his right to maintain that action was not questioned. Section 3634, Rev. St. 1887, provides that "a public nuisance may be abated by any public body or officer authorized thereto by law." Under the provisions of section 873, Rev. St. 1887, supra, it is provided that the road overseer must take charge of the public highways in his district, and keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair, and under the provisions of the laws of 1899 (Sess. Laws, p. 360) road overseers are elected by the electors of the road district, and are made public officers. The road overseer thus becomes a public officer, and the law makes it his duty to keep the highways clear from obstructions, and, as he is a public officer, he is authorized by the provisions of section 3634, supra, to bring an action to abate a public nuisance when such nuisance consists of an obstruction placed upon a highway within his road district. In San Benito Co. v. Whitesides, 51 Cal. 416, the court held that "an action to abate a nuisance caused by an obstruction to the public highway cannot be brought in the name of the county as plaintiff, and must be brought in the name of the road overseer." The road overseer is the proper party under our statute to bring an action to abate a nuisance when such nuisance consists of an obstruction to a public highway within his district. If the road overseer has no such authority, it certainly would place the county at a great disadvantage, as the boards of county commissioners in this state only have quarterly sessions, and are in session but a few days at a time. Highways might be obstructed weeks before the board could order an action to be brought to remove them. I conclude under our law that the road overseer has authority to bring actions to remove obstructions from highways either laid out or recorded as highways, or such as have been established by user or prescription. Section 963, Rev. St. 1887, provides that, if one who has made encroachments on the highway refuses either to remove or to permit the removal thereof, the road overseer must commence an action to abate the same as a nuisance and for the penalty; but the California courts have held under a similar statute that the provisions of that section, at least so far as it applies to the penalty, only applies to roads or highways duly laid out or erected and recorded.

It is next contended by counsel for appellant that, since it is alleged in the complaint that the appellant is the owner of the land over which such highway extended, the complaint should have alleged a claim of title to the highway by adverse possession, under the provisions of section 4039, Rev. St. 1887. That section of the statute has no application whatever to public highways, since under the law the public never acquires the legal title to land over which a highway extends. All the right acquired by the public is an easement in the land consisting of a right to pass over the same and keep the road in repair. The legal title to said land remains in the owner of the adjoining land or the land over which the road runs. It is not necessary to allege adverse possession in an action like the one at bar. The public use of a highway for the statutory period and the keeping of it in repair at public expense is all that is necessary to establish it as a highway. The consent of the owner of the land or his dissent makes no difference. Gross v. McNutt, 4 Idaho, 300, 38 Pac. 985.

It is next contended that the court admitted secondary evidence as to the appointment of the road overseer. It appears from the record that the minutes of the board of county commissioners contained a record of the appointment of the respondent road overseer, and that record was introduced in evidence, supplementing the testimony of the road overseer himself to the effect that he had been duly appointed road overseer. It is contended that under our law (section 1754, Rev. St. 1887) that the board is required to have kept a book known as the "Road Book," which must contain all proceedings and adjudications relating to the establishment, maintenance, change, and discontinuance of roads and road districts and overseers thereof, their reports and acts, and that that book was the best evidence of the appointment of said road overseer, and under the provisions of section 853, Rev. St., the clerk of the board of county commissioners is required to keep a book in which he must record separately all proceedings of the board relative to each road district, including orders, laying out, altering, and opening roads, etc., and it is contended that such books are the primary and best evidence of the appointment of a road overseer. Under the provisions of section 1754, Rev. St. 1887, the board is required to keep a minute book in which must be recorded all orders and decisions made by them, and the daily proceedings had at all regular and special sessions; and under the Laws 1899, p. 248, the board of county commissioners, at the adjournment of each session of the board, is required to publish a statement such as will clearly give notice to the public of all acts and proceedings of the board. Said "Minute Book," if it contains all orders and decisions made by the board, certainly is the book of original entry as to the appointment of road overseers, although a "Road Book" is required to show that fact also. If all the original orders and proceedings are first entered in the "Minute Book," that certainly would be the best evidence, or equal evidence, of the appointment of a road overseer to that of the "Road Book." We do not think the court erred in admitting said "Minute Book" showing the appointment of said road overseer. In Barry v. Smith, 191 Mass. 78, 77 N. E. 1009, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1028, it was held that in proving the fact that a man is a public officer his own testimony that he is such officer is competent evidence. The court did not err in permitting the road overseer to testify that he was road overseer of said district, and did not err in admitting said "Minute Book" to show that fact.

It is contended that as respondent was appointed road overseer by the board, that the order making the appointment must contain a recital that there was a vacancy in that office, and that, without this recital, the commissioners would have no authority to make the appointment. There is nothing in this contention, as the presumption is that public officers act within their authority until the contrary is shown, and the making of the appointment raises the presumption that there was a vacancy. 16 Cyc. 1076. Mercer Co. Traction Co. v. United N. J. R. Co., 64 N. J. Eq. 588, 54 Atl. 819, is in point, and it is there said: "It is, moreover, a rule of procedure that the burden of proving unlawful or irregular conduct rests upon him who asserts it, since there is no presumption of official irregularity." 16 Cyc. 1078. In Valley Township v. King Iron B. & M. Co., 4 Kan. App. 622, 45 Pac. 660, it is said: "In the absence of an affirmative showing, it will be presumed that the officers were in the rightful performance of duty, and that the conditions existed which authorized them to act as they did." See, also Harper v. City, 9 Kan. App. 600, 58 Pac. 488. Under our statute, the board of county commissioners could legally act in making an appointment if a vacancy existed; and, since the record is silent on that question, the presumption is that the board acted within the law and that the vacancy did exist. In the case of the County of Canyon v. Toole, 8 Idaho, 501, 69 Pac. 320, this court held that a substantial compliance with the statute by the board of commissioners was all that was necessary. Technical objections are not viewed with favor.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the court erred in finding the width of the highway described in the complaint to be a strip of land 25 feet wide on each side of the southwest boundary line of the southwest quarter of section 15, township 7 north, of range 41 east B. M., and that the same had continuously and uninterruptedly been used and traveled by the public as a road from 1887 to the spring of 1905. It is urged that the trial court in this finding added 25 feet to the width of the road more than the evidence shows was used as a highway. At least one witness testified that said road was 25 feet wide on each side of said section line; that it was approximately 25 feet each side of the line. He further testified that the road was 50 feet wide approximately; that the strip of land traversed there was approximately 50 feet wide. Under the provisions of section 932, Rev. St. 1887, all highways, except alleys and bridges, must be at least 50 feet wide, excepting those consisting of a less width at the date of the enactment of said section. This statute evidently provides the width of a road that is considered reasonably necessary for the convenience of the public generally. In Whitesides v. Green, 13 Utah, 341, 44 Pac. 1032, 57 Am. St. Rep. 740, which involved the width of a public highway established by prescription, the court held that the width must be determined from a consideration of the facts and circumstances peculiar to the case, because in such event the court cannot say that any highway is of a certain width "in the absence of statutory provisions." In Angell on the Law of Highways, § 155, the author says: "Where there is no other evidence of dedication than mere user by the public, the presumption is not necessarily limited to the traveled path, but may be inferred to extend to the ordinary width of highways; or, if the road be inclosed with fences, to include the entire space so inclosed." The court in Burrows v. Guest, 5 Utah, 91, 12 Pac. 847, said: "When a highway is established by user merely over a tract of land of the usual width of a highway, or over a tract of land where, by a survey and plat, which has been recognized and adopted by the owner, a street or highway of a certain width is laid out, the right of the public is not limited to the traveled part, but such user is evidence of a right in the public to use the whole tract as a highway, by widening the traveled part or otherwise, as the increased travel and the exigencies of the public may require. * * *

In determining the extent of the dedication, all the circumstances may be considered—the width of the highways in the vicinity of the land in question, the width of highways in a system of which the one in controversy forms a part, any circumstances of recognition by the owner of the fee and the public of definite and fixed limits." In Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 174, the author states: "If the right to the way depends solely upon user, then the width of the way and the extent of the servitude is measured by the character of the user, for the easement cannot be broader than the user; but, if there were defective proceedings, and the use was under color of the claim supplied by them, then the extent of the easement should generally be measured by the claim exhibited by the proceedings, and by them intended to be established. This is in strict accordance with the elementary principle of the law of real property, which declares that where there is color of title, and possession of part is taken under the claim of title, it will cover the whole, but that, where there is no color of title, the right will not extend beyond the actual possession, the pedis possessio. But it may be doubted if that rule applies in all its strictness to highways acquired by user and prescription. While it is true that the extent of the servitude is measured by the character of the user, and that, in a general sense, the easement cannot be broader than the user, yet the right of the public is not necessarily limited strictly to the main traveled path in all instances, and it has even been held in some jurisdictions that the user may evidence a right to a way of the statutory or usual width in the neighborhood." It would seem that the right acquired by prescription and user carries with it such width as is reasonably necessary for the reasonable convenience of the traveling public, and, where the public have acquired the easement, the land subject to it has passed under the jurisdiction of the public authorities for the purpose of keeping the same in proper condition for the enjoyment thereof by the public. See Whitesides v. Green, supra. And, where the right is so acquired, such width must be determined from a consideration of the facts and circumstances peculiar to each case. However, it must be borne in mind that the statute fixes the width of highways at not less than 50 feet, and common experience shows that width no more than sufficient for the proper keeping up and repair of roads generally.

It is further contended that it was error for the court to find, under the issues made by the pleadings and the proof, that said highway had existed since June, 1887. On this point the complaint alleges as follows: "That for more than 10 years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, continuously and uninterruptedly, except when interfered with during the past 2 years by the defendant, the public generally have enjoyed and used a public highway over, across, and through the said described lands." It is contended that, as this suit was commenced on May 10, 1906, it was error for the court to admit evidence tending to show that said road was first traveled in June, 1887. It is contended that the allegation, to wit, "that for more than 10 years immediately preceding the commencement of this action," etc., did not extend back further than 10 years and 1 day, and that it was error for the court to admit evidence to show that the road was first traveled as early as June, 1887; that being about 19 years before the commencement of the action. On this point appellant cites Bauserman v. Blunt, 147 U. S. 647, 13 Sup. Ct. 466, 37 L. Ed. 316. In the complaint in that action it was alleged that the debtor before his death was absent from the state "for more than five years." The court held that that allegation could not be treated as definitely describing a longer period than five years and one day. Going back to June, 1887, the court held that the road in question had been traveled continuously up to the spring of 1905. The court fails to find that said road had been worked and kept up at the expense of the public, or that it had been located and recorded by order of the board of county commissioners as a highway, as provided by said section 851, as amended by the Sess. Laws 1893, p. 12. But it is contended by counsel for respondent that said road was established as a highway under the provisions of said section 851 before its amendment, which did not require the road to be kept up at the expense of the public. The difficulty arises from the fact that it is alleged in the complaint that said road had been used by the public and kept up at public expense for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of the action, and the issues made by the pleadings clearly show that this action was commenced and the issues framed upon the theory that said road had become a highway by user and by reason of the expenditure of public money thereon under the provisions of said section 851 after its amendment in 1893. For that reason, it was error for the court to admit evidence of the establishment of this road from 1887 to 1893. As the court failed to find that said road was worked at public expense for a period of five years, the findings are not sufficient on which to base a judgment in favor of the plaintiff without a finding to that effect. It was error, under the issues, to enter judgment on the theory that said road had become a highway by prescription prior to 1893.

Several errors were assigned in regard to the admission and rejection of evidence. It will not be necessary for us to pass upon each of them separately. Assignment No. 11 is on the ground that the court permitted the plaintiff to state in what road district certain lands were situated. There was no error in that, as a plat of the road district was introduced in evidence showing the lands included within said district. Objection was raised to the introduction of said plat on the ground of its insufficiency, but we think the plat sufficient and that it was properly admitted.

The question was asked one witness whether or not there was a well-established road there at that time, and he was permitted to answer over the objection of counsel for the defendant. While that calls for a conclusion, we do not think it reversible error. The witness ought to have stated the condition of the road, rather than whether he considered it a well-established road or not. The court rejected certain evidence offered to show that there were numerous roads running in all directions across the school section involved in this controversy, and there were several questions asked which, if answered, would tend to illuminate the issues made by the pleadings, and it is sufficient for us to say here that, in case this action is tried again, the court should admit all evidence showing or tending to show that there was no well-defined and established road along the section line referred to.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. Costs are awarded to the appellant.

AILSHIE, C. J. (concurring). The only serious question in this case over which there is any doubt or diversity of opinion among the members of the court is as to whether or not under the statute the road overseer can maintain an action for the removal of an obstruction on a highway that has not been "duly laid out or erected." Upon the first consideration of this case, I was inclined to the opinion that he could not, but on more deliberate reflection and examination of the various provisions of the statute in reference to highways, and the duties of overseers in relation thereto, I am convinced that he may properly maintain such action. Article 8, c. 2, tit. 6, Pol. Code 1887 (Rev. St. 1887, §§ 960-976), is entitled, "Obstructions and injuries to highways." The first five sections of that article deal with "encroachments" upon highways "duly laid out and recorded," and of the duty of the road overseer to give notice to the person maintaining such encroachment, and provide for the prosecution of an action to abate the same in case the encroachment is denied. It will be seen from an examination of section 962 of that article that the person who maintains an encroachment upon such a highway is liable to a fine of $10 for each day it is maintained after receiving notice to remove the same. The same section also provides that, "if the encroachment is such as to effectually obstruct and prevent the use of the road for vehicles, the overseer must forthwith remove the same." In other words, where the encroachment grows into an obstruction, then it ceases to be incumbent upon the road overseer to prosecute an action for its abatement, but he may summarily abate it, and is vested with all the authority of a public officer to forthwith remove the obstruction or abate the nuisance.

After dealing with the matter of encroachments and the method of abating the same, and the subject of forfeitures and penalties for maintaining them, the Legislature passes to the consideration of the subject of "obstructions" to highways, and in section 967 it is provided that "whoever obstructs or injures any highway, or obstructs or diverts any water course thereon, is liable to a penalty of $5.00 for each day such obstruction or injury remains, and must be punished as provided in the Penal Code." The remaining sections of that entire article deal exclusively with what are termed by the Legislature "obstructions" to highways. Nothing is therein said about the road overseer maintaining an action for the abatement of "obstructions," but section 975 provides that "all penalties or forfeitures given in this chapter, and not otherwise provided for, must be recovered by the road overseers of the respective road districts." This latter section was amended by act of February 7, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 131), but the amendment only deals with the use of the fines so collected. An examination of the several sections from 967 to 975 discloses that numerous fines and penalties of different grades and character are prescribed for the different kinds and classes of injuries to highways and obstructions thereon. I take it that the Legislature had in mind a clear distinction between an encroachment and an obstruction on a public highway. By encroachment they evidently meant and had reference to some intrusion into or trespass upon a highway which would tend to lessen and diminish the width and extent of the public easement, but which would not amount to a complete blocking up of the highway and a substantial delay to passengers and travelers thereon. This view is borne out by the latter part of section 962, wherein it recognizes that an encroachment may grow into an obstruction such as to "prevent the use of the road for vehicles" in which case the overseer is given the right to summarily remove the obstruction. By "obstruction" they evidently meant something that would prevent, hinder, or substantially delay travel over the highway. The moving of a fence over into the road, the construction of a wall out onto a portion of the right of way, the digging of a ditch along the highway, and various other acts of this kind and character might constitute an encroachment upon the highway and easement, and yet not amount to an obstruction so as to materially delay or hinder travel. On the other hand, a fence, building, or wall constructed across the entire road would amount to an obstruction that the road overseer is clearly authorized and entitled to summarily remove. In Chase v. City of Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, 51 N. W. 560, 15 L. R. A. 553, 29 Am. St. Rep. 898, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin defined "encroachment" and "obstruction" as used in the road laws of that state as follows: "An 'encroachment' is a gradual entering on and taking possession by one of what is not his own; an unlawful gaining upon the rights of possession of another. An 'obstruction' is a blocking up; filling with obstacles or impediments; impeding; embarrassing, or opposing the passage along and over the street." To the same effect see 3 Words & Phrases, 2385, and 6 Words & Phrases, 4891.

It is also worthy of note that all those sections of article 8, supra, providing penalties for placing obstructions in roads, uniformly use the word "highway." Now, a highway includes not only roads duly laid out and erected, but also roads that have been used and worked as such for a period of five years. In other words, it is as much a violation of the law to obstruct a highway that has become such by user, even though it has never been recorded, as it is to obstruct a highway that has been duly laid out and recorded. The Legislature has as fully authorized the overseer to maintain an action for the collection of a penalty where the obstruction is on an unrecorded road as where it is on a recorded road. In such case the board of commissioners clearly have no control over him in the sense that they can prevent his maintaining an action. It would seem to be the height of inconsistency to hold that he may maintain an action to recover a penalty for obstructing an unrecorded highway, and at the same time hold that he cannot maintain an action for the abatement of the same nuisance for which he has collected a penalty. It requires exactly the same evidence in each case. It is a primary and fundamental rule of statutory construction that, where the power and authority is granted to do a certain thing, the act necessarily carries with it the implied power to employ the means necessary to accomplish the result. Section 873, Rev. St., as amended by act of February 7, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 128), provides that "road overseers, under the direction and supervision and pursuant to orders of the board of commissioners appointing them must: First. Take charge of the public highways within their respective districts: Second. Keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair." This section contains seven other subdivisions, among which are the provisions providing for notice to inhabitants liable to do road work and for the collection of commutation fee where work is not performed, making semiannual reports, etc. I do not think the Legislature by this provision meant to limit or subject the right of the overseer to remove obstructions and keep roads clear of impediments to free passage to the orders and directions of the board of commissioners. Such a construction would be inconsistent with the duties of the road overseer, and the general purpose and object of the road laws. I think the Legislature meant to authorize the road overseer to summarily remove obstructions to highways. On the other hand, it seems to me that, if the obstruction is of such a character that the overseer does not feel justified in assuming the responsibility of a summary abatement, he may pursue his remedy in court, and abate the nuisance and remove the obstruction by an action and consequent decree of the court. A man might in some instances move a house or other building onto the highway and completely block the same, and he might have his family in the building. On attempting to summarily remove the obstruction, it might appear to the overseer that a breach of the peace would be occasioned and violence be the result. In such a case he would undoubtedly prefer to resort to an action, and, in my opinion, he is granted all the implied power and authority necessary to enable him to prosecute such an action.

I concur in the reversal of the judgment.

STEWART, J. (concurring specially). I concur with the majority opinion that this case should be reversed. I am unable, however, to agree with the majority opinion, holding that the plaintiff, as road overseer, can maintain this action. Justice SULLIVAN in the principal opinion seems to hold that the plaintiff has a right to maintain this action by reason of the fact that, under the provisions of section 873 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 (as amended by Sess. Laws 1899, p. 128), the road overseer, under the direction of the board of commissioners, takes charge of all public highways of his district, and under the provisions of the act of February 18, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 306), he is made an elective officer, and as section 3634, Rev. St. 1887, provides "a public nuisance may be abated by any public body, or officer authorized thereto by law," that, therefore, the road overseer, being a public officer, has a right to maintain an action to abate as a nuisance any encroachment upon a public highway, as provided by section 963 of the Revised Statutes of 1887. Chief Justice AILSHIE, however, in his concurring opinion seems to think there is a difference between an encroachment and an obstruction of a public highway, and that, while the road overseer might not maintain an action to remove an encroachment upon a public highway "unless the same be duly laid out or erected," yet, inasmuch as the different sections in article 8 of the Political Code provide that a road overseer may maintain an action to recover the penalties for placing obstructions upon a public highway whether "duly laid out or erected" or not, that, therefore, there is an implied power that the road overseer may also bring an action to remove such obstruction. It will thus be observed that my associates take a contradictory position in the outset; Justice SULLIVAN holding that a road overseer may maintain an action to remove an encroachment upon a highway because it is a nuisance, whether the highway be "duly laid out or erected" or not, while Chief Justice AILSHIE holds that the word "encroachment" only applies to roads "duly laid out or erected," as defined by Rev. St. 1887, § 960, and that the road overseer's authority to maintain the action to remove an obstruction to a public highway whether "duly laid out or erected" is an implied authority by reason of the authority of the road overseer to bring an action to recover the penalty for obstructing a public highway.

It is a general proposition of law that the limit of the power of a public officer is the statute conferring the power, and what further power is necessarily implied, in order to effectuate that which is expressly conferred. The principle stated in the concurring opinion of Chief Justice AILSHIE that, "It is a primary and fundamental rule of statutory construction that where the power and authority is granted to do a certain thing, the act necessarily carries with it the implied power to employ the means necessary to accomplish the result," as applied to the plaintiff, means that, while he is authorized under article 8, supra, to bring an action to recover the penalty therein named, he is also impliedly authorized to employ whatever means may be necessary to recover such penalty; but the principle cannot be extended so as to authorize a suit entirely different and brought for a different purpose. In the performance of a ministerial duty enjoined by statute when the mode of performance is prescribed by the statute, no further power is implied, nor has the officer any discretion. He must strictly pursue the statute. His authority is the command of the statute, and it is the limit of his power. Throop on Public Officers, § 556; Ex parte Farrell (Mont.) 92 Pac. 785.

Section 900 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 provides that, if any highway "duly laid out or erected" is encroached upon by fences, buildings, or otherwise, the road overseer of the district may, orally or in writing, require the encroachment to be removed from the highway. And section 903 provides that if the encroachment is denied, and the owner refuses to remove the same, the road overseer must commence an action to abate the same as a nuisance. This section only authorizes the road overseer to commence an action to remove a nuisance by reason of an encroachment upon a highway "duly laid out or erected." The words "duly laid out or erected," as used in section 900, have reference to roads which have been laid out or erected by the proper officers in the manner prescribed by law. They have reference to formal or official action which the law enjoins upon those charged with the duty of establishing public highways. Freshour v. Hihn, 99 Cal. 443, 84 Pac. 87. It is admitted in this case that the road was not "duly laid out or erected." As section 3634 only authorizes the abatement of a nuisance by "an officer authorized thereto by law," and the law only authorizes the road overseer to bring an action for an encroachment upon a highway "duly laid out or erected," it follows that the road overseer has no authority found in the statute authorizing him to bring an action to remove an encroachment or obstruction upon any other kind of road. Section 907, Rev. St. 1887, upon which the Chief Justice bases his conclusion that the plaintiff has authority to bring this action, provides: "Whoever obstructs or injures any highway, or obstructs or diverts any water course thereon, is liable to a penalty of five dollars for each day such obstruction or injury remains, and must be punished as provided in the Penal Code." It says nothing about the authority of the road overseer to bring an action to remove an obstruction to a public highway. The authority to bring an action to recover a penalty for placing an obstruction in a highway is not authority to bring an action to remove an obstruction to a highway. The majority opinion, however, holds that this action is not brought under section 900, supra, but is brought under section 851 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, as amended. This latter section provides that "roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of commissioners, and all roads used as such, for a period of five years, provided the latter shall have been worked and kept up at the expense of the public, or located and recorded by order of the board of commissioners, are highways." Paragraph 3 of the complaint alleges that for more than 10 years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, continuously and uninterruptedly, except when interfered with during the past two years by the defendant, said road has been used, worked, and kept up at the expense of the public as a public highway. It will thus be seen that this allegation does not bring this case within that class of cases which the statute authorizes the road overseer to maintain, for the purpose of abating as a nuisance any encroachment upon a public highway. Had the Legislature intended to authorize a road overseer to bring an action to abate as a nuisance an obstruction upon a public highway before the same has been "duly laid out or erected," they certainly would have said so.

Rev. St. 1887, § 873, as amended by Laws 1899, p. 128, provides that "road overseers, under the direction and supervision, and pursuant to orders of the board of commissioners appointing them, must: First. Take charge of the public highways within their respective districts. Second. Keep them clear from obstructions and in good repair." It is not alleged in the complaint nor proved upon the trial that the board of commissioners ever authorized the plaintiff to take charge of the highway in controversy in this case, nor to keep the same free from obstructions or in good repair. In fact, there is nothing alleged in the complaint or proved upon the trial which shows that the highway in controversy was ever "laid out or erected" as such, or that it was ever recognized in any way by the commissioners of Fremont county as a public highway, or that its course or width was ever fixed or established in any way. Before the plaintiff, as road overseer, has any authority to declare the same a public highway, and bring an action to remove obstructions placed thereon, his authority must clearly appear in the statutes. Section 870, subd. 3, Rev. St. 1887, authorizes the board of commissioners to cause to be recorded as highways such roads as have become such by usage or abandonment by the public. These various sections of the statutes of this state are almost identical with the statutes of California bearing upon the same subject. In the case of Smith v. Talbot, 77 Cal. 16, 18 Pac. 795, the court held that no action lies under section 2734 of the Political Code at the suit of a road overseer to abate an encroachment of a highway as a nuisance, and for the penalty therein provided, unless the encroachment came into existence after the highway is "laid out and completed." If placed there by the owner of the land before the highway is laid out, the remedy of the road overseer is to pursue the course prescribed by section 2695 of the Political Code. Section 2734 of the California Code, referred to in the above opinion, is identical with section 963 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 of this state, and referred to in the opinion of Justice SULLIVAN, and section 2695 of the Political Code of California referred to in the above opinion is the same as section 986 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 of this state.

There is another remedy clearly provided for by the statutes of this state. Subdivision 4, § 1759, Rev. St. 1887, authorizes the board of county commissioners "to lay out, maintain, control, and manage public roads, turnpikes, ferries, and bridges, within the county and levy such taxes therefor as authorized by law." And subdivision 13 of the same section provides: "To direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party in interest, employ counsel to conduct the same, with or without the district attorney, as they may direct." This statute clearly provides a remedy for a case like that alleged in the complaint, and the county commissioners are clearly authorized under section 3634 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 to bring an action to abate a public nuisance.

I am unable to find in the statutes any authority giving to the plaintiff the right to maintain this action. For these reasons, I dissent from that part of the opinion of the majority which holds that the plaintiff can maintain this action.

NELSON BENNETT CO. et al. v. TWIN FALLS LAND & WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 4, 1908. On Rehearing, Jan. 30, 1908.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—RIGHT TO LIEN—SUB-CONTRACTORS.

Under Act Cong. June 11, 1896, c. 420, 29 Stat. 434, 6 Fed. St. Ann. p. 398 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1556] which is supplementary to Carey Act Aug. 4, 1894, c. 208, 28 Stat. 226, 6 Fed. St. Ann. pp. 396-398 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1552], Act Aug. 18, 1894 c. 301, 28 Stat. 422 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1554], and the act of the Legislature of the state of Idaho of March 2, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 282), accepting the provisions of the Carey act, and providing for the reclamation, occupation, and disposal of lands thereunder, a lien is granted in favor of the person, company, or association contracting for the construction of canals and reclamation works for the irrigation of arid lands thereunder, and such lien extends to all lands in the segregation that can be irrigated by such system, to the full extent of the price per acre for which such person, company, or association contracts and agrees to sell water rights, and the contractor or subcontractor performing work under such person, company, or association is entitled to the benefit of the lien laws to secure the payment to him for such work to the full extent of the title, interests, rights, and claims of the company having the contract from the state, and to the full extent of, and commensurate with, the lien rights of such company.

2. SAME.

The rights of the lien claimant who is a contractor or subcontractor under the person, company, or association which has the contract from the state will extend to all the rights, interests, claim, and title of such company in and to the works and irrigation system and lands thereunder; but the lien claimant cannot by foreclosure of his lien acquire any greater right than that possessed by such company or association.

3. SAME—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING—AMBIGUITY.

Where a complaint states in ordinary and concise language the nature of the cause of action, and states the number of cubic yards of earth removed for which the plaintiff claims compensation, and the classification to which the same belongs, and the specific contract or piece of work on which the same was performed, it is not open to demurrer on the ground of uncertainty or ambiguity in that particular; and it is not error for the trial court to deny a motion for a "bill of particulars" in such case, requiring the plaintiff to state the particular amount claimed for every given number of feet in distance or at any given station upon the works.

4. PLEADING—BILL OF PARTICULARS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—EQUITY.

Section 4209, Rev. St. 1887, provides the method for an adverse party securing an itemized statement of an account, and, in addition to that provision of the statute, the court in an equity case has the inherent power to so regulate and control its proceedings as to require the party to furnish a bill of particulars in a proper case.

5. CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION—MUTUALITY.

A stipulation in a contract, requiring the submission of differences and controversies arising thereunder to the chief engineer of one of the contracting parties as umpire, and leaving the measurements, estimates, and classification of the work to him, and providing that his measurements and classifications shall not estop the party employing the engineer from disputing or questioning them, will not be enforced by the courts as a binding obligation against the other party thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, § 21.]

6. SAME—AGREEMENT FOR UMPIRE—SETTING ASIDE UMPIRE'S FINDINGS.

Where the issue tendered is that the chief engineer of the defendant company, selected as umpire to determine all questions of controversy, acted fraudulently and arbitrarily in making estimates, measurements, and classifications, and without previously making any proper inspection on which to found an honest judgment, and with intent to injure and defraud the plaintiff and deprive it of its just compensation, and did arbitrarily and in violation of good faith make and cause to be made false and untrue estimates, measurements, and classifications, such issue, if supported by the evidence, will authorize and justify a court in setting aside such final estimates, measurements, and classifications, and in hearing the evidence as to the true measurements and classifications that should have been made and determined the same as though no estimates, measurements, or classifications had been made by an engineer and no submission had ever been made.

7. MECHANICS' LIENS — ENFORCEMENT — FINDING — SUFFICIENCY.

A finding by the trial court on the foregoing issue "that the chief engineer wrongfully, arbitrarily, and without having made proper observations, and without sufficient knowledge upon which to found a just judgment in respect to the kind, quality, and classification of materials, and in violation of good faith and duty, did make, cause to be made and permit untrue and grossly erroneous estimates and classifications of the kind, character, and amount of materials removed and placed, and work done," is sufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the true measurements and amount of work done, and the proper and just classifications as found from the evidence in the case.

8. CONTRACTS — AGREEMENT FOR UMPIRE — SETTING ASIDE UMPIRE'S ESTIMATES.

Where the chief engineer of a defendant company, who has been selected as umpire for the purpose of making a final determination of controversies and differences in reference to the work, material, measurements, and classifications, retains in his service an assistant engineer who is manifestly prejudiced and biased against the contractor, and where, after such chief engineer has been advised of the animus, bias, and prejudice of his assistant against the contractor, causes such assistant engineer to make the measurements, estimates, and classifications of the work done by such contractor, and it manifestly appears that such estimates and classifications have been unfair and unjust, and discriminating against the contractor, the court, when appealed to, will set the same aside, and ascertain from the evidence submitted the true amount of work done or material furnished, and the proper measurements and classifications thereof, and order judgment accordingly.

9. SAME.

Evidence in this case examined, and held sufficient to support findings and judgment entered and rendered thereon, except as to total number of cubic yards of earth moved; and judgment modified as to excess.

10. MECHANICS' LIENS — ENFORCEMENT — ATTORNEY'S FEES — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

That portion of the lien laws of this state (section 12, p. 150, Lien Laws 1899), which provides that upon the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien the court may allow reasonable attorney's fees in favor of the plaintiff, is constitutional and valid. Thompson v. Wise Boy Min. & Milling Co., 9 Idaho, 343, 74 Pac. 958, followed and approved. Held further, that under the facts and circumstances of this case and in view of the amount involved and the questions raised, an allowance of $10,000 as attorney's fees is not excessive.

11. SAME — COSTS.

Order, made on motion to tax costs, examined and sustained. Anderson v. Ferguson-Bach Sheep Company, 12 Idaho, 418, 86 Pac. 41, followed and approved.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Cassia County; Lyttleton Price, Judge.

Action by the Nelson Bennett Company and another against the Twin Falls Land & Water Company to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

See 92 Pac. 980.

Henderson, Pierce, Critchlow & Barrette and S. H. Hays, for appellants. Marshall K. Snell, Bertha M. Snell, and H. H. Henderson, for respondents.

AILSHIE, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial. The Nelson Bennett Company, a Washington corporation, in the month of March, 1903, entered into a contract with the Twin Falls Land & Water Company, a Utah corporation, whereby the former agreed to construct about 38 miles of canal for the appellants in the counties of Lincoln and Cassia on the south side of the Snake river, and which is now commonly called the "Twin Falls Canal." After the work was completed, the Nelson Bennett Company filed a lien against the canal and all the property connected therewith belonging to the Twin Falls Company, to secure its claim for the balance due in the sum of $185,705.62. About the same time liens were filed by subcontractors; one by Alexander Toponce, and one by Ryberg & Carleson. The Nelson Bennett Company commenced an action to foreclose the lien, as did also Toponce; but it seems that Ryberg & Carleson have never prosecuted any action for the foreclosure of their lien—at least they never sought to do so in this action. At the time of the trial, an order was made for the consolidation of the Nelson Bennett Case and the Toponce Case, and the action was thereafter prosecuted in the name of the two plaintiffs. The defendant and appellant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and also pleading special matters in defense. The case went to trial, and resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $162,211.26.

The questions presented on this appeal have involved the examination of a voluminous record and exhaustive briefs. In order to a proper understanding of the questions that must be determined on this appeal, it is necessary to recite the relation of the respective parties to the property, on which the lien is sought, and some of the transactions which led up to the status they occupied at the time of entering into this contract, and of the rendition of judgment thereon. On the 2d day of January, 1903, the appellant corporation entered into an agreement and contract with the state of Idaho, the latter acting through and by the authority of its State Board of Land Commissioners, whereby the company undertook to build a dam across Snake river and construct a system of main and lateral canals in the counties of Lincoln and Cassia, sufficient in capacity for carrying water enough to irrigate a tract of about 270,000 acres of land lying under such system of canals. The contract was entered into by the State Board of Land Commissioners, under authority of the act of the Legislature approved March 2, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 282), entitled "An act to provide for a state engineer, defining his duties and regulating his compensation, and to provide for the acceptance by the state of Idaho from the United States of certain lands, and to provide for the reclamation, occupation and disposal of the same." By the provisions of the foregoing act, the Legislature provided for an acceptance of the terms of the act of Congress commonly known as the "Carey Act" (Act Aug. 4, 1894, c. 208, 28 Stat. 226 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1552], and Act Aug. 18, 1894, c. 301, 28 Stat. 422 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1554], found in 6 Fed. St. Ann. pp. 306-398, and prescribed the means, manner, and method by which the state might avail itself of any part of the million-acre grant made by the Carey act, and acts of Congress supplemental thereto. It will be seen that the Legislature of this state did not authorize the state, or any board of commissioners under the state, to construct and erect these works; but it rather authorized the state to contract with individuals, associations, or corporations for doing such work. An examination into the character and extent of the appellants' interest in this property and these works is at once suggested, by reason of the contention that it makes to the effect that a mechanic's lien cannot be maintained against this property. The land and water company has argued with much force and earnestness that it has no lienable interest in this property; that the entire property belongs to the state of Idaho and to the United States; that the canal system, and the water and the entire works, belong to the state of Idaho; and that the lands to be irrigated principally belong to the United States. Appellants contend that the only interest they have is that they may do this work and receive their pay, and that the law does not permit a lien either against the state or the general government.

By section 20 of the act of the Legislature of 1899, the person, company, or association which secures the contract for the construction of a canal system and for the reclamation of arid lands under the Carey act is given a "prior lien on said water right and land upon which said water is used for all deferred payments for said water right." This provision of the legislative act, granting to the contractors or construction company a lien, is authorized by and is in harmony with section 1 of the sundry civil appropriation act of Congress of June 11, 1896 (29 Stat. 434, c. 420 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1556]), found in 6 Fed. St. Ann. p. 398, which authorizes the state to create a lien "for the actual cost and necessary expense of reclamation," etc., under the Carey act. By the provisions of the statute and the contract entered into thereunder, the appellant herein acquired the right to construct the system of canals and ditches covering this tract of land, and the right to divert the necessary amount of water from the Snake river for the irrigation of such lands. It likewise acquired a right to charge and collect from each and every settler the sum of $25 per acre for a water right, and to have the same become an immediate and continuing lien upon the lands to be irrigated. It acquired a right of way for the ditches and canals, and also an additional strip of land, not exceeding 50 feet in width along the main canal and 30 feet along the laterals, as a right of way for working, inspection, and improvement purposes, and the right to increase or enlarge the canal at any time it might see fit or proper to do so, for the purpose of carrying any additional waters either for its own use or purposes or for that of rental and distribution, and the right to the use of any surplus water that might be carried in the canal and not needed for the purpose of irrigating the lands in this segregation. Under its contract and the statute (section 7 of amendatory act approved March 18, 1901; Sess. Laws 1901, p. 198), it secured the additional right to acquire title absolute from the state of Idaho to any and all lands contained in the segregation not applied for or taken by settlers within two years after the final completion of the ditch and irrigation works. It also acquired a right of indefinite possession and control of the system, and authority to charge and collect additional rates from the water consumers not to exceed 80 cents per acre per annum, and to become a stockholder in the settlers' and consumers' company that was to be formed for the purpose of eventually taking over the management of the canals.

The foregoing are some of the numerous rights and interests we find provided and stipulated for in the contract entered into between the appellant corporation and the state. As to the legal effect of these various stipulations and provisions, and the extent of the rights, title, and interest acquired by the appellant corporation under them, we express no opinion; nor are we required in this case to determine their extent or character beyond that of ascertaining whether they are sufficient on which to found or rest a mechanic's lien. That the Twin Falls Land & Water Company had and still has an interest in this canal system, and the lands thereunder and the waters appropriated for their irrigation and reclamation, and that under the statutes and decisions of this state such property rights are real estate, there can be no doubt. Section 2825, Rev. St. 1887; Welch v. Garrett, 5 Idaho, 639, 51 Pac. 405; Ada Co., etc., v. Farmers', etc., Co., 5 Idaho, 793, 51 Pac. 990; Hard v. Boise City Irrigation & Land Co., 9 Idaho, 589, 76 Pac. 331, 65 L. R. A. 407. Under section 1 of the mechanic's lien law of this state (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 147), "Every person performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration or repair of any * * * ditch, dyke, flume * * * has a lien upon the same for the work or labor done or materials furnished," etc. The statute further provides that the contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or any person having charge of the construction, alteration, or repair shall be deemed the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter. In this case there is no contention made that the lien claimant can acquire any greater right or interest under its lien than that owned and possessed by the Twin Falls Land & Water Company. It should be borne in mind, however, that under the act of Congress and the state statute above cited both the general government and the state Legislature have granted the right of lien upon the lands to be irrigated to any person, association, or corporation taking a contract from the state to the extent of "the actual cost and necessary expenses of reclamation." The act of the Legislature, in conformity with the act of Congress, has granted a lien to "any person, company or association furnishing water for any tract of land," for the expense of the construction of the works, or rather to the extent of the price allowed to be charged for the water right for each acre of land. Under this enactment of the state Legislature, it is clear to us that the contractors and subcontractors, under a construction company like the appellant, would be entitled to avail themselves of the benefit of the lien laws of the state; and that in case of foreclosure and sale under the lien they would be entitled to sell all the right, interest, and claim of the construction company; and that the purchaser at such foreclosure sale would be subrogated to all the rights, interests, and privileges of the construction company therein. If it be conceded by appellant that it has no interest in or title to any of this property, and no right of possession thereto, then we grant that the respondent can sell nothing at a foreclosure sale. This lien extends only to the interest, claim, and right of the Twin Falls Land & Water Company. If it has no interest therein, it cannot suffer by a foreclosure sale under this lien. If it has an interest therein, that interest may be sold at foreclosure sale. The appellant is not the representative of either the state of Idaho or the general government, and is in no position to present the interests of either here, and cannot complain for or on account of any pretended claim that may be preferred against either. In fact, however, the claim here made is only commensurate with the interests and rights of the appellant company. To that extent the action may be prosecuted, and no further. Section 4, Lien Law; Sess. Laws 1899, p. 148. Miners, by discovery and location, acquire only a possessory right to mining claims, while the fee remains in the government; yet they may go ahead and expend thousands of dollars in running tunnels, sinking shafts, and making other improvements thereon, and the contractor, laborers, and materialmen who have engaged in such work are entitled to a lien on the mine or mining claim for such labor or material, and we know of no court that has refused to allow the lien because the fee was in the general government or that the miner had nothing but a possessory title. On the contrary, the courts have uniformly allowed the lien claimant to foreclose his lien and sell the property, and the purchaser has been recognized as having acquired all the interest that the locator and possessor of the claim had at the time of preferring the lien and foreclosing the same. Many cases may be found where the courts have held that liens preferred against property, where the party who employed the laborers, or made the contract, or purchased the material had only a right of possession or a leasehold interest, would extend to all the rights, interest, and claim the employer or purchaser had in or to the property. In Badger Lumber Co. v. Malone, 8 Kan. App. 692, 54 Pac. 692, the Court of Appeals of Kansas, in discussing this question, said: "We conclude the law to be that a mechanic's lien affects whatever estate or interest in the land upon which the building is erected is owned and possessed by the person who causes the erection of the building, at the time when the contract is made for the material. And, if the person contracting to have the building erected has any estate or interest in the land upon which it stands, the lien of the materialman who furnishes the material extends to the whole of that estate or interest, whatever it may be. The word 'owner' is not limited in its meaning to an 'owner in fee,' but includes also an owner of a leasehold or other estate. It therefore follows that the estate possessed by the builder, whatever its extent may be, in the land, is subject to a mechanic's lien, and may be sold." To the same effect, see Farnham on Water and Water Rights, vol. 3, p. 1995; Garland v. Bear Lake Co., 9 Utah, 35, 34 Pac. 368; s. c. 164 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 7, 41 L. Ed. 327; Jar- rell v. Block (Okla.) 92 Pac. 167; A. & E. Ency. (2d Ed.) 297.

Having determined that the plaintiffs were entitled to liens, and were pursuing the proper remedy, we now pass to the consideration of the further questions that were raised and are presented here. The defendant filed a special demurrer to the complaint on the grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty, and pointed out specifically numerous instances in which it claimed the complaint was too indefinite and uncertain to enable it to properly answer or go to trial. At the same time, defendant filed a motion based on the grounds designated in the demurrer, and moved the court to require the plaintiff to furnish it with a bill of particulars. The demurrer and motion came on for hearing, and the demurrer was overruled and the motion denied. The defendant thereafter answered. It now assigns the action of the court in overruling the demurrer and denying the motion as error. The chief ground relied upon by the appellant is that, since the measurements of the amount of work done and the estimates and classifications thereof were by the contract to be left to the appellant's chief engineer, and in pursuance thereof the engineer had made the measurements, estimates, and classifications, and the respondent claimed that they were unfair, fraudulent, and incorrect, and that in truth and in fact the classifications should be very different from those made, the court should have required the respondent to point out the particular place or places along the line of the works, and the particular stations, sections, or subdivisions where these errors and mistakes and fraudulent estimates had been committed, and the particulars on which it relied for a recovery, so as to enable appellant to properly answer, and to prepare its case for trial. The respondent constructed about 22 miles of the main canal. This canal was 80 feet wide at the bottom and 120 feet wide at the top. In its construction the contract contemplated that it would be necessary to remove all kinds of material, from that of loose earth to solid rock, and accordingly it enumerated a number of classifications, such as solid rock, loose rock, common material (earth that could be plowed with six horses), and earth or other material that could not be plowed with that number of horses. The allegations of the complaint involved in this consideration are paragraphs 8 and 9 thereof, which are as follows:

"(6) That plaintiff proceeded under said contract and employment, and in good faith completed and fulfilled said contract on its part; and did between the dates of March 9, 1903, and the 6th day of August, 1904, perform and furnish work, labor, and material in the construction of said canal, ditch, dams, adjuncts, and irrigation system and works, as follows:

482.85 acres cleared at $10 per acre	$ 4,828 50
70,732 cubic yards solid rock at 90 cts.	63,858 80
455,569 cubic yards loose rock and hard pan at 45 cts. per cubic yard	205,006 05
1,632,568 cubic yards common material at 13 cts. per cubic yard ..	212,233 84
499,172 cubic yards overhaul at 2 cts. per cubic yard, per 100 feet ..	9,983 44
28,256 feet bridge timber at $42 per M.	1,186 75
336 acres bond-plowing at $3.00 per acre	1,008 00
2 Pettelo cars furnished at $50 each	100 00
184,551 cubic yards of embankment at 27 cts. per cubic yard ..	49,828 77
9,789 yards of riprap at $1.25 per yard	12,236 25
167 days' pumping at $5 per day ..	835 00

Amount to the sum of..... $560,905 40

"(9) That, according to the terms of the contract between plaintiff and defendant canal company—the amount and classification of the work done under said contract—said plaintiff was to be governed by the rules, regulations and restrictions, and specifications of the engineers in charge of said work, which said engineers were in the employ of said defendant canal company. That the said defendant canal company and its said engineers fraudulently and arbitrarily, and without having made actual or correct measurements, and without having made proper inspection of the same, and without sufficient knowledge upon which to found an honest judgment in respect either to the proper measurements or the amount of cubic yards excavated, or the classifications of the same as to earth, loose rock, solid rock, hard pan, and of the other work done, and with intent to injure and defraud this plaintiff, and to deprive it of the just amount of compensation due for said work and material as aforesaid, the said defendant canal company and its engineers arbitrarily, and in violation of good faith and duty, did make, or cause to be made, false and untrue final estimates, so called, or calculations and certificates of the amount or kind of work done by the plaintiff. That said estimates and calculations and certificates of the kind of work done by said plaintiff, as made by the defendant canal company and its engineers, were false and untrue in this, to wit: That, according to the estimates made by said defendant canal company and its engineers, they allowed and furnished estimates to plaintiff for solid rock in the amount of 33,214 cubic yards, at the rate of 90 cents per cubic yard, when in truth and in fact there were 70,732 cubic yards of solid rock at the same price. That, according to the estimates and classifications made by said defendant canal company and its engineers, they allowed for loose rock and hard pan in the amount of 101,394.3 cubic yards, at the rate of 45 cents per cubic yard, when in truth and in fact there were 455,589 cubic yards of loose rock and hard pan at the same price. That, according to the estimates and classifications made by the said defendant canal company and its engineers, and as furnished defendant canal company, they allowed for overhaul 249,585.5 cubic yards, at the rate of 2 cents per cubic yard, while in truth and in fact there were 499,172 cubic yards at the same price. That the said defendant canal company did knowingly, intentionally, and with an intent to cheat and defraud plaintiff, order and direct in the performance of its said contract that it perform and plow 336 acres of bond plowing, for which plaintiff was to receive, and should have been allowed and received, the sum of $3 per acre. That said defendant canal company neglected and refused to allow said plaintiff anything whatsoever for said bond plowing, and have never made any allowance therefor. That the defendant canal company did take, and appropriate and use for its own use and benefit in the construction of said canal, two Pettelo grading cars of the value and price of $50 each, which cars were reasonably worth, and were worth at said time, the sum of $50 each, or $100. That said defendant canal company neglected and refused, and have always and still do neglect and refuse, to pay or allow plaintiff for said cars, although demand has been made for the payment of same. That the said defendant canal company, although ordering and directing that the plaintiff perform and furnish for its use and benefit in the puddling of its said dam, while under construction, 167 days' pumping of water, at the sum of $5 per day, that said services performed by plaintiff for said canal company in pumping of said water were reasonably worth, and were worth, the sum of $5 per day, which said defendant canal company promised and agreed to pay, but that they have neglected and refused, and do still neglect and refuse, to pay said pumping as heretofore set forth, or any part thereof. That, according to the estimates and specifications made by the said defendant canal company and its engineers, which were furnished to plaintiff, they allowed for 8,873 yards of riprap at the rate of $1.25 a yard, when in truth and in fact there were 9,789 yards at the same price. That, according to the estimates and specifications made by the said defendant canal company and its engineers, which were furnished to plaintiff, they allowed for 160,273 cubic yards for embankment and construction of its dam and canal at the price of 27 cents per cubic yard, when in truth and in fact there were 184,551 cubic yards at the same price. That, in respect to the above-enumerated items and estimates, calculations, and computations, as made by said defendant canal company and its engineers, they were false and untrue and grossly incorrect, and were arbitrarily made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding and depriving this plaintiff of the amount justly due to it for work performed under and in pursuance of said contract."

It will be seen from these allegations that the plaintiff in every instance gave the classification and number of cubic yards thereunder that had been allowed by the appellant's engineer, and also gave the number of cubic yards and classifications it contended was correct and that it should have received. The controversy and difficulty is therefore reduced to this: Was it necessary for the plaintiff, where it claimed 70,000 cubic yards of solid rock, when in fact the engineer's estimate had only given it 33,000 cubic yards, to state in its pleading or bill of particulars the particular point or points, station or stations, along the line of work at which it should have received increased estimates or different classifications; or, for instance, where it had only received an estimate of 100 cubic yards when it should have had 125 cubic yards in any given distance of the canal? It should be borne in mind, too, that the appellant company had on file all the figures, estimates, classifications, and records of its engineers showing the amount of excavation and work done along the entire length of this canal, and the number of cubic yards removed for every 100 feet thereof. It is further worthy of note that there was no material difference between the plaintiff and respondent as to the total number of cubic yards of material handled in the construction of this canal, with the exception of one piece of work known as the "Dry Creek Dam." The principal controversy arose over the classifications given the respondent by the appellant's engineer. For example, the appellant only allowed respondent for 101,394.3 cubic yards of loose rock and hard pan, while the respondent claimed that it should have had an estimate of 455,589 cubic yards of loose rock and hard pan. On the other hand, the engineer's estimate of common material was much larger than respondent claims it was entitled to; this difference arising out of the fact that he had not given large enough estimates of the more expensive classifications, and too large an estimate on the cheaper classifications. When the defendant company came to answer, it relied upon its engineer's estimates and classifications, and denied that any error, mistake, or fraud had been committed by him, and asserted the correctness of his estimates and classifications, and relied thereon. It is therefore difficult to see just how or wherein the appellant has been injured or prejudiced by the ruling of the court in overruling its demurrer and denying its motion. Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Co. (Cal. App.) 91 Pac. 427. We do not think the complaint was open to demurrer on the grounds of ambiguity or uncertainty. Under section 4209, Rev. St. 1887, in dealing with "general rules of pleading," a plaintiff is relieved from the necessity of pleading its items of an account, but must deliver to the adverse party a copy of the account within 10 days after written demand therefor, or be precluded from introducing evidence thereon. That section might be held to cover a case of this kind; but, if it does, it may then be said that the complaint in this case contained a statement of each item, or rather of the number of cubic yards under each classification, and the compensation claimed therefor. On the other hand, we have no statute providing for the ordering of "bills of particulars." The appellant does not appear to have relied upon the provisions of the foregoing statute, or pursued the remedy there pointed out; but rather applied to the court for an order requiring respondent to furnish a "bill of particulars," and, for the relief sought, relied upon the general and inherent powers of courts of justice to control their proceedings and regulate the conduct of trials, and to require the information that may be obtained by means of such statements or bills of particulars. United States v. Clawson, 4 Utah, 34, 5 Pac. 689; s. c. 114 U. S. 477, 5 Sup. Ct. 949, 29 L. Ed. 179; Commonwealth v. Snelling, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 330. We have no doubt of the power of the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to order bills of particulars in proper cases. 3 Ency. P. & P. 523; Tilton v. Beecher, 59 N. Y. 176, 17 Am. Rep. 342. We are satisfied, however, that there was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion in this case.

It is next urged by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give effect to the "contract provision giving engineer of defendant right to decide upon disputed questions"; and, further, that "the controversies have been decided by the chief engineer pursuant to the provisions of the contract." The provision of the contract involved in these assignments is as follows: "Engineer as Umpire.—(1) To prevent all disputes and misunderstanding in relation to any of the stipulations contained in this agreement, or their performance by either of said parties, the said engineer shall be and hereby is made umpire to decide all controversies arising or growing out of this contract, and his decision on any point or matter touching this agreement shall be final and conclusive between the parties. And it is further agreed between said parties that, wherever the word 'engineer' is used, it shall be taken and construed to mean chief engineer employed by said second party." Respondent in the first place urges that there are two reasons why this provision of the contract was ineffectual: (1) That it is so general and sweeping that it amounts to an attempt by contract to oust the courts of jurisdiction, and in support thereof cites Wait, Eng. & Arch. Juris. § 406, p. 340; 2 A. & E. Ency. (2d Ed.) 570; Louisville Ry. v. Donevan, 111 Ind. 179, 12 N. E. 153; Wood v. Chicago Ry. Co., 39 Fed. 52. See, also, B., O. & C. Co. v. Scholes, 14 Ind. App. 524, 43 N. E. 156, 56 Am. St. Rep. 307, and note. The second objection is that the contract under consideration reserved to the land and water company the right to question the estimates of the engineer both as to "amount and character of the work," etc. That provision of the contract is embodied in paragraph 3 thereof, and is as follows: "True Estimates.—Said second party shall not be estopped by any estimate by its engineer from showing at any time the true and correct amount and character of the work which shall have been done and materials which shall have been furnished by said first party, or by any person under this agreement." In the first place, it would seem that the stipulation constituting the chief engineer as umpire could not, and perhaps would not, receive a construction by the courts that would give to the engineer "the determination of questions relating to the meaning and interpretation of the contract itself," and would rather limit his determinations to "estimates, classifications, character of work," etc., provided by the contract to be done and performed. Wait, Eng. & Arch. Juris. § 408, p. 342. It is clear to us, on the other hand, that a stipulation in a contract, requiring the submission of any given questions or controversies to an engineer as umpire, in order to be binding upon one party, must be made obligatory on the other, and, in so far as it is made inoperative by the contract against one party, it will be held inoperative by the courts as against the other. If this point, however, were conceded in favor of appellant, there is another and equally serious reason why the courts will go back of the findings of the engineer in this case, and that reason we will consider presently.

As will be seen from an examination of paragraph 9 of the complaint above quoted, the issue tendered was that the "canal company and its said engineers fraudulently and arbitrarily, and without having made actual and correct measurements, and without having made proper inspection of the same, and without sufficient knowledge upon which to found an honest judgment in respect either to the proper measurements or the amount of cubic yards excavated, or the classifications of the same, * * * and with intent to injure and defraud this plaintiff, and to deprive it of the just amount of compensation due * * * its engineers arbitrarily, and in violation of good faith and duty, did make, or cause to be made, false and untrue final estimates," etc. In contracts for this character of work, stipulations for the submission of questions of difference and controversies to the decision of the chief engineer on the works have been generally sustained and enforced. Wait, Eng. & Arch. Juris. § 433; Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 11 Sup. Ct. 290, 34 L. Ed. 917; Davis v. King, 50 Am. St. Rep. 114, and note; McCoy v. Able, 131 Ind. 423, 30 N. E. 528, 31 N. E. 453; Baltimore, etc., Ry. Co. v. Scholes, 14 Ind. App. 524, 43 N. E. 156, 56 Am. St. Rep. 310. But where it has been shown that the engineer was biased against one of the parties to the contract, and declined to make honest estimates and decisions, or refused to make inquiries, or inform himself as to the facts in dispute, or as to the condition of the matters or works he was to determine upon, or the nature of the work or classification to which it belonged; or where he was utterly incompetent and unfit for the discharge of the duty, or acted fraudulently, or acted wholly on information received from other parties—the courts have furnished relief to the injured party. Spaulding v. Coeur d'Alene Ry. Co., 5 Idaho, 528, 51 Pac. 408; Davis v. King, 68 Conn. 465, 34 Atl. 107, 50 Am. St. Rep. 104; Edwards v. Hartshorn, 72 Kan. 19, 82 Pac. 520, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1030; Martinsburg & Potomac R. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255; Williams v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 112 Mo. 463, 20 S. W. 631, 34 Am. St. Rep. 403; Mundy v. L. & N. R. Co., 67 Fed. 633, 14 C. C. A. 583; Baltimore, etc., Ry. Co. v. Scholes, 14 Ind. App. 524, 43 N. E. 156, 56 Am. St. Rep. 307, and notes. Upon the issues made on this point the court found: "That the said chief engineer wrongfully, arbitrarily, and without having made proper examination, inspections, and tests, and without having made proper observations, and without sufficient knowledge upon which to found a just judgment in respect to the kind, quality, and classification of materials, and in violation of good faith and duty, did make, cause to be made, and permit untrue and grossly erroneous estimates and classifications of the kind, character, and amount of materials removed and placed, and work done, by said plaintiff. The said chief engineer, in arriving at his conclusion, based his judgment almost entirely upon reports made to him by his subordinates, and without any due or proper examination made by him to verify these reports. That the reports of the subordinates were grossly incorrect and untrue." It is argued by appellant that this finding is not sufficient to justify or support a judgment against the land and water company, setting aside the final estimates and classifications made by the engineer and going back of such estimates and classifications; that it is insufficient for the reason that it does not directly find the engineer or the company guilty of fraud or dishonesty in the matter of the estimates and classification. It has been established in this state that "the appellate court will give to the findings of the trial court the most liberal construction the language used will permit, in order to sustain a judgment founded thereon." Eastwood v. Standard Mines & Milling Co., 11 Idaho, 195, 81 Pac. 382. It is also well settled that findings of fact made by the trial court are not required to conform to all the niceties and rules governing the pleadings, which go to form the issues under which the findings are made. Here the court finds that the engineer made and caused to be made estimates and classifications "wrongfully" and "arbitrarily," and that he did so in "violation of good faith and duty," and that he caused and permitted "untrue and grossly erroneous" estimates and classifications, and that he based his judgment upon "grossly incorrect and untrue" reports made to him by his subordinates, and without due or proper effort to verify their correctness. It seems to us that there can be but little room for doubt that the findings of the court on these issues were sufficient to support the judgment entered thereon.

Pursuing this contention, however, appellant contends that the facts before the court were not sufficient to justify these findings and warrant the court in going back of the estimates and classifications made by the engineer. As stated by appellant in its brief, "The great controversy in the case, as to which the greater amount of testimony was given, was over that part of the specifications, Exhibit A, which classified loose rock and hard pan." The chief engineer had allowed the Nelson Bennett Company for 101,394.3 cubic yards of "loose rock and hard pan" at 45 cents per cubic yard, while the plaintiff contended that it was entitled to an allowance of 455,569 cubic yards of "loose rock and hard pan" at the price above stated. It seems to have been conceded by counsel, and assented to by the court, that there is a sheet of hard pan extending throughout that entire section of country, varying in depth below the surface. The parties to the contract had this fact in view, and stipulated therein for the classification of "hard pan" as common excavation where it "can be plowed with a 10-inch grading plow, behind a team of six good horses properly handled," and for its classification as loose rock where it "cannot be plowed with a 10-inch grading plow behind a team of six good horses properly handled." The controversy and evidence necessarily revolved about the issue as to whether this stratum of "hard pan" could be plowed with a 10-inch grading plow drawn by a team of six good horses properly handled. The record contains some hundreds of pages of evidence on this point. To review it in this opinion would be out of the question and useless. It is sufficient to say that the great preponderance of evidence on this point goes to sustain the contention made by the plaintiff and the finding of the court. It was shown that most of this work was done with 8 and 10 horses, and in some instances with smaller plows than that prescribed in the contract and specifications. In a few instances the appellant succeeded in showing that subcontractors had plowed with four and six horses; but in those cases the plows were much smaller than that mentioned in the contract, and in those cases the plaintiff

Appellant also urges that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding and conclusion that the engineer acted either fraudulently, arbitrarily, or dishonestly, or without honest inquiry and investigation, or without sufficient information to enable him to make honest and true estimates. The appellant's chief engineer was a Mr. Bickel, under whose charge were a number of assistant engineers. It is conceded that the larger part of the Nelson Bennett contract was examined and superintended by an assistant engineer named Shobert. It is also apparent from the record that Bickel received practically all his information, reports, estimates, and classifications from Shobert. Differences arose between the Nelson Bennett Company and the land and water company at an early stage in the progress of this work over the treatment the contractor and subcontractors were receiving from the employees of the land and water company, and especially from the engineers. Mr. Bennett complained of the conduct of the assistant engineer, Shobert, charging him with being prejudiced against him and with wanting to "do him." As an illustration of the feeling of animosity existing, we quote the following from the testimony of Mr. Bennett: "I called Shobert over and talked quite a while with him. I said: 'Shobert, why do you want to do me? What is the matter with you?' He says, 'Well, you ought to know why I want to do you.' He says, 'You got me discharged off the Northern Pacific Railway.' I said, 'Bill'—I called him 'Bill' because that was his nickname. I believe that is his name. We so call him. I says: 'Bill, you are entirely mistaken. I cannot see how you arrived at any such conclusion.' He told me what his authority was; that it was the chief engineer of the Northern Pacific Railroad told him—Mr. Darling. I told him, if Darling said anything of that kind, he was mistaken; and there was a good deal of feeling in the matter. He says: 'I don't believe a word of it. I don't believe Darling would say that unless it was true.' He says, 'You got me fired off there, and I don't see why you should expect anything from me.' I told him I didn't expect anything from him except justice, and I was going to try to get that; and I told him again that there was absolutely and unqualifiedly no reason for any statement that I got him fired from the Northern Pacific. 'On the contrary, I was always your friend.' I found there was no use talking to him about it. He had got it firmly fixed, and was going to do me injury. I went back to Milner, and saw the chief engineer, and called his attention to this matter. I saw Bickel in regard to this conversation with Shobert—the animosity he had expressed toward me. I explained to Bickel the conversation I had had with Shobert, and Shobert's answer to me. I said, 'Now, Mr. Bickel, it seems to me there should be something done in these premises; that it is not fair to myself, nor fair to these subcontractors who have to be punished if I am to keep a man over my work that expresses himself as having a desire to do me or to injure me; and he having such an opportunity to do it as to classify and return my estimates.' He asked me what I wanted him to do with him. I said: 'I don't want you to discharge him. You have plenty of work off my work. There is work below, location of that immense ditch and laterals. You could easily change him for one of the engineers of Faris-Kee, or you could put him below.' He got up and said: 'The very fact that you want me to discharge him is evidence that you did get him discharged off the Northern Pacific. I will tell you right now that I will not discharge him for you.' I said, 'All right, Mr. Bickel, I cannot help it. It is wrong.' In the fall, later on, I had another conversation with Mr. Shobert in regard to his feeling toward me." Later on, Bennett had another conversation with Shobert in which there appears to have been considerable feeling manifested, and wherein Shobert informed Bennett that he intended to make him and his subs hew to the line, and that he was going to do him up if he could. There seems to be no question about this conversation taking place, and, indeed, about this feeling existing. For a chief engineer and a corporation for which he was working to retain the services of a man under such circumstances, and with knowledge of the feeling existing, and permit him to fraudulently act as umpire in the settlement of differences and disputes and the making of estimates and classifications, is in itself sufficient evidence of fraud and injustice to warrant any court in going back of his estimates and classifications and see that honesty and fair dealing is enforced. It was specifically stipulated in this contract that the word "engineer" should mean the "chief engineer" employed by the land and water company. It is true that in extensive works such engineer cannot measure every yard of earth and material moved, and classify the same personally, and that he must in some measure rely upon information derived from other sources. Sweet v. Morrison, 116 N. Y. 31, 22 N. E. 276, 15 Am. St. Rep. 376; Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373. On the other hand, "the decision, to be conclusive, must be a result of the deliberate and fair judgment of the engineer." Wait, Eng. & Arch. Juris. §§ 433, 503. The decision of the questions which arise and require the exercise of judgment of a quasi judicial character cannot be delegated by the chief engineer or umpire to any one. The parties in this case have agreed to abide the deliberate and fair judgment of the "chief engineer." In order for him to fairly, honestly, and justly exercise that judgment, it was necessary for him to hear the facts, and to take such steps as would enable him to come into possession of the facts in controversy, or on which his judgment and decision depended. Such was not done.

The contract provided for any additional work, changes, or alterations that might be ordered by the land and water company or its chief engineer, and for the classification thereof and payment therefor in the same manner and under the same rules and regulations as set out in the contract and specifications for the main work. In the course of the construction of this canal, the company decided to have a dam built across what is called "Dry Creek," and which dam is referred to throughout the case as "Dry Creek Dam." No special contract, nor plans nor specifications, were drawn for this piece of work. The dam was about one mile long at the top. A difference arose between the Nelson Bennett Company and the engineer over the measurements of this work. The engineer allowed 160,273 cubic yards as his measurement. The court, after hearing the evidence, allowed 184,551 cubic yards. Small differences and disputes arose over other pieces of work, and extras and additional work. Among those items was that of "riprapping" and "bond plowing." Without going into a consideration of the evidence on these items and charges, we are content to dispose of them by saying that there is sufficient evidence in the record to justify the findings and conclusion of the court on each of them.

Appellant assigns as error that the court made excessive allowances, and that the total allowances made by the court under the various classifications amounted to some 38,000 cubic yards more than was contained in the works and was actually moved. It seems that respondent originally proceeded on the theory that the measurements made by the land and water company were in the aggregate correct, except as to those on the Dry Creek dam, and that the chief error was in the classification of the different material contained in the grand total. After the court had heard the evidence and made up its findings, he concluded, among other things, that, as a matter of fact, 78,948 cubic yards of solid rock had been removed; but, since a lien had only been claimed for 70,732 cubic yards, the plaintiffs were only allowed to recover for the latter amount. On the Dry Creek dam embankment he found that there had actually been removed 208,992 cubic yards, while the lien filed only claimed for 184,551; and the plaintiff was allowed to recover only to that extent. At the trial the Twin Falls Land & Water Company presented the measurements, estimates, and classifications made by their chief engineer, and relied upon them. They showed a total of 2,178,142.9 cubic yards of material as having been removed. The plaintiffs, in order to establish their case, had secured the services of an engineer named Bostaph, who went over the whole works and made tests and measurements; and he produced his measurements and computations in court and testified concerning the whole works covered by the transaction. His figures disclosed a total of 2,236,757.9 cubic yards of material as having been handled. The difference between the totals furnished by the two engineers was some 58,000 cubic yards. There was a difference of over 48,000 on the Dry Creek dam alone, on which it was never admitted that the chief engineer's figures were correct. In the course of the trial the company admitted, apparently, several items of discrepancies, something over 1,000 yards on the Dry Creek dam, and some 1,680 yards removed on the first 40 feet of the plaintiff's contract. After all the allowances are made for corrections, it seems that the difference in the figures is upward of 3,000 cubic yards. Respondents admit in their brief that, after making all the additions and corrections to the figures made by the engineer of the appellant company, as admitted by the pleadings or upon the trial, the total number of cubic yards as allowed by the court in its findings exceeds the total measurements made by the company as shown by its figures in the sum of 3,162.2 cubic yards. The Nelson Bennett Company's engineer, Bostaph, who made the tests, measurements, and computations for the plaintiff, testified that his total estimates were within seventeen-hundredths of 1 per cent. of the total estimates made by the company, and that, on a work of the magnitude of this, it would be very difficult to make a closer calculation than that. He also testified that his total estimates were substantially the same as those made by the company's engineer, and that in some instances he had relied upon their figures as to total yards of earth removed, and in fact had consulted their maps and measurements in arriving at some of them. We think, in view of the proceedings had upon the trial and the conduct of the plaintiffs and their engineer, that the appellant was justified in relying on its total estimates as made by its engineers, and in combating only the attempt of the plaintiff to have a reclassification of the material that the company's figures showed had been removed. In view of this situation, we think the judgment ought to be modified to the extent of the excess shown in these total estimates over those shown by the appellant's engineer. The question, therefore, arises as to the classifications from which this deduction shall be made. As the principal contest was made over the change in classification of "hard pan" from that of common material to loose rock, and since the principal change made by the court was in this classification, we think the most favorable presumption that could be indulged in favor of the appellant would be that the mistake had been made in increasing the total number of yards of the classification designated as "loose rock," for which the appellant was required to pay at the higher rate, namely, 45 cents per cubic yard. We have therefore concluded to modify this judgment to the extent of the overcharge in total number of cubic yards, admitted by respondent to be 3,162.2 yards, which, computed at 45 cents per cubic yard, will entitle the appellant to a reduction and modification of the judgment in the sum of $1,423.

The sixth assignment of error is that so much of the mechanic's lien law of this state as allows attorney's fees to a lien claimant is unconstitutional, for the reason that it does not provide for an allowance to the adverse party in case he shall be successful. We had occasion to consider the validity and constitutionality of this statute in Thompson v. Wise Boy Min. & Milling Company, 9 Idaho, 363, 74 Pac. 958, and there decided adversely to appellant's contention here. We are still satisfied with the conclusion reached in that case as to the validity of this portion of the law and the right to recover attorney's fees in case of a successful prosecution of a lien, and for that reason will not pursue that assignment of error further. In this case, however, the court allowed both the Nelson Bennett Company and Toponce a total sum of $10,000 for attorney's fees; and appellant contends that this sum is excessive. The evidence submitted to the trial court, upon which he found that this was a reasonable sum to be allowed, was sufficient in our judgment to authorize and justify the court in such a finding and conclusion. We are not prepared to say that, in a case of the magnitude of this, and of the peculiar character of the contract under which the plaintiff was operating, and the nature of the work and the obstacles with which he met in attempting to recover under the contract, and the obstinacy with which this case has been contested, $10,000 is an excessive sum to be allowed as attorney's fees.

Numerous errors have been assigned against the rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence. The particular objection to the ruling in each instance has not been pointed out by brief, nor have they been separately considered therein. Upon an examination of them, however, we are satisfied that the rulings of the court have generally been correct—in some instances, perhaps, erroneous; but it is clear to us that the appellant has not been injured or prejudiced thereby. This was an equity case, and no question of fact was submitted to a jury, and in such cases the rule as to the admission of evidence is much more liberal; and the appellate court will hesitate to reverse a judgment on account of an erroneous ruling in the admission of evidence, unless it appears that the court was proceeding on a wrong theory of the case, or that the admission or rejection of the evidence offered misled the losing party or surprised him, and in some way deprived him of some right, or embarrassed him in the presentation of some substantial part of his cause of action or grounds of defense.

After the entry of judgment, the plaintiffs filed a cost bill, in which they claimed costs to the amount of $2,488.60. The defendant Twin Falls Land & Water Company made a motion to retax costs, and supported the same by affidavit; and the two principal objections appear to have been, first, that mileage and per diem had been allowed to a number of subcontractors, who, while not parties to the action, were really interested in the outcome of the case, and were therefore such interested parties as were not entitled to per diem and mileage for attendance as witnesses; and, second, that mileage had been claimed for attendance of witnesses a distance of more than 30 miles. The court denied the motion, and the appellant assigns the same as error. The action of the court in denying the motion was clearly within the purview of the law as announced by this court in Anderson v. Ferguson-Bach Sheep Company, 12 Idaho, 418, 86 Pac. 41.

We are satisfied that there is no error in this record that has been called to our attention that would justify us in a reversal of the judgment herein. It is the order of this court that the judgment be modified and reduced in the sum of $1,423, and that, as so modified and reduced, it be and is hereby in all other respects affirmed. Each party will pay its own costs incurred on this appeal.

The case is remanded, with direction that the judgment be modified as above indicated.

SULLIVAN and STEWART, JJ., concur.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. A petition for a rehearing has been filed in this case; and, upon an examination of it, the court was at first disposed to strike it from the files on account of the disrespectful and discourteous language in which it was couched. However, since it was filed the resident attorney has withdrawn from the petition, and the court is satisfied that he took no part in the preparation of the same. On further consideration, the court concluded to and has made a careful examination of the questions raised by the petition, and we will proceed seriatim to consider them.

Counsel for petitioner raises six questions in his petition, all of which have been considered in the former hearing of this case, except one, and that is the first question suggested by the petition, to the effect that the respondent, the Nelson Bennett Company, showed no legal right to recover in this action, and that it affirmatively appears that it has no right to recover by reason of the fact that it had not complied with the requirements of the statutes of Idaho as to foreign corporations. The trial court in its first finding of fact found that the Nelson Bennett Company was an incorporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Washington, and, during all of the times mentioned in the complaint, had carried on business as a contractor, in its corporate name, in Cassia county, state of Idaho, and at all of said times had accepted the provisions of the Constitution and complied with the laws of the state of Idaho relative to nonresident corporations doing business within this state. In support of this contention, counsel calls our attention to folio 707 of the transcript, wherein it is made to appear, on the trial of the case, the respondent's counsel offered in evidence a certificate, executed by the Secretary of State, dated December 1, 1904, reciting the fact that the articles of the incorporation of the Nelson Bennett Company were filed August 1, 1904, and marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 11," which was received in evidence. It also appears in the transcript that counsel for respondent offered in evidence a certified copy of the written designation of agent by the Nelson Bennett Company from the county recorder of Cassia county, which certificate was marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 21" and received in evidence. Those exhibits, with others introduced on the trial of the case, were brought to this court by stipulation of counsel for inspection, and many of them are not printed in the transcript. On an examination of said Exhibit 11, we find that the Secretary of State of the state of Idaho certifies that the Nelson Bennett Company filed, in his office on the 1st day of August, 1903 (not 1904, as stated in the transcript), a properly authenticated copy of its articles of incorporation. It also appears from plaintiff's Exhibit 21 that the Nelson Bennett Company had filed its written designation of agent upon whom process could be served with the county recorder of Cassia county as early as the 22d day of June, 1903. This evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court to the effect that said respondent corporation had complied with the Constitution and laws of this state in regard to foreign corporations doing business in this state. Said Exhibit 11 shows that a mistake was made in the transcript at folio 707, where it recites that the certificate of the Secretary of State shows that the articles of incorporation of the Nelson Bennett Company were filed in the office of the Secretary of State on August 1, 1904, when, as a matter of fact, said certificate shows that said articles were filed August 1, 1903.

Another complete answer to this contention is that the court, by its first finding of fact, found that the Nelson Bennett Company was a foreign corporation, "and at all said times had accepted the provisions of the Constitution and complied with the laws of the state of Idaho relative to nonresident corporations doing business within this state." That finding was not excepted to, and there is no assignment of error in the record specifying in any manner that said finding is not supported by the evidence. Under the practice of this court, it will review no decision or ruling of the trial court unless the same is assigned as error. And, under the rules of this court, the brief of appellant must contain a distinct enumeration of all errors relied upon by the appellant. The record contains no exception to said finding of the court, and appellant's brief contains no suggestion that that finding of the court is not supported by the evidence. It is too late to assign that finding of fact as an error and present it for the first time on a petition for a rehearing.

Another answer to this contention of petitioner is that the Nelson Bennett Corporation alleged in its complaint that it had complied with the requirements of the Constitution and statutes of this state in regard to filing its articles of incorporation and designating an agent upon whom service of process could be made; and the appellant in its answer denied that allegation on information and belief. That denial, on information and belief, is no denial of the allegations of the complaint above referred to; hence that allegation is admitted. The fact whether the respondent corporation had complied with the Constitution and laws of this state in regard to filing its articles of incorporation and designating an agent upon whom process could be served could have been ascertained by the appellant from the records of the office of Secretary of State, and of the auditor of the county where the principal business of the corporation was carried on, as the law requires them to be made matters of record there; and its denial of that fact upon information and belief is not sufficient and is no denial whatever. Under the provisions of section 4183, Rev. St. 1887, if a defendant has no information and belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation of the complaint, he may so state in the answer, and place his denial on that ground; but this does not authorize a defendant to make a denial on information and belief when the truth of the fact alleged is a matter of public record and within his reach. This court has held in Simpson v. Remington, 6 Idaho, 681, 59 Pac. 300, that a denial on information and belief is not permitted "where by a mere inspection of a public record the defendant may have obtained the knowledge as to whether an execution had been issued and returned." This court again said, in Work Bros. v. Kinney, 7 Idaho, 460, 63 Pac. 596, when considering such denials, that, "This is not good pleading, and such denials of matters of record, within reach of the defendants, are insufficient."

We shall consider the second and third contentions as one, as they refer to the same stipulation in the contract on which this action was brought. It is contended that this court has erroneously construed the provisions of the written contract, which provide that the estimates of the engineer should not estop the company from annulling the other provision, making his decision final and conclusive between the parties. This court, in effect, held that a stipulation in a contract, requiring the submission of differences and controversies arising thereunder to the chief engineer of one of the contracting parties as umpire, and leaving the measures, estimates, and classification of the work to him, and providing that his measurements and classifications shall not estop the party employing the engineer from disputing or questioning them, will not be enforced by the courts as a binding obligation against the other party to the contract. We still adhere to that rule. The contract provides as follows: "Said second party shall not be estopped by any estimate made by its engineer from showing at any time the true and correct amount and character of the work which shall have been done and materials which shall have been furnished by said first party, or by any person under this agreement." There the contract expressly provides that the second party shall not be bound by the estimates of its engineer of the amount and character of the work. We take it that that applies to all estimates of the several varieties of material required to be excavated and removed, and classification of the same. So far as the umpire is concerned, his decision is made binding upon the first party, and not binding upon the second, and, for that reason, the courts of this state will not enforce such a one-sided provision. Counsel cites in support of his contention the case of Mundy v. Louisville, etc., R. R., 67 Fed. 635, 14 C. C. A. 583. That case involved a contract for the construction of a railroad, and contained a provision to the effect that, in computing the final estimate and giving his final certificate, the engineer should not be bound by any preceding estimates and certificates, but that such preceding estimates and certificates should be held to be only approximate to the final estimate. That is a very different provision from the one under consideration. That authorizes the engineer to correct his first estimates in his final estimate; but it did not relieve the second party from the decision of the engineer as made by his final estimates, as does the contract under consideration. The estimate of the chief engineer, under the provisions of the contract involved in this case, does not bind, and was not intended to bind, the second party, and for that reason the contract in the case at bar is not similar in that regard to the one in the Mundy Case above cited.

It is also contended that this court has expressly found that the lower court was authorized to go behind the stipulation of the contract as to the finality of the chief engineer's decision, and thus sets aside the contract for constructive fraud of the chief engineer, and contends that the court lays down a new rule of law in that regard. Counsel seems to misapprehend, or does not desire to understand, the decision in that regard. In support of this contention, counsel quotes as follows from the opinion: "The decision of the questions which arise and require the exercise of a judgment of a quasi judicial character cannot be delegated by the chief engineer or umpire to any one. The parties in this case have agreed to abide by the deliberate and fair judgment of the 'chief engineer.' In order for him to fairly, honestly, and justly exercise that judgment, it was necessary for him to hear the facts, and to take such steps as would enable him to come into possession of the facts in controversy, or on which his judgment and decision depended. Such was not done." Counsel says that he does not propose that the implications which arise therefrom shall go unchallenged. The quoted portion of the opinion fairly expresses the views of this court upon the point there under consideration. The record clearly shows that the chief engineer took the estimates and classifications from his subordinates. He knew that his subordinate, Shobert, was very much prejudiced against Mr. Bennett, and threatened to "do him." Mr. Bennett informed Mr. Bickel of this fact, and requested him to place some other engineer who was not prejudiced against him in charge of his work. Mr. Bickel's reply indicated that Mr. Shobert was just the kind of a man he wanted as a subordinate; and Mr. Bickel exhibited, as we gather from the record, such arbitrary and wanton disregard of the Nelson Bennett Company's rights as to be equivalent to fraud. This court has held that, in order for the chief engineer to honestly and justly exercise his judgment in regard to the matter in controversy, it was necessary for him to hear the facts and to take such steps as would enable him to come into possession of the facts in controversy, and that he had not done so. We think the record fully justifies the conclusion the court reached on that point.

In this connection it is contended in the third specification that this "court has abrogated the stipulation of the contract, making the decision of the engineer final, not because of any actual or positive fraud or dishonesty, bias or prejudice, but for mistakes of policy, or constructive fraud, thereby declaring a new rule of law, heretofore unheard of." The court has done nothing of the kind, and no such construction can reasonably be drawn from the opinion. The trial court found as follows: "That the said chief engineer wrongfully, arbitrarily, and without having made proper examinations, inspections, and tests, and without having made proper observations, and without sufficient knowledge upon which to found a just judgment in respect to the kind, quality, and classification of materials, and in violation of good faith and duty, did make, cause to be made, and permit untrue and grossly erroneous estimates and classifications of the kind, character, and amount of materials removed and placed and work done by said plaintiff. The said chief engineer in arriving at his conclusions based his judgment almost entirely upon reports made to him by his subordinates, and without any due or proper examination made by him to verify these reports. That the reports of the subordinates were grossly incorrect and untrue." If that finding of the trial court is not sufficiently strong to satisfy counsel that the court found the chief engineer exhibited such an arbitrary and wanton disregard of respondent's plain rights under the contract as to be equivalent to fraud, or had committed errors and mistakes to the respondent's prejudice so gross and palpable as to leave no doubt in the mind of the court that grave injustice had been done to the respondent, it must require very strong language to satisfy him. In effect, the trial court found that said engineer was guilty of fraud, although the word "fraud" was not used in that finding. The words "wrongfully," "arbitrarily," "without sufficient knowledge," "in violation of good faith," "grossly erroneous," "grossly incorrect," and "untrue" are used in said finding. If that finding only finds that said engineer was moved by "mistakes of policy" only, and not by fraud, as suggested by counsel, then we do not understand the language used therein. The contract considered in Mundy v. Louisville R. R. Co., supra, expressly stipulated that the decision of the engineer should not be conclusive in case of "fraud or mistake." But the court there held that the stipulation in the contract, to wit, that the engineer's decision should not be conclusive in cases of fraud or mistake, did not vary the construction of the contract; that in such a contract the exception therefrom of fraud or mistake would be implied, if they were not expressed in the contract; that that exception in such contract is always implied, whether it is written in the contract or not. We think that the correct rule. That provision is not contained in the contract under consideration, but it is clearly implied therein, and the contract will be construed the same as though it were written in the contract.

The court has not desired to reflect on the integrity of any person, as insinuated by counsel for the petitioner, but is controlled solely by the facts as they appear in the records before us. Counsel, with some asperity, has deemed it wise to suggest in his petition for a rehearing that the standing of the engineers referred to, for fairness and honesty, will continue to be of the best, regardless of the decision of this court. So far as this decision is concerned, it is immaterial to us what their standing ever has been or continues to be. We have been called upon to decide this case upon the record, regardless of the standing of any of the persons named therein, and, if their candor and fairness is impeached by evidence in the record, we are not responsible for that.

prehended the proof in respect to certain items of work in the "hard pan," and for that reason failed to reduce the judgment as it ought to have been. We have gone through the evidence and carefully considered the extensive quotations therefrom contained in the petition, and we are fully convinced that the conclusion reached by the court is correct and should be sustained. The controversy arises mostly from the classification of the hard pan. While it is true the evidence shows that much of said hard pan was plowed with a 10-inch plow and 6 horses, it is also true that the evidence shows that, in plowing with 6 horses and a 10-inch plow, the plow was so set as to cut but 6 or 8 inches in width; and under the contract all hard pan, or all earth that could not be successfully plowed with a 10-inch plow and 6 horses, was to be classified as "loose rock"; and, simply because many of the contractors did, as they testified, "wear the hard pan out" with a 10-inch plow and 6 horses, the record does not show that they could successfully plow it with 6 horses and a 10-inch plow. There is nothing in this contention.

It is next contended that the court is mistaken as to the state of the proof as to the total quantity of material removed, and upon the uncontested facts the judgment should be further reduced. It was alleged in the complaint that there had been placed 184,551 cubic yards of embankment in the Dry Creek dam, and the answer admitted that there had been placed there 176,073 yards. It was contended that respondent should be paid for only 160,273 cubic yards thereof, that being "within the lines of the stakes and directions given by defendant's engineer"; and it is averred that respondent was to put a two-foot excess on the sides and top of the dam without pay. It was admitted that there was more material actually placed on the Dry Creek dam than was included in the measurements of the company's engineer, and it appears that said excess amounted to something over 20,000 yards. It is clear from the record that there was a dispute in regard to the quantity of material placed in the Dry Creek dam, and the court found that there were 208,992 cubic yards placed therein, and that the appellant allowed respondent for only 160,273 cubic yards placed therein. Counsel for appellant admits, on page 106 of his brief, that respondent never admitted that the total measurements of the chief engineer of the Dry Creek dam were correct. The transcript and the briefs of counsel clearly show that there was a contest over the amount of material placed in said dam. After again going over the matter, we are satisfied that our former decision herein is correct. So far as the classification of the material is concerned, we are satisfied with the conclusion reached in our original decision.

The next question raised by the petition is an allowance of $1,008 for "bond plowing" on the main canal. There is nothing whatever in the contract or specifications requiring "bond plowing." In the specifications for the Dry Creek dam, which were handed the respondent some time after he had commenced work on his contract, was a specification for "bond plowing," and it is as follows: "The surface will then be thoroughly plowed, first, in a direction parallel with the stream bed, and the second time, parallel with the axis of the dam, throwing up ridges and making deep furrows between." There is no requirement in the contract or specifications for "bond plowing" anywhere on said canal, except as above set forth, and that applies only to the Dry Creek dam.

It is contended that, as respondent agreed to construct the banks of the canal in a good, workmanlike manner, out of materials excavated out of the prism of the canal, making the embankment as near water-tight as possible, of suitable materials, to be judged by the engineer, and in accordance with his instructions, respondent was required to do certain "bond plowing," and that, in order to do said work in a workmanlike manner, "bond plowing" must be done. It was held by the trial court that, under those provisions of the contract, "bond plowing" was not required to be done, or, if done under the orders of the engineer, a reasonable compensation should be paid therefor. We think that ruling of the court is correct, and that, under the terms of said contract, whenever the respondent did "bond plowing" under the orders of the chief engineer, he was entitled to receive compensation therefor.

We find no merit in the petition. A rehearing is denied.

EBLE v. STATE ex rel. LEAVENWORTH COUNTY ATTORNEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908. Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1908.)

1. HIGHWAYS — OBSTRUCTIONS — PERSONS ENTITLED TO ENJOIN — COUNTY ATTORNEY.

The county attorney has power to bring a suit in the name of the state to enjoin obstructions to travel upon a public highway without authority from the board of county commissioners, and notwithstanding the disinclination or refusal of the local highway officers to move in the matter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, § 431.]

2. SAME — ESTABLISHMENT — BOND — SUFFICIENCY.

A bond given at the institution of proceedings to open a road under the law of 1868 (Gen. St. 1868, c. 89, § 1) is not void because signed by one petitioner as principal and by a single surety who is also a petitioner.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, § 217.]

3. SAME — LIMITATION OF TIME TO OPEN.

The statute vacating roads and barring authority for opening roads which have remained unopened for seven years after orders have been made or authority has been granted for opening them does not apply to a discontinuance of use after a road has been opened.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION — PROPERTY SUBJECT TO PRESCRIPTION — PUBLIC HIGHWAY.

A private individual cannot obtain title to a public highway by adverse possession. Lapse of time will not bar the remedies of the state against encroachments upon a highway. An obstruction to the public use of a highway is a continuing nuisance, and no equities in favor of a person committing such a nuisance can be founded upon the acquiescence of the highway or other officials, or upon their laches in taking steps to punish or abate it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 43-57; vol. 25, Highways, §§ 417-422.]

5. WRIT OF ERROR — HARMLESS ERROR — SUBSTANTIAL PREJUDICE.

It must appear that the denial of a request upon the trial court to state findings of fact and conclusions of law separately has prejudiced the substantial rights of the party making the request before a judgment will be reversed because of such denial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4047-4051.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Leavenworth County; J. H. Gillpatrick, Judge.

Action by the state, on relation of the county attorney of Leavenworth county, against Joseph Eble. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

F. S. Jackson, Atty Gen., and Lee, Bond, Dawes & Rutherford, for plaintiff in error. Jno. T. O'Keefe, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. The state of Kansas, on the relation of the county attorney, brought an action to enjoin the defendant from the commission of a nuisance by the obstruction of a public highway. The action was instituted without consulting the board of county commissioners, and without authority obtained from them. Private parties applied to the county attorney for the relief asked, and indemnified the state against costs. Private counsel prepared the papers and conducted the trial of the case; but the county attorney signed and verified the petition, appeared at the trial, and participated in the conduct of the proceedings. On May 31, 1906, at the conclusion of the trial, the court announced orally what its judgment would be. The defendant then proposed to dedicate and open a road through his premises satisfactory to all parties in lieu of the highway obstructed, and the court for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to do so stated that it would take the case under advisement. On June 19, 1906, a regular motion day under the rules of the court, the defendant for the first time made a request for separate findings of fact and conclusions of law. The request was denied as coming too late, the court calling attention to the fact that the judgment had already been indicated, and that the proceedings were kept open merely on the proposal of the defendant referred to. On the next motion day a week later the request for separate findings of fact and conclusions of law was renewed and denied. On July 7th the court made findings, and rendered judgment as follows: "Now on this 7th day of July, 1906, this case came on for further consideration, and the court having heretofore heard the evidence and the arguments of counsel, and being well advised in the premises, finds that the road described in the petition in this case, and known as the 'Lynn Road,' was duly and legally established and opened for travel in 1871, and ever since such time has been a public highway; and the court further finds that for more than 15 years prior to the commencement of this action the defendant maintained fences, cattle sheds, and other obstructions in and across said public highway, and continued to maintain said obstructions up to the trial of this case. It is therefore now here by the court considered, ordered, and adjudged that said defendant, Joseph Eble, is guilty of maintaining a public nuisance. It is further considered, ordered, and adjudged and commanded that said defendant, Joseph Eble, abate said nuisance within 60 days from this date by removing all of said obstructions, except his barn, from said highway, and he is hereby perpetually enjoined from obstructing the same or any part thereof in any manner whatsoever except as the same is now obstructed by said barn." The defendant prosecutes error.

It is claimed the county attorney had no authority to bring the suit. The statutes making it the duty of the township trustee to prosecute violations of the road law and giving him authority to remove obstructions, and the statutes prescribing the powers and duties of boards of highway commissioners and road overseers, are cited. The decisions of this court to the effect that the board of county commissioners has control of the business and financial affairs of the county, and has charge of all litigation in which the interests of the county are involved, are also cited. These statutes and decisions do not govern the controversy. The state at large has an interest in keeping the highways in every county free from obstruction to public travel, no matter what the attitude of the local authorities upon the question may be. The willful obstruction of a highway is a public offense, which the state may prosecute, even though the township trustee be disinclined or refuse to do so. Such an obstruction may be enjoined and abated as a common nuisance by the state, even though the board of county commissioners should be opposed to the suit; and the Legislature has made it the duty of the county attorney to prosecute on behalf of the people all suits, civil or criminal, arising under the laws of the state in which the state is a party or is interested. Gen. St. 1901, § 1777. It is claimed the county attorney delegated the authority of his office to the private counsel, who did the work in the case. Manifestly this is not true. It was the county attorney's law suit all the time, and it is not very important in this proceeding in error who drew the papers or led in the trial.

The meritorious question is if the judgment is correct?

It is said no highway was ever established because the security of the bond given when application was made to lay out the road was insufficient. The statute of 1868 under which the road was established provides that one or more of the signers of the petition shall enter into a bond with sufficient security, payable to the state of Kansas, conditioned for the payment into the treasury of the county of all costs and expenses in case the prayer of the petitioner shall not be granted. Gen. St. 1868, c. 89, § 1. The bond was signed by one of the petitioners as principal, and by another petitioner as surety. Section 6 of the act referred to seems to contemplate that there may be a single obligor in the bond, indicating that perhaps the words "with sufficient security" might mean "in a sufficient sum." However this may be, the bond of one petitioner with one surety complies with the law, and the fact that the surety is also a petitioner does not render the bond void on its face and make the proceeding open to collateral attack. The statute is cited vacating roads and barring authority for opening roads which have remained unopened for seven years after orders have been made, or authority has been granted for opening them. Gen. St. 1901, § 6058. This statute does not apply to a discontinuance of use after a road has been opened. The regular procedure for vacating roads must then be followed. The court found specifically that this road had been opened.

Certain evidence was tendered which the court declined to consider. It showed that in November, 1903, a petition was presented asking the board of county commissioners to submit to the electors a proposition to build a bridge at a ford on the road in controversy. Remonstrances were filed. The county surveyor recommended a change in the road "by reason of improvements obstructing the original location of road as shown on plat." The commissioners refused to submit the bridge proposition, and ordered "that the road at the place in question be not ordered open, but be and remain vacated." It is not pointed out how this evidence could have inclined the court in the defendant's favor. The proceeding did not start as one to vacate a road, but as one to build a bridge. No single step essential to the vacation of a road was taken, and it is difficult to see how the proceeding could terminate in a valid judgment of vacation. Considered as the recorded opinion of the board of county commissioners upon the status of the road, the order was neither binding nor enlightening. In no other light does the evidence appear to have been relevant, and no error was committed in excluding it. The court likewise rightfully declined to hear evidence of the value of the barricading improvements. The wrong to the public could not be palliated, because of the amount of money expended by the wrongdoer in its perpetration. Perhaps the evidence might have appealed to the court's discretion; but the court took into consideration the character and location of the offending property in exercising his discretion over the allowance of the equitable remedy sought, as the judgment clearly shows, and this was sufficient.

It was admitted upon the trial that the obstruction to travel upon the road had been maintained for more than 15 years. The defendant claims the statute of limitations has run against the state, that he has acquired title to the road by adverse possession, and that the state is at least estopped to clear the road of obstructions. The weight of authority, supported by the better reasoning, is opposed to this view of the law. The courts of several states have changed their earlier rulings and adopted the modern doctrine. The question is discussed in an elaborate note in 87 Am. St. 775, where authorities are collated, and in Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 882 et seq. See, also, 28 L. R. A. 449, n. This court is already committed to the doctrine that a private individual cannot obtain title to a public highway by adverse possession, that lapse of time will not bar the remedy of the state against encroachments upon a highway, that an obstruction to the public use of a highway is a continuing nuisance, and that no equities in favor of a person committing such a nuisance can be founded upon the acquiescence of the highway or other officials, or upon their laches in taking steps to punish or abate it. McAlpine v. Railway Co., 68 Kan. 207, 75 Pac. 73, 64 L. R. A. 85; Webb v. Commissioners, 52 Kan. 375, 34 Pac. 973; and cases cited in those opinions.

Error is assigned because the court denied the request for separate findings of fact and conclusions of law. The request came too late. The trial was ended, and the character of the judgment indicated when the request was made. The case was, in fact, decided; but it was held open to enable the defendant to avoid the consequences of the decision which only needed formal promulgation to make it conclusive. Even if this were not true, another principle applies. The issues were few and simple. The findings embodied in the journal entry cover substantially all questions of fact essential to a decision. The court's views of the law are so plain they cannot be mistaken. The defendant does not even suggest that he has been unable satisfactorily to present his case to this court because findings of fact and conclusions of law were not separately stated. He makes no claim of prejudice. A rule of procedure has been violated without injurious consequences. Section 140 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "The court in every stage of action must disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party; and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." It must appear that the denial of a request upon the trial court to state findings of fact and conclusions of law separately has prejudiced the substantial rights of the party making the request before a judgment will be reversed because of such denial. See Caldwell v. Bigger (Kan.) 90 Pac. 1095.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

KROEGER v. PASSMORE.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—DEFINITION—INTENT AND MALICE—PROBABLE CAUSE.

Under Pen. Code, § 420, defining false imprisonment as the unlawful violation of the personal liberty of another, neither malice, nor, ordinarily, want of probable cause, is an element of the right to recover for false imprisonment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, False Imprisonment, §§ 1-16.]

2. SAME — ACTIONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for false imprisonment, evidence held sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff.

3. SAME—DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where, in an action for false imprisonment, there was evidence that plaintiff went to defendant's office to sign a deed conveying property to a third person, that defendant handed the deed to plaintiff, who, after reading it, refused to return it to defendant, who thereupon told plaintiff that she could not leave without surrendering the deed, and requested his brother to call the sheriff; that plaintiff was detained about three-quarters of an hour, during which time there were many people in the office, and others about the building, and plaintiff testified that as a result of the detention she became very nervous and sick from the shock of it, and, feeling that she was disgraced, did not leave her house for nearly a week thereafter—a verdict for plaintiff for $250 would not be disturbed.

4. SAME—DEFENSES.

Treating false imprisonment as a tort, as distinguished from a crime, the only defenses which may be interposed are a denial of the imprisonment and a justification thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, False Imprisonment, §§ 74-79.]

5. APPEAL — REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence, though conflicting, is sufficient to justify a finding for either party, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 8, Appeal and Error, §§ 3985-3987.]

6. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—JUSTIFICATION.

When a private person seeks to justify his imprisonment of another, it must appear that he has complied with the law warranting such imprisonment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, False Imprisonment, §§ 74-79.]

7. SAME — DEFENSES — ARREST BY PRIVATE PERSON—INSTRUCTIONS.

Pen. Code, § 1633, provides that a private person may arrest another (1) for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence; (2) when the person has committed a felony, although not in his presence; (3) when a felony has, in fact, been committed, and he has reasonable cause for believing the person arrested to have committed it. Section 1643 provides that a private person who has arrested another for the commission of a public offense must without unnecessary delay take the person arrested before a magistrate or deliver him to a peace officer. Held that, in an action for false imprisonment, an instruction requested by defendant that the law gives a private person the right to arrest another when the party arrested has committed, or is about to commit, a public offense in the presence of the party arresting, and that if the jury believed that plaintiff had taken from defendant property of defendant, and that defendant was attempting to recover it from plaintiff at the time plaintiff alleged she was restrained, they should find for defendant, was properly refused, as not calling the jury's attention to all the facts which must be shown under said sections 1633 and 1643 in order to constitute a justification.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by Lavina Kroeger against Charles S. Passmore. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Parr, for appellant. Mackel & Meyer, for respondent.

HOLLOWAY, J. This is an action for damages for false imprisonment. The plaintiff had judgment. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied by the trial court upon condition that the plaintiff remit $250 of the amount of the verdict, which was done. Defendant thereupon appealed from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

The errors assigned by the appellant are insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the refusal of the trial court to grant a motion for a nonsuit, refusal to direct a verdict for defendant, and refusal of the court to give the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the law of this state gives a private person the right to arrest another when the party arrested has committed or is about to commit a public offense in the presence of the party arresting; and in this case, if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff had taken from defendant property of defendant, and that defendant was attempting to recover his property from plaintiff at the time plaintiff alleges she was restrained, then your verdict must be for the defendant." In 1905 Henry Kroeger and Lavina Kroeger owned and occupied certain real estate in Butte, at 811 West Galena street. In November of that year Henry Kroeger listed the property for sale with the defendant, a real estate agent; the selling price agreed upon at that time being $6,000. In March, 1906, Passmore had an offer for the property at $5,750, made by Mrs. Cora L. Lindsay. He thereupon made what he understood to be satisfactory arrangements with the Kroegers for a sale of the property at that price, $2,000 of which was to be paid in cash. On March 27, 1906,

Henry Kroeger executed a deed conveying the property, and he and Mrs. Lindsay put the deed in escrow with Passmore as depository, under an agreement that upon the further payment by Mrs. Lindsay of the sum of $3,750 within 60 days, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, the deed was to be delivered to her. The parties apparently all understood that Mrs. Kroeger was to sign the deed and escrow agreement, and on March 28th Passmore took the deed and agreement to Mrs. Kroeger for the purpose of having her execute them. Some misunderstanding arose as to the amount of money to be paid at that time, and consideration of the matter went over until the following day. On the afternoon of March 29th Mr. and Mrs. Kroeger went to Passmore's office by appointment with him. As to what occurred there at that time the evidence is very conflicting.

The jurors were the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses; and, by the general verdict in plaintiff's favor, they indicated that they believed the version presented by her and her witnesses, which was to the effect: That she and her husband went into Passmore's office, which was in the front of a building occupied by him; the entrance to the office being through a narrow passageway between the end of a high desk and the wall of the building. That Mr. and Mrs. Kroeger sat down in the office. That Passmore then asked Mrs. Kroeger if she would sign the deed, to which she replied, "Yes; if you have the check for me," meaning a check for the remaining $3,750, which amount Mrs. Kroeger contends was to be paid at that time. That Passmore handed Mrs. Kroeger the deed. That she read it and kept it. That Passmore requested her three or four times to return the deed to him, and that she refused to do so. That, after reading the deed, she told Passmore that she knew it was hers, and that Passmore then said, "You cannot leave this office until you give me that," and turned to his brother, saying, "John, call the sheriff." That Passmore closed the door, and stood in the passageway leading into the office. That Mrs. Kroeger got up to leave the office, and that it was then that Passmore made the remark that she could not leave the office with the deed. That she was detained there about three-quarters of an hour from the time she got the deed until her attorney arrived, soon after which she was permitted to leave. That during the time she was detained there there were many persons in the office and others about the building. With respect to the effect of the detention upon the plaintiff, she testified: "The effect of all this was to make me very nervous. I was sick from the shock of it. You might know what effect it had on me. I was never in that position before. As to what effect it had on me when he threatened to call the sheriff, I said, 'If you call the sheriff, you must call a carriage,' because I could not have such a disgrace.

I made the remark, and he was there, and I was very nervous. I was very much humiliated and disgraced. I felt that I was disgraced. After that I did not leave the house for nearly a week." In view of the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff, the court was clearly correct in denying the motion for a nonsuit, and also the motion for an instructed verdict; for "the defendant's evidence, though contradictory in some particulars of that put in by the plaintiff, did not make out a case so clear and indisputable as would have justified the court in giving the peremptory instruction requested." Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436, 14 Sup. Ct. 387, 38 L. Ed. 224; Stephens v. Elliott, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 45.

False imprisonment is treated as a tort, and also as a crime. The definition is the same in either case. In our Code it is defined as "the unlawful violation of the personal liberty of another." Pen. Code, § 420. It has been held that the liability of the wrongdoer does not depend primarily upon his mental attitude. 19 Cyc. 319. Neither malice nor, ordinarily, want of probable cause, is an element of the right to recover. 19 Cyc. 320. "All of the authorities declare that neither malice nor, ordinarily, want of probable cause is an essential element of the right of action. If the imprisonment is lawful, it does not become unlawful because done with malicious intent. If the conduct is unlawful, neither good faith, nor provocation, nor ignorance of the law is a defense to the person committing the wrong, in a civil, as distinguished from a criminal, proceeding. The normal effect of malice or absence of malice is respectively to aggravate or mitigate the damages." And, again, it is said: "False imprisonment may be committed by words alone, or by acts alone, or by both. It is not necessary that the individual be actually confined or assaulted or even that he should be touched. But there must be personal coercion of some sort exercised by defendant over plaintiff in order to subject the former to liability." 19 Cyc. 323. In Comer v. Knowles, 17 Kan. 440, it is said: "False imprisonment is necessarily a wrongful interference with the personal liberty of an individual. The wrong may be committed by words alone, or by acts alone, or by both, and by merely operating on the will of the individual, or by personal violence, or by both. It is not necessary that the individual be confined within a prison, or within walls; or that he be assaulted, or even touched. It is not necessary that there should be any injury done to the individual's person, or to his character or reputation. Nor is it necessary that the wrongful act be committed with malice, or ill will, or even with the slightest wrongful intention. Nor is it necessary that the act be under color of any legal or judicial proceeding. All that is necessary is that the individual be restrained of his liberty without any sufficient legal cause therefor, and by words or acts which he fears to disregard." Under these authorities it is apparent that the evidence is sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. See, also, 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 736, and cases cited.

But it is said that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain a verdict or judgment for $250. The trial court properly called the attention of the jury to the provisions of section 4330 of the Civil Code as to the measure of damages in a case of this character, and after a careful consideration of the entire case as made, and upon a review of it on motion for new trial, that court reduced the amount of the verdict from $500 to $250, and with its determination as to the fairness of the amount of the reduced verdict we do not feel inclined to interfere.

said to be a limitation upon the provisions of section 1633 above. The latter section reads as follows: "A private person who has arrested another for the commission of a public offense must, without unnecessary delay, take the person arrested before a magistrate, or deliver him to a peace officer." Assuming, then, for the sake of this argument, everything in favor of the defendant as claimed by his counsel with respect to this defense, it appears at once that the offered instruction does not cover the ground, in that it does not call the attention of the jury to all of the facts which must be made to appear under sections 1633 and 1643 above in order to constitute a justification of the defendant.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Affirmed.

MANUEL v. TURNER et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT—EXTENT OF RELIEF.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1003, declaring that the relief granted to plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that demanded in the complaint, and also under the stipulation with plaintiff of defendants T. that the allegations of the complaint were true, that said defendants had no defense and would file no answer, and that their demurrer to the complaint might be overruled, their default might be entered, and judgment might be entered against them in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, it is error, where the complaint merely sets out mortgages and prays their foreclosure against said defendants, for the decree, after providing for sale of the property and application of the proceeds to satisfaction of the mortgages, to provide for application of the surplus to satisfaction of judgments against one of said defendants, set up in plaintiff's replication to the subsequent answer of another defendant, and alleged to be owned by plaintiff and to be a lien on the property.

2. SAME—PLEADINGS TO SUSTAIN.

A judgment for plaintiff for affirmative relief cannot be supported on allegations which appear in the replication only.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 232-235.]

3. DOWER—JUDGMENT AGAINST HUSBAND—EXTENT OF.

The lien on property of a judgment against a husband is subject to the interest of his wife, whether arising from a tenancy in common with her husband or out of her right of dower.

4. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT.

Where the complaint to foreclose a mortgage against T. states that the other defendants have or claim interests in or liens on the premises, as judgment or attaching creditors, but that their interests or liens are subordinate to plaintiff's mortgage, and demands that the priority of the mortgage lien be fixed and established, and that the liens of such other defendants be declared inferior to them, the decree, on default of T., may adjust the rights as between plaintiff and such other defendants.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; Lew L. Callaway, Judge.

Action by Josephine Manuel, administratrix of Moses Manuel, deceased, against Dima S. A. Turner individually and as administratrix of Davis C. Turner, deceased, and others. From the decree, defendant Turner appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Galen & Mettler, for appellant. Word & Word, for respondent.

BRANTLY, C. J. This action was brought to obtain a decree foreclosing three several mortgages upon lands situate in Jefferson county and described in the complaint, which were executed by Davis C. Turner and his wife, Dima S. A. Turner, for various persons to secure the payment of as many promissory notes, each one bearing the same date as the one of the mortgages intended to secure it. At the time of his death the plaintiff's intestate was the owner of all of these notes and mortgages. The second and third of the mortgages cover the lands described in the first, as well as others, but the record is silent as to what were the several interests of these defendants in any of them. The date of the third, and the junior, mortgage, was January 21, 1903. The other two were executed some years prior to that date. The complaint contains three separate counts, each one setting forth the allegations necessary to warrant foreclosure. George M. Bourquin and the T. O. Power Company were made defendants; it being alleged that they each claimed some interest in or lien upon the mortgaged property as judgment or attachment creditors or otherwise, but that their interests were subject and subsequent to the liens of plaintiff's mortgages. The prayer demands the usual decree of foreclosure as against the Turners, husband and wife, that the priority of plaintiff's mortgage liens over those of George M. Bourquin and the T. O. Power Company be fixed and established, that the property be sold to satisfy plaintiff's mortgages, and that the plaintiff have such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable. The action was brought on March 6, 1906. After being served with summons, the Turners filed a general demurrer. This was on March 21st. On April 24th they entered into a stipulation with plaintiff, in which it was agreed that all the allegations of the complaint were true; that the Turners had no defense and would file no answer; that their demurrer might be overruled; that their default might be entered on or after July 11, 1906; and that at any time after that date judgment might be entered against them in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, unless the amounts due on the several promissory notes had been paid. Default was entered against them on July 13th; no payment having been made. In the meantime, on March 14th, the defendant Bourquin filed his answer, admitting the truth of the allegations of the complaint, and alleging that he was the owner of a judgment against Davis C. Turner which had been recovered on February 2, 1904, and was a lien upon the property described in the complaint. He asked that the surplus remaining after the satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgages be applied to the satisfaction of his judgment. The defendant T. C. Power Company filed its answer on April 18th. It is alleged that on October 16, 1902, it brought its action against Davis C. Turner in the district court of Lewis and Clark county; that it caused an attachment to be issued therein, directed to the sheriff of Jefferson county, and to be levied upon all the lands described in the complaint; that thereafter a judgment was given and made in said action in its favor for $103.85; and that thereafter a transcript of said judgment was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Jefferson county, and thus became a lien upon all of said lands from the date of the levy of the attachment paramount to plaintiff's lien under said mortgages. The prayer demanded that upon final decree its lien be adjudged paramount to that of plaintiff, and that its judgment be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the property.

The allegations of Bourquin's answer were not controverted by any one. To the answer of the T. C. Power Company the plaintiff filed a replication, in which, after putting in issue many of the material allegations thereof, it is alleged, "as separate defenses, cross-complaints, and counterclaims," (1) that on February 6, 1901, a judgment was duly given and made by the district court of Lewis and Clark county in favor of the Thomas Cruse Savings Bank, a corporation, against the defendant Davis C. Turner for $610.05; that thereafter a transcript of this judgment was filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Jefferson county; that said judgment thus became a lien upon the property described in the complaint; that thereafter Moses Manuel, plaintiff's intestate, became the owner thereof by assignment; that the same came into the hands of the plaintiff as his administratrix, and that it remains wholly unpaid, and (2) that on September 22, 1902, one Arthur J. Craven brought an action in the district court of Lewis and Clark county against Davis C. Turner and Dima S. A. Turner; that he caused an attachment to issue therein, directed to the sheriff of Jefferson county, and to be levied upon the interests of said defendants in the lands described in the complaint; that thereafter such proceedings were had in the cause that on November 8, 1902, judgment was duly given and made therein in favor of said Craven and against Davis C. Turner for $302.50; that on November 10, 1902, a transcript of the judgment was duly filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Jefferson county; that thereafter Moses Manuel, plaintiff's intestate, became the owner thereof by assignment by said Craven; that it came into the hands of plaintiff, as the administratrix of said Manuel; that it was wholly unsatisfied; and that both judgments are liens upon the property described in the complaint paramount to the judgment lien of the T. C. Power Company. The prayer demands judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

The court found (1), that the mortgage set forth in the first count of the complaint was a first lien upon all the lands described therein; (2) that the one set forth in the second count was a second lien upon the same lands and a first lien upon the other lands described therein; (3) that the liens of the Cruse Savings Bank and the Craven judgments, and also of the T. C. Power Company judgment, followed next in the order in which they are here enumerated; (4) that plaintiff was entitled to have satisfaction of her third mortgage after the satisfaction of these judgments; and (5) that the lien of the Bourquin judgment should be satisfied out of any surplus thereafter remaining. A decree was entered directing the property to be sold, and the proceeds, after the payment of costs including attorney's fees for foreclosure, be applied to the satisfaction of the different liens in the order mentioned. Pending the action, Davis C. Turner died intestate, and Dima S. A. Turner, having qualified as his administratrix, was substituted as defendant in his stead. She has appealed from the decree both as administratrix and in her own right.

As heretofore stated, it does not appear what the respective interests of Davis C. Turner and Dima S. A. Turner were at the time the various mortgages were executed by them and the judgments against Turner were obtained. It is a matter of no importance, however, so far as it has to do with the contention made by the appellant. If it be assumed that she has only a dower interest, the decree is open to attack on some of the grounds which are urged against it by the appellant. As to the Turners, the decree was entered by default. Under the stipulation between the plaintiff and the Turners, it should have been entered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. This should have been done in any event, for the statute applicable (Code Civ. Proc. § 1003) declares: "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Now, the complaint neither in its allegations nor in the prayer contains any reference to plaintiff's two judgments. For this reason the court could grant no relief with reference to them, and, so far as it did undertake to do so, the decree is beyond the purview of the demand made in the complaint, and is, to this extent, erroneous. Nor is it aided in the least by the fact that the Turners stipulated for its entry. Plaintiff was bound by the stipulation, and could not demand anything further than was contemplated by its terms. Indeed, judging from the terms in which it is couched, the parties seem to have had in mind the provisions of the statute. In any event, the decree could go no further, in the extent of the relief granted, than the stipulation provided. Again, these judgments make their appearance in the case in plaintiff's replication to the answer of the defendant T. C. Power Company. This being so, they could not be made the basis of relief against the Turners; for the replication cannot be looked to to broaden the scope of the complaint or aid it in any way. Nor can a judgment for plaintiff for affirmative relief be supported upon allegations which appear in the reply only. Thornton v. Kaufman, 35 Mont. 181, 88 Pac. 796; 6 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 461. Further, the defendants could not anticipate that any issue would arise in the case between the plaintiff and the T. C. Power Company as to these judgments, which would in any way affect their rights, or that they would be brought into the case at all. Much less could they have anticipated that their validity as liens against the interest of Dima S. A. Turner would be declared in the decree. If she had the title to the land, they were not liens at all. If her interest was only her right of dower, still they could not be declared valid liens against the property so as to defeat this right; for, though so far as the mortgages were concerned she had waived her right of dower, the lien of any judgment against her husband was subject to her claim in the surplus remaining after the mortgages had been satisfied. Dahlman v. Dahlman, 28 Mont. 373, 72 Pac. 748; Civ. Code, § 228. In its consideration of the case the court should have eliminated those judgments altogether.

The decree is erroneous, also, in directing the satisfaction of the T. C. Power Company judgment out of the proceeds of the sale, without regard to the interest of the wife. While the decree correctly declared the lien of this judgment superior to the lien of the third mortgage, it could in no event attach as such except to the interest of the husband. It did not attach to the interest of the wife, whether such interest arose out of the ownership of the whole property by her or a tenancy in common with her husband, or out of her right of dower. The same may be said of the lien of the Bourquin judgment upon the surplus remaining after all the other liens were satisfied. His judgment being against Davis C. Turner alone, he had a lien upon his interest only.

It is said by counsel for appellant that since these latter judgments appear in the case, not from allegations in the complaint, but in the answers of Bourquin and the T. C. Power Company, the decree is erroneous in declaring their status. In this contention, however, we think there is no merit. The complaint states in terms that these defendants have or claim interests in or liens upon the premises described in the mortgages or some part thereof, as judgment or attachment creditors, but that their respective interests or liens are subsequent and subordinate to the liens of plaintiff's mortgages. The prayer demands that the priority of the plaintiff's mortgage liens be fixed and established, and that the liens of these defendants be declared inferior to them. It is apparent, therefore, that under the statute and the stipulation of the defendants for judgment it was fairly within the contemplation of the parties that the rights as between the plaintiff and these defendants should be adjusted in the decree. The court was therefore authorized to adjust these equities and decree accordingly. In this respect the decree is not open to attack.

For the reasons heretofore stated, however, the cause is remanded to the district court with directions to amend the decree by eliminating therefrom any mention of the judgments belonging to the plaintiff, and, further, to so modify it as to make the T. C. Power Company and the Bourquin judgments liens upon the interest of Davis C. Turner only, whatever that interest may be. When so amended and modified, the decree will stand affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

STEVENS v. TRAFTON.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—GROUNDS OF REMEDY—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Whether a contract will be specifically enforced is a matter of judicial discretion, but it must be a sound, legal discretion, and, where the testimony furnishes no reasonable grounds for different conclusions, there is no ground for the exercise of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 17, 18.]

2. SAME—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—PART PERFORMANCE OF ORAL SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

Under Civ. Code, § 2342, providing that failure to embody an agreement for the sale of real property in writing does not abridge the power of a court to compel the specific performance of any agreement for the sale of real property, in case of part performance thereof, where it appeared that the terms of an oral agreement for the sale of real property were fully performed on plaintiff's part, and that defendant had put him in actual possession of the premises upon which he had erected substantial improvements, the court had the power to decree specific performance of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 128-133.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for the specific performance of an oral agreement to sell real estate, plaintiff testified that by the terms of the agreement he agreed to buy a certain lot of defendant for $100, and also to buy from defendant the lumber for the erection of a house thereon; that he was to pay defendant $50 cash, $50 in three months, and the balance whatever it might be in six months, which included the price of the lumber to be purchased; and that defendant agreed that when these payments were made he would make a warranty deed of the lot to plaintiff. He further testified that he offered to make the $50 payments to defendant, but defendant told him to pay it to S., and that S. gave him receipts for the two $50 payments, the first of which recited that another $50 was to be paid in three months and the balance in six months, at which time a warranty deed was to be given plaintiff, and the second receipt recited that the $50 was "part payment on lot." He also testified to the subsequent payment for the lumber some 15 months after the date of the contract and original payment. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to a decree for specific performance.

4. SAME—PROCEEDINGS—EFFECT OF GENERAL DENIAL—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2223, providing that time is not of the essence of a contract unless expressly so provided, and section 2027, providing that, where delay in performance is capable of exact and entire compensation, and time is not expressly declared to be the essence of the obligation, an offer of performance, accompanied with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due, time was not the essence of the contract, and plaintiff was not without equitable rights. Hence a mere general denial by defendant unsupported by any proofs in opposition to plaintiff's testimony did not entitle defendant to judgment, for in any event the court was entitled to know defendant's version of the contract to determine the facts necessary to a full performance by plaintiff before refusing the relief to which his showing entitled him.

5. EQUITY—HEARING—NONSUIT.

Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as a motion for a nonsuit in equitable proceedings under our present practice.

6. APPEAL—REVERSAL—NONSUIT—EFFECT IN LAW ACTIONS—RESULT IN CASE OF ERROR.

The effect of granting a nonsuit in an action at law is to declare that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a verdict for plaintiff under any circumstances. Hence the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if there was any evidence justifying a verdict for plaintiff.

7. SAME—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—NONSUIT.

In an action for specific performance of a contract, if plaintiff is not entitled to relief as of right, then upon a motion for nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony it is the trial court's duty to adjudicate the issues between the parties, and the court may exercise a legal discretion in giving or withholding relief. Hence the effect of nonsuit would not be to determine that plaintiff was not entitled to relief in any view of the evidence, but that the court in the exercise of its discretion withheld relief in that particular case, and its action would not be disturbed unless there was an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3846.]

8. COURTS—PROCEDURE—RIGHT OF LEGISLATURE TO FIX.

The Legislature has power to establish by regulations the procedure in civil and criminal cases so far as it does not amount to a denial of justice, and it has power to declare by law what shall be the practice on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Courts, §§ 274-281.]

9. APPEAL—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—NONJURY QUESTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Laws 1903 (2d Ex. Sess.) p. 7, provides that the Supreme Court may affirm, reverse, or modify any judgment or order appealed from, and may direct the proper judgment or order to be entered, or direct a new trial or further proceedings to be had; that in equity cases, and in matters and proceedings of an equitable nature, the Supreme Court shall review and determine all questions of fact arising upon the evidence in the record as well as questions of law, unless for good cause a new trial or the taking of further evidence in the court below is ordered. Held, that the purpose of the Legislature was to expedite final judgment in cases where the parties were not entitled to trial by jury, and to put an end to litigation and avoid the necessity of new trials.

10. SAME—REVIEW—SCOPE—RULING ON MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON PLAINTIFF'S TESTIMONY.

The object of the law in providing that the court on appeal should determine equity cases on the merits, unless for good cause a new trial or the taking of further evidence is ordered, was that the Supreme Court might enter final judgment. Hence it is the duty of parties to an action in equity to introduce all of their testimony in order that the Supreme Court may carry out the intent of the Legislature; and, if a defendant moves for judgment at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, it will be construed as a declaration that, if his motion is granted, he elects to stand upon the case presented by the plaintiff.

11. SAME—EQUITY CASES—REVERSAL—NEW TRIALS—GROUNDS.

In view of Laws 1903 (2d Ex. Sess.) p. 7, requiring the Supreme Court to determine all questions of fact arising upon the evidence in the record in equity cases, unless for good cause a new trial or the taking of further evidence in the court below is ordered, a new trial will not be granted in equity cases except for good cause appearing in the record; and hence, where an equity case is reviewed on a judgment of nonsuit, the mere failure of defendant to introduce testimony will not entitle him to a new trial.

Appeal from District Court, Valley County; Jno. W. Tattan, Judge.

Action by C. H. Stevens against R. M. Trafton for specific performance of an agreement to convey land. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. E. Crutcher, for appellant. Hurd & Lewis, for respondent.

SMITH, J. In the district court of Valley county the plaintiff filed his complaint, wherein he alleged: "(1) That on the 21st day of July, 1903, he made a certain agreement with defendant whereby defendant agreed to sell, and plaintiff agreed to buy of defendant, the east half of lot 3 in block 6 of the Trafton addition to Malta, in the county of Valley, state of Montana, for which he agreed to pay defendant the sum of $100, and at the same time plaintiff agreed to buy from defendant certain lumber which he would need for building a house on said lot. By the terms of said agreement plaintiff was to pay defendant $50 cash, $50 in three months, and the balance, whatever it might be, in six months, which included the price of the lumber to be purchased, and when these payments were made defendant agreed to make to plaintiff a warranty deed to said east half of said lot. (2) That in pursuance of said agreement plaintiff paid defendant $50 cash on said 21st day of July, 1903, and was placed in possession of said east half of said lot by defendant, and proceeded to and did buy lumber from defendant and erected a house on said east half of said lot. That on the 20th day of October, 1903, he paid defendant the sum of $50 in accordance with the terms of said agreement, and on the 31st day of October, 1904, he paid defendant the sum of $101.78, the balance due under the terms of said agreement, and thus complied fully with his part of the agreement. (3) That on the 31st day of October, 1904, plaintiff made a written demand on said defendant to make and execute to him a warranty deed to said east half of said lot, which said deed defendant refused and still refuses to make, execute, and deliver to this plaintiff, notwithstanding plaintiff has performed all his part of said agreement. Wherefore he prays judgment that said defendant be decreed and compelled to make, execute, and deliver to this plaintiff in a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, a warranty deed to the east half of lot 3 in block 6 of Trafton's addition to Malta, and that this honorable court appoint a commissioner to make such conveyance in default of one being made by defendant in the time fixed by the court, and for his costs herein." Defendant filed a general demurrer to the complaint, but afterwards withdrew the same and filed an answer, wherein he denied each and every allegation thereof. Plaintiff was the only witness in his own behalf. After testifying to the contract for the sale of the lot, as alleged in his complaint, he continued as follows: "Mr. Trafton paced the lot off, indicating the northeast and northwest corners, scratching in the dirt, and said: 'This is the parcel.' We then went to the bank, and I paid him $50 cash. He called in Mr. Smith from another part of the bank, and said, 'Smith, Stevens has purchased the east half of this lot,' putting his finger down on the plat which he held in his hand. 'Mark it sold. He is to pay $100. The conditions are that he is to pay $50 down, and $50 in three months. You take the money and give him a receipt.' Mr. Trafton then withdrew, and Mr. Smith went into another part of the bank, and came back and gave me a receipt, reading as follows: 'Malta, Montana, July 21, 1903. Received of C. H. Stevens the sum of fifty dollars ($50.00) being part payment on the east half of lot 3, block 6, of Trafton's addition to Malta, Montana; another fifty dollars ($50.00) to be paid in three months, and the balance in six months, at which time a warranty deed is to be given the said Stevens. R. M. Trafton, per Smith.' I paid the second $50 on October 20, 1903. I have the receipt signed by E. Smith, as follows: '$50.00. October 20, 1903. Received of C. H. Smith fifty dollars, part payment on lot. E.

Smith.' I offered to pay the money to Mr. Trafton, but he sent me to Smith. I made this payment to Mr. Smith by direction of Mr. Trafton. Mr. Trafton told me to go and pay Smith. * * * He said to pay it to Smith, which I did, and took a receipt. * * * After having paid everything, I made a demand on Mr. Trafton for a deed in person, and by registered letter. I was at his store, and I told him I wanted a deed to this lot that I had contracted for, the east half of lot 3, block 6. He said: 'You will get your deed when you pay for it.' I said: 'Everything is paid for.' Then he said: 'Who did you pay?' I said I paid Smith. He said: 'Go to Smith for your deed.' I went to Smith and he sent me back to Trafton, and then I served written notice, through the post office, on Mr. Trafton, demanding a warranty deed for the property. I never received any reply to that written notice. Smith is out of the country, and has been for a long time. I paid for the lot in full according to Mr. Trafton's directions. I put a frame building, 12x18 feet, 10 feet high, on the lot. I have remained in possession ever since I purchased the lot, and I am in possession now. The contract I had with Mr. Trafton was a verbal contract. * * * I have no written agreement concerning this lot. * * * My recollection is clear as to the terms of this oral agreement. * * * As Mr. Trafton went out of the bank he said: 'So far as the lumber is concerned, you can pay that at the bank.' * * * I handed the $50 to Trafton, and he passed it on to Smith. * * * The next conversation I had as to title on payment was on the 20th of October, 1903, when I started from the office which I had built on the lot down to his store to pay him the remaining $50, and I met him on the street and told him I was going down to pay him the other $50 on my lot. He said: 'I am busy. Go in and pay Smith.' He went on, and I went in and paid it to Smith. * * * Then it ran along until the day I paid my lumber bill, which was the 31st day of October, 1904. The reason why I didn't demand a deed when I paid the $50 in 1903 was because I had a lumber bill for about $90 on that lot, due to Trafton, and I hadn't any idea that he would give me a deed until I had paid it. I did not ask him at that time, or make any demand. I waited for about a year before I made a demand. I saw Trafton off and on about every day during that time. On the 31st day of October, 1904, I did make a demand on Mr. Trafton, and he told me to go to Smith for the deed. I went to Smith, and I did not get my deed. Mr. Smith simply grinned and said: 'You better go back to Trafton.' I did not go back to Trafton, but wrote out a demand on him and sent it by registered letter. That demand reads as follows: 'Malta, Montana, October 31, 1904. R. M. Trafton, City—Sir: I hereby demand of you a warranty deed to the east half of lot 3, block 6, Trafton's addition to Malta, as per our agreement of July 21, 1903, and if the same is not delivered within six days from date, I shall begin proceedings against you to recover the same, and such damages as the law allows. C. H. Stevens." The record recites that at the conclusion of this testimony "the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that, under the proof, no decree for specific performance could be awarded." The district court granted the motion, entered a judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Appellant contends that the court erred in granting the so-called motion for a nonsuit, for the reason that the testimony tended to prove all the material allegations of the complaint. The respondent, on the other hand, argues that specific performance of a contract is never demandable as a matter of right, but relief should be granted or withheld in the discretion of the trial court, and in this case the court below having withheld relief to plaintiff on his own showing, and the evidence furnishing grounds for different inferences, the finding of the lower court thereon should not be disturbed. It is well settled that whether or not a contract will be specifically enforced is a matter of judicial discretion. 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 62. But it must be a sound, legal discretion. Dewey v. Spring Valley Land Co., 98 Wis. 83, 73 N. W. 565. And, assuming that the respondent is correct in his conclusion, we think he is wrong in his premises. As we read the testimony, it furnishes no reasonable grounds for different conclusions, and therefore no grounds for the exercise of discretion. Plaintiff testified that the purchase price of the lot was $100, all of which had been paid. Had no written receipts been received in evidence, plaintiff's case would have embodied no uncertainty whatever. The parties, the subject-matter, and the terms of and circumstances surrounding the making of the contract were all clearly and definitely stated. According to the evidence given by the plaintiff, the terms of the agreement were not merely partly but fully performed on his part, and, in addition to that, the defendant had put the plaintiff into actual possession of the premises, upon which he had erected substantial improvements. Under these circumstances the court had the power to decree specific performance of the contract, by virtue of section 2342 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "Sec. 2342. No agreement for the sale of real property, or of any interest therein, is valid unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent, thereunto authorized, in writing; but this does not abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of any agreement for the sale of real property in case of part performance thereof." See, also, Wolke v. Fleming, 103 Ind. 105, 2 N. E. 325, 53 Am. Rep. 495.

But it is argued that because the two receipts produced by the plaintiff recite, respectively, "and the balance in six months, at which time a warranty deed is to be given," and "part payment on lot," an element of uncertainty was injected into the case that authorized the court in disregarding the positive oral testimony of the plaintiff. But let us remember that the plaintiff testified that there was also a lumber bill between the parties, that the sale of the lot and agreement to purchase lumber were parts of one transaction, and that defendant had instructed him to pay the lumber money into the bank, as well as the $50 remaining due on the lot. It is true that plaintiff did not attempt to explain the reason for this phraseology of the receipts, or to account for the employment of the words quoted. Singularly enough he was not asked to do so by counsel for either party. But we do not think that this fact alone would warrant a court of equity in disregarding his positive testimony as to the terms of the sale. We feel that in equity and good conscience he was entitled to a decree as prayed for upon the showing made by him.

The general denial made by the defendant gave the court no intimation of the nature of the defense. It is true that defendant was entitled to file such a pleading, but whether it concealed a valid defense or an absolutely unconscionable one the court had no way of knowing. The receipts were written by the defendant's agent. We think the court should have taken these matters into consideration in passing upon defendant's motion, especially in view of the fact that, unless the defendant can be compelled in this action to disclose his version of the agreement, the plaintiff may never be able to perform his part, although there may be but a small sum between them. We cannot say that time was of the essence of this agreement. Civ. Code, §§ 2223, 2227.

The difficulty we encounter in this case relates to the disposition we shall make of it upon reversal of the judgment. Strictly speaking, there is, in our present practice, no such thing as a motion for a nonsuit in an equitable proceeding. The effect of granting a nonsuit in an action at law is to declare, on the part of the court, that the evidence is not sufficient in law to warrant the jury in finding, under any circumstances, a verdict for the plaintiff. If it be true that in an action to enforce specific performance of a contract the plaintiff is not entitled to relief as of right, then upon a motion for a nonsuit, such as was interposed in this case, it becomes the duty of the trial court to adjudicate the issues between the parties, and in so doing the court may exercise a legal discretion in giving or withholding relief. Such being the case, the effect of the nonsuit would not be to determine that the plaintiff was not entitled to relief in any view of the evidence, but that the court in the exercise of its discretion had withheld relief in the particular case. In the one case the action of the trial court would be reversed if there was any evidence justifying a verdict for the plaintiff, and in the other the action of the court would not be disturbed unless there was an abuse of discretion.

The Legislature of 1903 (Laws 1903 [2d Ex. Sess.] p. 7) enacted into law the following practice provision: "The Supreme Court may affirm, reverse, or modify any judgment or order appealed from, and may direct the proper judgment or order to be entered, or direct a new trial or further proceedings to be had. * * * In equity cases, and in matters and proceedings of an equitable nature, the Supreme Court shall review all questions of fact arising upon the evidence presented in the record, whether the same be presented by specifications of particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient or not, and determine the same, as well as questions of law, unless, for good cause, a new trial or the taking of further evidence in the court below be ordered." The Legislature has power by regulations to establish the procedure in civil and criminal cases, so far as such procedure does not amount to a denial of justice, and has power to declare by law what shall be the practice on appeal. Jordan v. Andrus, 26 Mont. 37, 69 Pac. 118. The evident purpose of the Legislature in passing the law above quoted was undoubtedly to expedite the entry of final judgment in cases where the parties were not entitled to trial by jury; to put an end to litigation and avoid the necessity of new trials involving expense and the contingencies incident to delay. These regulations seem reasonable and salutary. To the end, therefore, that this court might enter final judgment in these equity causes, it is provided that the court shall, on appeal, determine the same on the merits, unless for good cause a new trial or the taking of further evidence is ordered.

It is the duty of parties to an action in equity to introduce all of their testimony so that this court may carry out the intent of the Legislature. If the defendant moves for judgment, at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, it will be construed hereafter as a declaration on his part that, if his motion be granted, he elects to stand upon the case presented by the plaintiff. In this case the defendant may perhaps have been misled by the practice heretofore pursued into thinking that in the event of reversal he would get a new trial as of right. We feel, therefore, that in this particular case that may be sufficient cause for ordering a new trial. But in future we shall not grant new trials in equity cases, except for good cause appearing in the record.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Reversed and remanded.

STATE v. DE LEA.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS—WAIVER OF ERRORS—LIST OF WITNESSES.

In a criminal prosecution, failure to cause defendant to be served at arraignment with a copy of the indorsements upon the information including the list of witnesses is waived where defendant by counsel asked for and obtained time to plead, and afterwards, without objection, pleaded to the information.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 2116, 2117.]

2. SAME—REVIEW—ERRORS AFFECTING SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS.

In a criminal prosecution, minutes of the trial court which, after showing that the jury were present while the case was being tried, recite that the jury retired in charge of a bailiff, and later returned into open court and submitted their verdict, which verdict was filed and read in open court and in the presence of the jury, who, being asked, state that such is their verdict, while defective in not showing that the names of the jury were called by the clerk when brought into court as required by section 2142 of the Penal Code, cannot be construed not to show the presence of the entire jury at the rendition of the verdict, and, if they were so present, the failure to call their names is not prejudicial error under sections 2320 and 2600, providing that the appellate court will not notice errors not affecting the substantial rights of the parties.

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"THEREUPON."

"Thereupon," as defined by Webster, means "upon that or this; immediately; at once; without delay."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 6953-6955.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT—RECORDS—PRESENCE.

In a criminal prosecution, minutes of the trial court, which show the presence of defendant during the trial up to the time the jury retired, and then recite, "Defendant thereupon waived the polling of the jury * * * defendant thereupon waives time for sentence and elects to be sentenced at this time," sufficiently show the presence of defendant when the verdict was rendered under section 2141 of the Penal Code requiring such fact to be affirmatively shown.

5. SAME—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a criminal prosecution, the record shows that an instruction upon the presumption of innocence was not requested, and no error was assigned upon the failure to give such instruction, the appellate court in considering an instruction upon reasonable doubt will be uninfluenced by the failure to give the instruction.

6. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

In a criminal prosecution, an instruction defining a reasonable doubt as "not a mere imaginary or possible doubt, but a substantial doubt, based upon reason and common sense, and induced by the facts and circumstances attending the particular case and growing out of the testimony. It is such a doubt as will leave one's mind, after a careful examination of all the evidence, in such condition that he cannot say that he has an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the defendant's guilt as charged"—is not subject to the objection that by it the jury were confined to a consideration of the evidence, whereas a reasonable doubt may arise from the lack of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1904-1922.]

7. SAME—CREDIBILITY OF ACCUSED.

In a criminal prosecution, an instruction in the words of section 2442, Pen. Code, that a defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, but may be sworn and may testify in his own behalf, and that the jury, in judging his credibility and the weight to be given to his testimony, may take into consideration the fact that he is defendant, and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he is accused, is proper, as the statute creates an exception to the general rule that the court ought not to single out a particular witness, and direct the attention of the jury to his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1895-1901.]

8. SAME—CURE OF ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION.

An erroneous instruction as to larceny is cured by the giving of an instruction not subject to any objection urged against it, which is supplementary to the erroneous instruction, since instructions must be considered as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1990-1995.]

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Michael Donlan, Judge.

Frank De Lea was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

The following instruction as to reasonable doubt was given: "A reasonable doubt is not a mere imaginary or possible doubt, but a substantial doubt, based upon reason and common sense, and induced by the facts and circumstances attending the particular case and growing out of the testimony. It is such doubt as will leave one's mind after a careful examination of all the evidence, in such condition that he cannot say that he has an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the defendant's guilt as charged."

The first sentence of Pen. Code, § 2442, used as an instruction, is as follows: "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself but may be sworn and may testify in his own behalf and the jury in judging his credibility and the weight to be given to his testimony, may take into consideration the fact that he is defendant and the nature and enormity of the crime of which he is accused."

Maury, Tempelman & Hogevoll, for appellant. Albert J. Galen, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Poorman, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOLLOWAY, J. Frank De Lea was convicted of the crime of grand larceny and appeals from the judgment.

1. Objections are made to the proceedings in the case. It is said the court erred: "(a) In not causing a copy of the indorsements upon the information, including the list of witnesses, to be delivered to the defendant at the time of his arraignment. (b) In permitting the verdict to be filed without having the names of the jurors first called by the clerk. (c) In receiving the verdict in the absence of the defendant." These objections must be answered, if at all, by the record.

(a) The minutes of the trial court show: "This day, September 22d, defendant being present in person and by counsel, Mr. J. G. Brown, whose name is by the court ordered entered as counsel for defendant, and the county attorney being present on the part of the state, being then asked, defendant states that his true name is Frank De Lea as charged in the information. Defendant waives reading of the information and accepted a copy thereof, on application of Mr. J. G. Brown. Saturday, September 20th, 1906, at 10 o'clock a. m. is by the court fixed as date for the entry of a plea herein. * * * September 20th. This day defendant being present in person and by counsel Mr. J. G. Brown, and the county attorney being present on the part of the state, thereupon defendant pleads not guilty to the offense charged in the information, which plea is by the court ordered entered." It is not contended that the original information does not contain the names of the witnesses for the state; but it is contended that the minutes fail to show that the copy delivered to the defendant contained the necessary indorsements. It would appear from section 1893, Pen. Code, that the indorsements on the information are not considered part of the information; but, however this may be, by asking for and obtaining time to plead, and afterwards, without objecting, pleading to the information, the defendant waived these defects in the arraignment. 12 Cyc. 348; People v. Lightner, 49 Cal. 226.

(b) The next contention is that the minutes fail to show that the names of the jurors were called before the verdict was delivered, as required by section 2142, Pen. Code. The minutes do show the presence of the 12 men constituting the jury while the case was being tried. With respect to what occurred after the case was submitted the minutes recite: "The jury retired in charge of a sworn bailiff to consider of their verdict and later returned into open court and submitted their verdict which is in words and figures as follows, to wit: [Title of Court and Cause.] 'We, the jury in the above entitled action, find the defendant Frank De Lea guilty of the crime of grand larceny and leave his punishment to be fixed by the court. M. L. Mustard, Foreman.' Which verdict was filed and read in open court and in the presence of the jury who on being asked state that such is their verdict." While these minutes do not meet the requirements of the Code, we hardly think any other fair inference can be drawn than that the jurors were, in fact, all present. Certainly there is not anything here to suggest that the jurors were not all present; and the evident purpose of the provision of section 2142 above for calling the names of the jurors is to insure their presence before the verdict is delivered. A case presenting precisely this same question, and under a similar statute, is Norton v. State, 106 Ind. 163, 6 N. E. 126. In the opinion in that case it is said: "Under the alleged error of the court in overruling appellant's motion for a venire de novo, the only point made by his counsel is based upon their construction of the provisions of section 1829, Rev. St. 1881, and the alleged noncompliance of the trial court therewith. This section provides as follows: 'When the jury have agreed upon their verdict, they must be conducted into court by the officer having them in charge. Their names must then be called, and, if all appear, their verdict must be rendered in open court. If all do not appear, the rest must be discharged without giving a verdict, and the cause must be tried again at the same or next term. The defendant shall have the right, in all criminal cases, to have the jury polled.' It is not claimed by appellant that the jury had not all appeared when their verdict herein was rendered in open court; but it is claimed that their names were not called prior to such rendition of their verdict. Although the statutory provision requiring that the names of the jury must be called is mandatory in form, and although we think that such provisions ought always to be strictly complied with, yet we can hardly regard the omission to call the names of the jury as a material or fatal error, unless it further appears that the jury did not, in fact, all appear at the time their verdict was rendered in open court. To such an error, conceding it to be such, as the one here complained of, section 1891, Rev. St. 1881, seems to us peculiarly applicable, so far as our consideration of the error is concerned. In that section it is thus provided: 'In the consideration of the questions which are presented upon an appeal, the Supreme Court shall not regard technical errors or defects, or exceptions to any decision or action of the court below, which did not, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant.' In the case at bar, if the jury all appeared at the time their verdict was returned into open court, as we must assume they did, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, then we are of opinion that the omission of the court to have the names of the jury called, even if erroneous, did not prejudice the substantial rights of the appellant." Another case identical in its facts is People v. Rodundo, 44 Cal. 538, in which it is said: "It is now claimed that the court erred in receiving the verdict without first calling the names of the jurors. The statute provides that, when the jury have agreed upon a verdict, they shall be conducted into court. Their names must then be called, and, if all do not appear, the rest shall be discharged without giving a verdict." Crim. Prac. Act, § 414. Undoubtedly it was an irregularity to receive the verdict without first calling the names of the jurors; but, if all were in fact present and declared the verdict, it was an irregularity which in no way prejudiced the defendant. Section 601 of the Criminal Practice Act provides: 'Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this act in respect to any pleadings or proceedings, nor an error or mistake therein shall render the same invalid unless it have actually prejudiced the defendant or tended to his prejudice in respect to a substantial right.' The record shows that the 'jury' returned into court and reported the verdict, and it is not even suggested by counsel that the jurors were not all present and agreed. * * * On the whole, we see no error in the case which prejudiced the defendant in respect to any substantial right, and the judgment is therefore affirmed." Our Penal Code contains provisions similar to those referred to by the Indiana and California courts. See sections 2320, 2600, Pen. Code.

(c) The third contention is that the minutes do not show that the defendant was present when the verdict was returned. The minutes do show the presence of the defendant during the trial up to the time the jury retired to consider of their verdict. Then, after the recital last above set forth, the minutes proceed: "Defendant thereupon waived the polling of the jury. * * * Defendant thereupon waives time for sentence and elects to be sentenced at this time." The word "thereupon" first used in this quotation is significant in this connection. Webster defines it to mean: "Upon that or this; immediately; at once; without delay." Substituting in the minutes, then, the meaning of the word "thereupon" for the word itself, and the minutes would say that the jury returned into open court and submitted their verdict, which verdict was filed and read in open court and in the presence of the jury, who, on being asked, stated that such was their verdict. Upon this happening, the defendant immediately waived the polling of the jury and asked to be sentenced at this time. Pen. Code, § 2141, provides that the defendant, if charged with a felony, must be present when the verdict is received; and it is generally held, and we think correctly, that this fact must affirmatively appear; but it must be conceded that by every fair intendment this record is a sufficient showing of the defendant's presence when the verdict was received. Just criticism may be made of the manner in which the minutes of this trial were kept. A studied effort to ignore the law could hardly have been productive of a more defective record.

2. Exception is taken to the giving of instruction No. 7, which defines a reasonable doubt in the language employed for that purpose in Territory v. McAndrews, 3 Mont. 158. The particular objection is that the jury was confined to a consideration of the evidence; whereas, it is said, a reasonable doubt may arise from the lack of evidence, and State v.

Harrison, 23 Mont. 79, 57 Pac. 647, Coffin v. United States, 156 U. S. 432, 15 Sup. Ct. 394, 39 L. Ed. 481, Brown v. State, 105 Ind. 385, 5 N. E. 900, State v. Gosnell (C. C.) 74 Fed. 734, Smith v. State, 9 Tex. App. 150, Densmore v. State, 67 Ind. 303, 33 Am. Rep. 96, and Knight v. State, 74 Miss. 140, 20 South. 860, are cited in support of this contention. But most of these cases are not in point. In the Harrison Case this particular instruction now under consideration was approved. The case was reversed for the refusal of the trial court to give an instruction upon the subject of the presumption of innocence. While in the case now before us there does not appear to have been any instruction given upon the presumption of innocence, as there ought to have been, there is not any error assigned upon the failure of the court in this respect. Indeed, the record shows that an instruction upon that subject was not requested; but in the Harrison Case it was and was refused. So that our consideration of instruction No. 7 is uninfluenced by the failure of the court to give an instruction upon that very important branch of the case. In the Coffin Case there was a reversal for the same reason as in the Harrison Case. In the Gosnell Case the subject is not treated at all. In Brown v. State a somewhat similar instruction is criticized, but the judgment of conviction was affirmed. The same thing occurred in Mackey v. People, 2 Colo. 13. In Smith v. State the instruction given was held erroneous, but upon entirely different grounds from that suggested by counsel for appellant in this case. In each of the other two cases cited an instruction of this general character was held erroneous, for the reason now urged here. But, so far as we are able to ascertain, Indiana and Mississippi are the only states in which the giving of an instruction of this general character is held to be error. It is the accepted rule that, before any one can be convicted of a criminal offense, his guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt; but every attempt to define the apparently simple phrase "a reasonable doubt" has been attended with the greatest difficulty, and it may fairly be said that in a great majority of instances the definitions do not convey any more accurate idea than the phrase itself. So great is the difficulty, that some courts hold that it is not error for the trial court to decline any attempt at a definition. 12 Cyc. 623. In United States v. Hopkins (D. C.) 26 Fed. 443, Judge Dick said: "The inherent imperfection of language renders it impossible to define in exact express terms the nature of a reasonable doubt. It arises from a mental operation, and exists in the mind when the judgment is not fully satisfied as to the truth of a criminal charge, or the occurrence of a particular event, or the existence of a thing." However in 1850 Chief Justice Shaw, of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the celebrated case of Commonwealth v. Webster, 5

Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, formulated a definition which for more than half a century has withstood most of the criticism, and has been adopted and followed in a very large number of courts. In substance, if not in form literally, that definition was adopted and approved by this court in Territory v. McAndrews, above, and for more than 30 years the instruction approved in that case has been generally accepted and approved by the courts of this jurisdiction, and repeatedly approved by this court. See State v. Martin, 29 Mont. 273, 74 Pac. 725. So far as we are aware, the present is the first instance in which the instruction has been attacked upon the ground now urged. We think, however, that the criticism made of this instruction by the courts above is altogether captious, and must have had its origin in the misconception of the function of the presumption of innocence. By some of the courts it is held that this presumption is evidence introduced by the law in favor of the accused. But in State v. Martin, above, this court in a very able opinion by Mr. Commissioner Poorman said: "This presumption may have the effect of evidence, in that it must be overcome by evidence; but, strictly speaking, it cannot be evidence, nor can it be introduced in the case, for it is in the case from its inception. It needs no introduction. It is the safeguard which the law casts around all persons accused of crime, and the defendant cannot be reached by a verdict of guilty until this safeguard is entirely removed. This removal can only be accomplished by evidence which satisfies the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt. The presumption of innocence is in effect the very thing against which the prosecution is directed."

This presumption of innocence surrounds every person accused of crime. And to say that this presumption is evidence introduced at the trial in behalf of the accused implies, at least, that such person does not have that same presumption attending him prior to the trial; for instance, from the time of his arrest until the trial. The expression, "the presumption of innocence is evidence introduced by the law in favor of the accused," is inaccurate and an unfortunate one. If, however, this presumption be treated merely as safeguard with which the law surrounds every person accused of crime, the supposed defects in the definition of a reasonable doubt will at once appear more fanciful than real. It is inaccurate to say, in the language of the Supreme Court of Mississippi: "Such a doubt may arise from a want of evidence." It always does, and of necessity must, arise from a want of evidence, by which we mean a want of sufficient evidence; for in every criminal case where there is a plea of not guilty, if the state does not introduce any evidence, the question of a reasonable doubt never arises, for there is not a court in the land but what under those circumstances would peremptorily direct a verdict of not guilty. But, if the state does offer evidence sufficient in the judgment of the trial court to the jury, then the jurors under their oaths must consider such evidence and such evidence alone in determining whether the safeguard erected by the presumption of innocence has been completely destroyed. It is completely destroyed when, and only when, the jurors can say from the evidence introduced that they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge against the accused. If the evidence leads to a conclusion which satisfies the judgment of the jurors, and leaves upon their minds a settled conviction of the truth of the charge, it is then their duty to so declare by their verdict. But in every such contested case their consideration is directed to the evidence introduced, and from that evidence they must say whether they still retain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. It is in this sense that it is said that a reasonable doubt is not a doubt suggested or surmised without foundation in the facts or testimony. In other words, the jurors may not predicate a doubt upon street rumor, or facts not in evidence, nor upon theories outside of the record, which may be suggested by the ingenuity of counsel, or, upon a merciful inclination to permit the accused to escape, prompted by sympathy for him in his apparently unequal contest with the state. The definition now under consideration, which is in substance that of Chief Justice Shaw, has met with widespread approval. Hughes, Criminal Law & Procedure, §§ 2488, 3263; Hochheimer on Criminal Law, § 157; 12 Cyc. 491. Speaking of this definition, the Supreme Court of California, in People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, said: "And in the general charge of the court the jury were instructed in relation to the subject of reasonable doubt substantially in the language of Mr. Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 320, 52 Am. Dec. 711, which is probably the most satisfactory definition ever given to the words 'reasonable doubt' in any case known to criminal jurisprudence." And in this conclusion we agree. We do not think that the other objections to the instruction are well founded.

3. Exception is likewise taken to the giving of instruction No. 9, which is a literal copy of the first sentence of section 2442 of the Penal Code. But it is said that a court ought not to single out a particular witness and direct the attention of the jury to his testimony; and that this is the general rule is well settled and has been recognized by this court. Mahoney v. Dixon, 34 Mont. 454, 87 Pac. 452. But the Code, in section 2442 above, has made an exception to this general rule. That section particularly states by what standard the jury shall judge of the defendant's credibility; and, in order that they may have this standard which the law has fixed, it is necessary that it be given in a proper instruction. In support of their contention counsel for appellant cite People v. Maugh, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187; but, as this court said in State v. Farnham, 35 Mont. 375, 89 Pac. 728, the instruction criticized in the Maugh Case is not the one given here. And, furthermore, California does not have a provision of the Criminal Code similar at all to section 2442 above. See Pen. Code, Cal., tit. 10, c. 2. The instruction has received the approval of this court, and we are satisfied that it was properly given in this case. State v. Dotson, 26 Mont. 305, 67 Pac. 938; State v. Farnham, above.

4. Instruction No. 10 is also criticized. But this instruction, while not approved, is held in State v. Penna, 35 Mont. 535, 90 Pac. 787, not to be prejudicially erroneous, under circumstances similar to those we have here.

5. Instruction No. 12 attempts to define larceny; but, standing alone, is insufficient for that purpose. State v. Peterson, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 302. But this defect in the instruction is fully cured by instruction No. 17, which, though not technically correct, is not open to any objection urged against it here by counsel for appellant. It is not in any sense contradictory of No. 12, but supplementary of it. The instructions must be considered as a whole.

We find no prejudicial error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BRANTLY, C. J., concurs.

SMITH, J. (concurring specially). I agree with the result reached by Mr. Justice HOLLOWAY in the foregoing opinion. But I am inclined to think, despite the fact that the definition of "reasonable doubt" therein discussed has been employed by the courts of this and other states for so many years, and has been approved, that it is not too late to discourage the practice of giving it to juries in criminal cases. It seems that the English language is inadequate to satisfactorily define the phrase "reasonable doubt." Some courts are not satisfied with the definition approved by this court. How, then, shall a jury of laymen be guided or aided by it? Perhaps the reason why the words are difficult of explanation is because they are so ordinary and simple. At any rate, the definition, although the best that has ever been given and perhaps the best that can be framed, is so complicated and involved that it is more difficult to understand than are the words, the meaning of which are courts have attempted to explain. I do not think the words "reasonable doubt" require explanation. I believe that any juror who has not the mental capacity to understand the words themselves could not possibly comprehend the definition given to them by the courts. How can it be said that a juror could not understand what is meant by a "reasonable doubt" but would know the meaning of the words "an abiding conviction to a moral certainty," used in the definition? I think any intelligent juror will appreciate the scope of his duty when told that, before he is justified in arriving at a verdict of guilty, he must be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt; and that no other or further charge should be given on this subject.

An experience of over 20 years at the bar and on the trial bench enables me confidently to assert that, in criminal causes, more confusion in the minds of jurors, and more illogical verdicts, result from attempts by the court to define a reasonable doubt than from all other causes, save alone the conflict of testimony. Added to this, it is matter of common knowledge in the profession that this definition is seized upon by unscrupulous counsel, representing defendants oftentimes palpably guilty upon the evidence, and industriously repeated and reiterated, to impress upon the jurors that the words have some deeply occult meaning, known only to those engaged in the trial of criminal cases, which they, as jurors, are bound, on their oaths, to apply, or find the defendant not guilty; and that, having solemnly sworn, both generally and in answer to numerous questions touching their competency to sit as jurors, to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt, as defined by the court, there attaches to their deliberations some new and wonderful quality, pertaining more to deity than to mortals, prohibiting them from arriving at a conclusion by any mental process ever before exercised by them; that they must, as jurors, discard their everyday habits of thought and judgment, and use their minds in an entirely different manner from that which, as men, they would employ in their own important affairs. I believe the system of paternalism practiced toward jurors to-day, upon the theory apparently that they are as incapable of forming an intelligent judgment as were the yokels of 400 years ago, should be abandoned, lest in trying to explain the meaning of the most common words and terms we convey to jurors the idea that the law, instead of being founded in common sense, deals in nothing but technicalities.

We hold in this state, in common with many other states in the Union, that it is error for the trial court, usually presided over by a lawyer of experience and ability, to comment in any manner upon the weight of the evidence; and the application of the doctrine has been carried, in my judgment, to the extent of absurdity. But we give instructions to juries that would puzzle a scholastic logician to analyze; and then criticize the jury system. I have talked with highly intelligent jurors—men who were successful in their private affairs—who seemed to feel that a juror must discard all human attributes, and change all his usual mental habits in order to arrive at a verdict in a criminal case according to law. I have heard jurors say, in defense of a verdict of acquittal, in a case where every unsworn person who heard all of the evidence had no doubt whatsoever of the guilt of the defendant: "It was the only thing we could do under the charge of the court." And this after the court had laboriously instructed the jury that they were the sole and exclusive judges of the facts in the case, and that the instructions were merely a guide to the law. This is one of the principal reasons why we have mistrials and wrong verdicts in plain cases involving enormous expense, and why the popular defense of insanity can be successfully interposed in so many murder trials. After all, a reasonable doubt is not a thing to be described. It is a state of mind, not, ordinarily, to be accounted for by pointing out any particular testimony in the record. Doubts come and go, and reappear during the progress of the trial. The jurors are admonished by the court not to make up their minds concerning the guilt or innocence of the accused until the case is finally submitted to them. (An admonition admirable in theory, but ridiculous in practice, because usually impossible of obedience.) More paternalism. And, while the jury knows nothing of it, the trial judge is, in fact, almost powerless. He is a mere puppet in the trial, an umpire whose authority is limited to passing upon questions of admissibility of evidence. If he gives to the jury anything more than abstract propositions of law (and the appellate courts say he should not give those), he is accused, and generally convicted, on appeal, of commenting upon the weight of the evidence. A juror cannot tell when the reasonable doubt first lodged in his mind. Certainly it was not, in most instances, after the case was finally submitted to him. I undertake to say that every honest juror who, upon the whole evidence, has in his heart a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, will act upon it, without analysis or application of definition. He will unconsciously heed it without seeking to explain it. When his mind harbors a doubt that prevents his conscientiously voting guilty, that doubt will be expressed in a vote for acquittal.

I maintain, therefore, that we should give our trial judges credit for the integrity, learning, discretion, and consideration for their oaths of office that they in reality possess, and that our jurors should be treated as men of intelligence, and not as children.

CRAWFORD'S ESTATE v. CRAWFORD et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—NOTICE IN OPEN COURT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 549, providing, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 77, that a party may appeal by notice in open court, or before the judge, if the decree is rendered at chambers, and that such notice shall thereupon by order of the court or judge be entered in the journal, an oral notice of appeal in such a case is all that is required, and service thereof on the adverse party is not necessary; section 538, providing that notices shall be in writing, having no application to matters transpiring in the progress of the cause and relating to the issues.

2. SAME.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 549, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 77, the notice need not be contained in the decree; it sufficing if it be taken in open court and entered by the clerk.

3. SAME—DESCRIPTION OF DECREE.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 549, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 77, and where it appeared that the notice of appeal was given when the decree was rendered, and the entry of the notice apparently immediately followed the entry of the decree in the journal and referred to it as "the above order and decree," the decree was sufficiently identified without further description.

4. SAME.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 549, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 77, where notice of appeal from a final decree of distribution denying the widow any portion of the estate was given in open court, all the heirs affected by the decree were bound to take notice thereof, including those who were not parties to the objections filed in the probate court to the apportionment of any of the property to the widow; they being parties to the settlement of the administrator's final account and to the distribution of the estate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tillamook County; Geo. H. Burnett, Judge.

Final accounting of John R. Harter, administrator of the estate of Robert Crawford, deceased. John J. Crawford and others filed objections to the apportionment of any part of decedent's property to his widow, Rebecca Crawford. From a decree denying her any portion of the estate, said Rebecca Crawford appealed to the circuit court, and, from an order of that court dismissing her appeal, she appeals to the Supreme Court. Reversed.

See In re Crawford's Estate, 90 Pac. 147.

John Harter, administrator of the estate of Robert Crawford, deceased, on January 4, 1906, filed in the county court of Tillamook county his final account of the administration of said estate, in which he reported that Rebecca (Bessie) Crawford is the widow, and seven children of decedent, naming them, are the heirs, of said decedent. Thereafter four of said heirs filed objections in the county court to the apportionment of any part of the property to the widow. An answer to such objections was filed by the widow, and, after a trial of the issues so raised, the county court on the 17th day of April, 1906, filed and entered in its journal findings of fact and conclusions of law, together with a final decree of distribution, denying her any portion of said estate. Following said decree, and on the same day, the court made the following order in said matter: "Comes now on this 17th day of April, 1906, being the same day on which the above order and decree relating to the distribution of the proceeds of the estate of the deceased above named was made, Rebecca Crawford, the widow of Robert Crawford, deceased, by her attorney, W. H. Cooper, and gives notice in open court and before the judge of the above-entitled court that she, the said Rebecca Crawford, does now and at this time appeal from the order, judgment, and decree of this court to the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Tillamook county. It is therefore ordered that the said notice of appeal be entered on the record of this county court. W. H. Conder, County Judge." Appellant thereafter, on April 26th, filed and served an undertaking on appeal, and upon the perfecting of said appeal the said heirs moved that the circuit court dismiss the appeal for the reasons that no notice thereof had been given or served herein; that the pretended notice was given to the judge of the county court in vacation after the April term, and was not served upon the adverse parties; and that said notice does not describe the judgment or order appealed from. This motion is supported by the affidavit of the clerk of the county court to the effect that the findings and decree and the entry of the said notice of appeal were made in vacation after the April term of the county court, and that at the November term, 1906, of the circuit court, the said motion to dismiss the appeal was allowed; and Rebecca Crawford, the widow, appeals to this court from said order.

W. H. Cooper and H. T. Botts, for appellant. G. W. Talmage, for respondents.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The question of the sufficiency of said notice of appeal is the only matter for consideration. In 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 77) the Legislature amended section 549, B. & C. Comp., by adding thereto a provision to the effect that a party may take an appeal by giving notice in open court, or, if the decree is rendered in vacation before the judge, that he appeals from such decision; and such notice shall thereupon, by order of the court or judge thereof, be entered in the journal. It was clearly the purpose of the Legislature that this notice should dispense with the necessity of a formal notice of appeal or service thereof on the adverse party. Similar statutes have been so construed in other states. The statute of the state of Washington (Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6503), in so far as relates to the notice in open court, is identical with ours, and in Town of Elma v. Carney, 4 Wash. 418, 30 Pac. 732, it is held that oral notice is sufficient. This is followed in several subsequent cases. It is also held in Northern, etc., Trust v. Hender, 12 Wash. 550, 41 Pac. 913, that the effect of this statute is not confined to a judgment rendered in term, but applies equally to vacation orders. To the same effect is Torres et al. v. Falgoust, 33 La. Ann. 500. The Texas statute, in so far as relates to giving notice in open court or to the judge, in case of vacation orders, and the entry thereof in the journal, is also similar to our own; and it is held that service on the respondent is not necessary in such cases. Estado Land & Cattle Co. v. Ansley, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 185, 24 S. W. 933; Forrest v. Rawlings, 40 Tex. 502. The United States courts also hold that in case the appeal is taken in open court no citation is necessary. Brockett v. Brockett, 2 How. (U. S.) 238, 11 L. Ed. 251; United States v. Gomez, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 690, 17 L. Ed. 677; Hewitt v. Filbert, 116 U. S. 142, 6 Sup. Ct. 319, 29 L. Ed. 581; Brown v. McConnell, 124 U. S. 489, 8 Sup. Ct. 559, 31 L. Ed. 495. In this latter case it is said that no citation is necessary, because, both parties being constructively in court during the entire term, they are charged by law with notice of all that is done in the case affecting their interests. To the same effect is New York Hosp. v. Knox, 57 Miss. 600. On a motion to dismiss the appeal to this court the notice was oral in open court; and, in deciding that motion, it is held that such notice is sufficient and affects all interested parties without service. In re Crawford's Estate (Or.) 90 Pac. 147.

We are cited to section 538, B. & C. Comp., which requires notices to be in writing; but the notice referred to there relates to such warning as is necessary to bring the adverse party before the court or to advise him of some matter or proceeding not occurring in the progress of the trial, but can have no application to matters transpiring in the progress of the cause and relating to the issues. The notice in open court provided for in B. & C. Comp. § 549, is for the purpose of bringing the appeal to the attention of the court that a record thereof may be made, rather than information or a warning to respondent that an appeal is taken. In Rev. St. Mo. 1899, §§ 807, 811 [Ann. St. 1906, pp. 775, 780], the appeal in open court is taken by motion to the court requesting that a record of the appeal be made. It is recognized as an application to the court also in the opinions in Hewitt v. Filbert, 116 U. S. 142, 6 Sup. Ct. 319, 29 L. Ed. 581; Brockett v. Brockett, 2 How. (U. S.) 238, 11 L. Ed. 251; United States v. Gomez, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 690, 17 L. Ed. 677. Even a rule or statute requiring motions to be in writing does not apply to motions made in the progress of a cause with relation to matters presented by the pleadings or record, to which it is said that general rules cannot apply. 14 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 115; Johnson v. Adleman, 35 Ill. 265; Lake's Appeal from Probate, 32 Conn. 331; Palmer v. Jones, 49 Iowa, 405. Balling-er's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. § 4888, also provides that all notices shall be in writing, but, as we have seen, oral notice under Id. § 6503, is sufficient. Therefore we conclude that an oral notice of appeal given in open court or before the judge, if the decree is rendered at chambers, is all that is required by the statute, and service thereof on the adverse party is not necessary, but all interested parties must take notice of it.

It is objected that the notice was not given at the time of the rendition of the decree. The only thing from which this inference can be drawn is that the entry of the notice of appeal is not embodied in the decree; but that fact does not justify such conclusion. It does show that it was entered on the same day, and it is not necessary that it be contained in the decree. In the case of In re Estate of Askins, 20 D. C. 10, it is held that it is not necessary to have the notice embraced in the decree. It is sufficient if it be taken in open court, and entered by the clerk. It sufficiently appears that such notice of appeal was given at the time of the rendition of the decree, and the entry of the notice apparently immediately followed the entry of the decree in the journal, and refers to it as "the above order and decree," which sufficiently identifies it without further description.

It is further urged that the notice was not served upon the heirs who were not parties to the objections filed in the probate court; but this is untenable. They were parties to the settlement of the final account of the administrator and to the distribution of the estate, being the only matters under consideration and adjudicated by the decree, and, whether actually appearing or not, they are constructively in court; and, when the notice is given in open court, no service being necessary, all parties affected by the decree are bound to take notice of the appeal. Brown v. McConnell, 124 U. S. 489, 8 Sup. Ct. 559, 31 L. Ed. 495; New York Hosp. v. Knox, 57 Miss. 600. If some of the heirs were not parties to the proceeding, then they were not affected by the decree, and have no interest in the appeal. If they were parties and bound by the decree, then they are, without service thereof, also included with the parties affected by the notice.

Therefore, the court below erred in sustaining the motion to dismiss the appeal; and the order dismissing the appeal is reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court for such further proceedings as may be proper, not inconsistent with this opinion.

MULTNOMAH COUNTY v. DEKUM et al.
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT—FRAUD—INFORMATION—DUTY TO DISCLOSE.

Where there is no relation of trust or confidence existing between the parties to a compromise which would impose on one an obligation to give full information, and no artifice or fraud is employed to lull the other to repose, he cannot omit all investigation, and then complain that the former did not volunteer information he possessed, which, if disclosed, would have prevented the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Compromise and Settlement, § 19.]

2. SAME.

Where a county was a party to a suit to remove certain tax titles as a cloud on title, it was bound by the record, and charged with notice that a decree dismissing the suit had been affirmed on appeal prior to the execution of a compromise.

3. COUNTIES — TAXATION — SALES — DELINQUENT TAXES—COMPROMISE BY COUNTY.

Where property charged with delinquent taxes was sold on foreclosure of the tax lien to the county, the county officers had power to effect a valid compromise and settlement with the taxpayers by which a portion of the taxes were remitted.

4. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT—VACATION—FRAUD.

Certain property belonging to a trustee was sold to the county for unpaid taxes. The trustee and the heirs sued the county to cancel the tax certificates as a cloud on title. This suit was dismissed and the decree affirmed on appeal, after which the trustee filed a petition in the county court, alleging that the taxes were invalid and offering a compromise, which the county court accepted. The county thereafter filed a complaint to set aside such compromise, alleging that the trustee did not inform the county court that the decree in the prior suit had been affirmed, and that the assessments were valid, that the taxes were legally imposed, and that the order setting aside the tax sales was void. Held that, as the trustee was under no obligation to impart to the county court information that the decree had been affirmed and the complaint failed to allege any fraud in the settlement, it did not state a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Compromise and Settlement, § 19.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; John J. Cleland, Judge.

Suit by Multnomah county against Adolph A. Dekum, as trustee of the estate of Frank Dekum, deceased, and others. A decree was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This is a suit by Multnomah county against Adolph A. Dekum, as trustee under the last will and testament of Frank Dekum, deceased, and others, to set aside a compromise and settlement, whereby certain tax certificates were, upon the payment of a part of the money due thereon, canceled of record and surrendered. The facts are that the heirs at law of the deceased are the owners in fee of lots 1 and 2 in block 48, lots 3 and 4 in block 38, and lot 5 in block 18 of the city of Portland, and also lot 1 and the south half of lot 4, in block 10, in Couch's addition to that city. This property was mortgaged, and the incumbrances were assessed in 1892 to the defendants, as follows: The Hartford Fire Insurance Company, lot 1, and the south half of lot 4, in block 10, in such addition, and lot 5, in block 18, in the city, and taxed to the amount of $975; "German Savings and Loan Society, mtge. lot 1, 2, block 48, lot 34, block 38, Dekum, Frank, total tax, $2,921.65." These taxes not having been paid, the property assessed therefor was sold May 13, 1899, to the county, which received from the sheriff tax certificates therefor. The trustee and the heirs, asserting that such sales clouded the title to lots 1 and 2 in block 48 in Portland, commenced a suit against the county to remove the outstanding claim, alleging that the tax imposed on the incumbrance on the premises was invalid, because the debt had been paid, the lien discharged, and the statute authorizing the taxation of mortgages repealed. Such proceedings were had that the suit was dismissed and the decree affirmed on appeal. Dekum v. Multnomah County, 38 Or. 253, 63 Pac. 496. A mandate having been sent down, entry was made of it in the lower court in March, 1901; and the decree remains in full force. The trustee thereafter filed in the county court of that county a petition, which set forth the real property first hereinbefore described, the assessment and taxation of the mortgages, as stated, and the assertion that he believed these taxes were invalid because the mortgages were not assessed to the holders thereof, and that there was no tract of land in block 38 of the city of Portland designated as lot number "34"; but that it should have been described as lots 3 and 4 in that block; that in 1895 the county recognized such infirmities by not attempting the collection of the taxes, but in 1899, when an alias writ was issued, the description of the premises was amended without legal authority; that, as a compromise and settlement, and to avoid the expense of litigation, the trustee offered to pay the sum of $975 in full satisfaction of the entire taxes claimed, provided the tax certificates, issued for the property, were canceled of record and surrendered to him. The county court, sitting for the transaction of county business, July 16, 1901, accepted the offer thus made, and upon the payment of the money proposed complied with the terms of the petition; but on May 27, 1903, that court made another order intending to annul such cancellation and surrender, and to effectuate the latter determination this suit was instituted. The complaint sets forth the facts, in substance, as hereinbefore stated, and avers that lots 1 and 2, in block 48, in the city of Portland, constitute the identical property, and the mortgage tax imposed thereon to the German Savings & Loan Society is the same incumbrance described in the suit to remove the alleged cloud from the title; that the trustee did not inform the county court that the decree in that suit had been affirmed; that it is not true that the assessments of either of the mortgages is invalid; that the plaintiff elects to apply the payment of $975 on account of the taxes mentioned; that in 1892 the mortgages were severally owned and held by the defendant corporations, and the taxes specified were duly imposed; that the order of the county court setting aside the tax sales is void and the entries of such sales in the records thereof remains in full force and effect, but, by reason of the apparent release, the plaintiff is precluded from realizing anything upon such securities; and that the county had no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. A demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit, having been overruled and the defendants declining further to plead, the relief prayed for by the plaintiff was granted, from which decree the defendants appeal.

P. L. Willis, for appellants. Harrison Allen, for respondent.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The complaint herein does not allege any fraud or misrepresentation as a basis for setting aside the compromise and settlement. Neither does it aver that such agreement was not made in good faith, unless concealment can be inferred from the statement that the trustee did not inform the county court that the decree rendered in the case of Dekum v. Multnomah County, 38 Or. 253, 63 Pac. 496, had been affirmed.

The doctrine once prevailed that the failure of a party to a contract to disclose every material fact of which he knew the adverse party was ignorant, although such actuality was equally within the observation or reach of both parties, would afford sufficient equitable grounds for rescinding an agreement that was consummated by means of the concealment. Pom. Eq. § 850. This precept is modified to some extent by a text-writer who, discussing the question, says: "As a general rule, each party is bound to communicate to the other his knowledge of material facts, provided he knows the other to be ignorant of them, and they be not open and naked, or equally within the reach of his observation." 2 Kent, Com. *482. In a note to this excerpt, appearing in Lacy's edition to the works of this noted author, it is stated: "The rule here laid down, though one undoubtedly of moral obligation, is perhaps too broadly stated to be sustained by the practical doctrine of the courts. The qualification of the rule is that the party in possession of the facts must be under some special obligation, by confidence reposed or otherwise to communicate them truly and fairly." The more modern rule is that when there is no relation of trust or confidence existing between the parties to a compromise and settlement, which would impose upon one an obligation to give full information, and no artifice for a fraudulent purpose is employed which would lull the other to repose, he cannot proceed blindly, omitting all inquiry and investigation, and then complain that the former did not volunteer to give the information which he possessed. 8 Cyc. 525; Dambmann v. Schulting, 75 N. Y. 55; Graham v. Meyer, 90 N. Y. 611, 1 N. E. 143; Cleveland v. Richardson, 132 U. S. 318, 10 Sup. Ct. 100, 33 L. Ed. 384. Tested by this rule, the complaint in the case at bar does not show that any fiduciary relation existed between the parties hereto at the time the compromise and settlement were reached, nor does that pleading negative in any manner a want of knowledge on the part of the county court that the decree rendered in the case of Dekum v. Multnomah County, supra, had been affirmed. The county, however, was a party to that suit; and hence it knew what decree had been rendered therein, and was bound by the record. The complaint was undoubtedly framed on the assumption that the officers of a municipal corporation were powerless to effect a valid compromise and settlement whereby any part of a burden, represented by certificates issued to a county on account of the sale of property for delinquent taxes, could be remitted. This question having been settled adversely to such theory (Multnomah County v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 46 Or. 523, 80 Pac. 409), the only ground, therefore, on which a decree for the plaintiff could be based, is the alleged failure of the trustee to impart the information which he possessed, and that is insufficient.

It is unnecessary, in view of the conclusion reached, to consider whether or not the plaintiff can retain the money paid, which affords a valuable consideration for the compromise and settlement, and seek a rescission.

An error having been committed by the trial court, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer.

MATLOCK v. SCHEUERMAN.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—CHECKS—ACTIONS—DEFENSES—ILLEGALITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 1945, providing that all notes, bills, etc., the consideration for which is money won at gaming with cards, etc., shall be void as between the parties thereto and all other persons, except holders in good faith, without notice of the illegality of the contract, where, in an action on a check by the indorsee thereof, it was admitted by the pleadings that the check was given for a gambling debt, plaintiff had the burden of establishing all the elements necessary to constitute him a holder in good faith for value.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 1675-1686.]

2. SAME.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 4454, providing that one is a holder in due course of a negotiable instrument who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: "That it is complete and regular on its face," etc.—the fact that at the time a check was transferred the payee stated that the drawer had asked him to wait two or three days for presentation of the check did not charge the indorsee with notice of any infirmity in the contract, such a request not being binding on the payee, and not varying the terms of the writing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 849-852.]

3. SAME—PRESENTATION—TIME.

As between the drawer and payee of a check the rule is that, when the payee to whom the check is delivered receives it in the same place where the bank on which it is drawn is located, he may preserve recourse against the drawer by presenting it for payment at any time before the close of banking hours on the next day.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 1091-1103.]

4. SAME.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 4453, providing that, where an instrument, payable on demand, is negotiated an unreasonable length of time after its issue, the holder is not deemed a holder in due course, a check issued on a certain date, and bearing that date and negotiated at noon of the following day, was not overdue so as to carry to the indorsee notice of its illegality or previous dishonor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 830-841.]

5. SAME—RECEIPT IN USUAL COURSE OF BUSINESS.

Commercial paper may be said to be received in the usual course of business when it is indorsed and delivered for value under such circumstances that a business man of ordinary intelligence and capacity would give his money, goods, or credit for it, when offered for the purpose for which it is transferred; and it would not be in due course, if he should at once suspect the integrity of the paper itself, or the credit and standing of the party offering it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 819, 820.]

6. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

A purchaser for valuable consideration before maturity of negotiable paper is not as a matter of law affected by notice of facts calculated to arouse suspicion as to the transaction in which the paper originated, the single question being whether he acted in good faith; and in determining that question his knowledge of suspicious circumstances may be shown, and it is for the jury to determine the ultimate facts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1879.]

7. SAME—NOTICE OF INFIRMITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 4453, providing that to constitute notice of infirmity in a negotiable instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith, evidence that the transfer of a check for $400 by S., the payee thereof, to plaintiff, his brother-in-law, took place near the bank on which the check was drawn and of which plaintiff was vice president; that no inquiry was made at the bank before purchase; and that plaintiff, after getting his lunch, went to a hotel, got a blank check, and filled it out to the order of S. for $400, and gave it to another party for delivery to S.—did not show actual knowledge on plaintiff's part of an infirmity in the check.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 1832-1839.]

8. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where, in an action on a check by the indorsee thereof, an inference may be drawn from the surrounding circumstances that on the one hand tends to discredit plaintiff's testimony as to his lack of knowledge of the infirmity of the check and his good faith in taking it, and on the other hand tends to establish lack of good faith, the question is for the jury.

9. PAYMENT—CHECK OF DEBTOR—PRESUMPTION.

When a debtor gives his check for the amount of his indebtedness, the prima facie presumption arises that the check was taken merely as conditional, not as absolute, payment, though to make the rule applicable there must be a debt either precedent or contemporaneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, §§ 189-194.]

10. BILLS AND NOTES—CONSIDERATION—EXCHANGE OF COMMERCIAL PAPER—PAYMENT AS CONDITION.

Where there is an exchange of commercial paper, each instrument forms a sufficient consideration for the other, and such exchange is an independent obligation not conditioned on the payment of the other, unless such condition is expressed in it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 174.]

11. SAME.

B. & C. Comp. § 4454, relating to negotiable instruments, provides that one is a holder in due course "who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: * * * That he took it in good faith and for value." Section 4427 provides that value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. One S., the payee of a check drawn by defendant, told plaintiff that defendant had asked him to wait two or three days before presenting it, and that he (S.) might need some money. Plaintiff agreed to take the check, which was thereupon indorsed to him, he giving S. his own check for a like amount. This latter check was afterwards paid. Held, that plaintiff gave value for the check indorsed to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 898-908.]

12. SAME—RIGHTS OF INDORSEE—INVALIDITY OF CHECK.

A bona fide indorsee for value of a check given for a gambling debt is not bound on discovering the original invalidity of the check to sue the indorser rather than the maker.

13. SAME—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Defendant gave his check to one S. in payment of a gambling debt. S. indorsed the check to plaintiff, who took it without notice of its illegality, and gave his own check for a like amount, and on the same bank, in exchange therefor. Held, that an instruction that plaintiff was not bound to make inquiry at the bank, or ascertain whether or not his check had been presented or paid at the time he presented defendant's check for payment, nor was it necessary for him to stop payment on his own check, if, at the time he presented defendant's check for payment, he was a bona fide holder thereof, and that the fact that his own check had not yet been cashed would make no difference, was proper.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla County; H. J. Bean, Judge.

Action by W. F. Matlock against Jacob Scheuerman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant appeals from a judgment entered against him for the amount of a check issued by him under date of December 12, 1906, on the First National Bank of Pendleton, for the sum of $400, in favor of Lester Swaggart, his order, or bearer, who about noon of the following day indorsed and delivered it to plaintiff, receiving in exchange therefor plaintiff's check for the same amount, on the same bank, payable to his order. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff paid Swaggart value for the check, and on the 14th presented it to the bank for payment, which was refused on the order and direction of defendant, given to the bank without plaintiff's knowledge, and after he became the owner of it. The answer admits the issuance of the check, but denies case of a holder in due course? We shall discuss in the order of their statement in section 4454, supra, the several elements of fact, the existence of which is necessary to constitute one a holder in due course.

1. It is necessary that the instrument be complete and regular on its face, and it is argued by the defendant that Swaggart's remark at the time of the negotiation that Scheuerman had asked him to wait two or three days for presentation of the check disclosed to plaintiff that the instrument did not represent on its face all of the contract between the parties and rendered it indefinite as to time of payment. Such a request, however, was not binding on the payee. It did not vary the terms of the writing. It added nothing to it and took nothing from it that was essential to its character as a negotiable instrument. From such a request one would usually and rightly infer that the maker had not funds on deposit to meet the check when issued, but would deposit sufficient funds within the time, and, by the use of such language, notice of that fact might be given; but it is not calculated to carry notice of any infirmity in the contract.

2. It is urged that the check was overdue when negotiated. It is payable on demand, and when such paper is negotiated an unreasonable length of time after issue the holder is not deemed a holder in due course. B. & C. Comp. § 4455. What is a reasonable time has been fixed by judicial decisions. As between the drawer and payee the rule is that, when the payee to whom the check is delivered receives it in the same place where the bank on which it is drawn is located, he may preserve recourse against the drawer by presenting it for payment at any time before the close of banking hours on the next day. 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (5th Ed.) § 1590. The presumption raised by the statute is that if the instrument is presented within a reasonable time it would be paid, if a valid instrument on its face; but, when such reasonable time has passed and the instrument is still in circulation, it carries with it the inference of dishonor, and is notice to any one taking it of any latent inherent infirmity that may exist. The check having been issued on the 12th, and bearing that date, and negotiated at the noon hour on the 13th, was not overdue, so as to carry notice to plaintiff of its illegality or of its previous dishonor.

3. It is next urged that the check was not received in the usual course of business, but in a very unusual manner, not in the course of a business transaction, or a transaction free from suspicion. As to what transactions are included "in the usual course of business" it is not easy to determine. That depends largely upon the circumstances of each particular case. 7 Cyc. 925. As applied to the indorsement of commercial paper, it may be said generally to include the concurrent indorsement and delivery for value under such circumstances that a business man of ordinary intelligence and capacity would give his money, goods, or credit for it when offered for the purpose for which this was transferred, and it would not be in due course if such a person would at once suspect the integrity of the paper itself, or the credit and standing of the party offering it. 2 Randolph on Com. Paper, § 988; Roberts v. Hall, 37 Conn. 205, 9 Am. Rep. 308; Kimbro v. Lytle, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 417, 31 Am. Dec. 585. This necessarily involves the question of good faith. But a purchaser for a valuable consideration before maturity of negotiable paper is not as a matter of law affected by notice of facts calculated to arouse suspicion as to the transaction in which the paper originated. The single question is whether he acted in good faith, and to aid in determining that question his knowledge of suspicious circumstances may be shown, and it is for the jury to determine the ultimate facts. Bowman v. Metzger, 27 Or. 23, 39 Pac. 3, 44 Pac. 1090. Since the decision of that case the Legislature has prescribed a rule upon what shall constitute notice in such cases: "To constitute notice of an infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith." B. & C. Comp. § 4458. The lack of good faith arises, it is asserted, from the facts shown that the transfer took place in the near vicinity of the bank on which the check was drawn, and of which Matlock was vice president; that he and Swaggart were brothers-in-law; that no inquiry was made at the bank before purchase; that Matlock after getting his lunch went to the hotel, and there procured a blank check in which he wrote the amount of $400, payable to Swaggart, and signed and delivered it to Endicott for delivery to Swaggart. But none of these facts amount to proof of actual knowledge. As to making the inquiry "he does not owe to the party who puts such paper in circulation the duty of active inquiry to avert the imputation of bad faith. The rights of the holder are to be determined by the simple test of honesty and good faith, and not by mere speculation as to his probable diligence or negligence." Belmont Branch Bank v. Hoge, 35 N. Y. 65-68; Bowman v. Metzger, supra. Plaintiff testified to his lack of knowledge of the infirmity of the paper and to his good faith in taking it; but if an inference may be drawn from the surrounding circumstances that on the one hand tends to detract from the credibility of plaintiff's statements, and on the other hand tends to establish the lack of good faith, it is for the jury and not the court to determine the fact.

4. Did the plaintiff take the instrument for value? Value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. Section 4427,

B. & C. Comp. It is a well-settled and universally recognized rule that, when a debtor has given his check for the amount of his indebtedness, the prima facie presumption arises that the check was taken merely as conditional, not absolute, payment (22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law [2d Ed.] 569), and "the acceptance of the instrument by the creditor is considered as accompanied by the condition of payment. Thus it was said, in the time of Lord Holt: 'A bill shall never go in discharge of a precedent debt, except it be a part of the contract that it shall be so.'" 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (5th Ed.) 283. And this rule has been applied to the liquidation of a contemporaneous debt. Id. 281.

There must, however, be a debt, either precedent or contemporaneous, to make the rule applicable. Where, however, there is an exchange of commercial paper, each instrument forms a sufficient consideration for the other (2 Randolph on Com. Paper, §§ 479-480; Rice v. Grange, 131 N. Y. 149, 30 N. E. 46; Rankin v. Knight, 1 Cin. R. [Ohio] 515; Shannon v. Harley, 32 Misc. Rep. 623, 66 N. Y. Supp. 471), and each is an independent obligation not conditional on the payment of the other (7 Cyc. 710). In this case the language of the parties used at the time imports nothing more than an exchange of checks. They met upon the street, when Swaggart says to plaintiff: "I have a check of Scheuerman's which he asked me to wait two or three days for, and I may need the money." Plaintiff replies: "All right. Give me the check, and I will give you my check for it, and you can go to the bank and get the money." That is the contract between the parties. It appears from other evidence that the Scheuerman check which was then indorsed and delivered to plaintiff was for the sum of $400, and that Matlock gave to Swaggart his check for a like amount. The transaction does not amount to an offer to pay $400 and its acceptance, thereby creating a debt of that amount, which was afterwards liquidated by the delivery of another check. If, however, that construction should follow, the check would have the effect of conditional payment, and it is a part of the plaintiff's case that the check he gave was paid on the 15th. That not only established its value, but is a performance of the condition. The original obligation is paid and extinguished by relation as of the date of the giving of the check. Hunter v. Wetsell, 84 N. Y. 549, 38 Am. Rep. 544; Getchell v. Chase, 124 Mass. 366; Cushman v. Libbey, 15 Gray (Mass.) 358. As sustaining the contention that the check was not payment, we are cited to the case of Heartt v. Rhodes, 66 Ill. 351-356. There one Dickinson gave his check to pay a precedent debt existing in the form of a note signed by Heartt for his accommodation, and on which the action was brought. At the time of giving the check Dickinson had only $23.40 in the bank, and the check was dishonored for want of funds. Because of the pre-existing debt, the rule of conditional payment was applicable, and the court very properly say: "Drawing the check without having funds to meet it, and having no right to expect payment of it, was a fraud and imposition on the payee." For the same purpose the case of Harrington v. Johnson, 7 Colo. App. 483, 44 Pac. 368, is cited. There one Hoblit, who was the cashier of a bank, purchased of the mortgagee a note and mortgage which had been fraudulently given and gave a check on his bank for the price. A suit in equity was brought to set aside the conveyance for fraud, and the defense of bona fide purchaser for value was set up. Fraud was found; but the lower court held that Hoblit purchased without notice, and that by giving his check he had paid value. On appeal the case was reversed upon the ground that Hoblit was entirely silent as to what became of the check; whether it was ultimately paid, or whether, in point of fact, Mrs. Johnson, the assignor, ever received the money which it represented. He neither produced the check or proved its payment, and hence there was no evidence of value. Thompson v. Sioux Falls National Bank, 150 U. S. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. 94, 37 L. Ed. 1063, is another case upon which defendant relied. It was there held that the crediting upon the books of the bank to a depositor of the amount of a check fraudulently issued without consideration and to whom it was assigned does not make the bank a bona fide purchaser for value, and that if, after such credit and before payment for value upon the faith of the check, the holder received notice of the invalidity of the check, he cannot become a bona fide holder by subsequent payment. This is undoubtedly correct, because by such credit only the relation of debtor and creditor is created, and it is the right of the apparent debtor at any time upon receipt of knowledge of the invalidity of the check to cancel the credit, but if it pays, having such knowledge, it is a voluntary payment. We conclude, therefore, that there was no error in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

The theory of the defense is that the giving of a check by Matlock to Swaggart was not payment and did not amount to payment until Matlock's check was paid at the bank on which it was drawn, or it had passed out of Swaggart's hands and into the hands of an innocent purchaser. An instruction to that effect was asked, but was denied; and the court instructed the jury: "That the plaintiff was not bound to make inquiry at the bank, or ascertain whether or not his check had been presented or paid at the time he presented the Scheuerman check for payment. Neither was it necessary for plaintiff to stop payment on his check, if at the time he presented the check to the bank for payment he was a bona fide holder thereof. The fact that his own check had not yet been cashed would make no difference." And error is also assigned for the refusal to give and the giving of these instructions. If defendant's theory is correct as to what constitutes payment and when it took place, then Matlock received notice of an infirmity in the instrument before he paid value, and he would be bound at his own peril to stop payment of his own check. But we have already held that, where there is an exchange of commercial paper, as there was in this case, each instrument is a sufficient consideration for the other, and such exchange is an independent obligation, not conditioned on the payment of the other, unless such condition is expressed in it. It necessarily follows that the nonpayment of the Scheuerman check would not be a defense to Matlock in an action against him on his own check brought by Swaggart. "It is true," as stated in Wooster v. Jenkins, 3 Denio (N. Y.) 187, "that so long as the securities are in the hands of the original parties they will balance each other. But it is by way of set-off, and not on the ground that they are invalid." Even the defense of set-off would be lost by assignment of the check. As between Matlock and the bank he could doubtless have stopped payment of his own check when denied payment of the Scheuerman check, but that would not have relieved him of liability on his own check either in the hands of Swaggart or of a third party as assignee. While Matlock may have had a cause of action against Swaggart as indorser upon due notice to him of nonpayment, he is also entitled to his action against Scheuerman, and he was not bound to pursue the former for the protection of the latter to whom he was under no legal duty on account of the original invalidity of the check. In Duncan v. Gilbert, 29 N. J. Law, 521, action was brought on a note made for the accommodation of one Rowland, and which, it was alleged as a defense, had been fraudulently misappropriated by him, and a letter of credit on London obtained from plaintiff in his favor as the consideration for its assignment. The suggestion was made to the court that plaintiff might revoke the letters of credit and thus protect themselves, to which Brown, J., at page 540 of opinion, replies, in substance, that, if it be said that Rowland has not drawn, the plaintiffs may protect themselves from future drafts by revoking the credit, the answer is, the plaintiffs cannot be called upon by defendant to adopt that remedy. There was no error in refusing the requested instruction, or in the one given.

The court permitted the jury to consider all of the surrounding circumstances given in evidence, which included plaintiff's failure to notify Swaggart of the nonpayment of the defendant's check, and his failure to demand and enforce payment against Swaggart, to ascertain plaintiff's good faith in taking the check. We think that is all that defendant was entitled to, and there was no error in refusing the other requested instructions, not specifically considered herein.

These considerations, we think, dispose of the errors assigned, and result in an affirmance of the judgment.

BRUMMITT et al. v. OGDEN WATER-WORKS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Feb. 2, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—FISCAL MANAGEMENT—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYERS.

Where a city enacts an ordinance regulating its relations with a water company which provides for excessive rates for the use of water for municipal purposes, a taxpayer may sue to enjoin the waste of public funds, though the taxes of others are proportionally raised.

2. SAME—ULTRA VIRES ACTS.

A taxpayer may sue for relief against the waste of public funds by unauthorized or ultra vires acts of the municipality, in the absence of a special statute requiring a particular officer to sue for the benefit of all taxpayers. Hence, if a city enacts an invalid ordinance regulating its relations with a water company so as to bind itself to pay unreasonable rates or to require the payment of unjust charges by the public, taxpayers affected directly as users of water or indirectly as taxpayers may sue to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance.

3. SAME—DISCRETIONARY ACTS.

Where a city is acting within its authorized powers, a taxpayer cannot arrest its acts merely because they would be unwise or extravagant, nor in any matter that is purely legislative or discretionary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 2157.]

4. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RATES—REASONABLENESS—PRESUMPTION.

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that water rates agreed upon between a city and a water company are fair and reasonable.

5. APPEAL—SCOPE OF REVIEW—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED—CITY ORDINANCE—GROUNDS OF INVALIDITY.

In an action by taxpayers to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance regulating the relations between a city and a water company, where the ordinance is pleaded and made a part of the complaint, whether a particular provision is legal or illegal, in connection with the other provisions and the allegations of the complaint, may present a mere question of law, and, if it does, the grounds of illegality of the particular provision need not be specially pleaded to authorize its consideration on appeal, if the rights of plaintiffs are affected thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3316-3323.]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCES—REMEDY OF TAXPAYER.

A taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance, even though it is invalid, unless his rights are affected.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 2157.]

7. MONOPOLIES—GRANT—CONSTRUCTION—EXCLUSIVENESS.

Unless a grant is expressly made exclusive, it will not be so construed except by unavoidable implication arising from the terms used in the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Monopolies, § 1.]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—FISCAL MANAGEMENT—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYER—INJUNCTION—ENFORCEMENT OF ILLEGAL ORDINANCE.

Where an ordinance granting rights to a water company for 50 years is not prohibited by statute, and does not prevent others from receiving the right to supply inhabitants with water, and at most grants a monopoly of the right to furnish water to the city for that time, its enforcement cannot be enjoined in an action by taxpayers who have no direct or personal interest therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 2158.]

9. SAME—INVALIDITY OF PART OF ORDINANCE—EFFECT.

Though a part of an ordinance fixing the relations between a city and a water company is invalid, if it does not affect the interests of the taxpayers who are suing to restrain its enforcement, the effect of the invalid portion upon other provisions need not necessarily be considered in an action by the taxpayers to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance.

10. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RATES—AUTHORITY OF MUNICIPALITY TO FIX—RIGHT—WAIVER.

The fixing and regulation of water rates is a governmental function which cannot be surrendered or suspended by the city council.

11. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REGULATION OF RATES OF PUBLIC SERVICE.

Municipalities in this state cannot enter into binding contracts regarding rates for services rendered to the public, for the right to regulate and fix such rates cannot be surrendered, in the absence of a constitutional or statutory authority.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 154.]

12. SAME—ORDINANCES—EFFECT OF PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

The fact that a city ordinance is invalid in part because it attempts to suspend its right to regulate water rates will not render the rest of the ordinance invalid, since, on account of its invalidity, that portion could have no effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 248-251.]

13. SAME—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYER—CONTESTING VALIDITY OF ORDINANCES.

A taxpayer cannot sue to declare invalid or restrain the enforcement of an ordinance regulating relations with a water company, even though it contains invalid provisions which would affect his rights, if they could be enforced for, if they are illegal, they cannot be enforced by the water company, and would be no defense to the enforcement of the taxpayer's right against the company.

14. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—WATER RATES.

The fact that an ordinance regulating the relations of the city with a water company authorizes the company to fix reasonable rates to be paid by the public in certain instances does not invalidate the ordinance, since, if the rates are reasonable, it is immaterial who fixes them.

15. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYERS—ENJOINING ENFORCEMENT OF ORDINANCES.

A taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance relinquishing the city's right to purchase a water plant, since the question of purchase is discretionary with the council, and is not a proper subject of judicial review.

16. SAME—ALTERATION OF FORMER CONTRACT.

An ordinance readjusting water rates and regulating relations with water company, which requires payment for water used on school lawns during a certain season, is not invalid merely because the company was required to furnish free water for the public schools and grounds under a former agreement, and a taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance on that ground, for the wisdom of the ordinance is not a matter for judicial review.

17. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RIGHT OF CITY TO DISPOSE OF WATER RIGHTS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

Const. art. 11, § 6, provides that no municipal corporation shall directly or indirectly lease any water rights or sources of water supply controlled by it, but all such rights, etc., shall be preserved, maintained, and operated by it for supplying its inhabitants with water at reasonable charges; provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent an exchange of water rights or sources of water supply for others of equal value, and to be devoted in like manner to the public supply of its inhabitants. Prior to the time the Constitution went into effect a city had made a contract purporting to lease certain water rights to one who agreed to construct and operate a system of waterworks to supply the city, etc., under which the lessee was to furnish certain free water to the city. After the Constitution was adopted the city passed an ordinance regulating its relations with the company which succeeded to the rights of the lessee in which some changes in rates, etc., were made, and this ordinance granted to the company the use of the water rights for a term of 50 years as a part of the arrangement; but the city was still to receive considerable water for public purposes free of charge. Held, that the ordinance was in effect a mere continuance of the former contract, and the disposition of the city's water right was valid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 274.]

18. SAME.

Even if the ordinance were to be construed as a new contract, it would not be invalid merely because it is called a lease, since the water belonging to the city was devoted to its use under the contract.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 274.]

19. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CONSTRUCTION—MEANING OF LANGUAGE.

In determining whether an act is unconstitutional within the meaning of a certain provision, it must fall within the spirit of the constitutional inhibition, and not merely within the technical language used, for Constitutions like other laws are not to be interpreted alone by their words abstractly considered, but the language should be read in the light of the conditions which are to be met and the objects to be attained.†

20. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RATES.

Where an ordinance regulating relations with a water company and granting the company a right to use the streets, etc., fixes the rates for the entire period of the contract, that provision cannot be upheld, but the city council may fix temporary rates. Both the city and its taxpayers may sue to enforce reasonable rates, and the water company may sue to prevent the enforcement of confiscatory rates. Hence the entire ordinance is not vitiated by an agreement of the council that a certain rate for hydrants should be maintained during the 50-year period covered by the ordinance.

*Ogden City v. Waterworks Irrigation Co., 28 Utah, 25, 76 Pac. 1069.

†State v. City Council, 28 Utah, 12, 64 Pac. 460.

Appeal from District Court, Second District; J. A. Howell, Judge.

Action by James J. Brummitt and others against the Ogden Waterworks Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. D. Skeen, James N. Kimball, Dey & Hoppaugh, and C. S. Varian, for appellants. Van Cott, Allison & Riter, and Howat & Macmillan, for respondents.

FRICK, J. This action was commenced December 12, 1906, by the plaintiffs, as taxpayers and water users, for equitable relief by injunction. In 1889 the defendant Ogden City entered into a contract with one J. R. Bothwell whereby he agreed to construct and operate a system of waterworks to supply Ogden City and its inhabitants with water for all purposes. Ogden City, on its part, granted Bothwell the right to lay the pipes to be used in the water system in the streets, alleys, and public places of the city. The contract was for no definite time, and in connection therewith the city leased to said Bothwell its water right amounting to 0.98 of a second foot of water "for the full time that said Bothwell or assigns furnishes water through its system" of waterworks. The defendant waterworks company (hereinafter called "company") succeeded to all the rights of Bothwell under said contract, and for a long time prior to and at the commencement of this action owned and operated the system of waterworks constructed by Bothwell as aforesaid. A further history leading up to the making of the contract and the conditions under which it was entered into and executed are all set forth in the case of Ogden City v. Waterworks & Irrigation Co., 28 Utah, 25, 76 Pac. 1069, to which we refer for a more complete statement. We shall only refer to such parts here as are deemed essential to an understanding of the points passed upon in this opinion. In the Bothwell contract the rates agreed upon were as follows: For the first 100 hydrants, $75 a year each; for any number above 100, $60 a year each; for "city buildings, public schools, and grounds, public fountains and water troughs, parks, city squares, and lawns, street sprinkling, and all other municipal uses of water, free." The rates were to be reduced 10 per cent. after three years, and another 10 per cent. after six years. Extensions were to be made as fast as the consumption of water by users should produce a revenue of 8 per cent. on the cost of extensions. The city also reserved the option to purchase the system of waterworks by paying therefor the original cost of construction, to be paid for either in cash or in 6 per cent. city bonds. This option did not include a certain conduit which was part of and connected with the waterworks system. In addition to the waterworks the city was also to purchase the water rights owned by Bothwell, the value of which was to be ascertained by appraisers chosen by the parties. Before the city could exercise its option to purchase it was required to pay Bothwell the sum of $150,000, payment thereof to be made in three annual installments, which was to be for the perpetual right to use the conduit above mentioned. Much litigation ensued, a part of which culminated in the case referred to in 28 Utah, supra. In 1906 it seems a full adjustment and settlement of all differences between the parties was had, and, in pursuance of which, the terms and conditions of the Bothwell contract, under which the company was operating the waterworks system, were modified in certain respects by an ordinance passed by the city on September 24, 1906, and duly accepted by the company on October 1st of the same year. It is this ordinance that is called in question in this proceeding by the water users and taxpayers. The purpose of the action is to declare the ordinance illegal and void, and to enjoin its further enforcement by the city and the company. In the ordinance the rates for fire hydrants were fixed at $35 each. The city was also to receive free water for the following purposes: For all public buildings and grounds used for city purposes; for flushing public sewers; for washing paved streets and gutters; for five public drinking fountains, and an additional one for every 5,000 increase in population; for five watering troughs, and an additional one for each 5,000 increase in population over 20,000; for sprinkling city streets; for public school buildings and grounds, except for the water used on lawns from June 1st to September 15th; for sprinkling all the city parks, city hall square, city hospital grounds, and lawns at the library building, and for parking the centers of all streets. In addition to this the company agreed to pay the city an annual license or occupation tax of $2,500. The right to occupy the streets and to furnish water was limited in the ordinance to 50 years. The city also, as in the Bothwell contract, granted the company the use of the 0.98 second foot of water during the term aforesaid. Extensions were also provided for upon the same terms as in the Bothwell contract. The right was also given the company to set and maintain water meters in any building except residences, and to charge for water at meter measurements instead of the rates fixed by the ordinance. It was also provided that "consumers shall have the right to have meters set and pay for water by meter measurement. Meters will be of such make and size as may be approved by the waterworks company, and will be furnished and maintained in good order by the consumer." The ordinance also contained a schedule of water rates to be paid by the consumers of water. These rates were not to be increased nor diminished during the term for which the right was granted, except that all rates, not including fire hydrants, should be readjusted "every 10 years by a committee of three, one to be appointed by the city council, one to be appointed by the waterworks company, and these two to appoint a third member." For the use of water not specially designated in the schedule of rates the company was authorized to fix a reasonable rate. Ogden City also agreed to pay the sum of $10,000 to the company as a full and complete compromise and settlement of all prior claims against the city for water rentals or for any and all other claims arising out of the prior litigation and rights or claims existing between the parties, and of all matters pertaining thereto. The amount of these claims does not appear, but it is fairly inferable that they were much in excess of the $10,000 mentioned. In their complaint the plaintiffs attack the ordinance on the following grounds: That the city had no power to lease the 0.98 second foot of water; that it had no authority to waive the option right of the city to purchase the waterworks system provided for in the Bothwell contract; that the city, without legal authority, authorized the payment of extra compensation to the company for the performance of duties which it was already bound to perform; that the city had no power to waive, suspend, or relinquish the right to fix and regulate the water rates for the use of water, as contemplated in the ordinance; that the water rates fixed in the ordinance are exorbitant, unreasonable, and excessive. The plaintiffs further alleged that the city and the company threaten to enforce all and singular the matters complained of, and prayed that they be enjoined. The defendants filed separate answers to the complaint. The company admitted the making of the Bothwell contract set forth in the complaint, the passage and acceptance of the ordinance, the corporate character of defendants, and that it intended to carry on its water system and enforce the rates mentioned in the ordinance. It further answered that as to the leasing of the 0.98 second foot of water such alleged lease was only an extension or renewal of the right to said water provided for in the Bothwell contract, and that it was the intention of the company and the city that the company should continue the flow of said water through its pipes the same as theretofore, so that the city would not lose or forfeit its rights to said water by a nonuser thereof. It denied all other allegations of the complaint. The city's answer is practically the same as that of the company. Upon these issues a trial was had to the court, which found all the issues in favor of the defendant, and accordingly entered judgment against the contentions of the plaintiffs, from which they appeal.

Before proceeding to the merits we will dispose of the preliminary question which is raised by the defendants. It is asserted that the plaintiffs have no standing in court in their capacity merely as taxpayers. One of the plaintiffs, however, claimed to be directly affected by the water rates which were claimed to be unreasonable and excessive. But, waiving this point, a general taxpayer of the city certainly is affected in case the city is devoting public funds to the payment of excessive and unreasonable rates for the use of water for municipal purposes. To the extent that the water rates are excessive his taxes are increased, and the mere fact that it increases in like proportion the taxes of all other taxpayers does not deprive him of the right to maintain an action to arrest the waste of public funds. The weight of authority is clearly to the effect that a taxpayer may obtain relief against the waste of public funds through the unauthorized or ultra vires acts of the municipality, where there is no special statute by which some particular officer is designated in whose name the action must be brought for the benefit of all taxpayers. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 609, 25 L. Ed. 1070; Read v. Atlantic City, 49 N. J. Law, 559, 9 Atl. 759; Grand Island Gas Co. v. West, 28 Neb. 852, 45 N. W. 242; Packard v. Hayes, 94 Md. 233, 51 Atl. 32; Gibson v. Board of Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225; Meyer v. Town of Boonville, 162 Ind. 165, 70 N. E. 146; Dyer v. City of Newport, 94 S. W. 25, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 658. Upon the other hand, where a city is acting within its authorized powers, a taxpayer may not arrest its acts merely because such acts will be unwise, improvident, or extravagant; nor may he do this in any matter that is purely legislative or discretionary. This is well illustrated by the following authorities: Incorporated Town of Tablequah v. Guinn, 5 Ind. T. 497, 82 S. W. 886; Torrent v. Muskegon, 47 Mich. 115, 10 N. W. 132, 41 Am. Rep. 715; Wells v. Atlanta, 43 Ga. 67. The questions in this case fall squarely within the rule announced by the cases first above cited, and hence the plaintiffs, as taxpayers, had the right to institute and maintain this action to the extent at least that they were directly affected as users of water, or to the extent that they may be indirectly affected as taxpayers. By this is not meant that they may champion the rights of other water users for excessive rates which in no way affect the plaintiffs, nor may they champion the rights of the water company or any other person where none of their private or public rights are directly affected.

Proceeding now to a consideration of the reasons assigned by plaintiffs why the ordinance in question should be held invalid and its enforcement enjoined, we remark: There was no evidence whatever offered that the water rates agreed upon between the city and the company for the use of water for city purposes were either unreasonable or excessive. With respect to the contention that one of the plaintiffs was charged unreasonable and excessive rates, the evidence did not sustain the contention, and the court found against it. Until the contrary is shown, the presumption will prevail that water rates agreed upon between the city and the company are fair and reasonable. Wagner v. City of Rock Island, 146 Ill. 139, 34 N. E. 545, 21 L. R. A. 519; Robbins v. Bangor Ry. & El. Co., 100 Me. 496, 62 Atl. 141, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 963. The question of excessive or unreasonable rates is therefore out of the case, and needs no further consideration.

It is urged that the granting of the 50-year privilege to the company to furnish water for the city constitutes a monopoly, and is against public policy and therefore void. The defendant company insists that this was not one of the grounds stated in the complaint as a reason why the ordinance should be held void, and that therefore we cannot consider it. The ordinance was, however, pleaded, and made a part of the complaint. All of its provisions were before the district court for consideration, and are now before this court. As to whether a particular provision, in comparison with all the other provisions, and in view of the allegations contained in the complaint, is legal or illegal, may therefore present a question of law merely. This particular question, we think, presents nothing more. It was therefore merely a matter of argument and not pleading. We think that the plaintiffs have the right to insist upon all questions of law which affect the legality of the ordinance in so far as they are directly and presently affected in their rights as taxpayers and water users. Whether they are so affected requires an examination of the question presented, and for that purpose we have concluded to examine into it. If the ordinance is not void, or if they are not affected, then in either event they must fail. The question is one of grave importance, and merits most careful consideration. It is not claimed that the city council did not have the power to enter into a contract with some one for the purpose of supplying the city and its inhabitants with water. Indeed the statutes of this state expressly confer that power upon municipalities. Neither is it contended that the statutes prescribe any period of time for which such contracts must be limited. But it is urged that, under the common law prevailing in this state as elsewhere, such a grant is void upon the ground that it constitutes a monopoly. A number of cases are cited in support of this contention. While in the cases cited, under the facts present in those cases, the courts so held, it seems to us that the facts upon which the claim is based here are readily distinguishable from those upon which the decisions rest in the cases referred to. In those cases one of two elements was always present—either the city council had exceeded the time limit imposed by the statute, or had in terms attempted to grant an exclusive right. Neither of these elements is present in this case, although it is strenuously insisted that the latter is present, if not in express terms, that it is so by necessary implication. There is nothing in the ordinance whatever which makes the grant exclusive. The terms of the ordinance might be the same, although the same privileges were granted to two or more companies to furnish water to the city and its inhabitants. It is true the city agrees to take water and the company agrees to furnish it for a period of 50 years. But there is nothing contained in the ordinance that any other citizen or corporation may not at any time ask for and obtain the same privilege. It is not even specified how many hydrants the city agrees to pay for. All the specification that we can find is that the charge for fire hydrants shall be $35 each annually. The things for which water shall be furnished free are specifically enumerated, but those which the city pays for are not. It is true that the ordinance provides in the first section that the company is given the right to do all things necessary "for the purpose of furnishing and supplying the said city and its inhabitants with water for all necessary and useful purposes." And in section 4 it is provided: "The rights and privileges herein granted shall continue in force for a term of 50 years and from and after December 1, 1906." The ordinance is somewhat loosely drawn and is not specific in many matters that might well have been made more specific. This condition may, however, be accounted for upon the theory that the water-works were in existence and had been in operation for many years at the time the ordinance was passed. The matters involved in the contract had been litigated in various suits, and all that was then attempted between the city and the company was to modify in certain respects the old contract and to continue it in force as to all other matters not modified. Moreover, since the original contract was without time limit, a limit was fixed in the ordinance. As we have said, we fail to see in what particular the city granted an exclusive privilege to the company to supply water either to the city or to the inhabitants. Could it be reasonably contended that, if the city passed an ordinance extending the right to any one else to lay pipes in the streets and to supply water, this would be contrary to any of the express terms of the ordinance in question? The law upon the question as to whether a grant by a sovereign or one of its agencies is exclusive or not is well settled. It is elementary that, unless such right is expressly made exclusive, it is not to be construed so, except by unavoidable implication arising from the terms used in the grant. As is well expressed sometimes, if it is in doubt, the grant fails. This is well illustrated in the following cases: Jackson Co. H. P. Ry. v. Interstate Rapid Trans. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 310; Syracuse Water Co. v. Syracuse, 116 N. Y. 167, 22 N. E. 381, 5 L. R. A. 546; Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 685-696, 17 Sup. Ct. 718, 41 L. Ed. 1165; Stein v. Blenville Water Supply Co. (C. C.) 84 Fed. 145-148; Bartholomew v. City of Austin, 85

Fed. 359-364, 29 C. C. A. 568; Hamilton Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Hamilton, 146 U. S. 258, 13 Sup. Ct. 90, 36 L. Ed. 963.

If we assume, however, that the city agreed to purchase all the water used by it from the company for the full term of 50 years, it must still be conceded that in so doing it contravened no positive statute of this state. Plaintiffs concede that the city had the undoubted right to enter into a contract with the company, if limited in terms to a reasonable length of time. What, in view of the circumstances, is a reasonable time? Can we say as a matter of law that a contract not exclusive in terms to supply water for 50 years to a city in this arid region where the sources of supply are limited, appropriated, and controlled is necessarily unreasonable to the extent that it is absolutely void? Moreover, in addition to the uncertainty of the contract in this regard, are we required to consider it in a case where the matter affecting its validity is involved only indirectly by a taxpayer who is in no way personally affected one way or another? If, as the court found, the rates to be paid by the city for water are just and reasonable under the contract, and if this be likewise true with regard to the rates the water user is required to pay, what is there of substance that personally affects the taxpayer with regard to the length of time the contract is to continue? True he might complain if the contract were prohibited by a statute. So he might if the city had not the power to make any contract; but where such is not the case, and he has no personal interest that is affected, may he champion the rights of others? In this regard whether the company has or has not an exclusive right to supply the city with water for city purposes is a matter that must be determined when some one seeks to invade that alleged right against one who claims a subsisting right which is claimed to be invaded. It is not a matter of doubt that the company has not an exclusive right to supply water to the inhabitants of Ogden City under the ordinance in question. Any citizen or corporation may apply for a grant from the city to construct and operate waterworks to supply the inhabitants, and, if such a right be granted, there is nothing in the ordinance which in any way prevents any one or all the inhabitants from obtaining their water supply from such citizen or corporation. In this respect there is, and can be, no monopoly by reason of the provisions contained in the present ordinance. If the monopoly exists, therefore, it is limited to city water. If this limitation is void because unreasonable, then the city may disregard it at any time and obtain water from some other source. But whether it is so or not should be determined between parties directly and personally interested in its determination. The plaintiffs have no such personal interest, and hence they cannot, in advance, champion the rights of one who may, at some future time, acquire such interest. Moore v. City of Walla Walla (C. C.) 60 Fed. 961; Dodge v. City of Council Bluffs, 57 Iowa, 560, 10 N. W. 886; Grant v. City of Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396; Bellevue Water Co. v. City of Bellevue, 3 Hasb. (Idaho) 739, 35 Pac. 693. From the foregoing authorities, and from the facts as they are made to appear in this case, the plaintiffs do not come within the rule that we have attempted to follow in this case, namely, that they may be heard upon all questions that presently and directly affect them in their rights as taxpayers and water users; but it clearly appears that the claim that the city granted exclusive rights to the company is one that does not directly and presently affect the plaintiffs, and therefore they have no right to contest the ordinance upon that ground even though the right granted were exclusive. Wood v. City of Victoria, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 573, 46 S. W. 284. But even though this provision of the ordinance were held void this would not necessarily require us to inquire into the effect this would have upon other provisions. In Flynn v. Little Falls El. & Water Co., 74 Minn. 180, 77 N. W. 38, 78 N. W. 106, the Supreme Court of Minnesota held that the fixing of water rates for a period of 30 years was unreasonable and beyond the power of the city. The rates in that case, however, were found to be grossly unreasonable and excessive, and upon other grounds their payment by the city was enjoined in an action instituted by a taxpayer. But even in that case the court declined to pass upon the effect the injunction would have upon other portions of the contract existing between the city and the water company.

It is further contended that the ordinance is void because the city council surrendered its governmental powers of regulating the water rates both with respect to the city and the inhabitants. This proposition, like the one just discussed, directly affects the powers of the city council. The principles involved, to some extent at least, are therefore applicable to both. In discussing the proposition, therefore, we shall not attempt to avoid all reference to the question just discussed, but shall to some extent blend the two propositions, and cite authorities that illustrate and cover both. That the fixing and regulating of water rates is a governmental function and cannot be surrendered nor suspended by the city council is agreed to by all concerned in this action. We need spend no time, therefore, on this proposition. The law being established on this point, does it follow that, if the provision with respect to the rates fails, this will necessarily invalidate the whole ordinance? The plaintiffs insist that this must necessarily be the result, while the defendant company contends that it does not invalidate the whole ordinance. If the city council were powerless, either to agree to rates for so long a period of time, or to permit the company, or others, to fix them, because the power to do this is governmental and vested in the city council only, and cannot be delegated by it, it seems to us that the attempt to do this amounted to nothing. By attempting it the city lost nothing and the company gained nothing. The whole matter was left precisely where the law placed it. We are, however, not now dealing with a case where, in the absence of a constitutional provision, the courts hold that the Legislature may authorize a municipality to agree with a public service corporation upon rates to be charged for the services rendered, and may make such rates contractual and binding for the time specified in the legislative act. In such instances it has been held that the governmental right to regulate the rates is suspended during the life of the contract, if within the power conferred by the Legislature. This doctrine is illustrated in many cases. Omaha Water Company v. City of Omaha, 147 Fed. 1, 77 C. C. A. 267, and Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Street Railway Company, 184 U. S. 368, 22 Sup. Ct. 410, 46 L. Ed. 592, are directly in point. The doctrine of suspension, as illustrated by the cases last above cited, does not apply unless the power to suspend is expressly conferred upon municipalities by the Legislature. In this state no such power has been expressly conferred, nor has it been done by necessary implication. The power, therefore, does not exist. Municipalities in this state, therefore, cannot enter into binding contracts with regard to the rates for services rendered to the public. The right to regulate and fix rates cannot be surrendered, and the duty to exercise the right whenever the rates are, or become, excessive, can be enforced at any time. The attempt to suspend the right by an ordinance in no way affected the city, and conferred no right upon the company. It simply amounts to a stipulation in the contract that the city was legally powerless to consent to, and the company as powerless to exercise, except in conformity to law. This attempt did not invalidate the whole ordinance. This, we think, is well illustrated by the cases hereinafter cited.

The plaintiffs assert that the rates agreed upon and the right to maintain them constituted an essential part of the whole contract; that, if the agreed rates cannot be enforced, then the whole contract falls because there can be no segregation of the consideration under the facts of this case. It would seem that the answer of the company that it concedes that the agreement with regard to the rates is invalid, and that it obtained no rights thereunder, ought to be a sufficient, if not conclusive, answer to this contention. If the company is willing to have the rates regulated as the law provides, namely, by any city council that the electors of Ogden City may choose from time to time, it would seem that the question of water rates involved in this contract is not only settled for the present, but that it is settled for all time and in accordance with law. The courts have frequently held that, as the fixing and regulating of rates is a governmental function which may not be delegated nor surrendered by an agency of the sovereign without express authority, no contractual rights can be granted or obtained with respect thereto. This doctrine is thoroughly discussed and applied in the case of Rogers' Park Water Co. v. Fergus, 178 Ill. 578, 579, 53 N. E. 363. It is there held that every person dealing with an agency of the sovereign must take notice of the legal powers with which such agency is invested, and that these powers may not be evaded by contract. It is also held that water companies are quasi public servants, and that contracts to furnish a supply of water is a public duty which must be discharged in accordance with the law which always reserves the right to regulate and enforce reasonable rates for the services rendered, and that this law is a part of such a contract and may not be disregarded. It seems reasonably clear to us that in view of the law the company cannot now maintain an action to recover the rates agreed upon in this contract, if the city defended upon the ground and established the fact that the rates agreed upon were excessive and unreasonable. Neither could the company refuse to provide water under the contract at fair and reasonable rates for the services. This being so, how can a taxpayer annul a contract which neither of the parties thereto may avoid? A complete answer to a claim by the company for the agreed rates would be the lack of power upon the part of the city to agree to excessive and unreasonable rates; while a complete answer by the company, in case the city refused to pay at all, would be the use of the water by the city for which the law would require it to pay a fair and reasonable rate. In the case of Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Arkansas City, 76 Fed. 271, 22 C. C. A. 171, 34 L. R. A. 518, Mr. Justice Sanborn, in passing upon a similar question, says: "If it (the company) does not receive this benefit, the city suffers no loss. The only effect upon the city is that it gets the waterworks for a less price than it agreed to pay for them. No reason occurs to us why, under this state of facts, the gas company or its successors may not waive the receipt of the exclusive right and recover the remainder of the consideration which the city promised to pay it. The grant of this exclusive right was neither immoral nor illegal. It was merely ultra vires. We know of no rule of law nor of morals which relieves the recipient of the substantial benefits of a partially executed contract from the obligation to perform or pay that part of the consideration which he can perform or pay, because the performance of an insignificant portion of it is beyond his powers." In the case quoted from an exclusive right was granted which was held void, but it was nevertheless held that the city could not for that reason avoid all the other parts of the contract. In the case at bar the city is continually receiving the fruits of the contract, and the inhabitants enjoy a like benefit. The waterworks are constructed and in constant use. The time, labor, and money of the company have been expended for the purpose of supplying water to the city and its inhabitants. Is all this to be arrested at the request of a taxpayer? And are all the rights of the company to be ignored because of some provisions in the contract which the city was powerless to enter into, and which, if ignored, inure to the benefit of the city and the taxpayer? We think the following cases well illustrate that such is not the law: Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport City, 180 U. S. 587, 21 Sup. Ct. 493, 45 L. Ed. 679; City of Danville v. Danville Water Co., 178 Ill. 299, 53 N. E. 118, 69 Am. St. Rep. 304; Rogers Park Water Co. v. Fergus, 178 Ill. 571, 53 N. E. 363; Tampa Waterworks v. Tampa, 199 U. S. 241, 26 Sup. Ct. 23, 50 L. Ed. 170; Illinois Tr. & Svcs. Bank v. Arkansas City, 76 Fed. 271, 22 C. C. A. 171, 34 L. R. A. 518; Cedar Rapids Waterworks Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 118 Iowa, 234, 91 N. W. 1081; Jackson Co. H. P. R. Co. v. Interstate R. Tr. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 310; Moore v. City of Walla Walla (C. C.) 60 Fed. 961; Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 189 U. S. 438, 23 Sup. Ct. 531, 47 L. Ed. 887. In State v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 78 Minn., at page 340, 81 N. W., at page 201, it is said: "In short, while a municipality cannot impair the obligation of its contract under the guise of exercising its police power, yet it cannot surrender or barter away its police powers under the guise of making a contract." The principles involved in this case are all thoroughly considered and discussed in the foregoing cases. While in nearly all of them some matters incorporated into the contract were held to be void on the ground that the matters were ultra vires, still, in none of them, was the entire contract held to be void and nonenforceable. This doctrine is peculiarly applicable to cases like the one at bar, where everything pertaining to the contract has been executed except the part of continuing the services contemplated by it to be rendered for a term of years. It is true that in the cases of City of Brenham v. Brenham Water Co., 67 Tex. 542, 4 S. W. 143, and in Edwards County v. Jennings, 89 Tex. 618, 35 S. W. 1053, the Supreme Court of Texas held that provisions in the contract giving exclusive rights to the water company invalidates the whole contract. This, however, is based upon a constitutional provision in force in the state of Texas, and the cases in which it was held did not present the peculiar facts present in this case and present in the cases cited by us in support of our views. It may well be that an attempt to execute a contract before its execution is entered upon, or even an attempt to enter into a contract which in part only is illegal or ultra vires would, in a proper proceeding, be enjoined as an entirety. In such a case there is no part performance to be considered, and the parties may easily enter into a contract by which all objectionable parts are avoided. To declare a whole contract void, however, simply because some parts of it are ultra vires but not expressly prohibited and not contrary to good morals, and where such ultra vires parts, if disregarded, inure to the benefit of the party objecting, is quite a different matter.

It is further insisted by the plaintiffs that the ordinance should be held void upon the ground that it provides that the water user shall pay for and maintain water meters if such user desires to pay for water by meter rates rather than the flat rates; and upon the further ground that extensions of the system need be made only when such extensions return a revenue upon the cost of making them amounting to 8 per cent.; and also upon the ground that, where no rates are specified in the ordinance for water, the company may establish and collect reasonable rates. These are all matters in which the plaintiffs are not now interested. No user of water is required to obtain a meter. The matter is entirely optional with him. If he demands a meter, and the company provides him with one, he suffers no injury. If, upon the other hand, the company refuses to provide one, if the law requires this of it, we can see no reason why he may not enforce his right in the courts precisely the same as he might do if the company had agreed to provide one, but, notwithstanding such promise, refused to do so. If the provision in this regard is void, then the water user cannot complain. If, upon the other hand, it is valid, then again he has sustained no legal injury by its enforcement. At all events it is not a matter in issue now, and, so far as the record discloses, may never become a live issue. With regard to the extensions the same reasons apply. There is not a word of testimony that 8 per cent. on the cost of making them will be an unreasonable rate for water service; nor is there a word of evidence that extensions are contemplated nor that any will be made. Moreover, so far as this record discloses, none of the plaintiffs may ever be affected by them if made. As we understand it, the effect of the provision is that the water users along the line of extension, not the city, must pay the stipulated amount. As taxpayers the plaintiffs are therefore not directly interested, and as users of water they never may be. If, however, the rates should be unreasonable and excessive, the courts are always open to the city or the taxpayers to prevent their enforcement. On the other hand, the courts are likewise open to the company to prevent the enforcement of confiscatory rates against it. The rate question is thus left open, and must so remain for adjustment and regulation whenever the occasion calls for it.

With respect to the rates that are left to be fixed by the company, this ground is also covered by what we have already said. The city council certainly had the power to agree upon reasonable rates. This is all the company is authorized to impose by the provision of the ordinance now under consideration. Is it a matter of substance whether the city council proposes the rates or the company does so? The real thing to be kept in mind is that the rates, whatever they are, must be fair and reasonable. To make them so, and to maintain them as such, is the special province of the city council. But how, or through what sources or means, it arrives at such a rate, is not material.

A further objection urged is that the city council had no authority to surrender the option to purchase the water system which the city had under the Bothwell contract. But this, it seems to us, is not a judicial question. Whether the city council should have reserved an option to purchase the plant or not in the first instance was a matter purely discretionary with it. There was no legal duty imposed upon it to reserve such an option, and we know of no law whereby the exercise of the right could be enforced. The reservation of the right in the contract, as well as its exercise when made, were therefore matters purely of discretion vested in the city council. If discretionary in this regard, it must likewise be held discretionary with regard to whether the option should be abandoned or not. Whether it was wise or unwise, prudent or otherwise, to do so, is not a matter for judicial review. The option had been running for over 16 years. The price fixed was the original cost, and before the plant could be purchased, even at this price, the city would have to pay $150,000 for the right to use the conduit, and thereafter pay one-half of the cost necessary to maintain it. It may well be that after such a length of time the use and wear and tear of the original plant no longer made the cost price a fair purchase price. Neither can it be said that the city did not receive ample consideration for surrendering the option. Large claims against the city were relinquished by the company, and the company now pays the city an annual license or occupation tax of $2,500. Even if the question were one for judicial review, we cannot see in what way either the city or the taxpayers are prejudiced by the surrender of the option at the price fixed. Nor can we conjecture in what way the surrender of the option can possibly affect the present ordinance or its enforcement.

The objection urged against the ordinance because the city council requires the board of education of Ogden City to pay for water used upon the lawns surrounding the school buildings from June 1st to September 15th in each year is, we think, likewise untenable.

This was a matter that clearly fell within the province of the city council in readjusting the rates to be paid and in agreeing upon the quantity of water to be furnished free to the city by the company. The taxpayer has no better right to obtain water free or for less than what amounts to a reasonable compensation for the service than the company has to enforce excessive rates. There is not a word of evidence concerning the amount of water that will be required for such lawns, whether it will cost $1 or $1,000, nor that the arrangement in respect thereto is unfair or unreasonable. The entire claim is based upon the fact that under the Bothwell contract water for schoolhouse lawns was free, while under the ordinance it is not. For aught that appears from the record the change from the Bothwell contract to the present one may have been fair, just, and equitable in view of all the circumstances. That it was so, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, we must presume. If this be assumed, as it must be, how can a taxpayer be heard to complain? Indeed, so far as the record discloses, the present arrangement, although it does require payment for one item which was free before, may still redound to the benefit of the taxpayer when the whole contract is considered. Shall one or two taxpayers, therefore, be permitted to destroy a contract that may be for the benefit of many by simply pointing to an isolated matter which, if considered alone, might possibly affect them? We think not. If the rate agreed upon with regard to the lawns is or becomes unreasonable it can, and no doubt will, be adjusted. This is all the taxpayer is entitled to. The wisdom of the arrangement is not a matter for judicial review.

The last objection to be considered is one with regard to the so-called leasing to the company of the 0.98 second foot of water owned by the city. This presents a question not entirely free from difficulty. The Constitution (section 6, art. 11) provides: "No municipal corporation shall directly, or indirectly, lease, sell, alien or dispose of any waterworks, water rights, or sources of water supply now, or hereafter to be owned or controlled by it; but all such waterworks, water rights and sources of water supply now owned or hereafter to be acquired by any municipal corporation, shall be preserved, maintained and operated by it for supplying its inhabitants with water at reasonable charges: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any such municipal corporation from exchanging water rights, or sources of water supply, for other water rights or sources of water supply of equal value, and to be devoted in like manner to the public supply of its inhabitants." Has either the letter or spirit of this provision been invaded by the city in dealing with the water mentioned in the ordinance? It is quite clear that the city legally may exchange the quantity of water mentioned for a like quantity with any person or corporation. If it could effect such an exchange for all time, could it not do so for a limited time? The right to do the latter is necessarily included in the former. Now, what is it that the city has done in this case? Designating its act in this regard as one thing, rather than as another, is not controlling. When it is urged that a statutory or constitutional provision has been violated, we must look to the act rather than the name given to the act. In this connection it must not be overlooked that this court, in the case referred to in 28 Utah, 25, 76 Pac. 1069, has already passed upon and sustained the Bothwell contract. It was there held that the city had the power to deal with this 0.98 second foot of water in the manner set forth in the ordinance, and that the real consideration for the contract was the construction and maintenance of the water system and the supplying of the city and its inhabitants with water. True that contract was made before the Constitution went into effect. It is equally true that the ordinance in effect amounts to a mere continuance of that contract in so far at least as the water is concerned. If this be the correct view, then the question is hardly an open one. But, assuming it not to be the correct view, and that the ordinance must be construed as a new contract, does it violate the constitutional provision above quoted? It will be observed that so long as the city water is devoted to the use of the city and its inhabitants this provision is not infringed. Is this water so applied under the provisions of the ordinance? It seems to us that it is so admits of little if any doubt. From the statement of facts made at the beginning of this opinion, it appears that a large volume of water is delivered to the city free. Just what this volume is as compared with the 0.98 second foot owned by the city the record does not disclose. The present chief justice in the case referred to in 28 Utah, at page 44, 76 Pac., at page 1074, in discussing this point, said: "While the record does not disclose the exact quantity of water furnished to the city free under the lease, yet it is evident from the numerous public uses made of the water that the city used, without cost or expense of any kind on its part, a quantity equal to, or greater than, that leased to defendants. The payment of the nominal money consideration of $1 provided for in the lease was evidently exacted as an annual acknowledgment of the city's title on the part of the lessee, and, as stated, not the real or true consideration. And, further, the water has not been diverted from the uses to which it was dedicated. The only change made is that it is being distributed by a private corporation instead of a public corporation."

Can the matter be regarded in a different light now? We think not. Does the constitutional provision above quoted stand in the way? Our answer is again in the negative.

Would it not be a most forced and unreasonable construction of the constitutional provision to say that it meant that a city owning a small quantity of water entirely insufficient for its public needs, say nothing of the needs of its inhabitants, could not make any arrangement with any person to permit its water to flow through the pipes owned and controlled by such person and to distribute it for the use of the city? Would it alter the case if such an arrangement were called a lease? Does it not in substance amount to this? The city has some water but no means of distribution. Some one has the means of distribution and an additional amount of water, which, if combined with what the city owns, the needs of the city and its inhabitants, may be met. In order, therefore, to make use of the city's water, it enters into an arrangement with the person owning and controlling the waterworks and the additional water to permit its water to flow through the system owned by such person and in order to preserve its title to the water the city requires the distributor to make a proper acknowledgment of this title. The mere fact that the city cannot say that the identical water owned by it is distributed to it in no way changes the effect of the arrangement. As we have already pointed out, the city may exchange water for water, and this in effect is all that it has done in this case, and that is all that can in any event be done under the provisions of the ordinance. If the ordinance had been worded so as to define the rights and purposes of the parties just as we have outlined them above, perhaps no one would have raised an objection. The mere fact that what was in fact intended and what is being accomplished is not precisely stated in apt phrases in the ordinance ought not, in a court of equity at least, affect the result. We are of the opinion that the arrangement with respect to the 0.98 second foot of water is not contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, and the ordinance should not, for that reason, be declared void. By what we have said it is not intended that cities may, by indirect acts, circumvent this constitutional provision. But what we mean is that, when it is clear that the facts complained of were not intended as an evasion or have in any manner violated the spirit of the Constitution, then the acts will be upheld, unless such acts are clearly prohibited by the language contained in the Constitution. In other words, the acts must fall within the spirit of the constitutional inhibition, and not merely within the name applied to them. It is well to remember that Constitutions, like other laws, are not to be interpreted alone by their words abstractly considered. The words should be read in the light of the conditions and necessities which they are intended to meet and the objects sought to be attained thereby. State v. City Council, 23 Utah, 13, 64 Pac. 460; 1 Dillon's Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 3a.

We are constrained to hold, therefore, that the agreement fixing the rates for the entire period of the contract cannot be upheld; that the city council had the right to agree upon and fix temporary rates; that the rates agreed upon and set forth in the ordinance are presumed to be fair and reasonable until the contrary is shown; that the city council cannot delegate its duty to regulate, fix, and maintain reasonable rates, but that it must exercise this power and duty in that regard whenever the rates are or become excessive and unreasonable; that the city or any taxpayer may have recourse to the courts to enforce reasonable rates and prevent the company from collecting such; that the company may likewise have recourse to the courts to prevent the city council from enforcing confiscatory rates; and that the whole ordinance in question is not vitiated by reason that the city council agreed that the rates with regard to the hydrants should be maintained during the entire period of the time mentioned in the ordinance, nor because the city council agreed that the company or a committee may fix or revise certain rates; nor is the entire ordinance void upon the other grounds urged by the plaintiffs and discussed in this opinion. Since the present rates are reasonable as found by the court, and there is no present threat to enforce unreasonable rates and nothing for which present relief can be granted to any of the plaintiffs, there is no reason for and no ground upon which the judgment of the court can be reversed or modified.

The judgment, therefore, should be, and it accordingly is, affirmed, with costs to the defendants.

SPIKING et al. v. CONSOLIDATED RY. & POWER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. STREET RAILROADS—DEATH OF PEDESTRIAN—CARE REQUIRED.

A person crossing a street in front of an approaching street car is not required to use the same degree of care as persons traveling along, on, or across a steam railroad.¹

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, §§ 207, 208.]

2. SAME—CROSSING TRACKS.

A pedestrian desiring to take a street car standing on an opposite track was entitled to hastily cross an intervening track on which a car was approaching, provided he exercised ordinary care for his own safety in view of the surroundings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, §§ 207, 208.]

3. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence held to require submission to the jury of the issue of the contributory negligence of a pedestrian, struck and killed by an approaching street car as he was crossing the track.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, §§ 255-257.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—REPUTATION FOR CARE.

Where, in an action for the death of a pedestrian in collision with a street car, there were several eyewitnesses to the occurrence who testified, evidence that decedent was a careful and cautious man was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, § 238.]

5. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY OF OBJECTION—MOTION TO STRIKE—DISCRETION.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian by collision with defendants' street car, plaintiffs' counsel asked a witness how decedent was as to being a careful and cautious man. The witness answered, without objection, that he was careful, when defendants moved to strike the answer, and excepted to the court's refusal to do so. Held, that as the question indicated on its face that it called for incompetent evidence, in the absence of an objection to it, it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to strike the answer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 242.]

6. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMED FACTS—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Where the fact that fenders were generally used on street cars was treated as a matter of general knowledge, of which the court would take judicial notice, and proof thereof was excluded for that reason, the court was entitled to assume that such fact existed, in its instructions, as if it had been proved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 421.]

7. APPEAL—RIGHT TO ALLEGE ERROR—INCONSISTENT POSITION.

Where defendants objected to evidence to show that street cars generally were equipped with fenders, because the matter was one of general knowledge, they could not object on appeal that an instruction, in which the court took judicial notice of such fact, was erroneous because of the absence of evidence thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3000.]

8. STREET RAILROADS—INJURY TO PERSONS ON TRACK—INSTRUCTIONS.

Defendants, having objected to evidence that street cars generally were equipped with fenders, on the theory that such fact was a matter of common knowledge, which objection the court sustained, requested an instruction that there was no evidence that at the time of the accident fenders were in general use, and that there was no proof of negligence because the car that struck decedent was without a fender. The court charged that, if the jury found that the car did not have a fender, they could not find against defendants on that alone, unless they also found that, if the car had a fender, the "accident" might have been averted thereby. Held that, the term "accident" having been used in the instructions and evidence to refer to the collision itself, the instruction given in effect told the jury that the fender was not in the case as effectually as if the word "collision" had been used.

9. SAME—APPLIANCES—CARE REQUIRED.

A street railway company is only required to adopt methods, machinery, and appliances in accordance with the ordinary usage of the business.²

² Fritz v. Electric Light Co., 18 Utah, 493, 56 Pac. 90.

10. SAME—SAFETY APPLIANCES—GENERAL USE.

The rule that it is necessary to prove that certain appliances are in general use by street railway companies before negligence can be predicated on the omission to supply them does not apply to appliances, the use of which is a matter of common knowledge.

11. WORDS AND PHRASES—"FENDER."

As applied to street railway cars, a fender is a guard or protection against danger to pedestrians coming in contact with a car.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2747.]

12. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE—FENDERS ON STREET CARS.

Where negligence, in an action for death of a pedestrian by being struck by a street car, was predicated entirely on the omission to provide the car with any fender or guard whatever, the court was entitled to take judicial notice of the purpose of fenders, as applied to street cars; such appliances being in common and general use on street cars.

13. STREET RAILROADS—DEATH OF PEDESTRIAN—CARE REQUIRED.

Where decedent was killed in a collision with a street car, and the court called attention to the particular circumstances of the case, an instruction that decedent was required to use his senses, and exercise that degree of care that men of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the particular circumstances of the case as disclosed by the evidence, was not objectionable as requiring too low a degree of care, in view of evidence that decedent was familiar with the surroundings and conditions prevailing at the place of the accident.

14. SAME.

Where the court repeatedly charged that decedent was required to use all his senses to avoid collision with a street car by which he was killed, and that, unless he did so, plaintiffs could not recover, an instruction was not objectionable in the use of the expression "observing the car," instead of requiring decedent to have "looked for the car" before attempting to cross the track.

15. SAME—CROSSING STREETS—PLACE.

Where decedent was killed in a collision with a street car, as he was crossing the track, at a point some distance from a street crossing, but at which a large number of persons habitually crossed the track, an instruction that he was entitled to rely on the assumption that the company and its servants would discharge their legal duty in approaching crossings by having their cars under control was not objectionable because the accident did not happen at a public crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, §§ 207, 208.]

16. SAME—DUTY OF RAILWAY COMPANY.

Where a point in a street some distance from a crossing was habitually used by a large number of persons in crossing the tracks of a street railway, it was the duty of the railway company to conform the movements of its cars to such condition and to approach such point with the same degree of care it was required to approach street crossings.

17. SAME—RIGHTS IN STREETS.

Where a street railway company is authorized to lay its tracks on a street, no part of the street is thereby withdrawn from the use of the public, the street being merely burdened with an additional easement in favor of the street railway company, with a preferential right of passage over it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, § 193.]

18. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

It is not error to refuse requests to charge which are covered by instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 651-659.]

19. DEATH—DAMAGES—LOSS OF PROFITS.

In an action for wrongful death, an instruction authorizing consideration on the question of damages only of the income from property which decedent's skill, personal supervision, and diligence had a part in producing was not objectionable as authorizing consideration of profits arising out of decedent's business.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, § 112.]

Appeal from District Court, Third District; M. L. Ritchie, Judge.

Action by Emeline Spiking and others against the Consolidated Railway & Power Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. L. Williams, G. H. Smith, and J. G. Willis, for appellants. Powers & Marlon-eaux, for respondents.

FRICK, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries resulting in death. The plaintiffs, respondents in this court, are the widow and minor children of the deceased, Thomas W. Spiking, who, in August, 1902, was fatally injured by a street car while attempting to cross the street railway tracks on one of the streets in Salt Lake City. The acts of negligence charged against the defendants, appellants here, are: The omission to sound a gong or ring a bell, or to give any warning of the approaching car; the omission to have the headlight on the car lighted, and in omitting to have any lights on the car; the omission to have the car provided with a fender or guard of any kind; operating the car at a high and reckless rate of speed with the brakes released, and not having the car under the control of the motor-man or any other person while approaching and passing onto a certain switch, the place of the accident, and in omitting to look and ascertain whether the track was clear and free from persons passing to and fro at the point of the accident. The evidence is very voluminous, over 30 witnesses having been examined, a number of whom were eyewitnesses to the accident; and, as is usual, there is a conflict with regard to just how and when certain matters occurred, and with regard to the existence or nonexistence of others. From a careful reading of the entire transcript of the evidence, the following facts may be said to be fairly established: The point, or immediate vicinity, of the accident, is one of the principal business centers of Salt Lake City. The accident occurred on East Second South street, about 85 feet east of the east crossing of Main street, at which crossing the two streets intersect. At the time of the accident the appellants operated cars on three tracks on East Second South street running parallel, two of which continued west across Main street, and the third, being the north track, terminated at the point of the accident in a switch which connected it with the middle one of the tracks mentioned. The north rail of the northerly track was 28 feet south of the north curb of East Second South street. At the time of the accident there was no overhead or trolley wire connecting the north with the middle track, and the cars going west on the north track were switched onto the middle track by what is termed a "flying switch," which was accomplished by the momentum acquired by the car in approaching the switch. On the north and middle tracks the cars went west, while on the south track they went east. On the night of the accident, August 16, 1902, the car on the north track was due at the switch at 20 minutes past 10 o'clock, but arrived at that point at about 18 minutes past 10. As the car was approaching westerly toward the switch, the deceased was seen by a number of witnesses to start from the north curb on Second South street, thence going in a southerly direction towards a car just starting east on the south track, which car would pass his home. Two witnesses testified on behalf of appellants, who were passengers on the car that struck the deceased, which was an open or summer car, that they saw the deceased start from the point stated, and saw him running or going hastily south towards the car on the south track. In the course the deceased was going he would cross the north track at the switch, and when he arrived there the car in question had also arrived at the switch, and the deceased collided with the front end of the car, which knocked him down, and he fell under the car, and the wheels of the rear trucks passed over one of his legs and one foot, crushing them, so that in a few days thereafter he died from the effects of the injuries. A number of witnesses testified that the car was running at a high rate of speed in approaching the switch, others said it was running faster than usual, while the motorman testified that it was moving at from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 miles an hour. All the witnesses concur that no gong or bell was sounded, nor any warning of the approach of the car given. Some of the witnesses testified that there was no lighted headlight on the car, and all agree that just before the collision, or at the instant at which it occurred, all the lights in the car went out. The current was cut off at the time on account of the trolley leaving the north wire in making the cross-over from the north to the middle track, and the brakes were released so as not to arrest the speed of the car in making the cross-over. The motorman did not look for nor see the deceased until the instant he was struck by the car, at which time the power was off, and the only way the speed of the car could be checked was by means of the hand brake, which the motorman applied. There were lights in the streets, and other lights from the surrounding business houses, so that the car could have been seen and was seen approaching from the east. The car was not provided with a fender or any guard. The Main street crossing across the tracks for pedestrians was about 85 feet west of the switch where the accident occurred, but a large number of people habitually crossed the tracks at the point of the accident and immediately to the east thereof. A considerable number of people were about the place at the time of the accident, not directly at the switch, but near there, to the north and south of it. The cars on all the tracks habitually stopped just east of the Main street crossing to receive and discharge passengers. There is some evidence that the deceased, to some extent at least, was familiar with the conditions prevailing at and about the switch as outlined above. Whether the deceased saw the car approaching does not directly appear. It does, however, appear that he was hurrying to catch the outgoing car. At the time of the accident there was also a car approaching from the east on the middle track some little distance in the rear of the car on the north track. Upon substantially the foregoing facts, the court submitted the case to the jury, who returned a verdict for respondents, upon which a judgment was duly entered. A motion for a new trial having been duly made and overruled, the appellants prosecuted this appeal.

A great number of errors are assigned, but as counsel have condensed them in their brief and in their oral argument, we shall consider those only that are relied upon in the argument.

The first alleged error we shall consider is the one presented last in the brief, but, as it logically comes first, we shall reverse the order. It is urged that the court erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the appellants upon the ground that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In support of this contention it is asserted that the facts of this case bring it within the rule of Teakle v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. Ry. Co. (Utah) 90 Pac. 402, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 486, in which we held that a person, while walking along the railway tracks in the yard of the railway company and stepping in front of a moving train of cars without looking or listening when he knew the cars were being moved, was guilty of negligence as matter of law. It is contended that the contradicted testimony in this case is to the effect that the deceased by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen the approaching car in time to avoid the accident, and that, as matter of law, he must be held to have seen it, and that, therefore, he was guilty of negligence in attempting to cross the track ahead of the approaching car. That the car could have been seen approaching from the east for a distance of nearly a block there is little, if any, room for doubt. That the deceased was required to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and to that end make use of all of his faculties for seeing and hearing, no one questions; but whether he was required to exercise the same degree of care in attempting to cross a street railway track as in making a similar attempt with regard to a steam railroad, the authorities differ. Some of the cases cited by counsel for appellants, namely, Oawley v. La Crosse City Ry. Co., 101 Wis. 145, 77 N. W. 179, and Young v. Citizens' St. Ry. Co., 148 Ind. 58, 44 N. E. 927, 47 N. E. 142, and perhaps a few others, hold to the doctrine that the degree of care on the part of the pedestrian is the same in both cases—that is, that he must both look and listen—and in one case, at least, it is held that he must also stop to do so before crossing a street railway track. But the overwhelming weight of authority, including the decisions of this court, is to the contrary. It would seem to require but slight reflection to realize that, in the nature of things, there must be considerable difference between an attempt to cross a street railway and a steam railway, or in passing along the tracks of the one or the other. Without stopping to point out all the differences, we may be permitted to call attention to one of the fundamental differences between street and steam railways. The part of the street on which a street railway track is laid, and over which cars are operated, is not withdrawn from public use and travel. The rights and duties of the public and the street car operatives are mutual and reciprocal. The only right that the operators of a street railway possess over the public generally is a preferential right of passage over the tracks with the cars, and that between public crossings it is always the duty of the pedestrian or the person driving a vehicle to see to it that he does not impede the street car. But the street car company, in operating its cars, must likewise at all times and places exercise ordinary care so as not to injure any one who may be on or near the track, and at public crossings must have its cars under the control of the operator, and must exercise reasonable care to have them so in approaching the crossings; the degree of care to be exercised always depending upon the prevailing circumstances and conditions. As a general rule, therefore, where a collision occurs between a person lawfully using the street and a street car, the question as to whether the operator or such person, or both, were exercising the degree of care that the law imposes is a question of fact depending upon all the surrounding circumstances and conditions. The reciprocal rights and duties of persons and street railway companies in the use of the streets is well expressed in Campbell v. Los Angeles Tr. Co., 137 Cal. 565, 70 Pac. 624, where, at page 566 of 137 Cal., page 625 of 70 Pac., it is said: "But, as has been frequently held by this court, the same character of care is not demanded of one crossing a street railroad, where cars are frequently passing at a slow rate of speed and can be easily controlled, as is demanded of one crossing an ordinary steam railroad running through the country, on which heavy trains, difficult to control, go at stated times with great speed. With respect to a street railroad, the mere fact that a person attempts to cross it when a car is seen to be approaching does not of itself constitute negligence. * * * Ordinarily, whether or not he (the person crossing) was negligent in attempting to cross, under the circumstances of the case, is a question for the jury." The same thought is expressed in Hall v. Ry. Co., 18 Utah, 258, 44 Pac. 1049, 57 Am. St. Rep. 726, in the following language: "Persons traveling on the public street, along or across a street railway track, are not held to the exercise of the same degree of care and precaution as they are when traveling along, or upon, or across the ordinary steam railroad." To the same effect is Thompson v. S. L. Rapid Tr. Co., 16 Utah, 289, 52 Pac. 92, 40 L. R. A. 172, 67 Am. St. Rep. 621. The case of Marden v. Portsmouth, etc., R. Co., 100 Me. 41, 60 Atl. 530, 69 L. R. A. 300, 109 Am. St. Rep. 476, is a well-considered case, in which a large number of cases of this class are reviewed, and where the Utah cases are cited with approval. In Benjamin v. Holyoke St. Ry., 160 Mass. 3, 35 N. E. 95, 39 Am. St. Rep. 446, in referring to this subject, it is said: "The use of the street for electric cars and by the general public was concurrent; and the defendant (the company) was bound, in using the street, to have reference to its reasonable use by others." We have examined a large number of cases, and, from the decisions, we are forced to the conclusion that, where the conditions and circumstances are as they were in the case at bar, the question of negligence is within the province of the jury. In addition to the cases already mentioned, we cite the following well-considered cases: Robbins v. Springfield St. Ry., 165 Mass. 30, 42 N. E. 834; Newark Pass. Ry. v. Black, 55 N. J. Law, 611, 27 Atl. 1067, 22 L. R. A. 374; Lawler v. Hartford St. Ry., 72 Conn. 74, 43 Atl. 545; Shea v. St. Paul City Ry., 50 Minn. 395, 52 N. W. 902; Holmgren v. Twin City Rapid Tr. Ry., 61 Minn. 85, 63 N. W. 270; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 Pac. 908; McClain v. Brooklyn Ry., 116 N. Y. 459, 22 N. E. 1062; Copeland v. Met. St. Ry., 67 App. Div. (N. Y.) 483-485, 73 N. Y. Supp. 856.

The law required that the deceased exercise ordinary care for his own safety. To this end he was required to make use of all of his senses to avoid injury. Did he meet this legal requirement at the time and place of the accident? It is easy enough to assume, when viewing the matters retrospectively, that one has failed in this, that, or the other thing, and, if he had not so failed, he would not have been injured. In view of all the circumstances, may not reasonable men differ with regard to his conduct, as disclosed by the evidence, just before and at the time of the accident? May not, likewise, reasonable men draw different conclusions from the conceded facts? The deceased had a right to cross the track in an attempt to board the street car on the southerly track. He had a right to do so even hastily, provided he exercised ordinary care for his own safety in view of his surroundings. He may have seen the car on the north track approaching from the east. He may have assumed that it would reduce its speed on nearing the cross-over switch. But whether he saw it or not, the jury had a right to determine from all the facts whether or not he acted with reasonable care, and whether the motorman, in approaching the switch, did likewise. Moreover, as the car was approaching a place where a considerable number of persons habitually crossed the track, a place near the public crossing on Main street, and immediately east of which the cars habitually stopped to take on and discharge passengers, the deceased might have assumed that, if the motorman intended to make the cross-over without reducing the speed of the car, he would give some warning of his intention to do so. If the motorman had done either, it is quite probable that the accident would not have occurred. Under all these circumstances, it was a question of fact for the jury to say whether the deceased was guilty of negligence which directly contributed to the accident. Even an error of judgment by the pedestrian, based upon some act or duty required of the company or its servants, may be taken into consideration in determining who is in the wrong. This is well illustrated in the case of Copeland v. Met. St. Ry., supra, where a woman, in attempting to cross a street car track ahead of an approaching car which she saw coming toward the point where she intended to cross, was struck and injured while in the act of crossing. The court, in referring to her conduct, used this language: "Her judgment that she could cross in safety was in fault only because of the fact that the motorman had decided not to stop in answer to the signal, 'Slow down;' nor did he, by the ringing of a bell, notify her of his intention." The car in that case was signaled to stop by the woman's son. It was a car which did not stop at the particular point, and proceeded on its course, and reached the point where the woman crossed the track in less time than she had calculated, and was injured by reason of this miscalculation. The case of McClain v. Brooklyn Ry., supra, is likewise one where the facts and circumstances were in some respects similar to those at bar; and in that case it was also held that the conduct of the parties involved questions of fact to be determined by the jury. It may be that in some of the cases the conduct of the pedestrian may be of such a character that the question is one of law merely. The case of Boring v. Union Trac. Co., 211 Pa. 594, 61 Atl. 77, affords an illustration of that class. There the injured person walked along the side of the street railway track ahead of an oncoming car, and, without looking, suddenly stepped onto the track in front of the car, and was struck and injured. It was held that the injured person was negligent as a matter of law. We are, however, not dealing with such a case. In this case there were many matters to be considered, on at least some of which reasonable men might arrive at different conclusions. The Teakle Case, supra, was entirely different in this respect from the case at bar. There only one conclusion was permissible from the conceded facts; and hence it was a question of law, and was decided as such. We are convinced that the court committed no error in submitting the case to the jury.

The next assignment to be noticed, briefly stated, arises as follows: Mrs. Spiking, one of the respondents, testified as a witness in the case, and, before the respondents rested, counsel for appellants asked leave to recall her for further cross-examination. After this was concluded, her counsel proposed to ask her a further question upon a matter which he said was not proper on redirect, but desired to ask it because it had been overlooked. No objection being made, counsel asked the following question: "How was Mr. Spiking as to being a careful and cautious man?" The witness answered: "Yes, sir; he was very careful." Counsel for appellants offered no objection to the question, but immediately after the answer moved to strike it out as "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent." The court denied the motion, and permitted the answer to stand. Counsel for appellants now urge that the court erred in refusing to strike out the answer. That the evidence of the character contained in the foregoing answer is improper in view of all the evidence in the case must be conceded. This is well illustrated by the following authorities: Adams v. C. M. & St. P. Ry., 93 Iowa, 565, 61 N. W. 1059; Louisville Ry. Co. v. McClish, 115 Fed. 268, 53 C. C. A. 60; Glass v. Memphis & C. Ry., 94 Ala. 591, 10 South. 215; Chase v. Maine C. Ry., 77 Me. 62, 52 Am. Rep. 744; Towle v. Pac. Imp. Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207. Some of the authorities are to the effect that, where there are no eyewitnesses in a case of death by accident, such evidence is proper. 1 Shear. & Redf. Ev. (5th Ed.) § 111; 1 Elliott, Ev. § 217. Conceding the evidence to be improper, can this court review the alleged error in view of the state of the record? The question was one propounded immediately after opposing counsel's attention was directed to the fact that the question would be asked out of the regular order. The question upon its face was one that indicated what the character of the answer thereto would be. The answer of necessity would be that deceased was either a careful man or a careless man. If the answer was that he was a careful man, then appellants' counsel did not want it, and, if it had been to the contrary, respondents' counsel would have been opposed to it. But either way the testimony was improper. This is always the result, with regard to improper testimony, under conditions as above indicated; and in view of this the courts have evolved and adopted a rule of practice which is that where the question fairly indicates what the nature of the answer will be, then the adverse counsel must object to the question and obtain a ruling, and save an exception to make the error, if any be committed, available in a court of review. Error may not be predicated upon a denial of the motion alone. This rule is well stated in People v. Williams, 127 Cal. 216, 59 Pac. 583, in the following words: "When it is apparent from the question that the answer will contain evidence necessarily inadmissible, then the motion to strike out comes too late, unless preceded by an objection to the question; but the rule is otherwise when the evidence may, or may not, be admissible." The authorities are numerous to this effect, and among which we refer to the following: Taylor v. State, 100 Ala. 68, 14 South. 875; Way v. Johnson, 5 S. D. 237, 58 N. W. 552; Wendt v. R. Co., 4 S. D. 476, 57 N. W. 227; Cleveland, C., C. & I. Ry. Co. v. Wynant, 134 Ind. 681, 34 N. E. 569; Gran v. Houston, 45 Neb., at page 836, 64 N. W. 245; McClellan v. Hein, 56 Neb. 600, 77 N. W. 120; 3 Jones on Ev. § 898; 22 Pl. & Pr. 1310. In the foregoing cases, excepting those from Nebraska, where the record is like the one before us, it is held that the alleged error is not reviewable. In Nebraska, however, it is held that the motion to strike out is always addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and that a clear abuse of this discretion is always reviewable. If we adopt the rule generally recognized, we cannot review the alleged error, because under that rule a failure to object to the question waives the error. What would be the result if we should adopt the Nebraska rule? Has the trial court so clearly abused his legal discretion that, in view of the state of the record, error may be predicated thereon? When the motion to strike out was made, counsel for appellant offered some excuse for not making an objection before the question was answered. Whether the excuse was well founded depended upon the circumstances, all of which occurred in the presence of the court, and he necessarily deemed the excuse insufficient. We arrive at this conclusion from the fact that at various times during the trial, where answers had been made before an objection either was or apparently could have been interposed, the court permitted counsel on both sides to make objections, obtain rulings thereon, and take exceptions, so that the point could be reviewed by this court. In this instance no such permission was asked. If we attempted to review the action of the court from this point of view, we would have to hold that in the light of the record the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion to strike out the answer. We do not wish to be understood as holding that in no case where improper evidence was elicited in this way, which in and of itself either made a case or stated a defense, it would not be held that the action of the trial court in denying a motion to strike out, when timely made, would not be reviewed. In such a case the record upon its face might show an abuse of discretion. Such is not the case before us, and therefore this assignment cannot be sustained.

The remainder of the assignments all refer to the instructions. In passing upon those alleged errors the length of the instructions makes it impracticable to set them forth in full. We, therefore, can do no more than to refer to the particular parts of which complaint is made. The instructions given by the court cover 20 typewritten pages of legal cap, and the requests cover 21 pages in addition to those given. There are many exceptions to those that were given, and many more to the refusal of requests not given.

The first assignment to be noticed relates to the refusal to give two special requests offered by appellants, and in the giving of an instruction upon the same subject by the court. In the complaint negligence was predicated upon the failure of appellants to equip the car with a fender or guard of some kind. At the trial respondents produced a witness who had been employed as a motorman and gripman for a period of nearly eight years on cars propelled by electricity and cable in various cities from Chicago to the Pacific Coast, including Salt Lake City. Counsel for respondents asked the witness whether or not, during the time that he was employed as motorman or gripman, cars in the different cities were equipped with fenders. This evidence was objected to as "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant." Counsel for respondents then, by various questions and offers which cover about 10 pages of the transcript of the evidence, attempted to prove that the street cars, during the time the witness was employed as above stated, were equipped with fenders in the cities of Chicago, Omaha, Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles, all of which was objected to, and the objections sustained. After counsel had made repeated offers to get into the record the evidence with regard to the use of fenders, counsel for appellants suggested that the purpose for which fenders were used was a matter of common knowledge, and not a subject of expert evidence. The court adopted this view, and ruled that the purposes for which fenders were used on street cars was a matter of which judicial notice could be taken by both the court and jury. Thereupon counsel for appellants objected to any evidence with regard to the use of fenders. Their objections were sustained. No evidence upon the subject of fenders was admitted, except that the car in question was not equipped with a fender or guard of any kind. Upon this state of the record, counsel for appellants requested the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence "that at the time of the accident guards and fenders were in general use by companies, in similar business, doing their business in a prudent manner," and that "there is no proof of negligence against the defendants, or either of them, on account of there being no fender upon the car." The court charged the jury upon this subject as follows: "If you find that such car did not have a fender, you cannot find against the defendants upon that alone, unless you find also from the evidence that, if the car had a fender, the accident might have been averted thereby." It is strenuously insisted that the refusal to instruct as requested, and that the giving of the instruction quoted above, constitutes prejudicial error. It is urged that the instruction was not based upon a subject of which there was any evidence; that by the repeated decisions of this court instructions must be based upon the evidence, and to instruct upon a subject unsupported by evidence constitutes prejudicial error. Undoubtedly such is the general rule, which has been laid down by this and many other courts. Does the claim here made come within the rule? We do not think so, for several reasons. From what has been said it is apparent that both the court and counsel for appellant treated the purpose for which fenders were used on street cars as a matter of general knowledge. If this was the correct view, then the object, purpose, and use of fenders was in the case to be considered by the jury, as if it had been testified to by witnesses. It is elemental that any facts which are generally known and accepted, and of which courts take judicial knowledge, are part of the case as facts, and the court may instruct upon them to the same extent as upon other facts. Counsel cannot at the trial obtain rulings in their favor upon objections to evidence upon the ground that it is immaterial because the matter is one of general and common knowledge, and then urge on review that there is no evidence upon the subject to support an instruction. But, apart from this, there is room for the contention that the instruction, after it was modified by the court, in effect still was merely negative. The court told the jury that they could not find against appellants upon the omission to equip the car with a fender unless they found that the accident could have been averted by the fender. When the court told the jury that they could not consider the absence of a fender unless they found that if one had been provided it would have averted the accident, he in effect told them that the fender was not in the case. All through the instructions, and in the evidence as well, where the term "accident" is used, it refers to the collision itself. If the court had used the term "collision" instead of "accident" in the instructions, all would at once agree that the presence of a fender could not have averted the collision. The fender was not calculated, like a gong or a bell, or even a headlight, to apprise one of an approaching car so as to avoid it. A fender could have been used to prevent a person colliding with the front end of the car from getting under the wheels by shoving him off the track or by carrying him along in front of the car. If the court had told the jury that a fender might be considered in case they found that it would have prevented the injuries—that is, the crushing of deceased's leg and foot—there would be more force to counsel's contention. Even then we think the instruction would not be subject to the criticisms made of it. We do not rest our decision with regard to this assignment upon what we have said about the negative character of the instruction; what we have said was for the purpose of illustrating the point that the instruction is not necessarily open to the construction placed upon it by counsel.

Passing now to the claim made by counsel that by this instruction the jury were authorized to require from the appellants a standard of care in the conduct of their business different from that which may have been generally prevailing—that is, in view that there was no evidence in the record with regard to the use of fenders generally—the jury could not be permitted to say that not to use one on the car in question constituted negligence. It is true, as is well said in section 44 of Labatt on Master and Servant, that: "The unbending test of negligence in methods, machinery, and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. No man is held by law to a higher degree of skill than the fair average of his profession or trade, and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man." This doctrine with regard to the use of safety and other appliances is approved and adopted by this court, in speaking through the present Chief Justice, in the case of Fritz v. Electric Light Co., 18 Utah, 493, 56 Pac. 90. We have no inclination to either question the soundness of the doctrine or to modify it; but we are convinced it is not applicable to the facts in this case. It does not follow that, because it may be necessary to prove that certain appliances are in general use before negligence can be predicated upon the omission to supply them, therefore the rule applies to all appliances of whatever kind or character, or for whatever purpose used. The purpose of some appliances may be so generally known that it becomes a matter of common knowledge; and therefore the proof in that regard may be dispensed with. This may be illustrated by referring to a few only of many instances that may be named. Would any one now assert that, before one could predicate negligence on the failure to provide a headlight on a locomotive engine during its use at night, or in failing to provide cars in use with brakes, or in providing such locomotive engines or other boilers in use with what are known as "spark arresters," proof would have to be made that such appliances are in general use? We think not, for the simple reason that the purposes of the appliances above mentioned have become so generally known that proof of the fact is wholly unnecessary. This in time will no doubt be true of some of the appliances which now require proof of general use. If this be so, does the fender, as applied to street cars, come within the category of appliances whose purposes are a matter of common knowledge? We think it does. It certainly has a clear and well-defined meaning; and its purpose has also received legal recognition. "Fender," in 19 Cyc. 480, is defined as follows: "As applied to street railway cars, a guard or protection against danger to pedestrians." In the case of Cape May Ry. v. Cape May, 59 N. J. Law, 408, 36 Atl. 699, 36 L. R. A. 653, in referring to the term "fenders" as used in an ordinance, where the objection was made that the use of the term "fenders," without further definition, was vague and uncertain, and for that reason the ordinance was not enforceable, it was said, "The term 'fender' is well defined and readily understood as a guard and protection against dangers," and the ordinance was accordingly enforced. If, therefore, the term "fender" has acquired a well-defined meaning in law, and its purpose is legally recognized and understood, it must be so, because this meaning is the popularly and generally accepted meaning and purpose. The law does not precede but follows the popular and general understanding with regard to such matters. We think, therefore, that in this case, in view that the negligence was predicated entirely upon the omission to provide the car with any fender or guard whatever, the court had the right to take judicial notice of the purpose of fenders as applied to street cars. Had the complaint charged negligence in the use of an improper fender, or of one not in general use, then it no doubt would have been necessary to support the allegation with proper proof by showing the kind of fenders in use generally by those engaged in a similar business which was managed and conducted with ordinary prudence and care. But the negligence, if any, consisted in not providing any appliance whatever, the purpose of which is well known and recognized, and, this being so, the only proof that was required was to show its absence. If we are right in our conclusions, then it was for the jury to say, from all the facts and circumstances in evidence, together with the inferences to be drawn from them, whether or not a fender would have obviated the injuries. Unless the jury so found, the absence of a fender was wholly immaterial. The mere fact that no fender was provided did not, and could not, have any effect one way or the other, unless the fender would have guarded and protected the deceased against injury. We remark further, that, in view of what we have said with regard to the purposes of fenders, it may well be that the street railway company can no longer excuse itself for not equipping its cars with fenders at this late date by simply pointing to the fact that others, engaged in similar business, do likewise. There are some things that it may be negligent to do, or omit to do, although all others do or omit to do them. This is well illustrated in the cases of Webster v. Symes, 109 Mich. 1, 66 N. W. 580, and Ilwaco Ry. Co. v. Hedrich, 1 Wash. 446, 25 Pac. 335, 22 Am. St. Rep. 169. We are convinced that appellants were not prejudiced in any of their substantial rights in this regard, and therefore this assignment must be overruled.

It is also claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury with regard to the duties devolving upon deceased in attempting to cross the track. In this regard the court in effect told the jury that the deceased was required to use his senses, and exercise that degree of care that men of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the particular circumstances of the case as disclosed by the evidence. It is urged that this was insufficient, because the deceased was shown to have been familiar with the surroundings and conditions prevailing at the place of the accident, and therefore the usual or ordinary test did not cover the case. We think otherwise. The court called attention to the particular circumstances of this case, and within these were necessarily included all the circumstances which had any bearing upon the conduct of either party. Moreover, there is no intimation anywhere in the record that any one made any claim that any consideration should be based upon the fact that the deceased did not know the conditions and circumstances surrounding him at the time of the accident, and that he did not know the conditions generally prevailing at that place. We cannot perceive any error in this regard.

Error is also predicated upon the instruction where the court referred to the care the deceased was required to exercise in looking for an approaching car. In this instruction the court used the expression of "observing the car" instead of "looking for the car" before attempting to cross the track. It is urged that to merely require one to observe an approaching car is not sufficient; that it does not meet the duty imposed by law, which requires that a pedestrian, before attempting to cross the track, must look to see whether or not a car is approaching. We think the jury clearly understood what the court desired to impress upon them in the instruction. The court repeatedly told the jury that the deceased was required to use all of his senses, and in different instructions told them what the law required of him, and, unless they found that he had complied with those requirements, the respondents could not recover. In view of this the appellants could not have been prejudiced.

Another error assigned is that the court erred in directing the jury that a person, in attempting to cross a street railway track, "has a right to rely upon the assumption that the company and its servants will discharge their legal duty, in approaching crossings, by having their cars under control." It is urged that, in view that the accident did not occur at a public crossing, therefore the instruction is not based on the evidence and is contrary to law. The instruction, however, contains simply an abstract statement of the law, as applied to persons and street railroad companies, with regard to crossings generally. It is true that the accident occurred at a point some distance east of the main street crossing. But there was an abundance of evidence which tended to show that a large number of persons habitually crossed the track at and near the place of the accident. This, in effect, widened the extent of Main street crossing, all of which had existed for a long time prior to the accident, and was well known to the street car company and its servants; and hence it became their duty to adapt the movements of the cars to the prevailing conditions and circumstances. As we have already pointed out in this opinion, no part of the public street is withdrawn from use by placing a street railway track upon it. The street thereby is merely burdened with an additional easement in favor of the street railway company, with the preferential right of passage over it. The public are not merely licensees in using that portion of the street occupied by the street railway track. They are not there by the mere permission of the owner of the street railway; but they are there as a matter of legal right, and may so remain until the street railway company desires to pass over it with one of its cars. The right of passage by the company is a preferential right to which all others must yield. But, in exercising this right, the company and its servants must have due regard for the safety of those who may be on the street, or on or near the street railway tracks. If, therefore, any considerable number of persons habitually cross the track at a certain point, it is not material that such a point is not at the regularly established crossing in so far as it affects the care of the street railway company in passing that particular place. The right to the use of the public streets cannot be curtailed in this way. The public must have due regard for the preferential right of passage of the street cars, and must exercise the degree of care commensurate with this right; but the street car company may not say that it will not permit the use of streets except at public crossings, and that any person who attempts to use or cross them at other places does so at his peril. Both parties must so adapt their movements and conduct as will conserve the rights of all, and whether the one or the other has departed from the standard of care required at a public crossing, or on any other part of the tracks occupying a portion of the street, is, and of necessity must be, ordinarily, a question of fact. By what we have said, we do not mean that a street car company must at all points move its cars at the same rate of speed, or exercise the same vigilance, or have its cars under control to the same extent as at public crossings; but what we desire to impress is that the company must at all places exercise a degree of care which the existing conditions require, and that pedestrians, or any one using the street with horses and vehicles, must do the same. The court in no way departed from this rule in the instructions; and therefore no error was committed in giving it.

Error is also based upon the refusal of the court to charge the jury as requested by appellants in their request numbered 32. This request is to the effect that it was the duty of the deceased in approaching the track to look for an approaching car, and that, if he had looked, and by looking would have seen the car in time to have avoided the accident, but did not do so, and if the motorman did not have the last clear chance to have avoided the accident by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then the verdict should be for defendants. While this charge was not given to the jury in the exact language employed by counsel, we think that the substance of it was covered in several instructions given by the court. Instruction numbered 20 given covers a portion of it; and this instruction was in substance the same as requests numbered 8 and 9, asked by appellants. In view of this, the court did not err in refusing the request.

The last assignment to be noticed is directed against an instruction given in relation to the measure of damages. The instruction is a very long one, covering the whole range of matters to be considered by the jury in determining the amount to be allowed the widow and minor children for the loss sustained by them through the death of the husband and father. In the instruction is included in substance the whole of the requests upon the subject offered by appellants. The exception and argument, however, are directed against the concluding part of the instruction, which reads as follows: "You will not consider, in fixing damages, any income from any property that the deceased had, if any, at the time of his death, produced by the property itself alone, independent of his care, skill, and supervision; but you should consider any income from any and all of his property which his skill, personal supervision, diligence, and care have a part in producing." It is strenuously argued that under this instruction the jury could have considered the profits arising out of deceased's business, and that profits arising from any business or enterprise cannot be considered in actions of this kind, unless the profits are for past losses, and then they must be specially pleaded if a recovery is sought therefor. While the phraseology of the instruction is not to be approved as a model, nevertheless, for the reasons hereafter stated, it cannot be held that it was prejudicial to the rights of appellants. It may be conceded and it frequently has been held that mere future profits, arising out of a deceased's business, cannot be considered in a case of this character. But this is so because the element of future profits is too uncertain, besides being speculative and remote. Under our statute, both the wife and the children were heirs of the deceased, and as such were entitled to recover, not only for the loss of support, companionship, and the assistance he would naturally and probably be to them, but were entitled to all the pecuniary loss that they may have sustained by reason of his death, which could be established with reasonable certainty in view of all the circumstances pertaining to the subject-matter. The authorities under statutes similar to ours, we think, are clearly to this effect. In Hayes v. Williams, 17 Colo. 465, 30 Pac. 355, the rule or measure of damages is stated thus: "This rule allows, as compensatory damages, the estimated accumulations of deceased during 'the probable remainder of his life, if he had not come to an accidental death, having reference to his age, occupation, habits, bodily health, and ability.'" The rule in case of death of a husband and father is stated, in much the same terms, in section 160 of Tiffany on Death by Wrongful Act. See, also, San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Long, 87 Tex. 148, 27 S. W. 113, 24 L. R. A. 641, 47 Am. St. Rep. 87. The instruction strictly limited the recovery to such accumulations as would likely be produced by the "skill, personal supervision and diligence" of the deceased, and all future income from any property the deceased owned, at the time of his death, not produced from the deceased's personal efforts, was excluded. Future profits, as such, were, therefore, not only not included, but they were expressly excluded, as an element for which a recovery could be had. The respondents in this regard were entitled to receive what they would have received if the deceased had lived. This, so far as the loss could be established with reasonable certainty, was the measure of damages. If from the evidence it appeared that the deceased's ability and habits were such as gave reasonable grounds to believe that he would accumulate property in excess of his expenditures, then his heirs were entitled to the loss so sustained by them. These losses cannot be limited strictly to a fixed sum of earnings for a day, week, or month. If absolute certainty were required, very little, if anything, could be recovered. Matters of this kind depend on the inherent probabilities, and these were all in evidence on the part of appellants, as well as on the part of respondents; and in view of the evidence on this subject we are fully persuaded that no prejudicial error was committed, either in admitting the evidence upon the subject, or in giving the instruction complained of.

In concluding this opinion, we remark that this case has been tried three times. At the first trial the jury disagreed, and on the second trial a verdict was returned in favor of respondents, which was set aside by the trial court, and on the third trial the jury again rendered a verdict in favor of respondents, upon which the present judgment was entered. It is only fair to state that the counsel who presented the case to this court did not try it in the court below. We make this statement because the record presents exceptional features which may have arisen, in part at least, out of the theories of counsel trying the case, and which, according to their views, might not present the question in the precise form in which they have been argued before us. We have read the entire record with more than ordinary care. There were a large number of eyewitnesses who gave their version of the accident; every feature of the case was thoroughly covered by the instructions; and in the light of the whole record we are convinced that the case was properly submitted to the jury, and that, if they have committed any error of judgment in weighing and reconciling the evidence, it is one that the law, perhaps wisely, forbids us to review.

The judgment therefore should be, and accordingly is, affirmed, with costs to respondents.

CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO. v. POLLOCK.
(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—ACTION FOR LOSS—PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION.

In an action against a carrier for the loss of two of a larger number of horses delivered to defendant for transportation under a contract which provided that the shipper should do the loading the petition alleged that defendant, through its employé, "loaded said horses upon the cars of said defendant." There was a special finding that the two horses were lost or escaped between the time that they were turned over to the carrier and the time that they were loaded. Held, that the allegation that the horses were loaded by defendant might be construed to be for the purpose of showing a waiver of the agreement that the shipper should load them, and with the intention to allege that the act of loading was done by defendant instead of plaintiff so as to open the way to recover for a loss occurring while the horses were being loaded, that seeming to be the intention of the petition, the allegation being capable of such amendment, and defendant not having been misled, as appeared from the proceedings on the trial.

2. PLEADING—VARIANCE—MATERIALITY.

Under the express provisions of Rev. St. 1899, § 8736, no variance between allegation and proof shall be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 1338.]

3. SAME—AMENDMENT.

Under the express provision of Rev. St. 1899, §§ 3736, 3737, where a party alleges that he has been misled by a variance between the pleading and the proof, he must prove the fact, and also the respect in which he has been misled to the court's satisfaction, whereupon the court may order the pleading amended upon such terms as are just, and if the variance is not material the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, and may direct an immediate amendment without costs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 603-606.]

4. SAME—FAILURE OF PROOF.

Under the express provisions of Rev. St. 1899, § 3738, where an allegation to which proof is directed is unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in its general scope and meaning, it is not a case of variance, but a failure of proof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1339, 1340.]

5. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADINGS—AMENDMENTS.

Where the pleadings might have been amended to correspond with the facts proved, a judgment will not be disturbed because no formal amendment was made.

6. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—TIME LIABILITY COMMENCES.

The liability of a carrier as such commences at the time of delivery and acceptance of property for shipment.

7. SAME—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—DELIVERY—HORSES IN STOCK PENS.

Where horses are kept in a carrier's stock pens for a time under conditions during that period imposing no responsibility upon the carrier, when they are actually surrendered into the carrier's possession and control, though without change of location, and the carrier accepts them for transportation, the previous facts become of no consequence except as bearing on the question of the time of delivery and when the carrier's liability began.

8. SAME—DELIVERY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a shipper who had been keeping horses in a railroad stock pen, under his personal control, arranged with the carrier for the delivery in the same pen of the horses for transportation held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 962.]

9. SAME—LOADING BY CARRIER—LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

Where a carrier undertakes to discharge the duty of loading live stock without notice to the shipper or his agent, it will be liable if negligent in performance of the act, notwithstanding a stipulation in the contract requiring the loading to be done by the shipper.

10. SAME—ACTIONS—NUMBER OF HORSES IN SHIPMENT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a carrier for failure to transport all of a shipment of horses delivered and accepted for that purpose, where the evidence is conflicting as to the number of horses shipped, it is a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 962.]

11. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a carrier for failure to transport all of a shipment of horses delivered and accepted for that purpose, evidence held sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 960.]

12. TRIAL—QUESTION OF FACT—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The credibility of witnesses is a question for the jury.

13. WRIT OF ERROR—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—INCORPORATING ERRORS IN MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Alleged errors in excluding evidence and in regard to misconduct of counsel at the trial, not assigned as grounds for a new trial, are not reviewable.

14. SAME—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action against a carrier for failure to transport all of a shipment of 36 horses claimed to have been delivered and accepted for transportation, the exclusion of a sheriff's office record and monthly report as to the inspection of the horses shipped, offered to show that only 55 horses were inspected, was not prejudicial, where a witness connected with the sheriff's office was permitted to state the fact shown by the record by referring to it, not to refresh his recollection, but by way of stating the total number shown by the record to have been inspected.

Error to District Court, Sheridan County; Carroll H. Parmelee, Judge.

Action by F. G. Pollock against the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lonabaugh & Wenzell and N. K. Griggs, for plaintiff in error. Robert P. Parker, for defendant in error.

POTTER, C. J. The defendant in error, who will be referred to as the plaintiff—his title in the district court—brought this action to recover the value of two horses, alleged to have been delivered to and received by the plaintiff in error, defendant below, to be transported by it, as a common carrier, from Sheridan, in this state, to Hammond, Ind., under two separate contracts, or bills of lading, each providing for the transportation of 28 horses; and it is alleged that, in violation of the defendant's said contracts, it failed to transport the whole number of horses as thereby agreed respectively, but that it transported from Sheridan 27 horses only of the number covered by each contract. The answer alleges that 27 horses only were in fact delivered and received under each contract, and that the number was mistakenly entered in each as 28 in consequence of plaintiff's erroneous statement to the defendant respecting the number. The principal issue to be tried, therefore, was whether the two horses in question had been delivered and received for such shipment.

That the defendant is a common carrier, operating a railroad running through Sheridan county, in this state, is admitted by the pleadings. It appears from the evidence that there was but a single delivery of horses for the shipment aforesaid; that is to say, all the horses then proposed to be shipped by the plaintiff were delivered at one and the same time, but they were loaded into two cars, and a separate contract was made for the horses in each car. The plaintiff owned all the horses, and was named as consignee in each contract, and as the shipper in one of them. In the other contract one W. P. Palmer was named as shipper, and his name is subscribed to that contract. That appears to have been done to enable said Palmer to accompany the plaintiff with the horses, he having been employed, as plaintiff testified, to assist with the horses after their arrival at destination. This seems to explain the reason for the making of two contracts instead of one. They are alike in their terms except as to the name of the shipper and the number of the car containing the horses. Each contract contains the following stipulation: "It is agreed that the said animals are to be loaded, unloaded, watered and fed by the owner or his agents in charge; that the second party (the carrier) shall not be liable for loss from theft, heat or cold, jumping from car, or other escape, injury in loading or unloading, injury which animals may cause to themselves or to each other, or which results from the nature or propensities of such animals." It is also stated in each contract that, in consideration of free transportation for one person to accompany the stock, "It is agreed that the said cars, and the said animals contained therein, are and shall be in the sole charge of such persons, for the purpose of attention to and care of the said animals, and that the railway company shall not be responsible for such attention and care." The sum of $121 is stated in each contract and alleged in the petition as the freight rate to be paid for the agreed transportation. Notwithstanding the stipulation in the contracts as to loading the animals, the petition alleges, and the evidence shows, that the loading was done by an employé of the defendant, the foreman of its stockyards at Sheridan, the point of shipment; and from the evidence it appears that such loading occurred during the absence of the plaintiff. The discrepancy between the number of horses stated in the contracts and waybills and the number actually in the cars was noticed when the train carrying the horses reached Alliance, Neb., on the defendant's railroad. The horses were unloaded there during the night of their arrival, and but 27 were found to be in each car by the foreman of defendant's stockyards at that point, who assisted in unloading them, and the next morning, the horses having remained there until then, the plaintiff saw and counted the horses and discovered the discrepancy between the number stated in the contracts and which he claims to have been delivered, and the number being transported. He thereupon at once made and filed a claim for the alleged missing horses with the defendant's representative at Alliance, which was referred to the defendant's freight claim agent. Thereupon some correspondence occurred between the latter and the plaintiff, resulting in an offer of settlement at a stated figure by said claim agent, but which offer plaintiff did not accept. That correspondence was introduced in evidence. Whatever the loss or escape, therefore, it occurred, if at all, before the unloading of the horses at Alliance, so far as the evidence is concerned.

The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff assessing the damages at $160, with interest; and with their verdict returned answers to certain special interrogatories that had been submitted at defendant's request. Answering the special interrogatories the jury found that the two horses in controversy had not escaped from defendant's cars; that they were in the same pen at the stockyards with the other horses at the time the plaintiff directed or authorized the loading of his stock into defendant's cars; and that they escaped or were lost between the time of turning over the stock to defendant and the loading into defendant's cars, through the negligence of defendant's employés. A motion for judgment in favor of defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, was denied, and thereafter defendant's motion for new trial was also denied; whereupon judgment was rendered for the plaintiff upon and in accordance with the verdict for the sum of $203.30, that being the amount of damages assessed by the jury, with legal interest from the day next succeeding the execution of the contracts and the alleged delivery of the horses, together with costs of suit. The defendant complains here of that judgment on error.

The following grounds of error are relied on in the brief of counsel for the defendant, plaintiff in error here: (1) That the evidence fails to establish the cause of action alleged. (2) That the evidence fails to show negligence on the part of defendant. (3) That plaintiff is not shown to be entitled to recover. (4) That the court erroneously excluded from the evidence the official report of the sheriff's inspection of the horses shipped by the plaintiff. (5) Alleged misconduct of plaintiff's counsel during the trial.

1. It is contended in the first place that upon the allegations of the petition and the special findings of the jury the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything. This contention is based upon the finding that the horses were lost or escaped between the time that they were turned over to defendant and the time that they were loaded, which is claimed to be inconsistent and at variance with the allegation of the petition that the horses were loaded upon the cars of the defendant by an employé of defendant. In the cause of action upon one of the contracts, after alleging the delivery and acceptance of 28 horses for transportation, it is alleged "that said defendant, through its employé one Gill Dodge, loaded said horses upon the cars of said defendant." In stating the cause of action upon the other contract a similar allegation appears. The breach of each contract is alleged to have been the failure to transport and convey the horses in accordance with its said contracts. Upon this it is argued that negligence before or during loading is not charged, and that the verdict appears, therefore, to have been founded upon a liability not alleged in the petition. One of the grounds contained in the motion for new trial was that of surprise based on the facts aforesaid, and an alleged lack of advice and knowledge on the part of the defendant that an attempt would be made to show negligence prior to the loading of the horses. A literal reading of the allegation as to loading might perhaps throw the petition open to the technical construction that it states that all the horses delivered had been actually loaded upon the cars of defendant. Though the contract stipulation requiring the shipper to load was not alleged, it is probable, as suggested in the brief for defendant in error, that the allegation that the horses were loaded by the defendant was inserted to show a waiver of the agreement in that regard; and that the intention was merely to allege that the act of loading was performed by the defendant instead of the plaintiff, and thus to open the way to recover for a loss shown to have occurred while the horses were being loaded. And this we are inclined to think is the sense in which the averment ought to be construed, in view of all the allegations of the petition. There is at least no harm in adopting that construction, since it is clearly a matter that was capable of amendment without changing the cause of action, and the circumstances are such as to render the variance, if any, immaterial; a question that we will now proceed to consider. Recovery was sought for an alleged failure to transport two horses alleged to have been delivered and accepted for that purpose.

The statute provides that no variance between allegation and proof shall be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits, and when it is alleged that a party has been so misled, that fact must be proved to the satisfaction of the court, and it must also be shown in what respect the party has been misled, whereupon the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as are just; and when the variance is not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, and may order an immediate amendment without costs. Rev. St. 1899, §§ 3736, 3737. When the allegation to which the proof is directed is unproved, not in some particular or particulars only but in its general scope and meaning, then it is not a case of variance, but a failure of proof. Id. § 3738. Where an amendment might have been allowed to correspond with the facts proven, a judgment will not be disturbed because no formal amendment was made. Kuhn v. McKay, 7 Wyo. 42, 49 Pac. 473, 51 Pac. 205. Now, the whole transaction, including the circumstances of the delivery of the horses, the time of such delivery, the number of the horses when taken in charge by the defendant, and when loaded, the method employed in loading, the chances of escape after the time plaintiff claimed to have made the delivery, and apparently everything connected with the transaction as well before as after the alleged delivery, was gone into by both parties upon the trial. Defendant's representative in receiving and loading the horses was a witness for the defendant, and he was examined at length concerning the entire matter. The district court must have taken these facts into consideration in deciding the motion for new trial; and we fail to observe any reasonable ground for holding the defendant to have been misled by the allegation referred to, or any ground for assuming that it could have more fully presented its case or the facts to meet a claim of liability at any time following the alleged delivery. Moreover, the instructions given to the jury, apparently without objection, presented the case as one for an alleged liability between the time of delivery and leaving Sheridan. For example, the fourth instruction charged the jury that "In no view of the case can plaintiff be held to recover in this action for the horses in question, or either of them, unless he shall have established by preponderance of the evidence that he absolutely did deliver such horses, or horse, to defendant for actual shipment." Now there could be no question about delivery after the loading. The sixth instruction stated that under the petition no question is raised as to loss or escape at any other point than Sheridan, and that the jury were not at liberty to find against defendant because of any evidence tending to show the loss or escape of the horses at any point other than Sheridan. None of the other instructions sought to distinguish between a loss before and after loading. The defendant complains of the refusal to give its requested instruction No. 7, but it is not in the record, and we are in no way informed as to what was stated by it. Should there be any reasonable doubt therefore as to the interpretation of the allegation in question, we think it is clearly one which the court might have ordered to be amended to conform to the facts; and that the alleged variance was not of such a character as to amount to a failure of proof.

2. The evidence was conflicting in regard to the number of horses delivered. Each contract or bill of lading called for 28, as well as each waybill; these were made out by the agent of defendant at Sheridan, and the plaintiff testified that he did not state the number to the agent, and there was no evidence that he made any statements or representations as to number to such agent. He did testify however that he had 56 horses, and that he delivered all of them to the defendant for shipment; and he introduced in evidence the sheriff's certificate of inspection made at or about the time of the alleged delivery, showing the inspection of 56 horses for the plaintiff, "destination Hammond, Ind., shipped car 61357, 52585Q." According to the contracts and waybills the cars containing the horses were numbered 61357 and 62585. The sheriff may have made a clerical mistake in the number of one of the cars, or the mistake may be in the copy in the bill of exceptions. However, the discrepancy is not material to the controversy here, since there is no evidence of any other shipment at the time in question, and the discrepancy does not seem to have been mentioned at the trial. At the time that plaintiff claims by his testimony to have delivered the horses for shipment, they were, whatever their number, in one of the pens at defendant's stockyards at Sheridan, the particular pen being numbered 23 adjoining the loading chute or pen, or rather separated therefrom only by an alley 16 feet wide, a gate of the same width as the alley when closed separating the pen from the alley.

It appears that during several days immediately preceding this shipment a public horse sale had been conducted at said stockyards by one A. B. Clarke, who had been given the use of the stockyards for that purpose, except that the company reserved the right to use portions thereof if necessary for the unloading of animals from its cars while passing through Sheridan, and possibly for horses turned over to it at that point for shipment. While Mr. Clarke was using the yards as aforesaid, he or his agents allotted a certain pen or pens to respective buyers into which the horses bought from time to time by them were put. Under this arrangement the plaintiff was assigned the temporary use of pen 23, and the horses purchased by him were placed in that pen. During such sale, however, and while the pens were so used, that is to say, as a place for keeping the horses purchased, the pens so employed were under the exclusive control of the person conducting the sale, or his agents, so far as the company was concerned, and the horses might be taken out and others put in, without control or interference by the railway company. The plaintiff testified that he bought 56 horses, obtaining all but one at the sale aforesaid, and that the one not so obtained was bought from a party in Sheridan, and put in the same pen with the others; that at about six o'clock in the evening of the day of shipment while such horses were in the pen aforesaid, he counted them, and there were 56; that he then turned them over to the company for said shipment, and the company accepted them. That he thereupon went into town to attend to some business, returning at about 7 o'clock, when he was informed by the agent that they had loaded his horses, and he was given the bills of lading. It does not appear that he made any further count of the animals that day. The representative of the company who loaded the cars testified that he loaded all the horses that were in the pen used by plaintiff sometime between 7 and 9 o'clock in the evening; that he drove the horses out of the pen 23 into the chute pen, counting them as they passed through the gate into the alley connecting with the chute pen; that there were 54 head, which he divided into two lots of equal number, and loaded them in separate cars. He stated that the night was dark and rainy, and that he used a lantern, but he believed he was able to make a correct count. He denied giving the number of horses to the agent, or to having any knowledge as to where the agent obtained his information respecting the number. It appears from his testimony that the officer who inspected the horses was there at the time he commenced loading, and though he admitted having known at some time that 56 were claimed to have been inspected, and seems to have gained that information from the officer, he was unable to recall whether or not he had learned that fact at the time of the loading, but admitted that the officer may have told him at that time. He had the key to the outside gate of the yards, and testified that he did not let anyone out with any of the plaintiff's horses after they had been turned over to him, and that he did not think it was possible for any of the horses to have escaped or to have been stolen while being loaded. In addition to the testimony of the plaintiff above mentioned, he was recalled on rebuttal, and then testified that the representative of the company to whom he had delivered his horses was the foreman of the stockyards, the witness who testified to having done the loading; that the horses were in the pen aforesaid when so delivered, and that the delivery occurred immediately after he had received the certificate of inspection. It appears that the inspection was made by a deputy sheriff, and the plaintiff testified that upon his return from town, when he found the contracts prepared and ready for signature, the inspecting officer was with the agent, which may perhaps account for the agent's information as to the number of horses.

Neither the party who was agent at the time nor the officer who made the inspection appears to have been called as a witness or to have testified. But an affidavit, or apparently a portion of one, made by the absent officer was permitted to be read by consent, subject to objection as to relevancy. In that affidavit which was offered by defendant, it was stated that after the date of the shipment the affiant saw in a stable at Sheridan one of the animals claimed by the plaintiff to have been shipped and lost, but there is nothing in the evidence to connect the plaintiff with the act of placing the animal there, or to show that he knew of its having been there. Though the witness who had attended to the loading stated that the company had nothing to do with the horses while in pen 23, it appears from his own testimony that they were in that pen when he took charge of the horses as the company's representative, for he testified that he drove the horses out of the pen in loading them. The evidence showing that before the loading the plaintiff left the yards, and that he did not return until the loading had occurred is not disputed. It is clear, therefore, since he left the horses in the pen where they had been kept, and they were loaded without further act on his part, that it is a reasonable conclusion that they had been delivered before he left the stockyards, and therefore while in the pen. Though the company would not have been liable under the circumstances for losses had any occurred during the period that the horses were kept in the stockyards before actual delivery and acceptance for shipment, the fact that others previously had the temporary use of the yards does not exempt the company from liability as a common carrier after accepting possession for the purpose of transportation. The liability of the carrier as such commences at the time of delivery and acceptance of the property for shipment. 5 Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 181, 446; Hutchinson on Carriers (2d Ed.) § 82. In a recent Nebraska case the rule was stated to be well established as follows: "When a shipper surrenders the entire custody of his goods to a common carrier for immediate transportation, and the carrier so accepts them, the liability of the carrier as a practical insurer of the safe delivery of the goods at once attaches." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Powers, 73 Neb. 816, 103 N. W. 678. Notwithstanding, therefore, that the horses had been kept in the yards one or two days or more under conditions during that period imposing no responsibility upon the carrier, when, if ever, though without change of location, the horses were actually surrendered into the possession and control of the carrier, and the latter so accepted them for transportation, the previous facts became of no consequence, except as bearing upon the question of the time of delivery, and when the liability as carrier began. It is clear that although the plaintiff had for a time been using a pen in the yards of the company for holding his horses, with personal control over them, neither he nor the company was prevented by that fact from changing the condition of affairs, and entering into an arrangement for the delivery in the same pen of the horses for transportation. Whether such a change was accomplished was a question of fact for the jury to determine.

The testimony of the defendant's superintendent at Sheridan at the time of the shipment, does not, as contended, establish the fact that this particular lot of horses could not have gone into the company's possession until they were in the chute or loading pens. It does not appear by his testimony or otherwise that he gave any personal attention to this shipment. His testimony was directed generally to the arrangement with Mr. Clarke in relation to the use of the yards during the sale; and he stated that as no shipments had been previously booked for those days he had turned over the yards to Clarke for the purposes already stated, and that, in case of a proposed shipment while Clarke had control of the yards, the company would then have arranged with him about that, so as not to interfere with his sale. And in referring to the matter generally the witness stated that the company had nothing to do with the horses connected with the Clarke sale when they were put into the various pens, nor until their going into the chutes or loading pens, but that until then they could be handled in any way, driven away or shipped, and when put into the loading pens, they were then loaded in the car for the company. In making these statements it is clear that he was not referring specifically to this particular shipment, but to the situation generally resulting from the use of the yards for the Clarke sale. He was not examined about the specific facts connected with the delivery of plaintiff's horses, nor does he appear to have been present or to have had any personal knowledge about that delivery. Had there been an absence of any evidence tending to show a surrender of possession to the company before the horses entered the loading pens, the general situation would no doubt have controlled. We do not think his testimony or the facts testified to by him rendered it impossible for a delivery to have occurred while the horses were in pen 23. The testimony of the plaintiff and the foreman of the stockyards presented the facts to the jury respecting this particular shipment, and the time and manner of delivery therefore, a matter not touched upon specifically by the superintendent's testimony. Whether the Clarke sale had been closed at the time of this shipment is not clearly disclosed, though the inference is strong that it had. At any rate it would seem that the plaintiff's connection with the sale had ceased, and that he was prepared to arrange for the shipment of his horses.

There was some evidence to the effect that one horse bought by plaintiff at the Clarke sale had been put into another pen, and had been seen in the neighborhood of Sheridan after the shipment, but plaintiff testified to having rejected that horse, and to have excluded it in stating the number of horses he had purchased; moreover it appears to have been a different animal from either of the two alleged to have been missing. Under the contracts, which seem to have been completed and signed after the loading, the shipper agreed to load and unload; but the defendant voluntarily did the loading, and under such circumstances as to constitute a waiver of the contract stipulation, so far as to render it liable for negligence on its part in performing the act if resulting in loss or damage. We understand the rule to be that where a carrier undertakes to discharge the duty of loading live stock without notice to the shipper or his agent, it will be liable if negligent in performance of the act, notwithstanding a stipulation in the contract requiring the loading to be done by the shipper. Normile v. R. & Nav. Co., 41 Or. 177, 69 Pac. 928; C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Williams, 61 Neb. 608, 85 N. W. 832, 55 L. R. A. 889; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 89 Va. 703, 17 S. E. 127; Mo. Pac. R. Co. v. Kingsbury (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 322. The rule is certainly a reasonable one under circumstances such as are presented in the case at bar. It is not clear whether the special finding that the loss occurred between the time of delivery and loading refers to the time when the loading was begun or completed. If the latter was intended, then the rule above stated would apply.

The instructions seem to have fairly presented the law upon the issues, and are not here complained of, but we refer to them to show how the case went to the jury. They stated in substance that if but 27 horses were in fact delivered to the company to be placed in each of the two cars, then the fact that the contracts mistakenly stated that 28 were shipped in each would be immaterial, and the case should then be considered as though the contract read "27" instead of "28"; that while the horses were under plaintiff's control in the pen mentioned in the evidence, they could not be regarded as delivered to defendant; that a recovery could not be had unless an actual delivery of the alleged missing horses to the defendant was established; that if the horses were in a pen belonging to defendant, but only for the convenience of plaintiff in holding them or otherwise, then they were not delivered to defendant so as to make it liable for loss or escape therefrom. By reason of the peculiar language of the petition in stating that the defendant transported only 27 horses from Sheridan, the jury was instructed that no question was raised as to loss or escape at any point other than Sheridan.

The following instruction was requested by defendant: "You are instructed that as the plaintiff has declared, in his petition, upon the contracts of shipment, and also himself introduced said contracts in evidence, he is bound by their terms; and hence, as said contracts expressly state among other things that the defendant shall not be liable for the escape from defendant's cars of the horses in question, you cannot render a verdict against it for damages, on account of such escape, even though you should be satisfied from the evidence that they did so escape." This was modified by adding the following: "Provided, however, that such escape was made without negligence on the part of the defendant or its employes," and, as so modified, was given. Though the modification was complained of in the motion for new trial, it is not shown to have been excepted to, and we do not understand that it is now claimed to have been error. The evidence being conflicting upon the question of the number of the horses, it was the peculiar province of the jury to pass upon it; and they seem to have done so by harmonizing as much of the evidence as possible. It must be remembered that the contracts were in evidence, and they would control in the absence of evidence deemed sufficient to overcome their recitals. If the testimony of plaintiff was to be believed, then the contracts correctly stated the number. There were some other circumstances in evidence corroborative of his testimony. There were others opposing it; such as the improbability that more than 27 head actually went into either car, and the testimony of the witness who loaded the horses that he found only 54, and that he loaded all that were in pen 23. The jury may have thought it possible for the two to have escaped after delivery and inspection and before the beginning of loading; in which case the testimony of said witness, as well as the plaintiff, may have been given credence. Defendant's evidence tended strongly, if not conclusively, to show that no escape had occurred between Sheridan and Alliance, hence the instruction restricting the liability to loss at Sheridan does not seem to have eliminated any chances of plaintiff's recovery upon the evidence. Though conflicting, the evidence appears to be sufficient to sustain the verdict. We cannot substitute our judgment for that of the jury, even if we should feel inclined to look at the effect of the evidence differently. The credibility of the witnesses was especially a matter for the consideration of the jury. We are therefore of the opinion that the claim as to insufficiency of the evidence is not supported upon the record.

3. The other alleged errors are not properly before us, not having been assigned as grounds for new trial. But we are inclined to think that the exclusion of the sheriff's office record and his monthly report as to the inspection of these horses made by authority of chapter 79, p. 79, Laws 1901, was proper, or at least not prejudicial. The purpose of the offer was to show that as appeared by such record and report only 55 horses had been inspected, excluding the rejected horse above referred to; and as a witness connected with the sheriff's office was permitted to state the fact shown by the record by referring to it, not to refresh his recollection, but by way of stating the total number shown by the record to have been inspected on the occasion in question, prejudice is not quite apparent. But the shipper and carrier have nothing to do with the making of the record or report; and it was not shown nor offered to be shown that the plaintiff against whom they were sought to be introduced was present when they were made or had assisted in making them, or knew until they were produced at the trial what the contents were. As written evidence for the purpose aforesaid upon the issues here between the shipper and carrier they would appear to be objectionable on the ground of hearsay.

For the reasons aforesaid, no reversible error is perceived in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

McKEE v. DODD. (S. F. 4,381.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 17, 1908.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMPUTATION OF TIME—ABSENCE FROM STATE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, provides that an action upon a contract founded on a written instrument executed out of the state must be commenced in the state within two years. Section 351 declares that if, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the action may be commenced within two years after his return to the state, and if, after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action. Held, that where a note was expressly made payable in New York, and the parties were residents of that state when it was executed, but the maker was a non-resident thereof when the cause of action on it accrued and subsequently came to California, the statute only commenced to run in his favor when he came to the state, and where he left the state, returning for occasional visits which aggregated less than two years, the time that he was absent from the state was not a part of the time within which the suit could be brought.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 439-455.]

2. SAME—NONRESIDENCE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 361, provides that when a cause of action has arisen in another state, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained by reason of lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state except in favor of one who has been a citizen, and has held the cause of action from the time it accrued. The maker of notes payable in New York left that state, was in Europe when the notes became due, and afterwards took up his residence in Hawaii after the maturity of the notes, and remained there for a length of time which, under the Hawaiian statute of limitations, would bar an action on the notes. Held, that the Hawaiian statute of limitations did not bar an action brought against the payor's executor in California, since the action arose primarily in New York, and the section has reference only to the primary and original jurisdiction in which a cause of action arises, and does not contemplate other jurisdictions where the debtor may have resided.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 4-8.]

3. ACTION—NATURE AND ELEMENTS OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

A "cause of action" arises out of an antecedent primary right and corresponding duty and the breach of the right and duty by the person on whom the duty rests; the primary right and duty and the wrong together constituting the cause of action in the legal sense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, § 1.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1015-1019; vol. 8, p. 7598.]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLACE OF ACCESSION OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

In a legal sense a cause of action cannot have two places of origin, but can arise in but one place, and, in the case of a note made payable in the state where the payee lives, it arises in that state.

5. COURTS—COMITY—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

As between the states the same rights are reserved by the Constitution to the citizens of one that are accorded to the citizens of another, but, beyond this, the ability of a creditor to pursue his debtor in a foreign jurisdiction rests wholly upon comity and upon the laws of such jurisdiction.

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PRESENTMENT OF CLAIMS—CLAIMS OF NONRESIDENT CREDITOR—COMITY.

Since the statute does not forbid a creditor and resident of a sister state the right to present his claim against an estate being administered in this state, whether the administration be primary or ancillary, comity will dictate that such a claim should be entertained.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by John McKee against Rebecca A. Dodd, executor of James Dodd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Cannon, for appellant. A. P. Black, for intervener. Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action on a claim against the estate of James Dodd, deceased, based upon three promissory notes which were executed in 1891 in New York to plaintiff, and payable in that state; plaintiff and the deceased at that time both being residents thereof. All of these notes by their terms became due and payable before the expiration of the year 1891. Shortly after their execution Dodd left New York and never returned. He was in Europe until May, 1892, and thence came to California, arriving here in June, 1892. He kept a liquor saloon in San Francisco until April, 1893, when he sold out his business and went to Honolulu, H. I. He entered business in Honolulu, resided and had his domicile there until his death in January, 1900. During the time of his residence in Honolulu he made visits to San Francisco, but the total length of his stays in this state aggregated less than two years. He left estate, consisting of real and personal property, in Hawaii and in California. His will was duly admitted to probate in Honolulu, and ancillary administration was had in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Such property as he left in this state is here in process of administration. McKee, the plaintiff, continued to reside in New York. He presented the notes for payment to the executrix as a claim against the estate in California, which claim was allowed by her. The court refused its allowance, whereupon this action was commenced. It was known to plaintiff that Dodd was residing in Honolulu. The court awarded judgment to plaintiff upon his claim and defendant appeals, presenting three contentions.

1. Appellant urges that the notes are barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by which section an action upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing executed out of the state must be commenced in this state within two years. Section 351 of the Code of Civil Procedure in this connection declares that "If, when the cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the action may be commenced within the term herein limited, after his return to the state, and if, after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." Appellant relies upon the case of Palmer v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 93, as supporting her contention that when Dodd came to the state the cause of action against him here arose, that the statute of limitations then began to run, and that his subsequent departure from the state did not stay this running; but in Palmer v. Shaw, not only was the court's attention not directed to this proposition, but in fact the defendant had been in the state more than two full years before the action was brought, whereas the deceased in this case had been in the state, aggregating all of his visits, less than five hundred days. The rule is to the contrary of appellant's contention, and has been expressly so decided in Dougall v. Schulenberg, 101 Cal. 154, 35 Pac. 635. That case is the exact parallel of this as to the leading question involved, and it is there declared that where a note sued upon was in express terms payable out of the state, and the payors were nonresidents of the state when the cause of action accrued, the statute only commenced to run in their favor when they came to this state, and if afterward they left the state, the time during which they were so absent will not be a part of the time within which the suit must be commenced. It follows herefrom that plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by subdivision 1 of section 339 and section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. Appellant next contends that the cause of action was barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section is as follows: "When a cause of action has arisen in another state, or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot there be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of this state, and who has held the cause of action from the time it accrued."

In support of appellant's position under this section it was established in evidence that under the laws of Hawaii an action for the recovery of any debt founded upon any contract, obligation, or liability, where the cause of action has arisen in any foreign country, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues. Appellant's reasoning and argument is this: That a cause of action "arose" against the deceased in Hawaii upon his arrival there after the maturity of the notes; that for failure to prosecute, the right of action became barred by the statute of limitations of Hawaii; that thus is presented a case under our section 361, where, by the laws of a foreign country, an action cannot be maintained upon a contract by reason of lapse of time, wherefore no action is maintainable against such person or his estate in this jurisdiction. It is at once apparent then that the crux of this matter is to be found in the true interpretation to be given to the phrase "when a cause of action has arisen." Appellant contends that the cause of action "arose" simultaneously in New York state at the time the promissory notes became due and payable, and also in Europe, where at that moment deceased chanced to be; that subsequently the cause of action arose successively in every country through which he passed, and arose finally in Hawaii upon his arrival there. If this be the true construction of the statute, then admittedly plaintiff's cause of action is barred. It may at once be conceded that the courts have experienced difficulties in construing statutes of limitations similar in their terms to our section 361. Appellant cites many cases under her contention that the weight of authority is with her. It would not be profitable to analyze these authorities to show in individual instances where the ruling of the court was determined by differences between their statutes and our own, nor where under other circumstances the reasoning does not appeal to us as cogent. Suffice it to say that, from a consideration of all the authorities and from the very reason of the matter itself, we are satisfied that appellant's position cannot be maintained. A cause of action, as Professor Pomeroy points out with his usual lucidity (Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 452 et seq.), arises out of an antecedent primary right and corresponding duty and the delict or breach of such primary right and duty by the person on whom the duty rests. "Of these elements, the primary right and duty and the delict or wrong combined constitute the cause of action in the legal sense of the term and as it is used in the Codes of the several states." It was the right of plaintiff to look for payment of his debt at the time it became due and at the place of payment—New York state. It was the duty of the deceased to pay the debt, not only when it became due, but at the place of payment—New York state. His failure in this regard gave rise to the cause of action, and, clearly therefore, that cause of action arose in the state of New York. In a legal sense the cause of action cannot have two places of origin. It can arise in but one place, and that, in such a case as this, is where the note is payable and the payee resides. As between the states the same rights are reserved by the Constitution to the citizens of one that are accorded to the citizens of another. But beyond this, the ability of a creditor to pursue his debtor in foreign jurisdictions rests wholly upon comity and upon the laws of such jurisdiction. This cause of action, therefore, did not arise against the deceased in Europe, where he chanced to be; and, indeed, in the particular country of his location at the time of his default, no remedy may have been open to plaintiff. Whatever subsequent remedies by way of rights of action may have accrued to plaintiff because of the deceased's presence in various states and countries, they were one and all subordinate to and depended upon the vital and essential fact that the cause of action had arisen against him in the state of New York. Story v. Thompson, 36 Ill. App. 370; Chevrier v. Roberts, 6 Mont. 319, 12 Pac. 702; Doughty v. Funk, 15 Okl. 643, 84 Pac. 484, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1029; McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81, 17 N. E. 75, 9 Am. St. Rep. 666. We conclude, therefore, upon this point that section 381 has reference only to the primary and original jurisdiction in which the cause of action arises, and does not contemplate other jurisdictions in which a cause of action may arise or accrue, depending upon the peripatetic inclinations of the defendant, and in the case at bar, unquestionably, the cause of action had its origin and primarily "arose" in the state of New York.

3. The last contention which appellant advances is that administration in this state being ancillary, no claim of a citizen of a foreign state can here be recognized at all, regardless of any question of the statute of limitations, but that such claim must be transferred to the court of primary jurisdiction. Undoubtedly, there is authority holding this view. Undoubtedly, also, this rule is ably controverted upon the ground that it is unsound in morals, as well as in law, and violates the constitutional guarantee of equal privileges and immunities to citizens. Reference herein may be made to the case of Shogg v. Perkins, 34 Ark. 117, and to the conflicting views of the justices of that court upon the matter. In Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 19 Sup. Ct. 165, 43 L. Ed. 432, it was declared that a state statute giving to residents of that state a priority over non-residents in the distribution of the assets of a foreign corporation is violative of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, giving equal privileges and immunities to the citizens of the several states, and as denying to every person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. We find no statute of our state which, in terms, denies to a creditor and resident of a sister state the right to present his claim here, whether the administration in our courts be primary or ancillary, and, in view of the provision of the Constitution of the United States above referred to, we should doubt the validity of such a statute if found upon our books. However, upon this matter it is necessary here to say no more than that, since our statutes do not forbid, comity will dictate that such a claim should be entertained.

For these reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GILLESPIE et al. v. GOULEY. (S. F. 4,277.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. QUIETING TITLE — PARTIES — PLAINTIFFS — JOINDER.

Two sons claiming that each owns a divided half of certain land under the will of their mother, and seeking to remove from their title the cloud of a fraudulent deed affecting the moieties of both, were properly joined as plaintiffs, under Code Civ. Proc. § 381, providing that any two or more persons claiming any interest in land under a common source of title, whether holding as tenants in common, joint tenants, copartners, or in severalty, may unite in an action against any person claiming an adverse estate therein, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quietening Title, § 65.]

2. JUDGMENT—PARTIES—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES PLAINTIFF—EFFECT.

A woman died leaving three sons. By her will certain land was to be divided equally between two of the sons. Before her death, however, she was defrauded of the land. The sons joined in a suit to recover the property. The court found that the two sons took as devisees, but that the third son had no interest in the subject-matter of the action, and, for misjoinder of parties plaintiff, gave judgment for defendant. Code Civ. Proc. § 578, provides that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and may, when justice requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side as between themselves. Held, that the court should have dismissed the action as to the third son, retained it as to the other plaintiffs, and rendered such judgment in their favor as they were entitled to under the findings.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by William M. Gillespie, administrator, and others against Ellen Gouley, administratrix. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

John B. Carson, Carlton W. Greene, and Lewis & Royce, for appellants. Henry C. McPike, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The facts necessary for an understanding of this action will be found stated in the former opinion of Gillespie v. Gouly, 120 Cal. 515, 52 Pac. 816. The plaintiffs sued to recover the real property as the heirs at law of Ann Gilfeather, deceased, who was the original owner of it, and who had been defrauded of it by a judgment and proceedings taken thereunder while she was insane. Upon a retrial of the cause the court found these facts to be as charged. The answer, however, had affirmatively pleaded that these plaintiffs had no interest in the property as heirs at law of Ann Gilfeather, deceased, for the reason that Ann Gilfeather had died testate, and by her will had specifically devised the property in question to two of her sons; that is to say, to her son Dennis one-half of the property, specifically devised by metes and bounds, and to her son Edward the other moiety. The court found in accordance with the allegations of the answer. It further found that while these two sons took as devisees under the will of their mother, the third plaintiff, James, was not interested in the property or in the subject-matter of the action at all. There thus resulted, at least so far as the plaintiff James is concerned, a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. The court therefrom concluded that all of the plaintiffs must fail in their action, and gave judgment accordingly in favor of defendant. This appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and it is contended that the court, under its findings of fact above adverted to, erred in the judgment which it gave.

The action is one, the bringing of which is authorized under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 381 of the same Code declares that any two or more persons claiming any estate or interest in land under a common source of title, whether holding as tenants in common, joint tenants, copartners, or in severalty, may unite in an action against any person claiming an adverse estate or interest therein, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, etc. The plaintiffs Dennis and Edward, claiming as devisees, the common source of title being the will of their deceased mother, and seeking to remove from their title the cloud of the fraudulent deed which affected the whole land, indubitably brought themselves within the provisions of section 381 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thus, in People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 336, it is held that parties who have a common interest in annulling a patent, although their interest in the land adverse to the patent is not joint, may join as plaintiffs in an action to procure its cancellation. This is well nigh parallel to the case at bar. While the parties hold their moieties in severalty, they are seeking the annulment of a deed which equally affects the lands of both. Our Code section in this regard embodies the rule governing the joinder of parties to an action as enunciated by Judge Story, who says: "The result of the principles to be extracted from the cases on this subject seems to be that where there is a common liability and a common interest, a common liability in the defendants and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims to property, at least if the subjects are such as may without inconvenience be joined, may be united in one and the same suit."

The plaintiffs, other than the brother James, were thus properly joined as plaintiffs in this action. The brother James, as has been stated, appears without any interest whatsoever in the controversy. What result should follow the determination of this fact? Section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure presents the complete answer to this question. It declares: "Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants, and it may, when the justice of the case requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side as between themselves." Under the way thus clearly pointed out, the judgment of the court as to James should have been his dismissal from the action, retaining the action as to the other plaintiffs and rendering judgment in their favor, such judgment as, under the findings which the court made, they were clearly entitled to.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, and a judgment in accordance with the foregoing entered; that is to say, as to the plaintiff James, a judgment dismissing him from the action, as to plaintiffs William Gillespie, representing Dennis Gilfeather and Edward Gilfeather, a judgment in their favor upon the findings made by the court.

It is ordered accordingly.

MUIR v. HAMILTON et al. (Sac. 1,246.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. MORTGAGES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION FOR DEBT SECURED—EFFECT.

A client, to secure his contingent liability to pay his attorney in the event he was successful in a suit, gave the attorney a note for the amount of compensation, and gave a deed of real estate to a third person as security therefor. The suit was lost, and the note and deed remained in the hands of the original parties. Held, that the client was entitled to a cancellation of a deed which was in effect a mortgage, because there was a total failure of consideration for the note.

2. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION OF NOTE.

As between the original parties to a note, failure of consideration thereof may be shown by parol.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; Albert G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by William Muir against George W. Hamilton and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Fulweller, Chas. Tuttle, L. L. Chamberlain, and Geo. W. Hamilton, for appellants. W. H. Slade, J. D. Meredith, and F. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought his action to quiet title to certain parcels of land situated in the county of Placer. The gravamen of the action rests upon the following facts, which plaintiff alleges, and which the court found upon ample testimony, to be true: In the year 1897 plaintiff was engaged, as plaintiff, in a certain litigation with F. P. Tuttle. He employed the defendants, father and son, who were attorneys at law, to prosecute on his behalf this litigation, under an agreement that the defendants were to devote their time and legal services to the prosecution of the action, and, in the event that its final determination should be in favor of plaintiff, defendants should receive as compensation for their services the sum of $5,500, of which sum the defendant George W. Hamilton was to receive $2,500, and the defendant Joe Hamilton was to receive $3,000. In the event, however, that the action was determined adversely to plaintiff, defendants were to receive no compensation whatever. For the purpose of securing this contingent obligation plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant Joe Hamilton his promissory note for $3,000, and to the defendant George W. Hamilton his promissory note for $2,500. Furthermore, for the sole purpose of securing the payment of this contingent fee, so evidenced by the promissory notes, plaintiff executed a deed of all the property here in controversy to defendant George W. Hamilton. At the time it was agreed that this deed should be deposited by way of escrow with the defendant Joe Hamilton, and the defendant Joe Hamilton would hold the same in escrow until the final determination of the action of Muir v. Tuttle. In the event that the action of Muir v. Tuttle was finally decided in favor of plaintiff, Joe Hamilton was to deliver the deed to the defendant George W. Hamilton, who, under these circumstances, would take the same as security for the contingent fees. But in the event that the action of Muir v. Tuttle was finally determined in favor of defendant, said Joe Hamilton agreed to redeliver to plaintiff the deed and the promissory notes. The action of Muir v. Tuttle resulted in a final judgment for defendant. The defendant George W. Hamilton delivered his promissory note for $2,500 to plaintiff, but the defendant Joe Hamilton failed, neglected, and refused to surrender his note for $3,000 with the other securities and documents. The defendant George W. Hamilton secured possession of the deed, and in violation of the agreements, caused it to be placed of record in the office of the recorder of the county of Placer.

These findings, which as we have said are amply supported by the evidence, are sufficient to uphold the conclusions of law to the effect that plaintiff was the absolute owner of the land, and was not indebted to the defendant Joe Hamilton in the sum of $3,000, or in any sum whatever, nor to George W. Hamilton in any sum whatever; that the consideration for which the notes were given had wholly failed, and that plaintiff was entitled to his decree quieting title to the land in the complaint described; as a part of the relief under which decree, it was ordered that the deed of plaintiff to Hamilton be declared void and canceled.

The trial court stated that the vital question in the case was whether the agreement of plaintiff was to pay an unconditional or contingent fee. This, appellants say in their brief, is an illustration and a demonstration that the court has confused the true issue, and that the true issue is, did the execution and unconditional delivery of the promissory notes create an obligation against the plaintiff, and has that obligation been discharged? Under the facts of this case, the note still being in the hands of the original payee, we think the distinction that counsel makes is rather of form than of substance. There was not an unconditional delivery of the promissory notes. However closely the lips of the plaintiff might have been sealed under the law governing negotiable paper, if his notes had passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser for value before maturity, as between the original parties to an instrument, nothing is better settled than that the maker may show an original lack of consideration, or subsequent failure of consideration, which latter was done in this case. And equally is it well settled that such lack or failure of consideration may be shown by parol. Billings v. Everett, 52 Cal. 661; Brady v. Henry, 71 Cal. 483, 11 Pac. 385, 12 Pac. 623, 60 Am. Rep. 543; Jefferson v. Hewitt, 103 Cal. 624, 37 Pac. 638; 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 186, 196.

The deed which plaintiff gave was, in effect, a mortgage, and was given as security for the payment of the promissory notes. The consideration for the notes having failed totally, it was plaintiff's right, as the court decreed, that the deed itself should be canceled and annulled.

The judgment and order appealed from are, therefore, affirmed.

A contract by which a water company agrees to furnish through its canal to the owner of certain land water to irrigate it, for a term of years, he to make certain yearly payments therefor, is not to be recorded in the book in which County Government Act, § 120, subd. 1 (St. 1897, p. 484, c. 277), provides that "deeds, grants, transfers and mortgages" of real estate shall be recorded; but the book provided by subdivision 12 for recording "such other writings as are required or permitted by law to be recorded," and in which it has been the custom to record water contracts and other agreements of like character, is the proper book in which to record it, so as to give constructive notice thereof.

2. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — RIGHTS OF SUBSEQUENT INCUMBRANCES.

If a mortgage given by a water company on its water system was such as to make it paramount to the rights of a landowner under the contract thereafter made with him by the company to furnish through its canal water to irrigate his land for a term of years, he to make certain yearly payments therefor, yet, he not having been made a party to the foreclosure, though his contract was recorded prior to commencement of the foreclosure suit, the purchaser under the foreclosure holds the canal system and the waters thereof subject to the rights of such landowner, at least till those rights are terminated by foreclosure proceedings to which he is a party.

3. SAME—PROPERTY PASSING—SUBSEQUENTLY ACQUIRED WATER RIGHTS.

Though a mortgage of land is made prior to the contract of the landowner with a water company, by which the company agrees to furnish through its canal to him, his heirs or assigns, water to irrigate the land for a term of years, he to make certain yearly payments therefor, the water right, when acquired, having become an easement appurtenant to the land, passed with it under the foreclosure of the mortgage.

4. WATERS—CONTRACT FOR IRRIGATION—NATURE OF PROPERTY RIGHT.

The right conferred on a landowner by his contract with a water company to have water flow from its canal, through a lateral ditch, to his land, for its irrigation, for a term of years, is a servitude on the ditch and canal, and an appurtenance to the land, and so is real property.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—INNOCENT PURCHASERS—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF WATER.

An agreement of a water company with the owner of land to furnish through its canal from a certain river to the landowner, his heirs or assigns, to irrigate the land, a flow of water sufficient to irrigate it each year for a certain number of years, the devices through which the water shall be drawn from the land to be constructed by the company and the landowner to pay a certain amount yearly therefor, the contract to have the force and effect of a covenant running to and with the land and the canal, is not a mere personal covenant of the company, but, while not a lien on the canal, is an agreement for sale of real property of the company, binding on the successor in title of the company's plant, taking with notice of the agreement.

6. WATERS—CONTRACT TO SELL FOR IRRIGATION—DEFINITENESS.

The agreement of a water company to sell water for a certain price for irrigation of certain land for a term of years is sufficiently certain, the water being described as water from a certain river, to be carried through the company's canal, and it being shown that it had but one canal leading from that river, though the lateral ditch was not described, except by the statement that the company was to deliver the water on the land by means of such head gates, weirs, and devices as it should construct for that purpose, a ditch through which water was conducted to the land having thereafter been constructed by the company, and the contract in this respect having thus been made definite.

7. SAME—IRRIGATION — CONTRACT RIGHTS — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. 1879, art. 14, declaring the use of waters appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution to be a public use subject to the regulation of the state as shall be prescribed by law, and that the right to collect compensation for water supplied to any county, city, or town, or the inhabitants thereof, cannot be exercised except by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law, does not prevent a landowner acquiring and attaching to his land a right to the permanent use of water; and, in the absence of exercise of the power, delegated by statute to county boards of supervisors, of control and regulation of waters outside of cities, the terms of a contract for furnishing water for irrigation, for a term of years, at a fixed yearly rental, remain in full force, and constitute the measure of the rights of the parties.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by the Stanislaus Water Company against S. Bachman. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Dorsey and W. E. Cashman (James F. Peck, of counsel), for appellant. W. F. Williamson, amicus curiæ. Vogelsang & Brown (Samuel C. Wiel, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover $920 alleged to be due for water sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant for the irrigation of 400 acres of land, or at the rate of $2.30 per acre. The defendant admitted the receipt and use of the water on the land, and offered to allow judgment in favor of plaintiff for $600, or at the rate of $1.50 per acre. The case depends on the question whether or not the plaintiff can charge more than $1.50 per acre per year for water for irrigation purposes. The court below held for the defendant, and gave judgment for plaintiff for $600, without costs. The claims of the defendant are founded upon an agreement between one Threlfall, his predecessor in the ownership of the 400 acres of land, and a corporation known as the "Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company," the predecessor of the plaintiff in the ownership of the water and water system in question. The said Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company was the owner of water rights in the Stanislaus river and a canal, whereby the water was conducted through Stanislaus county, and it was engaged in the business of distributing and selling the water to farmers for irrigation purposes. Threlfall was the owner of a large tract of land. The following is a statement of the parts of the agreement that are material to the case: The company agreed to "furnish through its canal from the Stanislaus river" to Threlfall, "his heirs or assigns, during each and every year, for the term hereinafter mentioned, for the purpose of irrigating a tract of four hundred and sixty-one acres of land, * * * a flow of water sufficient to fully irrigate said land as often as necessary during each year of said term." The land described consisted of 10 quarter sections, comprising about 1,600 acres, and the 461 acres was described as all those portions of the larger tract "lying north of Little Johns creek and south of Myrtle creek." The water was to be used for irrigating purposes only on said land, and was to be delivered by the company on the land in such manner as to make it available for use thereon. "The headgates, weirs, and other arrangements or devices through which the water shall be drawn from said canal" were to be made and placed in position by the company at its own expense, and it was to fix and control the manner of supplying the water. Threlfall agreed to pay the company "the sum of ten dollars per acre for each and every acre of said land" to which the company agreed to furnish water, with interest on such sum at 6 per cent. per annum, "principal and interest apportioned and commuted as follows: On the first day of November after the delivery of water under the contract * * * the sum of eighty cents for each and every acre of said land, and on the first day of November thereafter for the period of twenty years thereafter, a like sum, making in all twenty payments on each and every acre of said land aforesaid, which shall be in full payment of the amount provided to be paid herein," or Threlfall had the right at any time to "make a cash settlement in whole or in part of the amount unpaid, by paying the principal sum still unpaid and the interest accrued" to the time of settlement. Threlfall also agreed to pay, in addition to the above sums, the sum of $1.50 per acre per year upon each acre of the land, "as a water rental therefor," to be paid on November 1st of each year perpetually. The ninth clause of the agreement contained the following: "The said parties agree to and with each other that this contract shall have the force and effect of a covenant running to and with the said land of the party of the second part [Threlfall] and the canal of the party of the first part" (the company). The contract was executed on the 18th day of June, 1896. The land to be irrigated was situated some eight or ten miles from the canal mentioned in the agreement, or from the point thereon at which the water was to be diverted therefrom. Under a subsequent contract with the company, Threlfall constructed for the company a lateral ditch leading from the point of diversion in the canal to his lands and the company accepted this work as full payment of the $10 per acre agreed to be paid by Threlfall on the 400 acres of land for which it subsequently supplied water. This arrangement appears to have been understood as a release of both parties from the operation of the contract and the obligations thereof, with respect to the remaining 61 acres mentioned in the agreement. The company took possession of the lateral ditch, and thereafter used it to convey water from its main canal to the lands of Threlfall and other lands in the vicinity. The Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company had executed a mortgage on July 28, 1895, upon all of its property, including the said main canal, and all lateral ditches and appurtenances of every character connected therewith. This was prior to the contract with Threlfall, and before the construction of the lateral ditch leading to his land. This mortgage was foreclosed, and on December 17, 1898, the mortgaged property, including said lateral ditch, was sold at the foreclosure sale to J. Dalzell Brown, and the deed thereunder was afterward executed to the plaintiff, as his successor. Neither Threlfall, nor Bachman, the defendant, were parties to the foreclosure suit. In 1893 and 1894 Threlfall executed certain mortgages on his land, which were foreclosed in 1898, and Bachman obtained title to said land by deed under the foreclosure decree. Neither the Stanislaus and San Joaquin Water Company, nor the Stanislaus Water Company, were parties to that action of foreclosure. During the year 1900 Bachman was the owner of the 400 acres of land, and the plaintiff was the owner of the canal and water system. It regularly supplied water to Bachman for the irrigation of the 400 acres of land during that year. The court finds that the reasonable value of the water so supplied, independent of the terms of the contract, was $2.30 per acre, or $920 for the land supplied. This, it may be observed, was substantially the same as the value fixed in the contract, being equal to the $1.50 annual rental and the 80 cents for the annual payment agreed on. The foregoing are the principal facts upon which the rights of the parties depend.

1. The water right agreement between the Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company and Threlfall was on June 26, 1896, recorded by the recorder of Stanislaus county in a book kept by him in the recorder's office, and designated as "volume 8 of Miscellaneous Records." This is one of seven books of the same designation which are kept in the said office. Ever since the year 1854 it has been the custom in said county to record in these books so designated instruments filed for records of the classes known as agreements, mining locations, bills of sale, water rights, water contracts, certified copies of decrees confirming sale, articles of copartnership, assignments for benefit of creditors, assignments of sheriff's certificates of sale, bonds for deed and agreements for sale of real estate, and it does not appear that in that county any instrument of either of these classes has ever been recorded elsewhere than in said Miscellaneous Records. The substance of the agreement has been, in part, stated. There were other clauses further showing its complex character. The fifth provided that Threlfall might use water on only one-fourth of the land the first year, one-half the second year, three-fourths the third year, and thereafter on all the land, paying rent only on the part used. By the seventh clause Threlfall granted to the company a permanent right of way over any land he owned for the canal of the company, and Threlfall was granted the right to use water from such canal for domestic purposes and to water stock, and to plant trees by the canal. The eighth provided that if, from causes not within its control, the company was unable to furnish the water, it should not be liable for the failure, and Threlfall should pay rent only for what water he received. Neither party was to be liable until delivery of water began or was tendered. It is claimed by the plaintiff that in legal effect this contract was a grant of real property—that is, of a right to demand and receive water for the irrigation of land—and that it should have been recorded in the book of deeds, instead of in the miscellaneous records, and that under the rule announced in Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 Pac. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391, the record in the latter imparted no constructive notice of its contents to the plaintiff as a subsequent purchaser of the canal system and water rights of the Stanislaus and San Joaquin Water Company, and that, as it bought without actual notice thereof, it took the canal system and all the water rights free from the obligations, burdens, easements, or servitudes imposed by that contract. On the other hand, plaintiff says, if it is not such a grant, then it is a mere personal agreement to sell and deliver water from year to year, binding only on the parties, and the plaintiff is free to demand and receive for water it may sell and deliver its full reasonable value without regard to payments made by Threlfall, under the contract, to plaintiff's predecessor.

Section 120 of the county government act (St. 1897, p. 484, c. 277), as it stood at the time this agreement was recorded, provided that the recorder must "record separately, in large and well-bound separate books, in a fair hand: (1) Deeds, grants, transfers and mortgages of real estate, releases of mortgages, powers of attorney to convey real estate, and leases which have been acknowledged and approved. (2) Mortgages of personal property." Then follow 10 additional designated classes of instruments, the section closing with class "12. Such other writings as are required or permitted by law to be recorded." The instrument in question does not come within either of the classes designated as "deeds, grants and transfers of real estate." No lawyer would call it a deed or a grant. No part of it is in the form usually adopted for such instruments. With respect to the rights secured to Threlfall under the agreement, it would not, in the ordinary use of language, be called a transfer of real estate. It is an executory agreement to sell and deliver, or, to use its words, "to furnish," water to Threlfall from year to year for the irrigation of his land. Such an agreement confers a right to receive water upon the terms agreed on, and this is no doubt a right in real property, as will hereinafter appear, but it does not necessarily follow that the instrument by which it is conferred constitutes a present grant or transfer. Any agreement to sell or convey real estate gives the vendee a right which is an interest in real property, but such instruments are not grants or transfers, and no one would expect to find them recorded in a book set apart for deeds, grants, and transfers. It is a matter of common knowledge that such instruments are usually recorded in a book designated as a "Miscellaneous Record." The evidence shows that it has been the custom in Stanislaus county, ever since its organization in 1854, to record water contracts and other agreements of like character to that in question here in the books of Miscellaneous Records. We think it has always been the custom throughout the state to so record them. It must be admitted that a document so composite in its elements is better described as an instrument of miscellaneous character than as a grant or transfer of real estate, and that one would naturally look for it in the Miscellaneous Records. We think that record was the proper one in which to record it. We do not mean to imply by this that the record of such an instrument might not be effective for some purposes, if made in some other book. Courts should not be technical in such a matter where the instrument in question is so complex and difficult to classify as the one in question. The rights of parties under the recording act should not depend on the ability to properly determine the character of such an instrument. The mortgage of the water system of the Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company, by foreclosure whereof the plaintiff obtained title thereto, is not set forth in the record, and hence we cannot determine whether or not it was contemplated that that company, as a going concern, was thereby authorized to make contracts, such as that with Threlfall, whereby it might obtain funds to pay the principal and interest of the mortgage, and by which the mortgagee would be bound. But, if that mortgage was paramount to Threlfall's rights, it could not be enforced against him without a foreclosure to which he was a party, if suit was begun, as is conceded here, after his contract was recorded. He was not made a party thereto, and the consequence is that the plaintiff holds the canal system and the waters thereof subject to the rights of Threlfall and his successors in interest, at least until those rights have been terminated by foreclosure proceedings to which he, or they, are parties.

2. The rights of Bachman under the agreement are the same as those of Threlfall. It is immaterial that the mortgages of Threlfall's land, under which Bachman acquired title, were executed before Threlfall obtained the water right. The water right, when acquired, became an easement appurtenant to the land (Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. 13) and passed with it, upon the foreclosure sale in the same manner as any other appurtenance or fixture passes with the title and possession of land (Civ. Code, §§ 1084, 1104; Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 140; Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., supra; Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 221, 10 Pac. 409, 58 Am. Rep. 558; Smith v. Corbit, 116 Cal. 591, 48 Pac. 725). It was an incident of the land, and would pass as such by a conveyance of the land, without express mention and without any reference thereto, such as by the use of the word "appurtenances" or otherwise. A conveyance of land upon a foreclosure sale must of necessity, at least as between the parties to the mortgage, carry with it a water right appurtenant to the land acquired and used by the mortgagor for the benefit of the land, although obtained after the execution of the mortgage and before the sale on foreclosure. We are cited to no authority for or against this proposition, and have not succeeded in finding any relating to it, but from the nature of the case it must be correct. Fixtures subsequently attached to mortgaged land pass to the purchaser at foreclosure sale, although not mentioned or referred to in the mortgage. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 72; 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 1857; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 255. The same rule applies to improvements made by the mortgagor on mortgaged land. 1 Jones on Mortgages, §§ 147, 681; Union Water Co. v. Murphy's Flat Co., 22 Cal. 631; Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. 215. We are unable to perceive any material difference in principle, in this respect, between fixtures and improvements attached to or erected upon land and a water right attached to land as an appurtenance, such as that here involved, and we hold that it is governed by the same rules. This principle probably applies also to the right of the Stanislaus Water Company to the lateral ditch built for the Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company from the main canal to Threlfall's land. It was used in connection with the canal for its benefit, and it was therefore an appurtenance to the canal. Although not in existence at the time the canal and water system was mortgaged, it became a part of the system as soon as it was constructed. It is not necessary to this case to determine whether or not it passed to the plaintiff by the foreclosure sale under the prior mortgage. The two interested parties appear to have assumed that it did. It was included in the foreclosure sale and in the deed to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took possession of it accordingly and used it to carry to the plaintiff's land the water for the rental of which it here claims compensation. Under these circumstances, it is immaterial, in this action, how it acquired title to the lateral.

3. We have assumed that the right conferred on Threlfall by the agreement with the canal company was real property. This is controverted by plaintiff, and its argument is, for the most part, founded on the assumption that it was either personality, or that the agreement constituted nothing more than a personal covenant of that company which does not bind the plaintiff, as its successor. We think neither of these propositions is correct. That water in its natural situation upon the surface of the earth, whether as a flowing stream, as a lake or pond, or as percolations in the soil, is real property will not be disputed. That it may become personality by being severed from the land and confined in portable receptacles is also evident. There is a remark in the opinion of Field, J., in Heyneman v. Blake, 19 Cal. 595, which has apparently given rise to the notion that when water is confined in artificial channels it thereupon becomes personal property. The learned jurist there says: "Water when collected in reservoirs or pipes and thus separated from the original source of supply is personal property, and is as much the subject of sale—an article of commerce—as ordinary goods and merchandise." The law then authorized the formation of corporations to engage in "any species of trade or commerce." The corporation in question was organized to engage in the business of distributing and selling water to the inhabitants of a city for their use. The question under discussion was the authority to organize such a corporation under that law. The language quoted from the opinion is apt for the disposition of the question to which it was addressed, but it is by no means tantamount to a decision that water becomes personality as soon as it is diverted from its natural channel or situation. No such question was involved in that case. The earth is composed of land and water and the water is not different in this respect from other material substances composing a part of the earth. Trees when felled and cut into logs and lumber; coal, iron, gold, and silver when taken from the mine; rocks when quarried from their bed; oil when pumped from its depths; clay when burned into bricks or converted into cement—all are real property before the change, but upon severance forthwith become personality. The business of collecting water in reservoirs, conducting it in pipes to houses of a city, and there selling and delivering it to the occupants of such houses, is a process of severing the water from its connection with the earth and changing it into personal property. The person engaged therein is as much engaged in trade and commerce as is the miner, the oil producer, the brickmaker, or the cement manufacturer who sells his product. But the substances in which these persons deal do not become personality until the severance is complete. The right to the water in the pipes and the pipes themselves, usually constitute an appurtenance to real property in such cases, and, if so, the water usually retains its character as realty until severance is completed by its delivery from the pipes to the consumer. The right in water which has been diverted into ditches or other artificial conduits, for the purpose of conducting it to land for irrigation, has been uniformly classed as real property in this state. "The right to water must be treated in this state as it has always been treated, as a right running with the land and as a corporeal privilege bestowed upon the occupier or appropriator of the soil; and as such, has none of the characteristics of mere personality." Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 448, 63 Am. Dec. 140. The right to have water flow from a river into a ditch is real property; and so also is the water while flowing in the ditch. Lower K. R. W. D. Co. v. K. R. & F. O. Co., 60 Cal. 410. A wrongful diversion of water flowing in a ditch is an injury to real property. Last Chance, etc., Co. v. Emigrant D. Co., 129 Cal. 278, 61 Pac. 960. The right to take water from a river and conduct it to a tract of land is realty. South Tule, etc., Co. v. King, 144 Cal. 454, 77 Pac. 1032. The right to have water flow through a pipe from a reservoir to and upon a tract of land is an appurtenance to the land. Standart v. Round Valley Co., 77 Cal. 403, 19 Pac. 689. An undivided interest in a ditch and in the water flowing therein is real property. Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 398, 27 Pac. 772. A ditch for carrying water is real estate. Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 376; Bradley v. Harkness, 26 Cal. 77. And, where one person has water flowing in a ditch and another has the right to have a part of such water flow from the ditch to his land for its irrigation, the right of the latter is a servitude upon the ditch, and is real property. Dorris v. Sullivan, 90 Cal. 286, 27 Pac. 216. So, in the case at bar, the right of Threlfall and his successor, Bachman, under the agreement, to have the water flow from the plaintiff's canal through the lateral ditch, to the land, for its irrigation, is a servitude upon the ditch and upon the canal, is an appurtenance to the land, and is real property.

4. We think it is also clear that the effect of the agreement was to confer upon Threlfall a right to such portion of the water flowing from the Stanislaus river through the canal of the company as should be required for the full irrigation of the land, and to have the canal and ditch used for the purpose of conducting the same to the land, and that it is more than a mere personal covenant on the part of the company.

The agreement declares, in effect, that the obligations thereby imposed on the company shall have the force and effect of a covenant running with its canal. Covenants running with real property bind the assigns of the covenantor in the same manner as if they had personally entered into them. Civ. Code, § 1460. A lien is a charge imposed upon specific property by which it is made security for the performance of some act. Civ. Code, § 2872. If it had been provided that the agreement to furnish the water should bind the canal of the company, there would have been created thereby a lien on the canal for the performance of the act of furnishing the water as agreed. Fresno Canal Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. 53, 3 Am. St. Rep. 112; Fresno Canal Co. v. Dunbar, 80 Cal. 530, 22 Pac. 275. By declaring that it should have the effect of a covenant running with the land of one party and with the canal of the other, the parties adopted the technical definition of such covenants to express their intention, and, in effect, declared, in the words of the Civil Code, § 1460, that the rights under the agreement should be "appurtenant to such estates, and pass with them, so as to bind the assigns of the covenantor, and to vest in the assigns of the covenantee in the same manner as if they had personally entered into them." This is not a declaration that it should bind the canal. Hence it does not come within the rule of the cases above cited, and it created no lien on the canal. But the agreement is, in legal effect, an agreement to sell a right or interest in real property. Water, flowing in a canal or artificial conduit, and delivered therefrom upon land, for the irrigation of that land, does not change its character from realty to personality. It remains real property throughout the process, and until it serves its purpose by being absorbed into the land which it moistens. Hence, the agreement to furnish the necessary water from the canal from year to year, during the times specified, and to deliver it upon the Threlfall lands for the irrigation thereof, for an agreed price, was in substance and effect an agreement for the sale of real property of the canal company. Such an agreement, with all its terms, is binding, not only upon the maker, but upon all persons who subsequently acquire the maker's title to the property agreed to be sold, with notice of the agreement. The plaintiff, as we have seen, bought with notice, and it is therefore as much bound to comply with this part of the agreement according to its terms as if it had executed the same.

The agreement is sufficiently certain in all its particulars. The water to be furnished and sold was identified by describing it as water from the Stanislaus river to be carried through the canal of the company. It was shown by the evidence that the company had but one canal leading from that river. The lateral was not described, except by the statement that the company was to deliver the water on the land by means of such head gates, weirs, and devices as it should construct for that purpose. This left the company at liberty to choose the location and size of the ditch, provided it was so located and was of sufficient size to comply with the terms of the agreement. The uncertainty in this respect did not render the agreement invalid. It was made certain when the ditch was constructed. Winslow v. Vallejo, 148 Cal. 725, 84 Pac. 191, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, 113 Am. St. Rep. 349. Thus the subject of the agreement, the means by which it was to be performed, and the price to be paid, were sufficiently identified and described. As the Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company had already received part of the agreed price, neither it nor its successor, the plaintiff, was entitled to claim more than the balance of $1.50 per acre for each year, as provided in the agreement.

5. The appellant suggests that under the provisions of article 14 of the Constitution, adopted in 1879, the use of water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is a public use, the regulation and control of which, including the right to collect compensation for such use, is vested in the state, and that, by reason of these provisions, the making of a contract whereby one citizen is given the exclusive right to a part of such water, or by which it is set apart to a particular tract of land, at a rate fixed in the agreement, would destroy the control of the state and convert the public use into private property. If the water right of the Stanislaus & San Joaquin Water Company was in private ownership and use at the time the Constitution of 1879 was adopted, we do not see how it could become dedicated to public use by the adoption of the Constitution, or at all, except by consent express or implied of its owners. The record does not show whether it was acquired before or after that date. But, if it is conceded that the water right has become subject to public use in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution, we do not think that any violation of the Constitution appears. The constitutional provision was not intended to prevent a landowner from acquiring and attaching to his land, a right to the permanent use of water for its irrigation. If the right to the use of water for that purpose cannot be made permanent, but is subject to change or termination at the hands of the public authorities under the guise of regulation and control, then such use would be of little value. Water for irrigation is not ordinarily used for annual crops for which the place of use can be changed from year to year, perhaps without serious injury, but for trees, vines, and alfalfa, which must be given water each year for a series of years to be successfully grown at all. To make land valuable for such use, it must have the right to a permanent and continuous use of water. The constitutional provision was not intended to prevent this. The purpose was to foster and encourage such industries, rather than to hamper and obstruct them by destructive limitations upon the right of acquiring private property. Permanent rights to the use of water for irrigation may still be obtained by contract, notwithstanding the provisions of the Constitution, subject only to the condition that the state may, if it chooses to do so, regulate and control the use. This question was fully considered and decided in Fresno C. & I. Co. v. Park, 129 Cal. 443, 62 Pac. 87, and we refer to that case for a full discussion of the subject. How far the state can go in the regulation and control of the use when thus secured by private contract it is not necessary here to decide. The Legislature had delegated the power or control and regulation of waters outside of cities to the boards of supervisors of the respective counties. St. 1885, p. 95, c. 115; St. 1897, p. 49, c. 54; St. 1901, p. 80, c. 62. It does not appear that there has been any attempt to regulate or control the use of water in Stanislaus county, and consequently the terms of the contract remain in full force and constitute the measure of the rights of the parties. Fresno C. & I. Co. v. Park, supra. And under the present statute the contract rights prevail in all cases; the boards of supervisors being powerless to affect or interfere with them. St. 1897, p. 49, c. 54.

There are no other questions demanding notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. LICENSES—FAILURE TO OBTAIN—EFFECT OF ORDINANCE.

A city or town ordinance is a "law of this state," within Pen. Code, § 435, prescribing a penalty for conducting business, etc., for which a license is required by any "law of this state," without procuring such license, and one who disobeys such an ordinance, not only violates it, but the state law.

2. SAME—PROSECUTION—JURISDICTION.

Mun. Corp. Act, § 882 (St. 1905, p. 73, c. 76), gives the recorder's court in certain towns concurrent jurisdiction with justices' courts of actions, etc., arising within the corporate limits, and exclusive jurisdiction of all prosecutions for violating ordinances of the towns. Pen. Code, § 435, makes it a misdemeanor to conduct any business, etc., without a license required by law. Section 19 provides that where no different punishment is prescribed the penalty for a misdemeanor shall be within certain limits. Section 1425 gives justices of the peace jurisdiction of misdemeanors where the punishment is within that prescribed by section 19. Held, that a justice of the peace has jurisdiction of a prosecution for violating Pen. Code, § 435, by conducting business without a license in violation of a town ordinance, it being one of the cases in which such section 882 gives exclusive jurisdiction to the recorder's and the justices' courts; the clause of such section conferring exclusive jurisdiction upon recorder's courts not being intended to deprive the justices' court of jurisdiction of any offense under the general state law.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

A judgment is not void for failure to sufficiently show the offense of which one was convicted, where the record includes a complaint specifically charging an offense under Pen. Code, § 435, making it a misdemeanor to conduct business without a license required by law, and the judgment refers to such complaint and imposes a penalty properly imposed upon a conviction of such offense.

In Bank. Application by Thomas H. Bagshaw for a writ of habeas corpus directed to W. P. Taylor, sheriff. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

O. F. Meldon, for petitioner. Thomas P. Boyd, for respondent.

ANGELLIOTTI, J. Petitioner seeks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of the county of Marin, by whom he is held under a commitment issued by the justice's court of Sausalito township of said county, based upon a judgment given in said court upon a conviction therein of the crime of carrying on the business of selling liquor in the town of Mill Valley, a municipal corporation of the sixth class in said county, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed therefor by an ordinance of said town.

The principal contention of petitioner is that said justice's court was without jurisdiction to entertain or try said case. The municipal corporation act provides that in municipal corporations of the sixth class there shall be a recorder's court, which shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the justice's court of all actions and proceedings, civil and criminal, arising within the corporate limits of the city or town, and "exclusive jurisdiction of all actions for the recovery of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture prescribed for the breach of any ordinance of such city or town, of all actions founded upon any obligation created by any ordinance, and of all prosecutions for any violation of any ordinance." Section 882 (St. 1905, p. 73, c. 74.) (The italics are ours.) The claim is that this provision confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the recorder's court of a prosecution for the carrying on of a business within the limits of a town, without taking out the license prescribed therefor by an ordinance of the town. Section 435 of the Penal Code, however, provides: "Every person who commences or carries on any business, trade, profession, or calling, for the transaction or carrying on of which a license is required by any law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." It has been expressly held by this court that a county or city and county ordinance is a "law of this state" within the meaning of this section. In re Lawrence, 69 Cal. 608, 611, 11 Pac. 217; Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 210, 24 Pac. 747; Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 Pac. 86. There is no distinction material here between a county ordinance and a city or town ordinance. The latter is as much a "law of this state" within the meaning of such section as is a county or city and county ordinance, and it has so been held by the District Court of Appeal for the First district. Ex parte Sweetman, 4 Cal. App. 601, 90 Pac. 1069. It appears to us to necessarily follow that the prosecution here must be held to be not for a violation of the ordinance of the town of Mill Valley, but for the commission of a crime created by a general law of the state—section 435 of the Penal Code. It is true that it is one of the essentials of such a crime that there should be an ordinance of the town prescribing a license, but this does not affect the question. The Legislature of the state has seen fit to make it a crime under the state law for any one to carry on a business for which a license is required by any law or ordinance, without procuring such license, and one who does so, not only disobeys the ordinance, but also violates the state law, and is guilty of a crime by reason of the express provision of such law. The misdemeanor created by section 435 of the Penal Code is precisely like any other misdemeanor created by the Penal Code, and punishable as it is by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months or by fine not exceeding $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment (section 19, Pen. Code), is within the jurisdiction of any justice's court of the county in which it is committed. Section 1425, Pen. Code. It is one of the cases in which, by section 882 of the municipal corporation act, the recorder's court of the city or town in which the offense is committed is given jurisdiction "concurrent with the justice's courts." It was not intended by that portion of section 882 which confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the recorder's court in certain classes of cases to deprive the justice's court of jurisdiction of any offense under the general state law. As to all such cases, the jurisdiction in the recorder's court is simply one concurrent with the justice's courts. The prosecutions for violations of ordinances declared to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of such recorder's court are prosecutions for acts which are crimes solely by reason of the fact that they are made crimes by ordinance, supplemented by the provisions of the municipal corporation act. That act makes the violation of any ordinance of the city or town a misdemeanor (section 867, Municipal Corporation Act, St. 1883, p. 272, c. 49), and if it were not for section 435 of the Penal Code, it may be that a prosecution for doing business without procuring the license required by the town ordinance would be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the recorder's court. But such act being also a crime under the general state law, a prosecution therefor will lie in the state courts.

The judgment is not void for failure to sufficiently show the offense of which petitioner was convicted. The record before us, which includes the complaint specifically charging an offense under section 435 of the Penal Code, and to which complaint the judgment in terms referred, sufficiently shows the judgment to have been based upon a conviction of the offense so charged, and the penalty imposed was expressed in certain and definite terms, and was one within the power of the court to impose upon a conviction of such offense.

The writ must be discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Marin county, and it is so ordered.

MERCED BANK v. PRICE et al. (S. F. 4,796.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. APPEAL.—PROCEEDINGS NOT IN RECORD—AMENDMENT OF RECORD—AMENDMENT AFTER CERTIFICATION.

On an appeal from an order denying a new trial, where the bill of exceptions on the motion was certified and filed before the motion was made, it may not be amended by inserting therein specifications of error authenticated by the trial judge as having been settled and allowed as a part of the engrossed bill of exceptions and believed by him to have been included therein, but inadvertently omitted therefrom, since the appeal from the order denying a new trial must be heard upon the same record upon which the motion for a new trial was heard and determined.

2. SAME.—TIME OF AMENDMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, allowing amendments to pleadings and proceedings on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, etc., if made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after the judgment or proceeding is taken, a bill of exceptions on motion for new trial may not be amended more than six months after it was certified and filed by inserting therein specifications of error authenticated by the trial judge as having been settled and allowed, but inadvertently omitted from the engrossed bill, and the order of the trial court allowing such amendment is void.

In Bank. Action by the Merced Bank, a corporation, against James D. Price and others. On a motion by defendants for an order to amend the record. Motion denied.

G. G. Goucher, W. H. Larew, and J. S. Larew, for appellants. J. W. Knox, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion for an order permitting appellants to file, as a part of the transcript and record on appeal herein, certain specifications of the particulars in which it is claimed that the findings of the trial court are not sustained by the evidence, and certain specifications of errors of law, which were not included in the engrossed bill of exceptions as certified by the trial judge. It is made to appear by an order of the trial judge, based on the motion of appellants, that such specifications were in fact allowed and settled by the judge as a part of the bill of exceptions, and were intended and believed by him to be included in and to constitute a part of the engrossed bill signed and certified by him, but that they were by accident and inadvertence omitted from such engrossed bill. The appeal before us is one from an order denying appellants' motion for a new trial. The bill of exceptions was ordered settled on September 21, 1906, and the engrossed bill of exceptions was signed and certified by the judge on November 3, 1906, and filed as a record of the court. The order denying the motion for a new trial was made on January 4, 1907, and the appeal from such order to this court was perfected on March 1, 1907. No proceeding was instituted in the superior court for the correction or amendment of said engrossed bill by inserting said specifications until more than six months had elapsed from the date of certification thereof by the judge. On May 14, 1907, eleven days after the expiration of such six months, appellants gave notice of a motion, to be made May 27, 1907, for an order authenticating said specifications as the specifications allowed and settled by the court as a part of the bill of exceptions on the 21st day of September, 1906, and as intended and believed by the court to be included in and to constitute a part of the engrossed bill signed on November 3, 1906, and the court, after hearing said motion, made the order asked on June 10, 1907. A certified copy of such order, attached to a certified copy of such specifications, has been produced in this court.

1. In our judgment at least two of the objections made to the granting of the motion are good. The proceeding instituted by the motion for authentication, etc., in the trial court was one for the amendment of the record of that court upon which the motion for a new trial had been heard and determined. It is immaterial in this connection that the proposed amendments merely included matters that had in fact been allowed by the judge, and thus ordered included in the bill to be subsequently signed by him. Whether or not a bill of exceptions has been correctly engrossed so as to embody all that the judge at the time of actual settlement ordered incorporated in it is a matter to be determined by the judge at the time the engrossed bill is presented for certification (Ryer v. Rio Land, etc., Co., 147 Cal. 465, 82 Pac. 62), and his certification of the same is a determination that it is so correctly engrossed. The bill when certified by the judge is filed with the clerk (section 650, Code Civ. Proc.), and as so certified becomes the record of the court, and the only record in the matter. The motion for a new trial, so far as it is based on a bill of exceptions at all, is based and must be heard and determined on the bill of exceptions as so certified and filed, or as previously corrected under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is settled that an appeal from an order denying a new trial deprives the superior court of jurisdiction to set aside such order; that, while that order is in force, the record upon which it is based cannot be changed; and that this court must review the order upon the same record upon which it was made. See Baker v. Borello, 131 Cal. 617, 63 Pac. 914. A different rule applies where the bill of exceptions is to be used on an appeal from a decision made before the bill of exceptions was settled; the effect of an amendment in such a case being simply to enable this court to review the decision of the lower court in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made its decision. This is shown by In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 408, 30 Pac. 568, an appeal from an order setting apart a homestead, where, after appeal taken, the judge of the superior court allowed the bill settled after the making of the order, to be amended by the insertion of specifications of insufficiency of evidence. It is possible that in the case at bar, if it could be made to appear that the motion for a new trial was heard and determined upon the theory that said specifications were in fact a part of the certified bill, a different rule might obtain. It is, however, unnecessary to determine this question for two reasons: First, the record does not so show; and, second, the motion here made must also be denied upon a second ground, which we will now proceed to discuss.

2. It has already been noted that no application for any amendment was made within six months after the certification of the engrossed bill by the judge. As we have seen, the certification was an adjudication by the judge that all the matters ordered incorporated in the bill had been set forth therein, and that the bill so certified constituted the bill of exceptions as ordered settled by him. It constituted a "proceeding" taken against appellants within the meaning of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, through the mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of appellants. It is settled that, under the procedure in this state, the power of the court to amend its record in matters of this character, and thus to relieve a party from the effect of a mistake, etc., therein, is derived from and limited by the terms of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, allowing amendments to pleadings or proceedings on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. See Fountain Water Co. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 648, 73 Pac. 590, and cases there cited. It was held in the case just cited that, when a statement on motion for new trial is settled and filed, it becomes a record of the court, and is only subject to the action of that tribunal within the time limited by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that section authorizing relief to be granted a party only when application is made therefor within six months from the time the judgment, order, or proceeding against him is taken, an application for amendment made more than six months from the date of certification is too late, and a court is without power to grant the relief. This conclusion was in line with several prior decisions of this court, and we find nothing in conflict therewith. The well-settled rule that a court has the power to correct its records at any time, so as to make them truly show a judgment or order actually made, where such judgment or order has been incorrectly entered or recorded by reason of mistake of a ministerial officer making the entry, such as the clerk of the court, has no application here. It follows from what we have said that the order of the superior court allowing the amendment is void, and that the specifications sought to be filed cannot be considered as a part of the bill of exceptions on this appeal.

The motion must be denied; and it is so ordered.

FERGUSON et al. v. BASIN CONSOL. MINES. (Sac. 1,461.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE — STATEMENTS OF AGENT — AUTHORITY.

Statements and admissions by the superintendent of defendant's mine, supporting plaintiff's contention as to the location of a boundary line in controversy, were inadmissible to bind defendant, in the absence of proof that the superintendent was authorized to make them apart from the fact that he was in charge of defendant's property, and this, though the witness asserted an interest in the adjoining mine claimed by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 893-907.]

2. SAME — ADMISSIONS AGAINST INTEREST — PREDECESSOR IN TITLE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1849, providing that, where one derives title to real property from another, the declaration, act, or omission of the latter while holding the title in relation to the property is evidence against the former, declarations made by a grantor after having parted with his title are inadmissible against the grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 340-351, 1128.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

The erroneous admission of declarations of defendant's agent not within the scope of his authority directly supporting plaintiff's contention was prejudicial to defendant and ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4153-4186.]

4. EVIDENCE — RECORDS — JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—DOCKET ENTRIES.

Since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 911, specifying the matters required to be entered in a justice docket, the justice is not required to enter the fact of the service of the summons, a docket entry showing the mode of service was not prima facie evidence of the facts stated, under section 912, declaring that the entries required to be made in a justice's docket are prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 462.]

5. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION — PRESUMPTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Since the law presumes nothing in favor of a justice's jurisdiction, the burden is on the party claiming under a justice's judgment to show affirmatively that the justice had jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 216.]

6. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In order to show that a justice had jurisdiction to render the judgment relied on, it is necessary to show that the summons had been issued and served as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 216.]

7. SAME—PROCESS—SERVICE OUTSIDE COUNTY—CERTIFICATE OF COUNTY CLERK.

Where a justice's judgment was based on a summons served outside the county, the burden was on a party claiming under such judgment to prove that there was attached to the summons a certificate of the county clerk that the person issuing the summons was at that date an acting justice of the peace, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 849.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 216.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Thomas Ferguson and others against the Basin Consolidated Mines. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

Myrick & Deering and F. P. Tuttle (Henry G. Tardy and T. W. Hubbard, of counsel), for appellant. L. L. Chamberlain and John M. Fulweiler, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs, claiming to be the owners and entitled to the possession of an undivided three-fourths of a placer mining claim in Placer county, brought this action to recover damages from the defendant, which, it is alleged, unlawfully entered upon plaintiffs' ground, and took therefrom gold-bearing earth and gravel of the value of $5,000. The complaint asks judgment for $3,750, three-fourths of the value of the earth and gravel so taken. The cause was tried without a jury, and the court, finding in favor of the plaintiffs' ownership as alleged, and that the defendant had entered and taken away earth and gravel of the value of $3,573.83, gave plaintiffs judgment for $2,679.77. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. The property claimed by plaintiffs is known as the "Harkness claim." The defendant was in possession of ground lying to the north of the Harkness claim. Certain ground had been worked by the defendant, and the dispute between the parties was whether this ground lay north or south of the northerly boundary line of the Harkness claim. The contention of the plaintiffs was that their northerly boundary line ran north of the ground worked by the defendant, and that this ground was therefore included within their claim. The plaintiffs, after showing that one Whitney was superintendent of defendant's mine, were allowed to show, over proper objection by the defendant, that Whitney had made statements and admissions tending to support plaintiffs' contention as to the location of the boundary line. This was error. There was no showing of the extent of Whitney's authority beyond the fact that he was in charge of the defendant's property. An agent cannot bind his principal by declarations against the principal's interest, unless the making of such declarations is within the scope of the agent's authority. As superintendent in charge of a mine, Whitney had no authority to make any statements regarding the extent of the ground claimed or owned by his principal, and any such statements, if made by him, were not binding upon the appellant. Walrath v. Champion Mining Co., 171 U. S. 293, 18 Sup. Ct. 909, 43 L. Ed. 170; Hartford Iron M. Co. v. Cambria M. Co., 80 Mich. 491, 45 N. W. 351. See O'Hara v. O'Brien, 107 Cal. 309, 40 Pac. 423. The question is not affected by the fact that Whitney asserted an interest in the Harkness mine, which was claimed not by his employer but by the plaintiffs. Such interest was, in relation to the present controversy, adverse to defendant, and certainly could not authorize Whitney to bind his employer by declarations in his own favor and against the interest of the appellant. Nor are the statements of Whitney rendered admissible by reason of evidence that the defendant had acquired its title by conveyance from him. To be admissible against his grantee, the declarations of a predecessor in interest must have been made by him while holding the title (Code Civ. Proc. § 1849), and here the declarations of Whitney appear to have been made after his conveyance. Since these declarations went to support the contention of the respondent upon the very point in controversy—i. e., whether the ground worked by the appellant was located within its claim or within that of the respondents—it is clear that the admission of this testimony was prejudicial to the appellant, and that the error so committed necessitates a new trial.

2. In view of the necessity for another trial, a point discussed by counsel may be briefly referred to. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to show that in 1894 the title to the Harkness claim was in Harkness Gold Mining Company, a corporation. To derange their title, the plaintiffs relied upon an execution sale following a judgment in the justice court of township No. 6 of Placer county against Harkness Gold Mining Company. The sale was to Spencer and Seller, who conveyed to one Cusick, under whom the plaintiffs claim. It is urged by appellant that the court erred in admitting in evidence the certificate of sale and the deed issued by the constable to Spencer and Seller pursuant to the execution sale, for the reason that the plaintiffs had failed to show that the justice court had acquired jurisdiction to render the judgment upon which the execution was based. It appears that all of the original papers in that action had been lost or destroyed. Plaintiffs offered in evidence the entries in the justice's docket, which were, as the court stated, "admitted only for the purpose of showing those matters that may lawfully be entered in the justice's docket." The entry with reference to return of summons reads as follows: "1894, June 15. Summons returned as served in San Francisco, California, on the seventh day of June, 1894, by J. J. McDade, Sheriff of San Francisco Co., California, by J. J. Tiernan, Deputy Sheriff, on W. S. Chapman, President of the Harkness Gold Mining Co., the defendant therein named, by delivering to him personally, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, a copy of said summons attached to a copy of the complaint in said action." No appearance having been made, judgment by default was rendered on the 28th day of June, 1894.

The entries required to be made in a justice's docket are prima facie evidence of the facts stated. Code Civ. Proc. § 912. But the fact of the service of summons is not one of the matters required to be so entered (Code Civ. Proc. § 911), and the entry above quoted is therefore no evidence that the justice ever acquired jurisdiction to render the judgment upon which the execution was issued. Fisk v. Mitchell, 124 Cal. 359, 57 Pac. 149. The burden was upon plaintiffs, claiming under the judgment, to show that the justice had acquired jurisdiction. "The jurisdiction of justices' courts being special and limited, the law presumes nothing in favor of their jurisdiction, and a party who asserts a right under a judgment rendered in such court must show affirmatively every fact necessary to confer such jurisdiction." Rowley v. Howard, 23 Cal. 401; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 296; Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321; Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464. It was necessary, therefore, for the plaintiffs, who were founding their claim of title upon this judgment, to show affirmatively that the court had acquired jurisdiction to render the judgment. To do this it was necessary to show that the summons had been issued and served as required by law; and, if the summons was served outside of the county in which it was issued, it was necessary to show that there was attached to the summons the certificate of the county clerk that the person issuing the summons was, at its date, an acting justice of the peace. Code Civ. Proc. § 849. Without such certificate no valid service out of the county could be made. Since in this case the only service attempted to be shown was one out of the county, the plaintiffs, in order to sustain the burden imposed upon them of proving every fact necessary to confer jurisdiction, were bound to show that such certificate had been attached to the summons. It is argued that the testimony of Mr. Lardner, who had been the attorney for the plaintiffs in the action in the justice's court, is sufficient to show that the summons as served complied with this requirement of the law. It is further contended by the respondents that even if this proof was not made, the appellant did not make a sufficiently specific objection to the admission in evidence of the certificate of sale and the execution deed based upon the judgment in question. Neither of these propositions need be discussed, since they are not likely to arise upon a new trial. What has been said on the subject is mentioned merely for the purpose of indicating to counsel that upon such new trial the plaintiffs, if they rely upon a judgment of the justice's court, must, as a part of their case, show that that court acquired jurisdiction over the defendant in the action.

It is unnecessary to consider the other points made.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES FARMING & MILLING CO. (L. A. 1,952)*

1. TRIAL—TRIAL BY COURT—SUBMISSION ON STIPULATED FACTS—EFFECT OF FINDINGS BY COURT.

Where a case is submitted on a stipulated statement of facts, findings by the court are unnecessary, but, where they do not materially change the facts as stipulated, they are not reversible error.

2. PUBLIC LANDS—SETTLEMENT OF MEXICAN GRANTS—PROCEEDINGS—SCOPE AND EFFECT—WATER RIGHTS.

Act Cong. March 3, 1851, c. 41, § 9 Stat. 631, to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, was intended to segregate private from public land, and did not contemplate presentation of claims to anything but "land"; and hence, where a city filed a petition with the board of land commissioners for an adjudication of its claim to lands, founded upon a grant to its predecessor, it was not necessary to present therein its claim to water rights pertaining thereto, and its claim to the water rights of its predecessor was not adversely adjudicated by a decision that it was not entitled to all the land claimed.

3. SAME — EXTENT OF PATENTEE'S RIGHT — "LAND."

The word "land," as a conveyance, carries every kind of property, right, and appurtenance which is legally embraced in that word, but what rights go to a patentee of land depend, not upon any supposed adjudication contained in the patent, but upon the general law of the state where the land is situated.

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNERS — EXTENT OF RIGHT — STATE LAWS.

While the patentee of land situated on a natural water course in a state where the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership prevails would be entitled to have the water of the stream flow down to his land without any material diminution in quantity, no such right would accrue to a patentee of land in an arid region, where irrigation is necessary to successful agriculture, and where the state law allows a riparian owner to divert a reasonable amount of the water to irrigate his riparian land.

5. SAME.

The right of a riparian owner in fee of land to the use of natural water running through it is subordinate to any paramount right to the use of such water existing under the general law in some other person.

6. SAME—RIGHTS OF SUCCESSOR TO MEXICAN PUEBLO.

Under Mexican law a pueblo, as a quasi public corporation, had power to distribute to the common lands and to its inhabitants the waters of an unnavigable river on which the pueblo was situated, and a riparian owner could not appropriate water so as to interfere with the common use or destiny which a pueblo on the stream had given to the water, and a city which is the successor of a pueblo holds the lands and water rights of its predecessor in trust for its inhabitants.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against the Los Angeles Farming & Milling Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and certain orders denying motions by defendant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Widney, for appellant. W. B. Mathews, H. T. Lee, and J. R. Scott, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff is a municipal corporation. Its corporate territory is situated on the Los Angeles river, an unnavigable stream which rises in the San Fernando valley several miles above and northerly of the city, and flows southerly until it reaches the northern corporate boundaries of the city. The defendant is the owner in fee of land on and riparian to said river and situated about 10 miles above the city. The plaintiff claims, as successor of a Spanish and Mexican pueblo, the prior and paramount ownership of the use of the water of the river from its source to the city and from the surface to bed rock, so far as the same may be necessary to give an adequate supply of water for the use of its inhabitants, and for municipal and public uses and purposes of plaintiff. Defendant denies that plaintiff has any such asserted ownership, and claims that as owner in fee of the said land, and as part and parcel thereof, it has the riparian right to the use of the water of the river as it flows through its land. This action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title and ownership of the use of said water as above stated, and to have it adjudicated that any right which the defendant may have to the use of the water is subordinate and subject to plaintiff's said ownership. The case was tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff as prayed for, and defendant appeals from the judgment. It also appealed from several orders denying certain motions made by defendant; but these appeals do not present any question substantially different from those presented by the appeal from the judgment, and, if the judgment should be affirmed, so also should be the orders.

The case was submitted on a stipulated statement of facts. The court, however, made a few additional findings, and appellant contends that it was error to make these findings, and that for this reason the judgment should be reversed. The making of these additional findings was unnecessary, and perhaps improper and erroneous; but it does not follow that for this reason the judgment should be reversed. So far as the findings may be considered as findings of fact, they do not materially change the facts as stipulated; and, if the stipulated facts warrant a judgment, it should stand. Higgins v. San Diego Sav. Bank, 129 Cal. 194, 61 Pac. 943; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 Pac. 109. It is not necessary to recite here in any great detail the facts as stipulated. Indeed, the situation of the city of Los Angeles with respect to the Los Angeles river, and its claim to the use of the water of the river, have been quite fully stated in former opinions of this court and are familiar facts. Vernon Irr. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762; City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585. For the purposes of this appeal, it is necessary to state only the following facts: In the year 1781, under Spanish rule, the pueblo of Nuestra Señora Reina de Los Angeles was established, embracing four square leagues of land which is included in and is part of the present city of Los Angeles. This pueblo continued in existence under Spanish and Mexican dominion until after the acquisition of California by the United States in February, 1848, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. It is stipulated that, "under the laws of the Kingdom of Spain, said pueblo upon its foundation, by virtue of a grant under such laws, had the paramount right, claimed by the plaintiff in the present case, to use all the water of the river, and such paramount right continued to exist under that government, and the Mexican government, until the acquisition of California by the United States." The plaintiff was first organized as a municipal corporation on April 4, 1850, by an act of the Legislature of California, and, with various changes in its charter, has continuously been a municipal corporation ever since. On October 26, 1852, it filed a petition with the board of land commissioners created by the well-known act of Congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631, c. 41), entitled, "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the state of California." In this proceeding it claimed title in fee to a "tract of land" known as the "pueblo lands" of the pueblo of Los Angeles founded upon the Spanish grant of 1781, and alleged to contain 16 square leagues. The commissioners rendered a decision in which they held that the city was entitled to said pueblo lands, but that they embraced only 4 square leagues, and the claim of the city to the other part of the alleged 16 leagues was rejected. In accordance with this decision a patent of the United States was afterwards, on August 9, 1866, issued to plaintiff for the four square leagues. The land owned by appellant, the Los Angeles Farming & Milling Company, was granted by the Mexican government to the predecessors of appellant in 1848, and was presented to the said board of land commissioners, and after proper proceedings regularly taken a patent of the United States was on June 8, 1873, duly issued to said predecessors for a tract of land through a part of which the Los Angeles river flows, so that the land is riparian to said river. The patent does not contain on its face any reservation or exception.

Appellant contends that the above two proceedings before the land commissioners and the patents which followed constitute final adjudications: First, that the city had only title to four square leagues of land with such appurtenances as regularly belonged to the ownership in fee of lands, but had not any ownership in the use of the water above the limits of the land granted, such as is alleged to have belonged to the old pueblo; and, second, that the patent to appellant's predecessors finally adjudicated that they were the riparian owners of the use of the waters of the river running through the land, as part and parcel of their estate. This contention is not maintainable. The act of March 3d was intended to segregate private from public lands. No word designating property is used in it other than "land." Appellant contends that the city, in its petition to the commissioners, should have set up its claim to the pueblo claim to the water; but the act does not contemplate presentation of a claim to anything but "land." The city was no more called upon to set up its water rights as successors to the pueblo than were appellant's predecessors called upon to set up the riparian rights of the owners of the land claimed by them. Of course, the word "land" as a conveyance, carried every kind of property, right, and appurtenance which is legally embraced in that word; but what rights go to a patentee of land depend, not upon any supposed adjudication contained in the patent, but upon the general law of the state where the land is situated, and those rights may be essentially different in different localities. For instance, if a piece of patented land is in a state or territory where the English common law doctrine of riparian ownership prevails to the full extent, the patentee of the land, if it is situated on a natural water course, would have the right to have the water of the stream flow down to his land without any material diminution in quantity, and could have the upper riparian proprietor enjoined from diverting the water in any way or for any purpose which would materially diminish the flow; but such right would not accrue to a patentee of land in an arid region of a western state where irrigation is necessary to successful agriculture, and where the original rule as to riparian ownership has been modified by the state law, so as to allow a riparian proprietor to divert a reasonable amount of the water of a stream and use it to irrigate his riparian land, although a material part of the water would be absorbed and prevented from flowing down to the lower proprietor. It is quite clear that the rights which are embraced in the word "land" are determined by the law of the country where the land is situated. In Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428, the Supreme Court of the United States say: "In our judgment the grants of the government of land bounded on streams and other waters, without any reservation or restriction of terms, are to be construed as to their effect according to the law of the state in which the lands lie." The right of a riparian owner in fee of land to the use of natural water running through it is subordinate to any paramount right to the use of such water existing under the general law in some other person.

The only question in the case, therefore, is whether under the general law of the locality the old pueblo of Los Angeles, and the respondent herein, as its successor, had and have, as against appellant, the prior and paramount ownership of the use of so much of the water of the Los Angeles river as is necessary for its inhabitants and for general municipal purposes; and this question need not be discussed as an original one, for it has been answered in the affirmative by former decisions of this court.—In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, the whole subject of water rights in California, both before and after American dominion, was involved, and extensively discussed. The law on the subject under Spanish and Mexican rule was very fully considered. As to pueblo rights the court says: "The laws of Mexico relating to pueblos conferred on the town authorities the power of distributing, to the common lands and to its inhabitants, the waters of an unnavigable river on which the pueblo was situated. It is not necessary to say that the property of the nation in the river, as such, was transferred to the pueblo, but it would seem that a species of right to the use of all its waters necessary to supply the domestic wants of the pobladores, the irrigable lands and the mills and manufactories within the general limits were vested in the pueblo authorities, subject to the trust of distributing them for the benefit of the settlers." It is further said: "Each pueblo was quasi a public corporation. By the scheme of the Mexican law it was treated as an entity or person, having a right as such, and by reason of its title to the four leagues of land, to the use of the water of the river on which it is situated, while as a political body, it was vested with power, by ordinance, to provide for a distribution of the waters to those for whose benefit the right and power were conferred." And it is further said: "From the foregoing it appears that the riparian proprietor could not appropriate water in such manner as should interfere with the common use or destiny which a pueblo on the stream should have given to the water; and semble that the pueblos had a preference or prior right to consume the waters even as against an upper riparian proprietor." In Vernon Irrigation Company v. City of Los Angeles et al., the present plaintiff was a defendant, and the rights of the old pueblos and of the present city as its successor were directly involved. The opinion of the court delivered by the late Justice Temple, then commissioner, contained an exhaustive review of the Spanish and Mexican law on the subject. The views expressed in Lux v. Haggin as to the rights of the pueblo in the waters of the river are approved. The opinion is very lengthy, and we will quote only an expression or two from it. It is said: "Our courts have determined that the successors of these pueblos hold the public lands in trust for the inhabitants, and that the Legislature can control the execution of the trust; and that the United States has, in accordance with the decisions, confirmed the lands to the successors of the pueblos." And it is further said: "I am satisfied with the conclusion reached in Lux v. Haggin, supra, that pueblos had a right to the water which had been appropriated to the use of the inhabitants similar to that which it had in the pueblo lands, and that the right of its successor, the city, to the water, for its inhabitants and for municipal purposes, is superior to the rights of plaintiff as a riparian owner." City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585, is another case in which the right of the old pueblo and the present plaintiff to the waters of the river was immediately involved. An exhaustive opinion is also written in this case by the chief justice, speaking for the court, and, the conclusion reached in Vernon Irrigation Company is approved, the court saying: "But the appellants go still further, and contend that, when the land in controversy was granted to their predecessors, there was no pueblo of Los Angeles, and consequently no pueblo right to which any of their rights could be subordinated. * * * This question, however, ought to be considered closed by the previous decisions of this court in the Vernon Irrigation Company Case and others. All of the laws and public documents upon which its solution depends are within the judicial cognizance of the courts, and, whether they were actually noticed or not in previous decisions, they must be deemed to have been considered and allowed their due weight. The question is one of law, rather than of fact, and its decision in one case is a precedent in others." The foregoing decisions are determinative of the prior and paramount right of the pueblo, and of plaintiff as a successor, to the use of the water of the river necessary for its inhabitants and for ordinary municipal purposes. The questions as to what extent this right goes, a question somewhat considered in the Pomeroy Case—that is, for the use of the inhabitants of what territory, and for what municipal purposes can the water be taken as against a riparian owner—does not arise, and need not be considered in the case at bar. Appellant's case is presented in the record as resting upon the proposition that neither the pueblo nor the plaintiff has or had any right whatever to use water of the river that is prior or paramount to appellant's right as a riparian proprietor; and the present decision would not be authority in a case, if any such case should ever arise, where the question would be as to the extent of plaintiff's prior and paramount right, and not as to the existence of that right to any extent.

The judgment not only quiets plaintiff's title, but also enjoins appellant from doing certain acts; and appellant contends that the injunction was erroneous because no injunction was prayed for in the complaint, and no facts are alleged which would support an injunction. So far as the prayer is concerned, the general prayer for relief is sufficient, and the facts alleged warranted an injunction, so that this contention cannot be maintained. Moreover, the injunction is of very little importance, and it cannot be prejudicial to appellant. It does not enjoin appellant from interfering with any particular amount of water, but merely restrains it "from claiming or asserting any right to the water, except in subordination and subject to the said paramount right of said plaintiff." This is merely in accord with the part of the judgment which quiets the title, and adds nothing of consequence to it.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

SUTTER COUNTY v. NICOLS. (Sac. 1,453.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — OBSTRUCTION—NUISANCE—DISCHARGING DÉBRIS INTO RIVER.

The discharging of tailings and debris from a mine into rivers, whereby the beds are filled up and the waters caused to overflow lands and approaches to bridges, and carry the debris onto the lands, injuring them and threatening the bridges with destruction, constitutes a nuisance unless authorized by law.

2. TAXATION—POWER OF LEGISLATURE—EMINENT DOMAIN—PRIVATE PURPOSE.

The legislative power does not extend to the raising of local taxes to pay for improvements for private benefit or profit, nor to the taking or damaging of the private property of one person for the private benefit of another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 51.]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN — PURPOSES — MINING PURPOSES.

The business of mining for the benefit of the mine owner is a private enterprise, and the right of eminent domain cannot be invoked in aid of it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 79.]

4. MINES AND MINERALS—STATUTORY REGULATION—POWER.

While laws may be enacted in the exercise of the police power, requiring the owner of a hydraulic mine to use all reasonable precautions to prevent injury to others or the obstruction of navigable streams from the discharge of mining debris into them, and to ascertain the means best adapted to that end, the law cannot declare that the observance of such means or precautions shall exonerate the mine owner from liability if, notwithstanding their use, injury is caused to others by such discharge.

5. SAME—HYDRAULIC MINING—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Act Cong. March 1, 1893, c. 183, 27 Stat. 507 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3553], provides for the appointment of the California debris commission. Persons desiring to operate mines by hydraulic process must file a verified petition with the commission and a release to the United States of the right to regulate the manner in which debris from the mines shall be restrained, and the amount of debris that may be produced. A notice specifying the contents of the petition must be published, and a hearing is provided for at which claims of all interested persons may be heard, if the commission find in favor of the petitioner it makes an order specifying the method of operating the mine, building restraining works, etc. Held that, while the purpose of the act was to prevent injuries from the discharge of debris from hydraulic mines, it was not intended to exonerate the miner from liability therefor, nor to limit the powers of the state courts to protect private property from threatened injury, and to redress inflicted injury thereto from the operation of hydraulic mines, though carried on under a permit and in strict compliance with the plans of the commission.

6. SAME.

The provisions of the act directing notice to be given and authorizing a hearing at which all persons interested may appear were not intended to conclude and estop the owners of lands below with respect to subsequent injuries that might be inflicted, but were designated to enable the commission in reaching its decision to obtain all aid which it could derive from the suggestions of all interested persons.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Edwin A. Davis, Judge.

Action by the county of Sutter against William Nicols. From a judgment for plaintiff, an order denying a new trial, and an order refusing to vacate the judgment and give judgment in his favor, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, Tuttle & Tuttle, and Solinsky & Wehe, for appellant. Lawrence Schilling, Dist. Atty., and Devlin & Devlin, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The record herein presents appeals by the defendant from the judgment from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from an order denying his motion, under sections 663 and 663½ of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate the judgment given, and render judgment in his favor. Each of the three appeals presents the same question.

The complaint states a cause of action by the county of Sutter, as owner of the lands in Yuba City, upon which the county courthouse and hall of records stand, also of a bridge across Feather river between Yuba City and Marysville, and a half interest in two other bridges over Bear river, to enjoin the defendant from dumping or discharging into said rivers the tailings and debris of his mines, to the injury of said property. It was alleged, in substance, that by the discharge thereof into said rivers the said debris and refuse from defendant's mines had filled up the beds of the rivers and caused the waters thereof to overflow to and upon the said lands and the approaches to said bridges, and to carry said debris and refuse to and deposit them upon said lands, whereby said lands are greatly injured and said bridges are threatened with destruction, and that, if continued, great damage to plaintiff's said property will ensue, and said bridges will be destroyed. The court found the facts in accordance with these allegations of the complaint, and gave judgment accordingly. Unless the facts stated in the special defense pleaded in the answer, and found to be true by the court, legalizes the nuisance complained of and authorizes the defendant to continue the same, regardless of the injury it may cause to private property, the judgment is admitted to be correct and fully sustained by the evidence and by the decisions in County of Yuba v. Kate Hayes M. Co., 141 Cal. 300, 74 Pac. 1049, and Woodruff v. North Bloomfield G. M. Co. (C. C.) 9 Sawy. 441, 18 Fed. 753.

The special defense was that the defendant was engaged in mining upon a claim, known as the "Polar Star Mine," had erected below the same a dam for impounding the debris coming from such mine, had obtained from the California debris commission, under the authority of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1893 (27 Stat. 507, c. 183 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3553]), a permit to operate his mines upon said claim by hydraulic process, that all the mining done by him and all the debris discharged therefrom, was done solely in strict compliance with and obedience to said permit, and that he did not intend or threaten to operate said mines or discharge such debris, except in compliance therewith and under the authority thereof. The court found these allegations to be true, but also found that the dam so constructed was insufficient to prevent, and did not prevent, said debris from being carried down to and upon plaintiff's property, to its injury, that it is not a permanent structure, but is liable to be carried away by the forces of nature, and that said permit was no bar to the action. The latter is really a conclusion, and its accuracy presents the sole question in the case. The act of Congress provides for the appointment of three army engineers to be known as the "California Débris Commission." Its jurisdiction, so far as it affects hydraulic mining, extends to the territory drained by the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. Hydraulic mining directly or indirectly injuring the navigability of said river systems, except as permitted under the provisions of the act, is prohibited. The commission is directed to adopt plans to prevent damage from debris resulting from mining operations, with a view of restoring the navigability of said rivers to the condition existing in 1860, and of permitting hydraulic mining, so far as it can be done "without injury to the navigability of said rivers or the lands adjacent thereto." Any person or persons who desire to operate a mine, or mines, by hydraulic process, must file with the commission a verified petition and a release or surrender to the United States, of the right or privilege to regulate the manner in which the debris from such mines shall be restrained and the amount of debris that may be produced from such mines. Thereupon a notice, specifying the contents of the petition and fixing a time previous to which all proofs are to be submitted, is to be published in a daily paper, or in three issues of a weekly paper. On or before the time fixed "all parties interested, either as petitioners or contestants, whether miners or agriculturists, may file affidavits, plans and maps, in support of their respective claims. Further hearings, upon notice to all parties of record, may be granted by the commission when necessary." If "within thirty days after the time so fixed" a majority of the commission decide in favor of the petitioner, the commission must thereupon make an order specifying in detail the method and manner of operating such mine, the restraining works to be built, the location and material thereof, and such further safeguards "as will protect public interests and prevent injury to the navigable rivers, and the lands adjacent thereto," all to be done at the expense of the miner. The mine owner must then construct the prescribed works, under the supervision of the commission, and upon the completion thereof "permission shall thereupon be granted to the owner or owners of such mine or mines to commence mining operations subject to the conditions of said order and the provisions of this act." The order may be modified from time to time, and the permission may be suspended, as conditions may demand. The act contains many other provisions relating to the administrative duties and powers of the board, which are not important to the question.

It is the contention of the appellant that the act empowers the commission to act as a judicial tribunal by which, in the prescribed proceeding, all persons liable to injury may have their rights ascertained and their property protected from the effects of debris by the adoption and enforcement of a plan appropriate and sufficient for that purpose, and that the decision and orders of this tribunal are binding and conclusive upon all parties affected by the mining operations authorized by the permit granted, even if it should turn out that the plan adopted was wholly inadequate and ineffective to prevent injury. There are instances wherein, for the purpose of apportioning, to the persons specially interested and benefited, the cost of a local public improvement, or, for the purpose of fixing the amounts to be paid for private property taken for or damaged by such public improvements, special tribunals have been established, with power to make a conclusive determination in a special proceeding upon constructive notice to all parties interested. The proceedings before city councils for the improvement or opening of public streets are familiar examples. But it is essential in all such cases that the thing to be accomplished shall be a matter of public concern and for the public benefit. The legislative power does not extend to the raising of local taxes to pay for improvements for private benefit or profit, nor to the taking or damaging of the private property of one person for the private use and benefit of others. The business of mining for the benefit of the mine owner is as much a private affair as that of the farm or factory, and the right of eminent domain cannot be invoked in aid of it. Con. C. Co. v. S. P. R. R. Co., 51 Cal. 271; Lorenz v. Jacob, 63 Cal. 73; Dower v. Richards, 73 Cal. 480, 15 Pac. 105; Amador, etc., Co. v. De Witt, 73 Cal. 485, 15 Pac. 74. The mine of the defendant was carried on solely for his own personal profit. Laws could be enacted, in the exercise of the police power, requiring him to use all reasonable precautions and means to prevent injury to others, or the obstruction of navigable streams, from the discharge of mining debris into the streams and to ascertain and devise the means and plans best adapted to that end. But the law is powerless to declare that the observance of such means or precautions shall exonerate him from liability if, not withstanding their use, injury is caused to other persons by such discharge of debris. This proposition appears to be conceded in the argument in this court. Appellant here contends that the main objects and purposes of the act are to encourage the production of gold with a view to the maintenance of the gold standard, and to preserve and improve the navigability of the rivers, both of which subjects it is argued are within the scope of the legislative powers of the United States; that by this law the hydraulic miners are made the public agents of the United States to carry out the plans adopted by the commission for the accomplishment of the said purposes and objects; that these are public purposes designed to promote the general welfare; that the powers of Congress, in providing for public improvements within its sphere of action, are limited only by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which, unlike that of this state, does not provide that private property cannot be taken or damaged for public use, without compensation, but only that it cannot be taken for public use without compensation; that the injury to the plaintiff from the débris in question does not constitute a taking of its property, but only a damage thereto; and hence that the depositing of such débris by mining, in pursuance of the permit is a lawful act, and the resulting injury damnum absque injuria. The production of sufficient gold to maintain the gold standard may be a matter of public importance, and it may be within the power of Congress to encourage it by appropriate legislation. It probably has the same power with regard to any other industry tending to increase the wealth of the nation. It cannot be admitted, however, that the mining of gold to be applied wholly to the private use of the miner, to whatever extent it may increase the general output, is a public purpose in behalf of which the power of eminent domain may be resorted to, or for which the private property of others may be taken, or its injury lawfully authorized.

The preservation and improvement of the navigability of navigable rivers is no doubt a proper subject of congressional legislation. The act in question is intended to promote those objects by providing for the regulation, restriction, and supervision of hydraulic mining upon the headwaters of those rivers. It does not purport to make the miners the agents of the United States to preserve the rivers below in their present state, or restore them to a former condition. Its provisions are calculated to so control and restrict the operations of the mines as to prevent the further clogging of the navigable streams by mining débris which otherwise would occur, and to devise plans and means whereby hydraulic mining, so controlled and restricted, may be carried on without injury to other persons. They were never intended to give such miners full license, in case the plans proved ineffectual to prevent it, either to fill up the river channels or to commit injuries to private property, by discharging débris into the streams. The commission is given power to revoke the permit, or to modify the plans. That is perhaps sufficient to protect and preserve the navigable streams. At all events, that is a public matter, and the public authorities alone are authorized to act. But no power is given to the commission to redress private injuries, if any should occur. It is unnecessary to decide whether the injury here committed and threatened constitutes a taking of private property for public use or not. We are of the opinion that, while it was the purpose of the act in question to prevent such injuries, if possible, it was not intended to exonerate the miner from liability therefor, or, in any respect, to limit or restrict the powers of the state courts to protect private property from threatened injury and to redress inflicted injury thereto from the operation of hydraulic mines, though carried on under a permit and in strict compliance with the plans and directions of the commission, and that the act does not have that effect. The provisions of the act directing notice to be given and authorizing a hearing at which all parties interested may appear were not intended to conclude and estop the owners of lands below with respect to subsequent injuries that might be inflicted, but were designed to enable the commission to obtain all aid which it could derive from the suggestions of all interested persons, including those who might believe their property to be in danger, in order that it would be better advised as to the means and plans necessary to prevent injury.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

MARRIOTT v. WILLIAMS et al. (S. F. 4,215.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted by defendants, it appeared that defendant went to plaintiff's house to demand a retraction of a published article, and that, after a scuffle, plaintiff started upstairs. Defendant testified that plaintiff made a movement as though he was going to draw a revolver, and thereupon defendant shot plaintiff, who afterward crawled upstairs. Plaintiff and his wife were permitted to testify that, after reaching his bedroom, plaintiff asked his wife to come into the room and lock the hall door of a room opening into the bedroom and the door of the bedroom. Held that, if the admission of the testimony was error, it was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4153–4160.]

2. SAME.

In an action for personal injuries inflicted by defendant, plaintiff testified on cross-examination that he was the prosecuting witness in a criminal prosecution for the same assault, but the court refused to allow proof of defendant's acquittal on the criminal charge. Held, that the evidence could only be admissible to show plaintiff's bias for impeaching purposes, and where plaintiff's intensity of feeling was freely admitted and manifested throughout the case the rejection of the evidence was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161–4170.]

3. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—WEALTH OF DEFENDANT AT TIME OF TRIAL.

In an action for injuries, where malice is alleged and exemplary damages asked, evidence of defendant's wealth is admissible to enable the jury to determine what amount of punishment would be inflicted by compelling defendant to pay a given sum of money, hence, it is proper to show defendant's wealth at the time of the trial instead of at the time of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assault and Battery, § 46.]

4. SAME—DEFENSES—PROVOCATION.

In an action for injuries, the publication of an alleged defamatory article by plaintiff cannot be considered in reduction of the actual damages, but only in reduction of, or set-off against, exemplary damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assault and Battery, § 48.]

5. SAME—SELF-DEFENSE.

In an action for personal injuries, self-defense is an affirmative defense, and the burden of proving it is upon defendant, for there is no presumption that a bodily injury is justifiable, and the justification must be proved by the one asserting it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assault and Battery, § 36.]

6. TORTS—JOINT LIABILITY—VERDICT—DIFFERENT DEFENDANTS.

In an action against two or more persons for a single tort, there cannot be different verdicts for different sums against different defendants upon the same trial, for all who are guilty at all are liable for the whole amount of the actual damages, irrespective of the degree of culpability.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Torts, §§ 29, 38.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Frederick Marriott against Thomas H. Williams and another. From a judgment against Williams and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

H. T. Creswell and P. F. Dunne; for appellant. Hiram W. Johnson and Albert M. Johnson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff by defendants. The jury rendered a verdict against the defendant Williams alone, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is by the defendant Williams from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that the defendants entered plaintiff's home and there assaulted, beat, and wounded him, shooting him twice in the leg, breaking both bones below the knee, and piercing the fleshy part of the thigh, and bruising and cutting his head and hand. The answer admits that Beale inflicted the cuts and bruises on the head and hand, and that Williams shot plaintiff in the leg, but alleges that it was all done in necessary self-defense. Upon the trial, there was practically no controversy over the fact that Beale cut and bruised the plaintiff's head and hand by beating him with a pistol, and that Williams shot plaintiff in the thigh and below the knee, breaking the bones as alleged.

The plaintiff was the publisher of a weekly paper called the "News Letter." The defendants went to his house for the avowed purpose of demanding and procuring from him a retraction of a statement published in the paper. Upon entering the hallway of the house, the plaintiff asked them for their hats, and took Beale's hat and started toward the rear of the hall to hang it on the hat rack. Before, or immediately after, this was done, Beale demanded of Marriott the retraction, and almost immediately struck the blows on the hand and head, while the two were engaged in a scuffle. Marriott broke away and started to run up the stairway, which was on the left side of the hallway. There were 20 steps in the stairway and about the fourteenth step from the bottom it made a quarter turn to the left to reach the floor above. When he had gone perhaps a little more than half way up, Williams shot at him three times, hitting him twice, as alleged. Upon receiving the shot which broke his leg, the plaintiff fell forward upon the upper steps and crawled to the upper floor and into his bedroom. Almost immediately his wife came into the room from the upper part of the stairway where, as she testified, she witnessed a part of the shooting. The defendants did not pursue Marriott, but stood on the lower floor during the altercation and shooting and until Marriott had disappeared, and then left the house.

Over the objection of the defendant, the plaintiff and his wife were allowed to testify that immediately after the shooting and upon his arrival in the bedroom he asked her to come in where he lay and lock the door of that room, and also to lock the hall door of another room which opened into the bedroom, and that she immediately did so. The objection to this evidence was that it was immaterial and incompetent. This ruling is assigned as error. It may be conceded that these acts and declarations were not part of the res gestæ of the shooting. They occurred after the injury was done, and not in the sight or hearing of the defendants. They tended to prove no fact material to the case, except the physical condition and mental state of the plaintiff after he was shot. They would tend to show the plaintiff's fear that the defendants would follow him and inflict more injury, or annoy him or his wife in some way, and that he was himself unable to take the precautions requested. We may concede that the evidence was incompetent to prove his physical condition, but its effect on that part of the case would be so trivial and inconsequential that it could not produce injury. So far as they tended to show that the defendant was at that time in fear, if we concede that they were not part of the res gestæ on that point, they were immaterial. The ruling, then, was perhaps technically erroneous. The inquiry arises whether the proof of said acts and declarations was substantially prejudicial to the case of the defendant.

Counsel contends with much earnestness that it was very prejudicial because of its bearing upon the issue of self-defense. The defendant Williams testified that Marriott, as he was running up the stairway, turned his side around to the left, at the same time making a motion for his hip pocket, and that thereupon he (Williams), believing that Marriott intended to draw a pistol to shoot him, drew his own pistol, and fired three times at Marriott as fast as he could. Beale also testified that he saw the threatening motion of Marriott. This motion of Marriott constitutes the sole basis of the claim of self-defense on the part of Williams. He took no part in the assault on the lower floor of the hall. The argument in regard to the effect of the evidence about the locking of the doors runs thus: The motion towards the hip pocket was prompted by courage and a spirit of combat. The locking of the doors was requested because Marriott was then in fear and desired protection. Proof of the manifestation of the latter feeling, so soon after the manifestation of the former, tended to throw doubt on the existence of the former, and, to that extent, tended to disprove the making of the hip-pocket motion. This argument is not of great force, at best, and what little strength it has is much impaired when we consider that, in the meantime, Marriott had received two severe wounds, one of them dangerous, had had his leg broken by one of them, and that at the time he requested the locking of the doors he was lying on the floor of his bedroom suffering indescribable agonies from his wounds, as he testifies. Such intervening circumstances and such condition would probably unnerve the most courageous person, or at least remove all desire to attack, and substitute therefor the desire for protection. There are, however, other facts which show that the evidence could have had no substantial prejudicial effect. It was proven, without contradiction, that Marriott did not have a pistol, or other weapon, upon his person. The fact was established. Not having any pistol to draw, he could not have made the motion with the intent to draw it. There was, therefore, no real danger to Williams, no necessity for him to shoot in self-defense, nothing, at most, but a mere appearance of danger. If the suspicious motion was made, as claimed, it must have been one of those involuntary movements of the arms which many people make in running, which Williams, in his combative spirit, mistook for a motion to draw a pistol, or it may have been a pretense of such motion, made by Marriott to intimidate the defendants and prevent their further pursuit or gain time to reach a place of safety. If it was the latter, it would be entirely consistent with the feeling of fear and the desire for protection manifested in the bedroom, and proof of the existence of one would not tend to disprove the other. If it was the mere accidental and unconscious motion made in running, it would have no significance at all with respect to his state of mind and the proof of the subsequent fear and desire for protection would be proof of an immaterial fact. In either case the evidence objected to could have produced no injury to the defendants' case.

With regard to the blows, inasmuch as the verdict was in favor of Beale, who alone inflicted them, we must assume that the jury held them to be justified, and hence, the effect of the evidence of locking the doors on this part of the case was not injurious.

What has been said is also applicable to the objection to the admission of similar evidence, introduced in rebuttal, in connection with proof of declarations by Mrs. Marriott, inconsistent with her testimony as a witness for plaintiff, and nothing further need be said with regard thereto.

The defendants had been acquitted upon a criminal prosecution for the assault upon Marriott. On cross-examination Marriott testified, in answer to the defendants' questions, that he was the prosecuting witness in that case. The court refused to allow proof of the fact of acquittal of the criminal charge. The evidence was pertinent only to show his feeling and bias against the defendants and thereby to impeach his credibility as a witness. Even if we concede that natural chagrin at the defeat of the criminal prosecution might have added to the intensity of his feeling, and that, in general, the proof would be admissible for that purpose, solely, it would be harmless error here, where the feeling was freely admitted and was manifest throughout the case, and where the circumstances were such that it would have been inferred by the jury, even if there had been no proof or exhibition of it.

The complaint alleged malice on the part of the defendants and asked exemplary damages. It was therefore proper to allow evidence of the defendants' wealth. Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 100; Webb v. Gilman, 80 Me. 177, 13 Atl. 688; Draper v. Baker, 61 Wis. 450, 21 N. W. 527, 50 Am. Rep. 143; Brown v. Evans (C. C.) 17 Fed. 912; 3 Cyc. 1095; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 997; 1 Ency. Ev. 1004. Such evidence is admitted to enable the jury to determine what amount of punishment would be inflicted upon the defendant by compelling him to pay a given sum of money. Hence it is proper to show his wealth at the time of the trial, as was done here, instead of at the time of the injury. In mitigation of damages the defendants pleaded the publication of the articles above referred to, which, as they allege, were defamatory, and gave them just cause for great indignation. The court instructed the jury that these matters could not be considered in reduction of the actual damages accruing from his pain, physical injuries, loss of time, and moneys expended, or any other element of actual damages, but only in reduction of, or set-off against, the exemplary damages. That this was a correct exposition of the law is well settled. Goldsmith v. Joy, 61 Vt. 488, 17 Atl. 1010, 4 L. R. A. 500, 15 Am. St. Rep. 923; Badostain v. Graziade, 115 Cal. 429, 47 Pac. 118; Fenclon v. Butts, 53 Wis. 351, 10 N. W. 501; Corcoran v. Harran, 55 Wis. 122, 12 N. W. 468; Donnelly v. Harris, 41 Ill. 128. The assault and injury to the plaintiff were admitted. The answer that they were inflicted in self-defense was an affirmative defense, which it was necessary for the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence. A person who sues for a personal injury at the hands of another is not bound to prove, in the first instance, that he was not the aggressor and that the defendant did not act in self-defense. He must prove the assault and the injury, if they are denied. In so doing, he may incidentally bring out facts tending to support a plea of self-defense, and if so the defendant will be entitled to the benefit of such evidence. But the burden of proof to establish the self-defense remains with the defendant. There is no presumption that a bodily injury is justifiable, and the justification must be proven by him who asserts it. The instructions of the court embodying these propositions were properly given. Sellman v. Wheeler, 95 Md. 751, 54 Atl. 513; Gizler v. Witzel, 82 Ill. 326; Johnson v. Strong, 58 S. W. 430, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 577; Phillips v. Mann, 44 S. W. 379, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1705; Rhinehart v. Whitehead, 64 Wis. 42, 24 N. W. 401.

In actions against two or more persons for a single tort, there cannot be two verdicts for different sums against different defendants upon the same trial. There can be but one verdict for a single sum against all who are found guilty of the tort. All who are guilty at all are liable for the whole amount of the actual damages arising from the injury inflicted, irrespective of the degree of culpability. Huddleson v. Borough, 111 Pa. 110, 2 Atl. 200; McCool v. Mahoney, 54 Cal. 492; Nichols v. Dunphy, 58 Cal. 607; Errord v. Gabbert, 83 Ind. 492; Carney v. Reed, 11 Ind. 417; Coolley on Torts, p. 136; 1 Suth. Dam. § 140. The court did not err in instructing the jury to this effect.

There are some other objections to the charge to the jury, and there are other rulings in the admission of evidence which are questioned, but they are all either covered by what we have said, or they are too trivial to require notice.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex inf. BOARD OF HARBOR COM'RS FOR SAN DIEGO BAY v. KERBER et al. (L. A. 1,983.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1908. Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1908.)

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS—TIDE LANDS—WHAT CONSTITUTE.

Land lying between the lines of the ordinary high and low tides, and covered and uncovered successively by the ebb and flow thereof, constitutes tide lands.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Navigable Waters, §§ 180–187.]

2. SAME—TITLE.

Tide lands fronting on navigable waters vest in the state by virtue of its sovereignty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Navigable Waters, §§ 180–187.]

3. SAME—PRIVATE TITLE—NO ACQUISITION BY PRESCRIPTION.

Tide lands fronting on a navigable bay constitute property devoted to a public use, of which private persons cannot obtain title by prescription, founded upon adverse occupancy for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Navigable Waters, §§ 180–193; vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 24–57.]

4. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF PUBLIC USE.

Though the public use in tide lands fronting on a navigable bay may, by some lawful act of public authority, be abandoned, and if the state then holds the title it will thereafter hold it as a proprietor, if the statute of limitations can run against the state respecting the lands, it will only begin from the date when the public use ceased.

5. SAME—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Const. 1879, art. 15, § 3, provides that all tide lands within two miles of any city or town and fronting on a navigable bay, etc., shall be withheld from grant or sale to individuals, etc., and article 4, § 31, prohibits the gift of state property by the Legislature. Article 22, § 1, repeals all laws inconsistent with the Constitution. Held that, so long as such tide lands remain subject to navigation, they cannot be alienated by the state except for navigation purposes, and title thereto may not be acquired by individuals by prescription; so far as Code Civ. Proc. § 315, limiting actions by the people to sue for land, and Civ. Code, § 1007, providing that occupancy for the period prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure as sufficient to bar suit to recover property confers prescriptive title thereto, would enable title to such lands to be acquired, they were repealed by the Constitution.

6. SAME—SEA-WALL LINE—ESTABLISHMENT—EFFECT.

The establishment of a sea-wall line by the San Diego harbor commissioners, under authority of Pol. Code, §§ 2587, 2588, does not constitute an abandonment of the public use in tide lands between that line and the shore, where no wall has been built nor projected, and no obstruction to navigation has been placed on the line, since, under sections 2579, 2588 and 2590 the line may be changed before the wall is built so as to cause such lands to remain in the part of the bay reserved for navigation.

7. SAME—ALCALDE GRANT EFFECT.

A purported conveyance by the alcalde of the pueblo of San Diego on March 18, 1850, of tide lands passed no title, since at that time title had accrued to the United States as sovereign; St. 1850, p. 121, c. 46, incorporating San Diego, not validating alcalde grants, and Act May 14, 1861 (St. 1861, p. 363, c. 356), confirming such grants near Oakland, San Francisco, and San Quentin prison, not ratifying such conveyance.

8. STATUTES—AFFECTING STATE'S TITLE—CONSTRUCTION.

Statutes depriving the state of its property must be construed favorably to the state, or, at least, not strictly against it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 319.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California, by the State Board of Harbor Commissioners for San Diego Bay, against H. Kerber and others. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stearns & Sweet and Haines & Haines, for appellants. Shaw & Winnek and Victor E. Shaw, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action is prosecuted under the authority of section 2578 of the Political Code, to recover possession of certain premises alleged to constitute a part of the tide lands of the bay of San Diego. Plaintiff had judgment for part of the land sued for, and the defendants appeal from that part of the judgment. The defendants denied ownership of the lands by the state, and pleaded, as a defense, the 10-year statute of limitations, as set forth in section 315 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court found that the defendants have been in adverse occupancy of the land for more than 10 years next before the action was begun. The evidence shows that their occupancy began on January 1, 1887, and has continued ever since that time. The claim of the defendants is that the action is barred by the statute, and that, under the provisions of section 1007 of the Civil Code, they have acquired title to the land by prescription.

The land in question lies between the lines of the ordinary high and low tides and is covered and uncovered successively by the ebb and flow thereof. It is, unquestionably, tide land, in the usual meaning of that term. People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 386; Rondell v. Fay, 32 Cal. 364; Oakland v. Oakland Water F. Co., 118 Cal. 182, 50 Pac. 277. It is situated next to the shore line at ordinary high tide and constitutes a strip of land 40 feet in width, running from the line of Atlantic street on the west to the line of California street on the east, assuming that those streets extend into the bay. The said shore line at that point is 10 feet south of the south line of H street in the city of San Diego. The land extends 40 feet into the water at ordinary high tide, and, under the existing natural conditions, it is not disputed that it fronts on the waters of San Diego Bay, and constitutes a portion of the waters thereof used for navigation. It either adjoins or is within the city of San Diego. Tide lands of this character vest in and belong to the state by virtue of its sovereignty. Shively v. Bowly, 152 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331; Farish v. Coon, 40 Cal. 57; People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 337; Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 365. And when such tide lands are situated in a navigable bay, and constitute a part of the water front thereof, as is the case here, they constitute property devoted to a public use, of which private persons cannot obtain title by prescription, founded upon adverse occupancy for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations. In Ward v. Mulford, supra, on page 372 of 32 Cal., the court says on this subject: "Such land is held in trust for the benefit of the people. The right of the state is subservient to the public rights of navigation and fishery, and theoretically, at least, the state can make no disposition of them prejudicial to the right of the public to use them for the purposes of navigation and fishery, and whatever disposition she does make of them, her grantee takes them upon the same terms upon which she holds them, and, of course, subject to the public rights above mentioned." See, also, Oakland v. Oakland W. F. Co., page 184 of 118 Cal., page 286 of 50 Pac., where the same passage is quoted with approval. Property thus held by the state in trust for public use cannot be gained by adverse possession, and the statute of limitations does not apply to an action by the state or its agents to recover such property from one using it for private purposes not consistent with the public use. This is the settled rule in this state, with respect to all properties so devoted to public use, and tide lands—underlying waters forming part of the waters of a navigable bay used for navigation—are not, in this respect, to be distinguished from property used for other public purposes. Upon this point the rule is thus stated: "It is immaterial where the title—that is, the record title—is held, whether by the state at large, or by a county, or by some municipal department or other official body. There can be no adverse holding of such land which will deprive the public of the right thereto, or give title to the adverse claimant, or create a title by virtue of the statute of limitations. The rule is universal in its application to all property set apart or reserved for public use, and the public use for which it is appropriated is immaterial. The same principles which govern the adverse holding of a street, a public square, a quay, a wharf, a common, apply to the adverse holding of a schoolhouse. The public is not to lose its rights through the negligence of its agents, nor because it has not chosen to resist an encroachment by one of its own number, whose duty it was, as much as that of every other citizen, to protect the state in its rights." This rule has been often repeated in the opinions of this court. Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 275; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 437; Visalla v. Jacobs, 65 Cal. 434, 4 Pac. 433, 52 Am. Rep. 303; San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405; Yolo Co. v. Barney, 79 Cal. 378, 21 Pac. 833, 12 Am. St. Rep. 152; Millis v. Los Angeles, 90 Cal. 522, 27 Pac. 354; Orena v. Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 621, 28 Pac. 268; San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 418, 28 Pac. 803; Archer v. Salinas, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145; Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 394, 35 Pac. 1005; Home v. San Francisco, 119 Cal. 537, 51 Pac. 950; Holladay v. San Francisco, 124 Cal. 353, 57 Pac. 146; San Francisco v. Sharp, 125 Cal. 536, 58 Pac. 173; S. P. Co. v. Hyatt, 132 Cal. 240, 64 Pac. 272, 54 L. R. A. 522.

It is true that the public use may, by some lawful act of public authority, be discontinued or abandoned, and that, in that event, the property may thereupon cease to be protected by this rule. If the title is at that time held by the state, it will thereafter hold it as a proprietor and not as a public agent or sovereign in charge of a public use. If an adverse possession can be maintained, or if the statute of limitations can run against the state, in regard to such proprietary property, it will begin from the date when the public use ceased and not before. If the power is left to the Legislature, it may then provide for the sale of such property, and order that it may become the subject of private ownership. But, as was said in Yolo Co. v. Barney, supra, the fact that the public authorities in charge of the property have power to discontinue or abandon the public use and sell the property for private use does not affect the rule above cited, nor enable an occupant to gain it by adverse possession before that event occurs, or to invoke the statute of limitations to protect his possession against the state. This was the rule applicable to such property, so held and used, before the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. To make such tide lands more secure against unwise disposition by the Legislature to the detriment or destruction of the public rights, the following provision was inserted therein: "All tide lands within two miles of any incorporated city or town in this state, and fronting on the waters of any harbor, estuary, bay, or inlet, used for the purposes of navigation, shall be withheld from grant or sale to private persons, partnerships or corporations." Article 15, § 3. Other constitutional provisions prevent the gift of any state property by the Legislature. Article 4, § 31. So long, therefore, as property of this character remains subject to use for the purposes of navigation, it cannot, without an amendment of the Constitution, be disposed of by the state in any manner, except in furtherance of the purposes of navigation to which it is dedicated. The provisions of the Constitution are of higher force than the statute of limitations, or the statute defining the manner of acquiring title to property by adverse occupancy. If the state is without power to dispose of this land for private use at all, its officers and agents must be without power to make a virtual disposition of it by their neglect in permitting private persons to occupy it for a period of 10 years, under claim of ownership, and thus giving such persons an opportunity to invoke for their benefit a legislative declaration that such occupancy will bar the state of its title. So far as the statutes referred to may have had that effect before the adoption of the Constitution, they must be considered as having ceased to exist when the Constitution took effect. The Constitution declares that all laws inconsistent with its provisions shall cease upon its adoption. Article 22, § 1. In this view of the case, it is immaterial whether title by prescription under the Code is, or is not, founded upon the presumption that the possession was originally taken under a grant which had been lost in the lapse of time, as was the case at common law, even if it were conceded that the rule that there can be no adverse possession of property devoted to public use did not apply to this land.

It is claimed that the land in controversy is not now devoted to public use for navigation; that, by lawful action of the harbor board, the public use has been discontinued and abandoned, and the land made available for sale to private use, and thus has become proprietary in character; that this occurred more than 10 years before the action was begun; and hence, that the statute of limitations has barred the action, and the defendants have acquired title. This theory is based on the fact that on March 17, 1890, the board of harbor commissioners of San Diego, under the provisions of sections 2587 and 2588 of the Political Code, established a line for the location of a sea-wall or a harbor embankment to be thereafter erected, and that this land is between that line and the shore, and some 150 feet distant from the sea-wall line. It may be admitted that when a sea-wall shall be constructed on this line, and the water between it and the shore is thereby excluded from use for navigation, the land between the wall and ordinary high-tide line, not abutting on the wall, nor lying so near it as to be reasonably necessary for purposes incidental to and in furtherance of navigation, may become proprietary lands, which, like ordinary public land, may be sold by the state to private persons for private use not connected with navigation. Perhaps, before such wall is constructed, land within the sea-wall line, and so remote therefrom that its use for private purposes would not be detrimental to the public use or the public right, might be disposed of to private persons in connection with and in aid of the building of such wall, and its adaptation to purposes of navigation and commerce, as, for instance, to raise funds wherewith to build the wall. We are not called upon here to express any opinion on these questions. No such case is presented. No such disposition of the land has been made to the defendants, or to any person. No sea-wall has been built or projected. No barrier or obstruction to navigation has been placed on the line. For all practical purposes the bay is open to navigation to the actual shore line of high tide over the land in question as fully and freely as before the line was so located. It still remains, in fact, a part of the bay of San Diego, which, by section 2579 of the Political Code, is placed in the possession and control of the harbor commissioners, with all the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances connected therewith. They may, at any time, change the location of the line. Pol. Code, §§ 2579, 2588, 2593. Before a sea-wall is constructed, and before private rights accrue from such construction, it would seem that their power to make such change is unlimited. It may therefore be changed so as to include this land within the waters of the bay set apart exclusively to navigation. In People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 499, 2 Pac. 393, the court says: "The mere establishment of a harbor line does not deprive the state of the right to control and regulate the water within the line." We think the establishment of the sea-wall line has no effect whatever upon the character of the waters and tide lands between it and the shore as property devoted to use for navigation, at least, until some further action is taken looking to the erection of the wall, or the abandonment of the public use of the waters between it and the shore.

On March 18, 1850, the alcalde of the pueblo of San Diego, in consideration of the building of a wharf by the grantees, executed a deed purporting to convey to Jose Aguirre and others 15 acres of land, including the land in controversy. The defendants claim under this deed, and deraign title therefrom by a regular chain of conveyances. The wharf was built, but is gone. Defendants do not claim that they ever maintained any wharf. San Diego was incorporated on March 27, 1850, nine days after the execution of this deed. St. 1850, p. 121, c. 46. This conveyance could not have been of any force or effect to pass the title. At that time the title had accrued to the United States as sovereign. The community which afterward became the city of San Diego was then a mere unincorporated village, or, at most, a Mexican pueblo, exercising some powers in that capacity. Whatever powers it may have possessed over this land as a Mexican pueblo before the cession of the territory to the United States, those powers had ceased when the cession took place, and the sole power and authority to dispose of such lands was thereupon transferred to the United States, and was by it transmitted to the state of California at the time of its admission as a state on September 9, 1850. There is nothing in the incorporating act creating the city of San Diego, that purports to validate the previous grants of tide lands made by the alcalde. The act of May 14, 1861, refers only to marsh and tide lands within 5 miles of the city of Oakland and San Francisco, or within $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles of San Quentin prison. The proviso in that act declares that no sales of such land within those limits shall be confirmed by the act, "excepting alcalde grants which are hereby ratified and confirmed." St. 1861, p. 363, c. 356. Statutes which operate to deprive the state of its property are to be construed favorably to the state, or, at all events, are not to be construed strictly against it. Under any theory of interpretation applicable thereto, this statute should not be deemed a ratification of previous alcalde grants of tide lands in or adjacent to San Diego.

We have said nothing so far upon the question whether or not the provisions of section 315 of the Code of Civil Procedure do, in fact, apply to actions by the state for the recovery of possession of these tide lands, aside from their exemption under the Constitution, or as lands devoted to public use. For the purposes of the discussion we have assumed that they would apply but for such exemption, and that their effect was similar to that of section 318 respecting private property, except as to the length of the period of limitations. The language of the two sections, however, is materially different. Section 318 declares the action barred, unless the plaintiff, or his privies, were "seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action." Section 315 is as follows: "The people of this state will not sue any person for or in respect to any real property, or the issues or profits thereof, by reason of the right or title of the people to the same, unless: 1. Such right or title shall have accrued within ten years before any action or other proceeding for the same is commenced; or, 2. The people, or those from whom they claim, shall have received the rents and profits of such real property, or of some part thereof within the space of ten years."

The title of the state to lands lying between high and low tide accrued upon the admission of the state to the Union. If all actions to recover such lands are barred under subdivision 1, § 315, if begun more than 10 years after the title of the state accrued, it would follow that the state could not, at this time, maintain any action for possession thereof against a trespasser. In any case, regardless of the time the unlawful possession had continued. In view of this absurd result it may be doubted if section 315 is applicable at all to actions to recover possession of such tide lands. A doubt on this subject is expressed in Farish v. Coon, 40 Cal. 57, but the point was not decided. It is not necessary to decide it here. We have noticed it to this extent, merely to explain that we do not decide that the statute was intended to apply in any case.

The judgment is affirmed.

POMONA LAND & WATER CO. et al. v.
SAN ANTONIO WATER CO. et al.
(L. A. 1817.)

Rehearing Denied in Bank Feb. 16, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION —SALVAGE AND DEVELOPED WATER—RIGHT TO.

Where, under a contract with defendant, plaintiffs were only entitled to one-half of the natural flow of a stream as it reached a dam, any water defendant saved by impounding the water above and bringing it to the dam by pipe line, thus saving the water otherwise lost by seepage, etc., above the dam, and any water developed from the bed of the stream, are essentially new waters, and the right to use and distribute them belongs to defendant, under the principle that, where one is entitled to use a given amount of water at a given point, he may not complain of any prior use made of the water not impairing the quantity or quality to which he is entitled, and that he may not claim any excess of water over the amount to which he is entitled however it may be produced.

2. SAME—CONTRACTS.

The only covenants binding those who do not personally incur the obligation are those running with land, and under Civ. Code, § 1462, the only covenants running with land are those contained in a grant of an estate in realty and made for the direct benefit of the property or some part of it then in existence, and hence, where parties in 1877 agreed that the waters of a stream should be divided at a dam for the use of owners on both sides of the stream, and that the parties should at their joint expense develop the waters from their source to the dam, and that the development work should proceed with reasonable diligence until completed, and their successors, plaintiff and defendant, in 1897 agreed that the natural flow of the stream should be divided at a dam, defendant is bound only by the last contract, and is not deprived by the terms of the first of the exclusive right to water saved by it by impounding the waters of the stream above and bringing it to the dam, thus saving the water otherwise lost by seepage, etc., above the dam, and water developed from the bed of the stream; the development work being done 30 years after the first contract was made.

3. SAME—FINDING.

Where defendant is entitled to water saved and developed by it above the natural flow of a stream, the court must determine with such exactness as possible how much water is saved and developed.

4. SAME.

Where a contract provided plaintiff and defendant should divide the natural flow of a stream, subject to the water right of another, established by a judgment against plaintiff and defendant's predecessor, defendant could acquire such right for its own use, within the limitations of such judgment.

5. JUDGMENT—INTERPRETATION—RESORT TO PLEADINGS.

Resort may be had to the pleadings in a case and the issues joined thereunder to explain and to limit the language of a judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 969.]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—ACTION TO ESTABLISH RIGHTS—JUDGMENT.

Where one only claimed a right to use 20 inches of water of a stream for domestic purposes and to irrigate his land, a judgment awarding him that amount, but not showing the purpose for which it might be used, did not entitle him nor his successor to transport water beyond the watershed for other uses.

7. SAME—WATER RIGHTS—ACQUISITION BY PRESCRIPTION.

Where plaintiff and defendant water companies agreed upon a division of the natural flow of a stream at a dam, subject to the right of another to use 20 inches for a specific purpose, and defendant acquired such right, though it did not have a right to use water thereunder for another purpose, where for a long time it openly, notoriously, and under a claim of right diverted the water for another purpose to a point near the dam and did not allow it to flow over it for division, it acquired a prescriptive title to the quantity used.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Pomona Land & Water Company and others against the San Antonio Water Company and others. From the judgment both parties appeal. Plaintiffs' appeal denied; judgment partly reversed with directions on defendants' appeal and defendants' appeal partly denied.

Rehearing denied in bank; BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

A. P. Nichols, J. S. Chapman, and Stephens & Stephens, for plaintiffs. Otis, Gregg & Surr and H. W. O'Melveny, for defendants.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action in form for an injunction to restrain the defendants from their alleged unlawful diversion of the waters of the San Antonio creek. In its essence the action is to determine the conflicting claims of plaintiffs and of defendants to certain of these waters. The Pomona Land & Water Company represents the users of water to the west of San Antonio creek—the "Pomona people." The San Antonio Water Company represents and supplies the lands and people to the east side of the creek—the "Ontario people." At a fixed point upon the stream a dam had been erected, and at this dam the waters which flowed thereto had, under agreement, been divided between the Pomona people and the Ontario people as follows: When the water which reached the dam amounted to or was less than 624 miner's inches, the supply was equally divided between the west side and east side users. When it exceeded 624 inches the west side users were entitled to 312 inches and the east side users to all of the rest. Over this there is no controversy. By contract and deed between the Pomona Land & Water Company and the San Antonio Water Company the water rights of the former were conveyed to the latter, and the latter company agreed in effect to make distribution of the waters in the proportions above set forth.

The defendant the Ontario Power Company is a corporation created for the purpose of generating power. The San Antonio Water Company owns the lands riparian to the San Antonio creek above the division dam, and granted permission by lease to the Ontario Power Company to do certain work and erect necessary structures, to the end of developing power from the waters of San Antonio creek above the division dam and before such waters reached the dam. Measurements of the natural flow of the stream were taken by these defendant corporations at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the division dam and again at the division dam, from which they became satisfied that from the upper point of measurement the stream was a losing stream, and that 19 per cent. of its surface flow was lost by seepage, percolation, and evaporation between that point and the division dam. In the belief, therefore, that its duty to plaintiffs was only to distribute to them their proportion of the natural flow of the water as it reached the division dam, the defendants held that any excess over the natural flow which they could save by impounding the waters $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles above the division dam in a pipe line, and bringing it thus down to the division dam without waste, would be salvage water, rescued water, or developed water, the rightful use of which would be theirs absolutely. This then in fact is what was done. The Ontario Power Company impounded all the waters of the stream in a 30-inch pipe line, and carried them down to their power house above the dam. They leased, in turn, to the defendant San Antonio Water Company the salvage water, estimated at 19 per cent. of this natural flow. By plaintiffs and respondents it is insisted upon this appeal that the Ontario Power Company is a mere agency in this regard of the San Antonio Water Company, and that its rights to this salvage water are no greater than are the rights of the San Antonio Water Company. The next contention is that it was the legal duty of the San Antonio Water Company under certain agreements and contracts, hereinafter to be considered, to divide this salvage water with plaintiffs equally with the rest of the water of the stream at all times when the total amount of that water did not exceed 624 inches.

For convenience, the Ontario Power Company may be dropped from the case, and the questions may be considered from the point of view for which plaintiffs and respondents contend; that is to say, from the point of view of the rights and duties of the San Antonio Water Company. The right to this salvage water, estimated by the San Antonio Water Company to be 19 per cent. of the natural flow, is the first matter in controversy between these parties. The amount of the water so saved, the court expressed itself unable to determine from the evidence. Under its view, however, that whatever the amount might be it should be divided under the contention of plaintiffs, it was unnecessary to determine the amount. If, however, the position of the defendant the San Antonio Water Company is correct—if it is entitled to this water—then an accurate finding upon this question becomes of extreme importance to all of the litigants.

After the natural flow of the stream had, as above described, been impounded in a pipe line and carried down to the division dam, leaving the bed of the creek dry, the San Antonio Water Company undertook certain development work in the bed of the creek, laying a pipe line in the saturated gravels, and thus rescuing, impounding, and using from 25 to 30 inches of water. As to this water its position is the same as that which it takes with regard to the salvage water. It argues that, as it is delivering to plaintiffs all of their proportion of the natural flow to which alone they are entitled, all other waters which it may save or develop belong to it; that, as it is giving to plaintiffs all of their proportion of the natural flow which by any possibility could reach the division dam, this water so rescued from the bed of the creek cannot be part of that, and although it comes from the creek is newly developed water, and their property. Upon this the court took plaintiffs' view that, under the agreements above adverted to, one-half of this water belonged to plaintiffs whenever the total flow was less than 624 inches, but that plaintiffs should bear one-half of the cost of the development, estimated at $750. From the conclusion reached by the court upon both these matters and expressed in its judgment, the defendants appeal.

Still a third matter of controversy exists between the parties, to which consideration must now be paid. One Dexter asserted the right to 20 inches of water for use upon his lands upon the east side of the creek, and in fact his right to this water was embodied in a judgment in litigation growing out of these very questions, a judgment to which all the parties to this action, their predecessors or representatives in interest were parties. In the contract between the Pomona Land & Water Company and the San Antonio Water Company, to which reference has heretofore been made, it is "agreed between the parties hereto that all the waters of San Antonio creek, except the twenty inches of water owned by Richard Gird and known as the Dexter claim, have been for more than fifteen years last past owned and used equally in common by certain parties on the Ontario and Pomona sides of the San Antonio creek," etc. And, further, it is declared "that after the execution of this agreement and of the deeds hereinafter mentioned all the waters of San Antonio creek and its tributaries, excepting the so-called Dexter claim of twenty inches above referred to, shall be allowed to flow undiminished to said point of diversion" (the division dam). Dexter sold his land and water right to Gird. Gird in turn, after the execution of this contract, sold both to the San Antonio Water Company. The San Antonio Water Company insists upon its right to take the Dexter 20 inches of water, which it will be remembered, was water which for years had been diverted from the stream above the division dam. Respondents, upon the other hand, contend still by force of certain contracts, to which reference has been made, that upon the acquisition by the San Antonio Water Company of this Dexter claim it became that corporation's duty to permit that 20 inches to flow to the dam and there to be divided. The court upon this found generally with the plaintiffs, to the effect that such was their right, but it found moreover that by adverse use for sufficient time the San Antonio Water Company had acquired a new title by prescription to 18 inches of this water, and for that amount gave them judgment. Upon this so-called Dexter claim there are cross-appeals, appeals by the plaintiffs from the judgment in favor of the defendants for the 18 inches, and from the court's order denying its motion for a new trial, and upon the part of the defendants, who insist upon their title to the full 20 inches awarded to Dexter by the judgment above referred to.

1. Salvage and Developed Water. It may not successfully be disputed that if, in fact, all the water to which plaintiffs were entitled was the one-half of the natural flow of the stream as it reached the division dam, and that if in fact they receive this water, then the 19 or any other percentage, which was saved by the economical method of impounding the water above, and the 25 inches, more or less, which were rescued as developed water from the bed of the stream, were essentially new waters, the right to use and distribute which belonged to defendant. This principle has been enunciated by this court as early as Butte Company v. Vaughn, 11 Cal. 143, 70 Am. Dec. 769, and has been reaffirmed, however varying the forms may have been, whenever it has been presented. The principle in brief is this: That where one is entitled to the use of a given amount of water at a given point, he may not complain of any prior use made of the water which does not impair the quality or quantity to which he is entitled, and, upon the other hand, he may not lay claim to any excess of water over the amount to which he is entitled, however it may be produced. In the Vaughn case, supra, the question turned upon the prior use. In Creighton v. Kaweah Irrigating Company, 67 Cal. 222, 7 Pac. 659, it is said: "At best, the plaintiffs would be entitled only to have the defendant enjoined from obstructing the flow of that which would have naturally flowed unaided by artificial means, with which the plaintiff is not connected." In Wiggins v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 195, 45 Pac. 164, 32 L. R. A. 667, 54 Am. St. Rep. 337, this whole question is elaborately considered, and full recognition is accorded of the right to water of one who saves as well as of one who develops it. It there appeared that 100 inches of water were naturally lost by absorption and evaporation in passing through the natural channel from the dam and ditch of an upper riparian owner to the land of a lower owner. It was held that a court of equity in dividing the flow of the stream might allow the upper owner to provide artificial means for carrying all the waters of the stream in excess of the 100 inches to the land of the lower owner, and permit the upper owner to use so much of the 100 inches as he could save by such artificial means, and, quoting from the opinion, it is said: "The plaintiff could under no circumstances be entitled to the use of more water than would reach his land by the natural flow of the stream, and, if he receives this flow upon the land, it is immaterial to him whether it is received by means of the natural course of the stream or by artificial means. On the other hand, if the defendant is enabled by artificial means to give to the plaintiff all of the water he is entitled to receive, no reason can be assigned why it should not be permitted to divert from the stream where it enters its land and preserve and utilize the one hundred inches which would otherwise be lost by absorption." This same doctrine is recognized by all the courts which have been called upon to consider it. Platte Irrigation Co. v. Buckers Irrigation, Milling & Improvement Company, 25 Colo. 77, 53 Pac. 335; Herriman Irrigation Co. v. Butterfield Mining Co., 19 Utah, 453, 57 Pac. 541, 51 L. R. A. 930; Farnham on Waters, § 672. Indeed, as we read plaintiffs' brief, we are led to believe that this doctrine is not disputed, but that, because of defendants' contractual obligations, it is insisted that plaintiffs are entitled to their share of this salvage and developed water. A consideration of these agreements is thus imposed.

At the outset it should perhaps be stated that none of these waters are used in virtue of riparian rights upon lands riparian to the stream, but are either diverted and consumed upon lands without its watershed, or used solely under claims by appropriation. In 1877, Loop and Meserve, owners of lands upon the west side of the stream and claiming water rights in the stream, entered into an agreement with the Cucamonga Water Company, claiming water rights in the stream for the use of lands and people on the east side thereof. At the time of this agreement each of the contracting parties claimed by pre-existing rights and titles. The substance of the agreement was that at the division dam the water should be divided equally between the parties; that the parties should, at their joint expense, develop the waters of the stream from their source to the division dam; that the development work should proceed with reasonable diligence until completed. Each party to the contract agreed to supply out of his moiety such water as any other person upon his side of the stream was entitled to.

In August, 1882, Loop and Meserve, the west side users, entered into a contract with Mills and Wicks, the substance of which agreement is that Loop and Meserve, reserving to themselves 1 miner's inch of water for every 8 acres of their lands, which water Mills and Wicks agreed to deliver to them, conveyed to Mills and Wicks any excess water over that amount. Mills and Wicks agreed to do development work for the purpose of increasing the flow of the water. This, obviously, it was for the interest of Mills and Wicks to do, since the excess over the amount which was to go to Loop and Meserve was their own. It is to be remembered, however, that this agreement affected only the waters to which the west side users were entitled, and in no way affected the waters of the east side users. Moreover, time was made of the essence of the contract as to the work of development. A deed in consummation of the agreement was placed in escrow to be delivered upon the performance by Mills and Wicks of their part of the contract. The deed was placed in escrow and was delivered to Mills and Wicks in April, 1885, whereby it was established, as between the parties, that the covenants, the performance of which Mills and Wicks had undertaken, had been fully complied with, and thus Mills and Wicks were relieved from any obligation of making any further water developments. And, finally, there is established not only this complete performance by Mills and Wicks, but the contract does not attempt to impose the duty of any further or future developments upon the assigns of Mills and Wicks. The Chaffey's had succeeded to the interest of the Cucamonga Water Company, and consequently to such transitive rights and duties as were imposed under the contract of 1877 with Loop and Meserve. In 1882 the Chaffey's in turn made an agreement with Mills and Wicks, by which contract it was agreed that all the waters of the stream were to be allowed to run undisturbed to the division dam, where the waters were to be divided into two equal parts, which parts were to be taken by the respective parties to the contract. "At said dam all waters flowing into or over said dam shall be divided into two equal parts," etc. It was further agreed that all development of the canyon was to be at the joint and equal expense of the parties in accordance with their plans first agreed upon. Subsequently, in December, 1882, Mills and Wicks conveyed their rights to the plaintiff the Pomona Land & Water Company, while the defendant the San Antonio Water Company succeeded to all the rights of the Chaffey's. Then, finally, upon April 23, 1897, the plaintiff the Pomona Land & Water Company entered into an agreement with the defendant the San Antonio Water Company and in pursuance of that agreement conveyed its rights in the waters of the stream to the San Antonio Water Company. Thus the defendant the San Antonio Water Company has come to be the owner of all the rights in the waters formerly belonging to Mills and Wicks, the Chaffey's, and the San Antonio Water Company. (It also acquired the Dexter right, as has been above stated, but that right is a matter for separate consideration.)

The agreement of the San Antonio Water Company with the Pomona Land & Water Company is the only agreement to which it is directly a party, and by which it can be legally bound. Of course, in taking the rights of the Pomona Company, as in taking the Chaffey's' rights, it took cum onere and subject to all the legal burdens which, by the express terms of the preceding contracts or by necessary implication of law, devolved upon it; and the especial obligation which plaintiffs insist was thus cast upon the San Antonio Company is that of the duty to do work of development to increase the flow of the water, which increased flow should be for the mutual benefit of the west side and east side users. Or that, if it were not the duty of the defendant to do such development work, still, if it did do it, the result is the same, and the plaintiffs acquire a right in the new water. But, if this is so, since the defendant the San Antonio Water Company was not a party to any of the earlier contracts, and since no such obligation is in terms imposed upon it by its contract with the Pomona Land & Water Company, it must follow that these earlier contracts contained a covenant carrying with it the transitive quality of binding those who did not personally incur the obligation. But the covenants, and the only covenants which bear this quality, are covenants which run with the land, and the only covenants which run with the land are those which are found in section 1462 et seq. of the Civil Code. "Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land." Civ. Code, § 1462. Clearly, none of these earlier contracts contain any such covenant. Fresno Canal Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 118, 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112. There is no privity of estate or tenure here. There is no grant of an estate. Thus, says Erle, J., in Cole v. Hughes, 54 N. Y. 444, 13 Am. Rep. 611: "There is a wide difference between the transfer of the burden of a covenant running with the land and the benefit of the covenant, or, in other words, of the liability to fulfill the covenant, and the right to exact the fulfillment. The benefit will pass with the land to which it is incident; but the burden or liability will be confined to the original covenantor, unless the relation of privity of estate or tenure exists or is created between the covenantor and the covenantee at the time when the covenant is made." "The obligation of all contracts is ordinarily limited to those by whom they are made, and if privity of contract be dispensed with, its absence must be supplied by privity of estate." 1 Smith's Leading Cases, p. 178, note. The covenants then touching this matter were not founded in grant, so there was no privity of estate between the parties at the time the covenants were made. They were merely personal covenants binding only upon the covenantors. In the contract of December, 1877, the provision as to development work was that it should be done at the joint expense of the parties, and should proceed with reasonable diligence until completed. It cannot be said that such an agreement binds the defendant who was not a party nor privy to the contract, and whose development work was done 30 years after. So, too, as to the agreement made by the west side users with Mills and Wicks. The development which Mills and Wicks were called upon by their contract to do they had done, and it was not incumbent upon them to do anything more. In short, the rights and duties of the San Antonio Water Company are governed in this regard entirely by the contract which it made with the Pomona Land & Water Company. That agreement makes provision for the 312 inches which is to be diverted to the Pomona side under the conditions above stated (that is to say, no more than that, under any circumstances, and one-half of the flow when the amount shall be less than 624 inches); provides, after expressly excepting the Dexter claim of 20 inches, that "all the waters of San Antonio creek and its tributaries shall be allowed to flow undiminished to said point of diversion"; provides that the San Antonio Water Company shall be entitled to all water in excess of the 312 inches which is to be diverted to the Pomona side; contains the covenant upon the part of the San Antonio Water Company that it will "never by any development or works which it may or shall make or do in the San Antonio canyon, or any of its tributaries, diminish the flow of water to said users below the said amount of 312 inches which they are now and long have been entitled to receive"; provides that the waters shall be permitted to flow to said users as they are now and have been long permitted to flow, and nothing in the agreement shall enlarge or abridge the rights of the users of water; and San Antonio Water Company shall be under no higher or greater obligations to the users of water (represented by the Pomona Land & Water Company) under or by virtue of this agreement than it has been in the past, except to deliver water into the said Pomona conduit as herein directed. Then, finally, it declares that "it is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that if in future the party of the second part [the San Antonio Water Company] shall construct a pipe line in said San Antonio canyon, in such event said party of the second part herein shall deliver to the users of water hereinbefore referred to the water which said users of water are now, under and by virtue of said deeds and agreements, entitled to at the intake, where now such users of water receive the water to which they are entitled from the San Antonio creek at the point known as the division dam." Having in mind the fact that the parties were, and for years had been, using the surface flow of the stream, and that surface flow only as and when it reached the division dam, that the contract provides for the uninterrupted or rather undiminished flow to the division dam, and that the water which is to be divided is the water then flowing at this point of division, the conclusion is irresistible that the plaintiffs' rights have become fixed, and are measured by their proportion of the natural flow of the stream when that flow reaches, without hindrance or diminution, the division dam. But this is a very different proposition from that contended for by plaintiffs, wherein they insist upon their proportionate share of any water over and above that natural flow which may be developed or saved. To such water we are of opinion that they show no right at all. There is not here involved any question of impairment of quality or quantity by the use of the pipe line. The facts then stand that by use of this pipe line defendant brings down and delivers to plaintiffs the one-half of the surface flow at the division dam to which they are entitled, and the circumstance that, in addition, the defendant rescues and devotes to beneficial use an additional quantity of water affords no grievance to the plaintiffs, so long as that additional quantity is determined with the nicest exactness possible.

We thus come to the question of how much water was actually saved by the pipe line; that is to say, how much water in excess of that which would reach the division dam does the pipe line carry, for to that excess defendant is clearly entitled. The defendant contends for 19 per cent., and put in evidence the elaborate measurements which it made by clock work, covering a period of some four months, and the testimony of competent engineers in explanation and support of those measurements. Upon this question the court found that the defendants have not saved 19 per cent. of the water; that the average measurement showed a saving of 19 per cent.; that the measurements did not show any uniform percentage of loss, but by many it appeared that the loss was greater than 19 and by others that it was less, and that the percentages claimed to be saved varied from 13 per cent. to 22 per cent., and that no fixed percentage would fairly represent the so-called salvage; and that to determine the amount saved at all the various stages of water in different seasons, and different times in the same season, could only be ascertained by constant measurements every year and throughout the year. This finding amounts to a mere negation, but in the view which the court took, that whatever water was saved belonged in equal portions to plaintiffs and defendants, an exact finding as to the amount saved was immaterial. Under the view here expressed, that defendant is entitled to the water saved, it becomes necessary for the court to find specifically upon this matter. The difficulty which the court experienced in arriving at the facts is not an unusual one, but it is one which nevertheless must always be met. As was said in the early case of Butte v. Vaughn, 11 Cal. 143, 70 Am. Dec. 769: "There may be some difficulty in cases like the present, in determining with exactness the quantity of which parties are entitled to divert. Similar difficulty exists in the case of a mixture of wheat and corn. The quantity to be taken by each owner must be a matter of evidence. The courts do not, however, refuse the consideration of such subjects because of the complicated and embarrassing character of the questions to which they give rise. If exact justice cannot be obtained, an approximation to it must be sought, care being taken that no injury is done to the innocent party." It will, therefore, be the duty of the trial court, upon a rehearing of this matter, with the evidence before it, to determine with such exactness as may be possible the percentage of salvage water.

What has been said as to the salvage water is equally applicable to the water developed and carried by the pipe line along the bed of the creek. This pipe line, the court finds, collects and preserves an amount of water varying from 25 to 50 inches. The court finds as to this water that, under the changed mode of diversion by the Ontario pipe line, none of it reaches the dam, but if the old system of natural flow prevailed, then this water would flow to the division dam, or would go to support and sustain the surface stream to the extent that the waters filled the soil and gravel beneath the surface stream. All this may be quite true, and yet afford no argument to support plaintiffs' claim to this water, nor yet any reason why there should be a return to the older system of diversion. It might be that it required 1,000 inches of water to fill the voids and to support a surface flow of 50 inches. Yet, as in the Muscuplabe Case, if the owner of the 50 inches received that amount of water, he could not assert any title to the 1,000 inches of water which, by a change in the mode of delivery, not to his injury was preserved from waste. So here, if plaintiffs get the one-half of the natural flow to which they are entitled delivered, unimpaired in quantity and quality, through a pipe line, they are not injured by the fact that other water, which otherwise would go to waste, as merely supporting the surface flow, was rescued. Nor can they lay claim to any of the water so saved.

2. The Dexter Claim. The origin and history of this claim has already been set forth, together with the disposition which the court made of it. Plaintiffs, as appellants upon this matter, insist that under the agreement of 1877 between Loop and Meserve and the Cucamonga Water Company, it was the duty of the Cucamonga Water Company to protect the predecessors of plaintiffs, and consequently plaintiffs themselves, against this Dexter claim, which was against the waters of the east side; that the same duty devolved upon the defendant; and that in the acquisition of this Dexter claim it was but performing the duty cast upon it by the contract of 1877; consequently that the Dexter water should come out of the moiety due to the east side users without impairment of the full one-half to which plaintiffs are entitled. But Dexter had obtained a judgment against plaintiff the Pomona Land & Water Company representing the parties to whom the west side water was distributed, and the Chaffey, who then held the title to the east side water, which judgment was a consent judgment, and was acquiesced in by all concerned. Moreover, in the contract between the Pomona Land & Water Company, as has been repeatedly pointed out, the Dexter 20 inches is recognized as an existing outstanding water right, and the division of the waters contemplated is repeatedly declared to be all the water at the division dam, excepting the Dexter claim to 20 inches. There can be no doubt, therefore, not only of the right of the defendant to acquire this outstanding and hostile water right, but, after acquiring it, to use the water as its own, within the limitations of the judgment which established the right. Herein it is contended by defendant that the judgment awarded to Dexter an absolute right to 20 inches, to be used wheresoever and in whatsoever way he deemed fit, and reference for a parallel judgment is made to the case of S. C. Investment Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 68, 77 Pac. 767. The judgment in the case at bar, after reciting that a stipulation had been filed and signed by the parties that judgment by consent "be entered in favor of defendant for twenty inches of water under a four inch pressure," etc., states: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiffs are entitled to the use, enjoyment, and control of all the water of San Antonio creek described in their complaint, save and except the amount of twenty inches, * * * and the defendant be and is hereby perpetually enjoined from diverting from said San Antonio creek any greater or larger amount than the twenty inches hereinabove described." It is well settled that resort may be had to the pleadings and issues joined thereunder to explain and to limit the language of a judgment. 23 Cyc. 1101; Van Fleet, Former Ad. § 376 et seq. In the Dexter Case it appears, by an inspection of the pleadings, that the action was for an injunction to restrain Dexter from diverting any of the waters of the stream. Dexter made answer that he was not interfering with the waters of the stream nor with any of plaintiffs' rights therein, saving as in his answer afterwards set forth, and in that answer he alleged ownership of riparian land and that he was using, and that there was necessary for use upon his land for irrigation and for domestic purposes, a perpetual flow of 80 inches of water. Under this condition of the pleadings, it was that the Dexter judgment was entered, and thus it clearly appears that Dexter's sole claim was 20 inches of water as riparian owner for domestic use and for purposes of irrigation upon the land which he owned. The estoppel of this judgment can go no further. Therefore the entire change in use made by defendants whereby none of the water is used upon the Dexter land, but all of it is transported to land without the watershed, is clearly a use not countenanced by the judgment, and one which, as the court finds, is injurious to plaintiffs. Because under the original use upon the riparian lands a large percentage of the water found its way back to the stream and so to the division dam, thus increasing the amount to which plaintiffs were entitled. The use of the defendants wholly eliminated this water. It follows, therefore, that the use of the water now made by defendants does not derive support from the Dexter judgment, nor yet from the subsequent use of Gird, Dexter's grantee, who used the water as Dexter had used it. But the defendants for a long time had openly and notoriously, and under this claim of right, diverted the water by flume at a point immediately above the division dam, and had not allowed the water to flow over that dam for division and distribution. To the extent of 18 inches the court finds that the defendants thus had acquired a prescriptive title, and the findings to this effect are fully supported by the evidence. It follows, therefore, that as to the Dexter claim the defendants are entitled to 18 inches of water and no more.

For these reasons it is ordered that the appeals of plaintiffs be denied; that such part of the judgment as is appealed from by defendants touching their claim to the salvage water and to the water impounded by the pipe line in the bed of the creek be reversed, with directions to the trial court to determine the percentage or amount of water so saved or developed, which said amount, with the 18 inches to which defendant (San Antonio Water Company) has acquired prescriptive title growing out of the Dexter claim, may first be taken by defendant, after which the remaining waters are to be divided as in the judgment provided. The defendants' appeal from that portion of the judgment affecting the Dexter claim is also denied. Defendants will recover their costs upon appeal.

SAN FRANCISCO SULPHUR CO. v. ÆTNA INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 369.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 9, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1908.)

ATTACHMENT — UNDERTAKINGS — ACTIONS — PLEADING.

In an action on an undertaking to procure the release of an attachment, a complaint which fails to allege that defendant executed or delivered the undertaking is bad on demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Sulphur Company against the Ætna Indemnity Company. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Geo. F. Hatton and H. F. Peart (Franklin P. Nutting, of counsel), for appellant. Wm. J. Herrin, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to recover upon an undertaking given to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco in order to procure the release of an attachment. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the same was overruled.

It is claimed that there is no allegation that defendant ever made, executed, or delivered the undertaking attached to the complaint as an exhibit, and that for this reason the judgment is erroneous, and the demurrer should have been sustained. Upon examination, we can find no allegation in the complaint that defendant ever made, executed, or delivered the contract upon which recovery is sought. It is elementary that, in order to state a cause of action against a surety upon an undertaking, the complaint must in some way allege or show that the defendant executed or delivered the undertaking. Seattle Crochery Co. v. Haley, 6 Wash. 302, 33 Pac. 650, 36 Am. St. Rep. 156; Petty v. Church, 70 Ind. 290. The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the trial court is directed to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time in which to amend its complaint, if so advised.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 9, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1908.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Sulphur Company, a corporation, against the Ætna Indemnity Company, a corporation. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Geo. F. Hatton and H. F. Peart (Franklin P. Nutting, of counsel), for appellant. Wm. J. Herrin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It having been stipulated that the judgment in this case shall follow that of the same entitled case, No. 369 (this day decided) supra, the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is therefore reversed, and the trial court is directed to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time in which to amend its complaint if so advised.

MYERS v. KENYON et al. (Civ. 400.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 12, 1907.)

1. DEDICATION—ESTOPPEL TO DENY DEDICATION.

One who platted a block into lots with an alleyway through the center thereof, sold lots with reference to a map on which the alleyway is marked, and received the price, was es-topped from asserting title to the alleyway and closing it as a right of way.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Dedication, §§ 34-47.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

A purchaser of land covered by an alleyway through the center of a block, on each side of which was a line of houses with gates opening into it, was not an innocent purchaser, and acquired the land subject to the burden imposed on it by the vendor who platted the block into lots with an alleyway through the center thereof, and who conveyed lots with reference to the alleyway.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 488, 545-547.]

3. EASEMENTS—SUIT TO QUIET TITLE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a suit to quiet title to a right of way over a strip through the center of a block, the legal title to which was in defendant, plaintiff claimed that the right of way was based on the act of the grantor of defendant in platting the block into lots with an alleyway through the center thereof, and conveying the lots with reference to the alleyway, evidence of the acts of the grantor with reference to buildings on the lots, gates opening on the alleyway, and statements to intending purchasers of lots was admissible.

4. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—IDENTIFICATION OF DOCUMENT.

Where a book of maps containing a map of a block platted by the deceased owner was delivered by the widow of the deceased to the attorney for his estate, it was proper to receive the testimony of the attorney for the purpose of identifying the book; the fact that the map existed, and that it was a map delivered to the attorney by the widow, going to its identity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 1056.]

5. WITNESSES—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

The delivery by the widow of a deceased owner of a map of a block platted by the deceased to the attorney for the estate of the deceased was not a privileged communication from client to attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 759-762.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action to quiet title by C. E. Myers against Silas T. Kenyon and others. From an order denying a motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stoney, Rouleau & Stoney, H. B. Montague, and A. S. Newburgh, for appellants. Edward F. Treadwell, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to quiet the plaintiff's title to a right of way over a strip of land 18 feet in width, the fee of which is in defendants. Defendants deny that the plaintiff is the owner of the right of way, and ask to have their title quieted as against the plaintiff. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff. This appeal is from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial.

The question is as to whether or not the plaintiff is the owner of the alleged right of way. The court finds in effect that the defendants' predecessors and grantors dedicated the said strip of land as an alleyway about the year 1883, and that ever since the plaintiff has openly, notoriously, continuously, and peaceably, under a claim of right so to do, and adversely, used said strip of land as an alleyway for ingress and egress to and from the lot of land owned by plaintiff and particularly described in the complaint. The findings are fully supported by the evidence, which we do not deem necessary to state in detail.

Prior to the year 1883 one Comerford was the owner of Horner's addition block 94, in the city and county of San Francisco, bounded by Duncan and Twenty-Seventh, Church and Sanchez streets, and was engaged in the business of building houses and selling them. He subdivided this block into lots fronting on Duncan and Twenty-Seventh streets 105 feet deep, which left a strip of land running through the block from Church to Sanchez street 18 feet wide, cutting the block in the center, the lots on the north side of the alley fronting on Twenty-Seventh street, and those on the south side fronting on Duncan street. Comerford built houses on the block, the back fences of the lots being on the line of the alleyway, with gates opening thereon. Each house so built covered the entire width of its lot, and had a back gate for an exit into the alleyway, or for an entrance from the alleyway. Comerford sold the lots with reference to this alleyway after he had so laid out the lots with the alleyway 18 feet wide, and stated to purchasers of the lots that the alleyway would be convenient for the owners. When plaintiff purchased his lot, he was shown a map in Comerford's office, on which the alleyway was laid out and platted. Comerford had a book in which he had all his property in San Francisco platted, and in which this block was platted with the alleyway laid out and marked "Comerford street." The alleyway, after being so opened, laid out, and platted, was at all times used, and has up to the present time been used, continuously by plaintiff and by all the other residents of the block as an open alleyway, without let or hindrance, and with no objection from Comerford during his lifetime. The owner of the block of land, having subdivided it into 50 lots, leaving an alleyway through the center, 25 lots on each side of it, and having sold the lots with reference to the map and alleyway, and received the money therefor from the purchasers of the lots, would be estopped from afterwards asserting title to the alleyway and closing it up as a right of way. Having left it open and upon the map while selling the lots, and receiving the money, he must continue to leave it open afterwards. Common honesty would require of such owner that he should not deceive or mislead any purchaser or sell him a lot under false pretenses. If, after the lots were sold, the owner could change his mind and close the ends of the alley, and use it as a stock corral, the owners of the lots would find their back gates opening into the corral. The law will compel the owner to keep the alleyway open for the use of the owners of the lots in such case. It must follow that all subsequent purchasers would purchase with notice. One cannot purchase the land covered by such alleyway, with a line of houses on each side of it, and gates opening into it, it being in continual use every day, without opening his eyes and looking. In such case he cannot claim to be an innocent purchaser. He would get the title in fee to the land, but subject to the burden imposed upon it by the former owner. It needs no citation of authorities to sustain the principles here stated.

The defendants claim that the court erred in the admission of certain evidence referred to in exceptions 2 to 9, inclusive. The evidence related to the acts and conduct of Comerford in 1883 with reference to buildings upon the lots, back gates, maps, and statements to intending purchasers. The evidence was admissible, and went to the very essence of the plaintiff's case.

It was not error to receive the evidence of the witness Drum, for the purpose of identifying a book of maps in his possession as attorney for the estate of Comerford, deceased. The book contained the map of the block on which the alleyway was marked and laid out by Comerford in his lifetime. The fact that the map existed, that it was a map delivered to the witness by the widow of the deceased, went to its identity, and the "delivery of the map was not a privileged communication from client to attorney." It would be a strange doctrine that a client could deliver a map, deed, contract, or other document into the hands of his attorney, and then prevent such map or other document from ever being brought to light or produced, for the reason that such delivery was a privileged communication.

No other question is raised that merits discussion.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MALTAIS. (Cr. 55.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Dec. 13, 1907.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Harry Maltais was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

B. K. Collier, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was accused by information of having on January 5, 1907, at the county of Siskiyou, unlawfully and feloniously stolen $80, lawful money of the United States, then and there the personal property of one J. Root, contrary, etc. He was found guilty of grand larceny and sentenced to four years' imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin.

Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. He urges as grounds of appeal: First, that the evidence is insufficient, generally, to sustain the verdict; second, that the evidence is insufficient particularly, because the venue was not proven; third, that the court erred in overruling the objection made to a certain question asked by the prosecution of witness Ladue on cross-examination.

There is evidence tending to establish the following facts: Root, the complaining witness, came to the town of Dunsmuir from a lumber camp where he had been working, about midnight, or later, of January 4, 1905. He had come by way of Castella, where he had been drinking intoxicants to some extent. Arriving at Dunsmuir, he went to the Palm saloon, which was a rooming house as well as a saloon, and resumed his drinking and remained there at times most of the night. He went across the street during the night to the Weed restaurant, and had supper, and there met defendant, whom he had not before known or seen. He returned to the Palm saloon and defendant followed him. Root treated defendant and others several times, and finally toward the morning of January 5th asked for a room. He brought with him something over $100 in $20 gold pieces and some silver. When treating in the saloon, he displayed his purse and its contents in a way to apprise defendant of what money he had. When he asked for a room, defendant offered to show him to it, and did so, taking the key and unlocking the door. As Root was about starting to his room, he again made known his possession of the money in the hearing of defendant. On reaching the room, defendant returned to the saloon and got a couple of drinks, and took them to the room, where he and Root drank them. Root had meanwhile undressed and got in bed, placing his trousers under the pillow, leaving their legs hanging out. After drinking defendant left the room and Root went to sleep, not locking the door. He arose about 11 o'clock of that forenoon, and went down to the saloon, called for a drink, and, upon getting his purse, discovered that all the $20 gold pieces were gone. He found in his coat pocket a $10 bill which had been given him in part as change for a $20 gold piece during his drinking carousal and some small silver. There was evidence that he had at least four $20 pieces when he went to bed. Some time near noon of January 5th defendant deposited in the Dunsmuir State Bank four $20 gold pieces, and it was the only time he had ever deposited any money there or transacted any business with the bank. At the time he remarked to the cashier, "You won't say anything about this on the outside, will you?" There was evidence that defendant was working in the Weed restaurant at $1.25 per day and board, and that he had been seen previously by persons who knew him and that he appeared to have no money except some small change. He cashed his certificate of deposit at the Weed Hotel on January 7th. Mr. Weed testified that he had known defendant as Moltin, and he had so signed his name and Weed called his attention to the name in the certificate as Maltals, to which defendant replied that it was a mistake though he had so signed his name at the bank. When Root started to go to his room, defendant said he knew about the rooms and would show him where to go, and there was evidence tending to show that defendant had never roomed there.

Defendant introduced some testimony tending to show that about Christmas he had one or two $20 pieces, part of which he spent in saloons about that time, and that on December 31st defendant had drawn a chance at a raffle calling for $1.25, but he "said he didn't have the money. Said he would pay for it that evening. He was working at the Weed lunch counter then. He came back that evening and paid it." Defendant testified that when he came to Dunsmuir he had about $100, part of which he spent at saloons, but that the money deposited by him was his own which he had brought with him to that town. He explained that he deposited the money "so as not to gamble it away." He explained that he told the cashier not to mention the deposit because "parties would borrow it" if they knew he had it. He also testified: "I never before that time made a deposit of money in Dunsmuir. I never had enough at a time when I was there before to make a deposit." He had arrived at Dunsmuir with this and other money, amounting to over $100, according to his testimony, on December 22d, but he did not explain why he had not deposited the money before the morning of January 5th. It is not necessary to further notice the testimony. It is chiefly circumstantial, and not strongly inculpatory, but we cannot say that it was wholly insufficient to justify the verdict of guilty. People v. Wong Chong Suey, 110 Cal. 117, 42 Pac. 420. The venue was distinctly proved. The testimony upon the point was doubtless overlooked by defendant's attorney in preparing his brief.

A witness had testified to defendant's having two $20 gold pieces when he came into witness' saloon; that he had spent $5 or $6 there at that time. On cross-examination he was asked: "And he may have spent that much or more in every saloon in town that day, so far as you know?" The record shows that, while the court overruled defendant's objection to the question, the witness made no answer.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Grant Trask was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Gibson, for appellant. Attorney General Webb and W. H. Langdon, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment convicting defendant of the crime of robbery, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only reasons suggested why the judgment and order should be reversed grow out of the method adopted by the trial court for the impanelment of the jury to try defendant. Immediately after the first 12 names had been drawn, and the persons so drawn had been sworn to answer questions, the judge of the court examined each of them as to his qualifications, and each by his answers showed himself possessed of all the statutory qualifications, and each answered that he had never heard of the case, did not know any of the parties, counsel, or witnesses, and had no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and had never expressed any such opinion. The judge thereupon announced that all of the jurors appeared prima facie to be qualified jurors, but that either counsel could challenge either one or all of the jurors for any statutory cause, and, if such challenge was not denied by opposing counsel, the challenge would be allowed, and the juror excused without further examination; but that, if the challenge was denied by opposing counsel, then, on the issue so made, the juror challenged could be questioned and examined by counsel on both sides. The judge further gave at some length his reasons for the course thus adopted, making it quite clear that he did not consider that counsel had any right to examine a juror on the voir dire in advance of a challenge to such juror.

The brief of appellant is almost entirely devoted to a discussion of what he claims to be error in this action of the court. But he nowhere points out where the bill of exceptions shows that he either objected or excepted to this action of the court, and after a diligent examination of the bill of exceptions we have not been able to find any such objection or exception noted therein. Nowhere do we find that defendant's counsel objected to the court examining the jurors, or that he expressed any wish to examine them as to their qualifications before challenging, except that he did ask to be allowed to put three stated questions to each juror "solely for the purpose of determining whether he should exercise peremptory challenges." Defendant having reserved no exception to the action of the court above set forth, we are not called upon to determine whether the course adopted by the court was erroneous or not.

Defendant asked permission to ask of each juror, before challenging either of them for cause, three questions, viz.: Where do you live? What is your business? Are you a man of family? "solely for the purpose of determining whether he should exercise his peremptory challenges," as he himself stated. The court refused to allow such questions to be put by counsel, or to put them himself, but stated that counsel could ask them subsequently should they become relevant or material to any challenge that might be interposed. To this ruling defendant reserved an exception. The court, however, did not err in so ruling. Defendant is not entitled to put questions simply for the purpose of gaining information as to the advisability of exercising peremptory challenges. People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 382; People v. Brittan, 118 Cal. 409, 50 Pac. 664. Defendant successively challenged each of the jurors "under subdivision 2 of section 1073 of the Penal Code," that is, for actual bias and, each of said challenges being denied by the district attorney, defendant asked each of said jurors the following questions, and no others, viz.: (1) Have you ever served as a juror on a charge of robbery? (2) how long have you served as a juror in this department of the superior court? (3) how many men have you ever convicted for robbery? and (4) what is your age? The court sustained the objection made by the district attorney that the questions were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial to the issue being tried, and the defendant excepted. An answer to any of the above questions could not have tended to show the state of mind of the juror with reference to the case or to either of the parties. The questions were therefore irrelevant and immaterial to the question then being tried, and the objections were properly overruled. People v. Brittan, 118 Cal. 409, 50 Pac. 664. No other evidence being offered, the court properly overruled the challenge to each of said jurors.

There being no other reasons suggested why the judgment or order should be reversed, both judgment and order are affirmed.

WEST v. WILL C. PRATHER & CO.
(Civ. 459.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Dec. 4, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—EXECUTION—REPUDIATION—ESTOPPEL.

Plaintiff, having a lease of a hotel from defendant, agreed with its president to cancel the same and surrender possession to defendant in consideration of its guaranteeing to pay certain sums specified in the contract, and furnish plaintiff board and room in the hotel for a year, or at his option pay him $25 per month in lieu thereof. Plaintiff delivered possession, canceled the lease, and defendant immediately leased the property to another. Plaintiff remained at the hotel for 10 days, when defendant paid for his board and room up to that time, and denied further obligation under the contract. Held, that though the contract was defectively executed, so that the acceptance and retention of benefits would not constitute a ratification as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 2309, 2310, the facts constituted an estoppel precluding the corporation from repudiating the contract.

2. SAME—OFFICERS—AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of a corporation's contract executed between plaintiff and its president, plaintiff having testified that he called at the company's office on two occasions where he talked with such president, the question as to who was operating the business there was admissible to show the president's implied powers, and that he was its managing agent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 1735.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by L. M. West against Will C. Prather & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thornton Alexander, for appellant. Jones & Drake, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Judgment was rendered herein for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

The action is based upon a contract alleged to have been made between the parties, whereby plaintiff, who was in possession of a hotel under a lease thereof, agreed to cancel said lease and surrender possession of the property, with certain furnishings, to defendant, who agreed to guarantee payment of certain sums specified in said contract and furnish plaintiff room and board in said hotel for a period of one year; or, at its option, pay him at the rate of $25 per month in lieu thereof. Plaintiff alleges that, pursuant to the terms of the contract, he canceled the lease and delivered possession of the hotel and other property mentioned in the contract to defendant, who immediately leased the same to another party. Plaintiff remained at the hotel for 10 days, when defendant paid the proprietor the sum of $8.33, covering the cost of his room and board for such time, and denied any further obligation under said contract.

Defendant is a corporation and the transaction is admittedly within its powers. No corporate seal was attached to the contract, but it was signed: "Will C. Prather & Co., Will C. Prather, Prest." The defense is that said Prather as president of said company had no authority to execute the contract on its behalf, and therefore the court erred in receiving said contract in evidence unaccompanied as it was by a copy of the resolution authorizing its execution. The uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff delivered the property to the corporation, and that it, within a few hours after the execution of the contract, placed another party in possession of the premises under a new lease, from whom it collected rent. Prather, on behalf of the company, had charge of all the negotiations relating to the transaction, and subsequent lease of the hotel. Having by virtue of this contract obtained a cancellation of plaintiff's lease, the transfer of certain personal property, and ousted plaintiff from possession of the hotel, which it leases to another party, the defendant by its counsel solemnly avers that the act of its president in executing the contract on its behalf was unauthorized. The evidence is sufficient to show that Prather was held out by the corporation as possessing the authority which he assumed. Crowley v. Genesee Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273; Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527. The company, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, imparted through its president acting in its behalf, accepted and retained the benefits of the transaction. Conceding the contract to be one required to be in writing, and defectively executed by reason whereof such acceptance and retention of benefits would not constitute a ratification (sections 2309, 2310, Civ. Code), the facts nevertheless constitute an estoppel against the attempted repudiation of the contract on the part of the corporation (Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252).

It is also contended that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the question put to the plaintiff, as follows: "Who was operating the business there?" Plaintiff had testified to calling at the office of the company upon two occasions, where he had talked with Prather. Appellant admits the purpose of the question was to elicit evidence tending to show Prather's implied powers and that he was managing agent of the company. Such being its purpose, the ruling of the court upon the objection was not error.

Our views render it unnecessary to discuss the ruling of the court in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by M. G. Bray against D. S. Cohn. From a judgment for defendant on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Charles W. Slack and T. M. McNamara, for respondent.

HART, J. A demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that this action was barred by the provisions of section 339, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc., was sustained, without leave to amend, and thereafter judgment entered in favor of respondent. From said judgment, this appeal is taken.

On the 30th day of January, 1899, the respondent, Cohn, executed and delivered to the Bank of British Columbia, at the city of San Francisco, his promissory note for the sum of $3,000, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, said note being payable one day after date. At the request of Cohn, and for the purpose of enabling him to secure said money, and "as part of the same transaction," one Moses Samuel, in writing, promised and agreed with said Bank of British Columbia "that, if said defendant did not pay said promissory note, he [said Samuel] would pay the same." On or about the 30th day of January, 1899, Cohn departed from the state of California, and did not return until about the 23d day of July, 1901, and defendant during the period between the said 30th day of January, 1899, and the said 23d day of July, 1901, was absent from the state. Shortly after Cohn's departure from the state, the Bank of British Columbia made a demand on Samuel for payment of accrued interest upon the note, which interest was paid by him, and the said Samuel continued, upon the demand of said bank, to pay the interest accruing from time to time on said note until the 7th day of August, 1900, when, written demand having previously been made upon him by the bank for its payment, Samuel paid the principal and the unpaid interest upon said note. Thereupon, the complaint alleges, the bank surrendered and delivered said note to said Moses Samuel. Thereafter Samuel assigned the note to the plaintiff, who filed his complaint, declaring upon said note, on the 15th day of June, 1905, a little less than four years after the return of the defendant to the state.

The contention of the appellant is that the payment by his assignor of the note and the surrender and delivery to him of the same by the bank amounted to an assignment thereof, and that, therefore, he was subrogated to all the rights exercisable by the original payee thereunder. Upon this assumption (and if well founded his contention would be true) he claims that he was entitled to institute suit for recovery upon the note at any time within four years from the date of the return of the defendant to this state. In support of this position, appellant relies upon section 2848 of the Civil Code, and insists that section 1473 of said Code has no application to sureties. The respondent, on the other hand, maintains that section 1473 of the Civil Code does govern the rights of sureties in a case like the present one, and that consequently the payment of the note by Samuel, who was a surety, extinguished its obligation, and that his only remedy against the principal obligor was by an action upon an implied obligation; that is, in assumpsit for money expended for and in behalf of the defendant. The question presented by the demurrer is no longer an open one in this state. Section 2848 of the Civil Code provides that a surety, upon satisfying the obligation of the principal, is entitled to enforce every remedy which the creditor then has against the principal to the extent of reimbursing what he has expended, and section 2849 of the same Code declares that a "surety is entitled to the benefit of every security for the performance of the principal obligation held by the creditor, or by a co-surety at the time of entering into the contract of suretyship, or acquired by him afterwards," etc. Those sections are construed by the appellant as having the effect of perpetuating the life of the obligation after the debt has been paid, and passes for enforcement to the surety, who has made payment. But our appellate courts have, in some comparatively late cases, given those sections an interpretation which does not harmonize with the views of the appellant. Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 578, 65 Pac. 1094. In that case, in which the point under discussion is elaborately and exhaustively considered, it is said: "In this state, as early as 1862, in the case of Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 130, it was decided, in effect, that by the surety's payment the principal obligation was extinguished, and that the action of the surety was upon the assumpsit which the law implies where a surety is compelled to advance money for his principal. That there might be no room for controversy, with the enactment of the Code the question was laid at rest in this state by the declaration that the full performance of the obligation by any person on behalf of the principal with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes the obligation"—citing section 1473 of the Civil Code.

The more recent case of Crystal v. Hutton, 1 Cal. App. 251, 81 Pac. 1115, reaffirms the rule as declared in Yule v. Bishop, supra, and cites a large number of California cases to the same effect. In that case the appellate court, speaking through Presiding Justice Chipman, says: "However the question may be regarded elsewhere, we think the rule firmly settled in this state that payment by the surety of the obligation evidenced by a promissory note under the circumstances shown in the complaint extinguishes the obligation, and that the remedy given the surety in such case is upon the implied obligation of the principal debtor to reimburse the surety 'what he has expended.'"

The remedy of the plaintiff being, therefore, upon the implied obligation, it was his duty, in order to have preserved his right of action, to have brought his suit within two years from the date of the return of the defendant to the state. Having failed to do this, the demurrer was properly sustained upon the ground that his right of action was barred. The judgment is affirmed.

LINDLEY v. BLUMBERG et al. (Civ. 426.)
(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Dec. 18, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1908; Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY — INCONSISTENT TESTIMONY.

Positive testimony on direct examination, though inconsistent with that given on cross-examination, is sufficient to support a finding of the trial court.

2. TRUSTS—RESULTING TRUST—PART PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION — RELATION BETWEEN PARTIES.

Where a wife contributes $800 to a $1,750 payment on land purchased in her husband's name and a mortgage is given for the balance, a resulting trust arises in favor of the wife for sixteen thirty-fifths of the property and in favor of the community for the balance.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that a conveyance by a husband to his wife was for a valuable consideration.

4. CONTRACTS—"VALUABLE CONSIDERATION."

Valuable consideration is such as money or the like, and the adequacy or inadequacy of the amount or its disproportion to the actual value of the property does not affect the question of the kind of consideration, since the adequacy of consideration is merely an element of good faith, and has no bearing upon whether the consideration is a valuable or good one.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, §§ 222-232.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7271-7273.]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—PURCHASE PRICE — PAYMENT.

Plaintiff leased premises for five years, with the privilege of buying at any time during the life of the lease. He built a barn upon the premises, and paid the rent for three years, and then sought specific performance of the option to purchase. Held, that the rent paid and the cost of the barn were not payments on the purchase price of the property, but, considered most favorably to plaintiff, were merely payments for the right to buy at a specified price within a certain time.

6. SAME—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

To entitle a party to protection as a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for value, as against the title of a grantee under a prior unrecorded deed, he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith, without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment. Hence, where one holding an option to purchase land had notice of a prior unrecorded deed, before he exercised the option or paid the purchase price he is not a bona fide purchaser, and cannot recover.

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—RELATION—RECOVERY OF PART PAYMENT.

If plaintiff made a payment under an option to purchase land belonging to defendant under a prior unrecorded deed, of which he had no notice, and both plaintiff and defendant acted in good faith, plaintiff could recover from defendant only the amount actually paid before notice of defendant's rights, since he is protected only to the extent that he is hurt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 412-419.]

8. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Civ. Code, § 1214, provides that a conveyance of real property is void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration whose conveyance is first duly recorded. Plaintiff rented land for the term of five years, with an option to purchase during the life of the lease. Defendant held a prior unrecorded deed from plaintiff's lessor, which deed was not recorded until after the recording of the lease and option. Plaintiff built a barn on the premises and paid the rent, but did not offer to exercise the option until after the recording of defendant's deed. Held, that plaintiff was not a subsequent purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration within the meaning of the section.

9. SAME—DEFENSES—ESTOPPEL.

In an action for specific performance of an option to purchase land during the life of a five-year lease which contained the option, it appeared that defendant held a prior deed, which was not recorded until after the record of the lease and option; that defendant knew of the execution of the lease by her husband, who was her grantor, but did not know of the option it contained; and that plaintiff erected a barn on the premises in question, but there was no showing as to the time the barn was built and no attempt to exercise the option until after defendant's deed was recorded. Held, that defendant was not estopped to assert her title against plaintiff's option, there being no act or failure to act on her part which resulted in injury to plaintiff or which by unfair means gave her an advantage over him.

10. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—ALTERNATIVE RELIEF—DAMAGES—PRESUMPTION.

Where the court, in an action for specific performance of an option to purchase land during the life of a five-year lease which contained the option, found the value of the property at the time of making the lease and at the time of the trial, but there was no evidence or finding as to any value at any intervening time, it must be presumed that there was no increase in value from the time of making the lease up to the time plaintiff attempted to exercise his option, at which time he had constructive notice of defendant's prior deed from the lessor, and hence plaintiff could recover no damages for failure to convey.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 412-422.]

11. TRIAL—TRIAL BY COURT—FINDINGS—MATTERS ALLEGED BUT NOT PROVED.

In the absence of evidence to support an allegation necessary to be proved, the finding upon the issue raised thereby should be against the person making and failing to prove the allegation.

12. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

Though defendant asserts a claim to property, if no knowledge of the claim is brought home to plaintiff, he will not be affected by the assertion to others of the claim.

13. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—REMEDY AGAINST GRANTEE UNDER OR BY UNRECORDED DEED.

Where both parties acted in good faith, one holding possession of land under a lease and option to purchase which has been recorded is not entitled to compel specific performance of the option by the grantee claiming under a prior unrecorded deed from the same person.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by S. K. Lindley against Mrs. F. H. Blumberg and others. From a judgment for defendant Dina E. Simpson, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Chapman and Ward Chapman, for appellant. C. L. Shinn and McNutt & Hannon, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. This is an action to compel specific performance of an option to purchase real estate. The option is contained in a lease of the premises, which are the subject of the option. Judgment was for defendant Dina E. Simpson, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On the 17th day of January, 1901, William Simpson made a lease to plaintiff of the premises in dispute for the term of five years from that date, at a monthly rental of $10, payable quarterly in advance. The lease contained an option in the words and figures following, to wit: "The party of the first part hereby gives to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, the exclusive right to purchase said property for eighty ($80) dollars per front foot cash during the life of this lease, and upon payment of said amount agrees to furnish a good deed and unlimited certificate of title from Title Insurance & Trust Company, or Title Guarantee & Trust Company, of Los Angeles, showing said property clear of all incumbrance." This instrument was regularly recorded in the records of leases of Los Angeles county on January 28, 1901. On August 20, 1902, William Simpson died testate, and letters testamentary issued to the defendant Dina E. Simpson, his widow, as executrix, on the 24th day of September, 1902, and she thereupon qualified as such executrix. On September 23, 1902, the Union Bank of Savings, which had been the designated agent to receive the rent for said property, refused to receive the rent for the quarter beginning October, 1902, claiming to act upon notice given by Dina E. Simpson, both individually and as executrix. On October 2, 1902, Mrs. Simpson notified plaintiff that she was the owner in fee of the leased premises by virtue of a conveyance thereof to her by William Simpson by deed dated October 20, 1896. This deed was not recorded in the office of the recorder of Los Angeles county until August 22, 1902.

By a decree of distribution entered in the estate of William Simpson, deceased, on the 15th day of February, 1904, the whole of said estate was distributed to the defendant Dina E. Simpson, but the lot here in question was not described in said decree. On the 23d day of February, 1904, plaintiff, claiming to exercise his right of purchase under said option, offered to pay to defendant the purchase price for the lot in gold coin, as provided in the option given by William Simpson, but she refused to accept the same or to convey the property to plaintiff. Plaintiff paid all rent due to the time the above notice was given, and has regularly tendered that falling due since then, at the times specified in the lease, but defendant Simpson refused to receive such rent either as executrix or individually. A number of defenses, based upon allegations of weakness of mind of William Simpson, and acts of fraud and undue influence perpetrated in procuring the execution of the option, were presented by defendants' answer to the complaint; but, these were eliminated from consideration here by the rulings of the court upon the demurrer to the answer, and its findings of good faith upon the part of plaintiff in all transactions connected with the execution of the lease and option.

The court found that a valuable and adequate consideration was given for the lease and the option contained therein; that the property leased had no rental value in the market, and the premises were of the value of only $50 per front foot at the time of the execution of the writing containing the lease and option; that plaintiff erected a barn on said premises at a cost of $300 after said instrument was executed; that he would not have rented said premises or constructed said barn but for the option in said lease; that this fact was known to the lessor at the time the lease was made; that said contract was fair and just to the lessor; that plaintiff paid the rent to William Simpson up to the time of his death, and that the defendant Dina E. Simpson knew, or could have learned, that said payments were being made in pursuance of said lease; that she had knowledge of the making of the lease on the day it was executed, but did not know any of its terms until after its execution, and did not know that it contained the option until 10 days later; that plaintiff had no notice or information at the time of the execution of the lease that Dina E. Simpson had any right, title, or interest in the property. The findings upon which the judgment in favor of the defendant rests may be summarized as follows: She was not personally present at the time the lease was executed, and did not know its contents until 10 days thereafter. It is not true that the lease or option was given with her full knowledge or consent or acquiescence, and it is not true that at the time of the execution of said instrument, nor at any other time until the 2d of October, 1902, she did not assert or claim any right, title, or interest in said property, or make any objection to said lease or option, but she did not make any such objections to plaintiff until that date. The deed from William Simpson to her was for a valuable consideration and conveyed the title to the leased premises, and she was the owner of said property from the date of that deed. The market value of the premises have greatly increased since January 17, 1901, and the premises, at the time of the trial, were worth about $29,000. Plaintiff has received in rents from said premises more than sufficient to compensate him for the rents paid by him and the cost of the improvements placed on the property by him, and has been fully reimbursed and recouped for all expenditures made by him under said lease and option. The conclusions of the trial court from the facts found are that plaintiff is not a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith so as to entitle him to a specific performance of his contract against the defendant Dina E. Simpson, and that she is not estopped from asserting her title against the option of plaintiff. Appellant contends that the judgment is not supported by the findings; but, if the court so contrues the findings as to sustain the judgment, it should nevertheless reverse the judgment and order a new trial, because the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

The finding that the defendant Dina E. Simpson acquired the premises from her husband in 1896 for a valuable consideration is attacked by appellant upon his motion for a new trial as not being supported by the evidence in two respects—first, that the deed was not delivered; and, second, that a valuable consideration was not shown. In regard to the first matter, the testimony of the witness Samson, who drew the deed, is: "I drew it up, and I made it (the deed), and he signed it and delivered it to his wife, and she delivered it to me and wanted I should take care of it." It is contended that on cross-examination the testimony of the witness was inconsistent with his statement on direct examination. Assuming this to be true, the trial court might elect which, if either statement, it would believe, and the finding indicates which it accepted as true; but we do not think the two statements are necessarily inconsistent. The evidence shows that the lot was purchased in the name of Wm. Simpson in 1895 for $3,750—$1,750 in cash, and the balance secured by mortgage on the property. Eight hundred dollars of the de-defendant's money "went into the property." There is no showing whether this was a loan to William Simpson or a contribution to the cash paid for the property. If the former, the property became community property and William Simpson owed defendant $800; if the latter was the case, a resulting trust arose in favor of defendant to the extent of sixteen thirty-fifths and in favor of the community for the other nineteen thirty-fifths of the property. If William Simpson made the deed of October 20, 1896, to defendant in payment of an existing debt of $800 due to her from him, the consideration was a valuable one, and if he conveyed to her as trustee of a resulting trust she took sixteen thirty-fifths in execution of the trust and the rest, or community portion of the property, passed to her for the consideration mentioned in the deed—$1 and love and affection. If it were necessary to sustain the finding that the conveyance was for a valuable consideration, there is evidence sufficient to do so. Hussey v. Castle, 41 Cal. 241. A valuable consideration is such as money or the like and the adequacy or inadequacy of the amount, or its disproportion to the actual value of the property, does not affect the question of the kind of consideration. The adequacy of the consideration is an element of the good faith of the transaction, and has no bearing upon whether the consideration is a valuable or a good one. Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 342; Clark v. Troy, 20 Cal. 224. Mrs. Simpson, then, was the owner of the property at the time the premises were leased to the plaintiff, and when the latter purchased the option. Under the findings, these two contracts must be considered as one. The court found the property had no rental value at the time the lease was made. In the absence of any finding that it subsequently acquired a rental value, we may assume that the entire promise to pay $10 per month for five years was in consideration for the option. The erection of the $300 barn may also be attributed to plaintiff's desire to procure the option and as a part payment therefor. Taken in the most favorable light for the appellant, he paid $900 for the option, $300 in building a barn upon the premises, and the $600 which he obligated himself to pay at the rate of $10 per month, quarterly in advance, for five years.

This price paid and to be paid for the right to purchase within five years should not be confused with the purchase price of the property. The latter was to be $80 per front foot, whether the right was exercised the day following the execution of the option or the last day of the five years; so that the $900 was no part of the purchase price of the property. The option was purely executory in its character, and on October 2, 1902, when defendant notified appellant of her title to the property, no part of the purchase price of the lot had been paid, and plaintiff had not become a purchaser of the property. All his transactions were conducted in good faith, and for all that he had received he had given an adequate and valuable consideration, and the agreed price for the property was adequate at the time the option was given, and this was sufficient against the maker of the option; but he had not purchased the property. He did not exercise his right to do so under the option until February, 1904, one year and four months after he had notice of defendant's unrecorded deed.

To entitle a party to protection as a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for value against the title of a grantee under a prior unrecorded deed, he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, the purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith, and without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment; for if he had notice, actual or constructive, at any moment of time before the payment of the money, he is not a bona fide purchaser. Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 Pac. 641; Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 413, 33 Pac. 325; Beattie v. Crewdson, 124 Cal. 579, 57 Pac. 463; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 45, 73 Pac. 803. If it were conceded that the entire $900 were paid, and agreed to be paid, as part of the purchase price for the property (only the rent from January, 1901, to October, 1902, actually was paid), defendant would only be required to refund to plaintiff the amount paid by him before receiving notice of her right in order to enforce her claim to the property. Plaintiff is entitled to be protected only to the extent that he is hurt. Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 191, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; Combination Land Co. v. Morgan, 95 Cal. 552, 30 Pac. 1102. The finding of the court that he has been fully reimbursed and recouped for expenditures made by him under the lease and option recognizes his right to protection pro tanto. The conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff was not a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, as those terms are used in section 1214 of the Civil Code, is sustained by the record.

We are likewise unable to agree with appellant's contention that the conclusion of the trial court that respondent is not estopped from asserting her title against plaintiff's option is unsupported by the findings. In order that she should be estopped it is necessary that some act or failure to act upon her part should have resulted in injury to plaintiff, or in her acquiring some advantage over him by unfair means. In other words, to quote from appellant's brief: "To raise an equitable estoppel, the party estopped must by his declaration or conduct (or silence) mislead another to his prejudice so that it would be a fraud upon him to allow the true state of facts to be proved (Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300, 99 Am. Dec. 365), and the representations or conduct must either have been done with intent to deceive, or with such carelessness or culpable negligence as to amount to a constructive fraud (Griffeth v. Brown, 78 Cal. 260, 18 Pac. 372). The vital principle is that he who, by his language or conduct, leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done, shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted." Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580, 25 L. Ed. 618.

The question whether respondent is estopped by her acts or silence to set up her prior title against appellant's depends upon her knowledge of her husband's acts in relation to the leased property. At the time the lease was made respondent knew that her husband was going to lease the property. The same day, when her husband came home, she learned that the lease had been executed, and that he had leased it for a term of five years. She had no other knowledge of the contents of the lease or the option until 10 days thereafter. There is no evidence and no finding as to when the barn was erected upon the premises. It might have been and probably was built within 10 days after the execution of the lease and before respondent had knowledge of the option. Had she known of its construction, she would have been justified in assuming that it was built in order that plaintiff might use the premises to advantage under the lease. In the absence of evidence and finding, the presumption must be in support of the judgment. As respondent had no knowledge that the barn was constructed by reason of the option, no estoppel can be imputed to her on this account.

Plaintiff's status was not changed from that time until October 2, 1902, except by the payment of the $10 per month rent. The court finds the value of the property was $50 per front foot at the time of the making of the lease, and the value of the lot at the time of the trial (October, 1905) to be in gross $29,000. There is neither evidence nor finding to show value at any intervening time. There is nothing by which it can be determined how long the market value of the property continued at $50 per front foot. If, as appellant contends, he was prejudiced by being prevented from buying other property in the neighborhood at $50 or $80 per front foot and holding it until its value increased to $376 per front foot, this was not because of any act of respondent. In the absence of evidence or finding as to intermediate values, it will be presumed in support of the trial court's finding that respondent was not estopped, and that $50 per foot continued to be the value of the property until after appellant had notice of respondent's title and claim. Having had this notice before the rise in values, appellant cannot successfully contend that any loss or injury of this kind was due to the act of respondent. He was under no obligation to carry out the option or pay any part of the $80 per front foot purchase price, and could have released himself from the option by simply withdrawing at any time.

All the obligations entered into by appellant so far as the option was concerned were without knowledge of the respondent at the time the obligations were assumed. The appreciation in value of the property was after appellant had notice of respondent's title and information that she intended to maintain her rights against the option. It cannot therefore be said that appellant suffered any loss or injury on account of disappointing expectations for which respondent was responsible.

Finding 10 is attacked by appellant as unsupported by the evidence. This finding merely negatives certain allegations of the complaint, and when considered with finding 14 distinguishes between the knowledge upon the part of the respondent that the lease had been made and knowledge of its contents. The testimony of the respondent is that she and her husband had talked about leasing the property for three years, and that the agent who drew the lease called and asked her if she was willing to the leasing of Main street and she answered, "Certainly." When her husband came home that evening he told her he had leased for five years. She negatives all other knowledge of the contents until several days after, when her husband told her that he had given the option. There is a direct conflict between her evidence and that of the agent in this respect, but the evidence supports the inference that neither the lease nor the option were given with full knowledge, consent, or acquiescence on her part. There is an absence of evidence in respect to the other part of finding 10, which is assailed, to wit, that "it is not true that at the time of the execution of said instrument, nor at any other time until the 2d day of October, 1902, said defendant did not assert or claim any right, title, or interest in said property, nor make any objection to said lease or option." This was a negative allegation of the complaint which was denied by the answer. In the absence of evidence to support an allegation necessary to be proven, the finding upon the issue raised thereby should be against the person alleging and failing to prove it. This rule was followed by the trial court; but we do not think the finding material, as it is immediately followed by the further finding that she made no claim or objection to the plaintiff until October 2, 1902. If no knowledge of her claim was brought home to the plaintiff, he would not be affected by such assertion to others. The point that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of a delivery of the deed of October 20, 1896, has heretofore been considered, as has also the evidence in relation to the purchase of the property in 1895 by William Simpson and respondent's contribution to the purchase price in that transaction. The weaknesses and inconsistencies and conflicts in the evidence which supports the findings to which our attention has been called by appellant are apparent; but it is not necessary that the trial court accept and act upon the testimony that appeals most strongly to us in order to sustain its findings against an attack for insufficiency of the evidence. There is evidence, and the trial court has accepted and acted upon it.

The good faith of all parties is declared by the decision of the trial court, and the question, is a party holding possession of real property under a lease and option to purchase, which has been recorded, entitled to compel a specific performance of the option by a grantee claiming under a prior unrecorded deed from the same person? was answered by denying specific performance. There is evidence in support of the inference of fact, and the conclusion of law is correct.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HERZOG v. HEMPHILL et al. (Civ. 388.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Dec. 12, 1907.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—CONDITION OF BUILDINGS—DUTY OF OCCUPANT TO LICENSEE.

Deceased entered defendants' tamale stand with another, by the license and permission of defendants, and volunteered to show his companion the way to the urinal, often used by customers, and always pointed out by defendants, when requested, and permission to use which was always granted by them. The route thereto lay through an adjoining room to a stair landing, with two flights of stairs; the one to the left going above, and that to the right going down to the urinal in the basement. The landing was not lighted, and because of that deceased fell into a hole to the left of the left-hand stairway, and received the injuries from which he died. The urinal was not designed for the use of patrons of the stand, nor was it designed for use or used as a part of the business conducted on the premises. Held, that deceased was a mere licensee, so that defendants assumed no duty to him except not to inflict any wanton or willful injury.

2. SAME—PERSONS INVITED—WHAT IS INVITATION.

The owner or occupier of lands or buildings must exercise ordinary care to render the premises reasonably safe to persons whom he induces to come thereon by invitation, express or implied, which invitation may be manifested by the arrangement of the premises or the conduct of the owner; but mere permission, or a habit of an owner in allowing people to enter and use a certain portion of his premises, is not indicative of an invitation, but a license.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Joseph Herzog, administrator, against Lizzie J. Hemphill and another.

From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William R. Daingerfield and James A. Ballentine, for appellant. Garber, Creswell & Garber and Morrison & Cope, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the defendants' negligence. The appeal is from the judgment entered in favor of the defendants upon the sustaining of their demurrer to the complaint, the plaintiff having declined to amend it.

The complaint in substance alleges that the defendants were in possession of certain premises in San Francisco, and had the sole management and control thereof, including a tamale stand, at which stand tamales were sold to the public; that Alfred N. Herzog, the deceased, entered the premises June 6, 1901, at about 10 o'clock in the evening to purchase tamales, and that he was accompanied by a friend, Miller. The complaint alleges that the deceased and his friend entered said premises by license and permission of the defendants; that while there Miller expressed the desire to visit the urinal on the premises, and the deceased volunteered to show him the way thereto, deceased knowing its location, and Miller never having visited it; that prior to the time of this accident the urinal had often been used by patrons of the premises by license and permission of the defendants, and its location was shown or told by all and any of said defendants to any of said customers whenever requested, and said patrons and their friends were at all times allowed to and did use the same; that the route from the tamale stand to the urinal was through a door adjoining the tamale stand into an open room, thence across said room to a stair landing, wherefrom two sets of stairs proceeded, the one at the left upward to the second story, the one at the right downward to the basement and urinal; that within two feet of said door, and at the left of said left-hand stairway there was a "stair landing, recess, or cul-de-sac, about two feet square, terminating in an abrupt precipice, or death trap, wholly unfenced, unprotected, and unlighted"; that deceased went with his friend through said door into said room, and that "said stair-landing, precipice, death trap, and stairway" were not sufficiently lighted to enable a person to reach the urinal in safety, and on visiting the urinal he would be likely to step off said precipice and fall into said death trap and be killed, or seriously injured; that defendants well knew of the unprotected and unlighted condition of said death trap, but that deceased was ignorant thereof; that by reason of defendants' failure to fence and guard said recess, cul-de-sac, and death trap the same was dangerous to all persons going to said urinal or near the same; that the deceased, in guiding Miller to said urinal, attempted to follow said route; that by reason of the defendants' negligence in the premises deceased fell into said death trap, sustaining injuries from which he subsequently died, and to recover damages for which this action is commenced.

The complaint was demurred to upon the ground that it states no cause of action, and we think the ruling of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer was correct. The complaint does not show that the deceased was more than a mere licensee as to the portion of the premises where the accident occurred. It is a well-settled rule of law that the owner or occupier of lands or buildings who, by invitation, express or implied, induces persons to come upon his premises, is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to render the premises reasonably safe; but he assumes no duty to one who is on his premises by permission only, and as a mere licensee, except that while on the premises no wanton or willful injury shall be inflicted upon him. Means v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001; Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 535, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580. In the latter case, which in many respects is similar to the one at bar, the defendant kept a saloon, and a customer, who had purchased beer, inquired the way to the urinal, apparently ignorant of the location thereof. The defendant pointed the way. In the direction indicated there was a stairway leading to the urinal, and also a door leading upon a porch, from which the stairway led into the back yard. This latter route the plaintiff followed, and, when returning to the saloon, instead of coming back through the door by which he had passed out, he passed into the other, leading into the private portion of the house, where the floor had been taken up, leaving an open space, into which he fell and was injured. It was held that the obligation of the owner of the premises was to keep the access or passageway thereto in such condition as to avoid injury to persons who have been "induced by the invitation or allurements of the owner, express or implied, to enter therein." We quote from this case: "The keeper of a public place of business is bound to keep his premises and the passageways to and from it in safe condition, and use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly entering upon his premises on business. But this rule applies only to such parts of the building as are a part of, or used to gain access to, or constitute a passageway to and from, the business portion of the building, and not to such parts of the building as are used for the private purposes of the owner, unless the party injured has been induced by the invitation or allurements of the owner, express or implied, to enter therein. * * * Conceding that the respondent was not wrongfully in the place where the accident occurred, and giving the most liberal construction to the evidence, he was there by the mere license of the appellant, and for that reason the appellant owed him no duty, and he went there subject to all the risks attending his going."

There is no doubt that an invitation may be manifested by the arrangement of the premises, or by the conduct of the owner. Sweeney v. Old Colony & Newport Ry. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 373, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Redigan v. Boston & Maine R. R., 155 Mass. 44, 28 N. E. 1183, 14 L. R. A. 276, 31 Am. St. Rep. 520; Rooney v. Woolworth, 74 Conn. 720, 52 Atl. 411; Ivay v. Hedges, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 80; Benson v. Baltimore Traction Co., 77 Md. 535, 26 Atl. 973, 20 L. R. A. 714, 39 Am. St. Rep. 436; Phillips v. Library Co., 55 N. J. Law, 307, 27 Atl. 478. Mere permission, or a habit, however, of an owner of allowing people to enter and use a certain portion of his premises, is indicative of a license merely, and not of an invitation. Redigan v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., supra; Phillips v. Library Co., supra; Rooney v. Woolworth, supra. In the last case the plaintiff had been in the defendant's store as a customer. After making a purchase she left the store by a rear door, and was injured by falling into an unguarded excavation on defendant's premises in a dark alley just outside the door. The plaintiff had frequently used the rear door, under express permission from one of the clerks, and it was customary for people other than those connected with the store to use this entrance. The court held that the arrangement of the store was such as to indicate that the rear entrance was intended for use by expressmen and deliverymen, and not for the use of customers, and that therefore, in spite of the fact that it was actually used by people other than expressmen and deliverymen, when it suited their convenience, the plaintiff should be treated as having used the door merely as a licensee and not upon an implied invitation. There is no allegation that the urinal was designed or maintained for the use of patrons of the store; nor any allegation that it was designed for use or used as a part of the business conducted on the premises.

From what has been said, it follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

GARDNER et al. v. SAN GABRIEL VALLEY BANK. (Civ. 422.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 11, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 10, 1908.)

1. TRIAL—FINDINGS—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT—OWNERSHIP.

While ownership may be pleaded and found as an ultimate fact, it may also be pleaded as a conclusion of law, and may be determined by the court as such.

2. APPEAL — REVIEW — RECORD NECESSARY — OWNERSHIP.

Where ownership is purely a question of fact, it can only be considered on a record bringing up the evidence from which the ultimate fact was deduced, or upon a judgment roll from which it appears that ownership was found as an inference of fact entirely from other facts found; but, if the court must determine ownership by the construction of a writing or mere application of legal principles to facts found by the court, it is a question of law, which may be determined from the judgment roll alone.

3. TRIAL — TRIAL BY COURT — QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT — OWNERSHIP.

Whether a finding of ownership in a particular case is the finding of an ultimate fact or a conclusion of law must depend on the issues to be tried, and in an action to quiet title to an easement in a certain stairway, where plaintiffs claim by virtue of a reservation in a certain deed from their grantor to defendant, and the answer admits whatever right was created in the grantor by the instrument, but denies that it granted the privileges claimed by plaintiffs, or that plaintiffs succeeded to the rights, and plead an extinguishment of the servitude by nonuser, and the court found that defendant had not otherwise than as expressed in the deed acquiesced and consented to the use by plaintiffs of the privileges claimed, that no use of the stairway was made by plaintiffs prior to the erection of a second story to plaintiff's property subsequent to the deed, and that plaintiffs are not the owners of the right or easement of using the stairway, etc., the question of ownership was determined by a construction of the deed upon the theory that the admitted reservation was an easement in gross and not one which would pass as appurtenant by the grant to plaintiffs; and hence the court on appeal may consider and determine the questions presented from the record which includes the deed containing the reservation in question.

4. EASEMENTS — RESERVATION — CONSTRUCTION — APPURTENANT EASEMENT — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Defendant received a conveyance of the north 75 feet of a certain lot containing a reservation of a stairway at the south end, to be perpetually maintained such as should give access therefrom to the second story of the brick building now owned by the grantor, that the grantor should have the right to use the stairway wholly at the cost of the grantee for erection and maintenance, and that, whenever said brick building of the grantor should be built so as to have two or more stories, the owner thereof should have the right of support therefrom in the adjoining wall of said bank building so high as the bank building wall should have been erected, etc. The second story of the brick building was not built until after the south part of the lot subsequently came into plaintiffs' hands. Held, that the reservation was intended for the benefit of the south part of the original lot, that the easement in the stairway, etc., passed as appurtenant, for the contract in providing for support of the second story declared the right to be exercised in the future, though created presently, and an easement is presumed to be appurtenant rather than in gross, and especially in view of Civ. Code, § 1069, providing that a reservation in a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor and Code Civ. Proc. § 1864, providing that when different constructions of a provision of a contract are equally proper, that is to be taken which is most favorable to the party in whose favor the provision is made, since an appurtenant servitude would be assignable, and tend to increase the value of the dominant estate.

5. SAME — EFFECT OF NONUSER — EASEMENTS ACQUIRED BY DEED.

No length of time of mere nonuser will operate to impair or defeat the right to an easement acquired by deed, and this is especially true in view of Civ. Code, § 806, providing that the extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant, and section 811, relating to extinguishment of servitudes, which provides under subdivision 4 for extinguishment by disuse only in case of servitudes acquired by enjoyment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, §§ 77-79.]

6. SAME — TRANSFER — INCIDENTAL RIGHTS.

Under Civ. Code, § 1104, providing that a transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and section 1084, providing that the transfer of a thing transfers also all its incidents unless expressly excepted, the right to use an adjoining stairway in defendant's building which is appurtenant to certain real estate passes with the conveyance of the real estate, and carries with it such other incidental rights as are necessary to the full enjoyment of the servitude imposed upon defendant's building by the reservation creating the easement.

7. SAME — DETERMINATION OF INCIDENTAL RIGHTS.

Where a deed to certain property reserved the right to use a stairway in the premises conveyed for access to the second story of adjoining premises not conveyed, the rights incident to the enjoyment of the servitude must be determined from the evidence as to custom, usage, and the conditions surrounding the parties at the time the servitude was created.

8. SAME — STAIRWAY — DOOR.

Where an easement in the use of a stairway for the purpose of access to the second story of a building on grantor's property is reserved in a deed of the adjoining property, no custom or usage can sustain the maintenance of a door at the entrance of the stairway which would interfere with the convenient use of the stairway by the grantees of the original owner of the easement and their tenants; for otherwise the easement itself would be destroyed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by Miriam Gardner and another against the San Gabriel Valley Bank, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Frank James, Craig & Wood, and Volney H. Craig, for appellants. Wright, Bell & Ward, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an action to quiet plaintiffs' title to an easement, and to restrain defendant from interfering with the use by plaintiffs and their tenants of a stairway in the rear of defendant's building and the maintenance by said tenants of their professional and business signs in the passageway and entrance to said stairway; such right being claimed under an easement alleged to have been created by deed. Judgment was for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

From the findings it appears that during the year 1886 one Chas. A. Gardner, who was the owner of a lot numbered 1 on a certain subdivision of lands situate in the city of Pasadena (said lot being located at the southeast corner of Colorado street and Fair Oaks avenue of that city), entered into an agreement to sell to Bates and Janes the north 75 feet of said lot. Bates and Janes in September, 1886, conveyed to defendant their interest in the lot acquired under the agreement. On April 9, 1887, Gardner made a conveyance of the 75 feet to defendant by a deed, a copy of which is attached to the complaint and marked "Exhibit A," and contains the following reservation: "Reserving the following specified rights in the granted premises to the grantor, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, against the grantee, its successors and assigns: (1) Whereas, the said grantee has erected on the premises hereby conveyed a brick building with a stairway four feet and six inches wide at the south end thereof (being the south end of the premises hereby conveyed and facing on Fair Oaks avenue), it is agreed and understood that said stairway shall be perpetually maintained as shall give access therefrom to the second floor or story of the said brick building now owned by the party of the first part and said first party shall have the right to use said stairway wholly at the cost of the grantee for erection and maintenance thereof. And it is a condition of this conveyance that if said stairway shall cease to exist, and shall not be restored immediately, the grantor shall be entitled to build and maintain in the place and instead thereof a stairway of equal width and size, or less if he prefer, for his exclusive use until said destroyed stairway shall be restored by the grantee for use on the conditions now existing as to the present stairway. (2) Provided, further, and upon condition that whenever said brick building of the grantor shall be built so as to have two or more stories, the owner thereof shall have the right of support therefrom in the adjoining wall of said bank building, so high as said bank building wall shall have been erected, such support to be made or obtained in good workmanlike manner without injury to the building used." Prior to the date of that deed, and while holding possession under the agreement, the defendant erected upon the said north 75 feet a two-story brick building, a part of the first floor of which was to be used for its banking business. At the south end of, and within said building, a stairway leading from Fair Oaks avenue to the second floor of the bank building was constructed. Before making the deed to the defendant, Gardner had built the one-story building, mentioned in the reservation in the deed, on the remaining portion of lot 1, the north wall of which building joined the south wall of the bank building. On September 27, 1894, Gardner and his wife granted and conveyed to Katherine Gardner, one of the plaintiffs, and Edith M. Gardner, the south 50 feet of lot 1 with the one-story building thereon, and on April 1, 1904, Edith M. Gardner granted to the other plaintiff, Miriam Gardner, all her estate in said south 50 feet of lot 1. During the month of July, 1904, plaintiffs erected a second story on their said one-story building, and constructed thereon five offices or rooms for rent to tenants, and caused an opening to be cut through the south wall of defendant's building to serve as a passageway to the stairway in defendant's building, and since the completion of plaintiffs' second story their tenants have used defendant's stairway and said opening as a way to and from said second story of plaintiffs' building. Plaintiffs' tenants placed signs in defendant's stairway, indicating their offices and business, which were removed by defendant because the latter claimed that neither plaintiffs nor their tenants had any right to the use of said stairway for any purpose. Defendant also placed doors at the entrance of said stairway. The court further finds "that defendant has not at all times up to the 21st day of July, 1904, or at all (otherwise than as expressed in said deed 'Exhibit A'), acquiesced and consented to the use by plaintiffs and their tenants of all the rights, privileges and easements so claimed by plaintiffs, or any of them"; that no use of said stairway was made by plaintiffs or their tenants prior to the erection of their said second story; and "that the plaintiffs are not and have not been since the deeds of conveyance to them as aforesaid, the owners of the right, privilege, or easement of using said entrance to defendant's bank building and said stairway and landing, for the purpose of reaching the second story of plaintiffs' said building, or otherwise."

Respondent contends that the finding that plaintiffs are not the owners of the easement is of an ultimate fact and cannot be modified by the other findings which are characterized as findings of probative facts. Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740. It is true that ownership may be pleaded and found as an ultimate fact, but it is equally true that it may be pleaded as a conclusion of law, and may be determined by the court as such a conclusion and not a fact. Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. 161. In a case where ownership is purely a question of fact it can, of course, be considered only upon a record bringing up the evidence from which the ultimate fact was deduced, or upon a judgment roll from which it appears that ownership was found as an inference of fact entirely from the other facts found. Geer v. Sibley, 83 Cal. 4, 23 Pac. 220. But it is also the case that, if the court must determine the ownership by the construction of a writing or the mere application of the proper legal principles to the facts already found by the court, it is a question of law and may be determined from the judgment roll alone. Savings & Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 539, 39 Pac. 922. Whether a finding of ownership in a particular case be the finding of an ultimate fact or of a conclusion of law, then, must depend upon the issues to be tried. Plaintiffs claim a right of passage over de-defendant's stairway by virtue of the reservation in "Exhibit A." The answer admits whatever right was created in Charles A. Gardner by that instrument, but denies that that deed granted to Gardner, his heirs and assigns, the rights and privileges which plaintiffs claim exist thereunder, or that plaintiffs succeeded to such rights. Defendant also pleads an extinguishment by nonuser of the servitude imposed upon its property by the deed, "Exhibit A."

Taking all the findings together, it is apparent that the question of ownership in this case was determined by the trial court by a construction of the deed, and upon the theory that the admitted reservation in the deed created an easement in gross, and not one which was appurtenant to the 50 feet of lot 1, which was retained by Gardner when he conveyed the other 75 feet to the defendant. There is no doubt, then, that this court can consider the questions presented on this appeal, and determine them from the record presented. Examining the deed of April 9, 1887, and the circumstances surrounding its execution, it is clear that the reservation therein was intended to be for the benefit of the south 50 feet of lot 1. No reason or motive for the reservation of a servitude in gross is apparent, and the instrument itself, by its very terms, contemplates the use of the stairway in connection with the building of Gardner (then but one story) adjoining defendant's building to the south. The clause in the instrument reserving the right to support from defendant's south wall "whenever said brick building of the grantor shall be built so as to have two or more stories" establishes a state of facts which render inapplicable the authorities cited by respondent to support the position that an easement does not pass as an appurtenance, unless it was actually appurtenant at the time of the conveyance. The parties themselves by their contract have declared the easement created to be a right to be exercised in the future, though created presently. An easement is never presumed to be attached to the person of the grantor when it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate. Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 639, 45 Pac. 874. This rule is strengthened in its application to this case by the statutory provision that a reservation in a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor (Civ. Code, § 1069; Code Civ. Proc. § 1864), as the appurtenant servitude is assignable, and tends to increase the value of the estate to which attached.

The easement having been acquired by deed, no length of time of mere nonuser will operate to impair or defeat the right. Washburn on Easements, 640. This is consonant with the rule of our Code which provides for the extinguishment of servitudes by "disuse" only when acquired by enjoyment. Civ. Code, §§ 806, 811, subd. 4; Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 212, 28 Pac. 944. The right to use the stairway, being appurtenant to the south 50 feet of lot 1, passed to the plaintiffs with the conveyance of that property to them. Civ. Code, § 1104. It carried with it also such other and incidental rights as were necessary to the full enjoyment of the servitude imposed upon defendant's building by the reservation in the Gardner deed. Civ. Code, § 1084.

As the case must go back for retrial, the trial court must determine from the evidence before it what incidents were to be implied from custom, usage, and the conditions surrounding the parties to the contract at the time it was made. No custom or usage, however, could sustain the erection or maintenance of a door at the entrance to the stairway which would be a barricade or interfere with the free and convenient use of the stairway by plaintiffs and their tenants. Teachout v. Capital Lodge, etc., 128 Iowa, 380, 104 N. W. 442. This would destroy the easement itself. The question of what is a reasonable protection of the entrance to the stairway is a matter for the trial court to consider in the light of the evidence introduced.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

HYDE et ux. v. SEATTLE ELECTRIC CO.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 7, 1908.)

CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGER.

In an action for injuries to a passenger on a street car, owing to a vehicle colliding with the car while he was standing on the running board, evidence held insufficient to show negligence on the part of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Mitchell Gilliam, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Hyde and wife against the Seattle Electric Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Richard Saxe Jones and Jas. A. Snoddy, for appellants. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell & Ramsey, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This is an action for personal injuries received upon the Madison street cable line in the city of Seattle. The testimony is undisputed. The court, after the testimony of the plaintiffs was in, sustained a motion for nonsuit on the part of the defendant. The facts briefly are, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff Frank R. Hyde was riding on the Madison street cable line. The car upon which he rode consisted of a closed portion in the rear and an open portion in front, and had longitudinal seats in the open portion; the method of getting on the car in the open portion being by stepping on a running board or first step, and, if the passenger desired to go further, and opportunity offered, to step from the running board onto the second step, or deck of the car. At the time of, and some time prior to, the time when the injury occurred, Madison street from Fourth avenue to Second avenue was being regraded, and dirt was being removed from the street and adjacent property by teams which came out of the excavations at the side of the tracks and down Madison street on the north side from Third avenue to Second avenue. The plaintiff Hyde testified that, as the car came down the hill, he noticed a team passing at and about the Second avenue crossing. The wagon was loaded with dirt. The car continued down the hill, not stopping at Third avenue. Hyde at that time was standing on the second step or deck of the car, leaning against the stanchion, which is the support of the roof of the car. When the car got down nearly to the level of Second avenue, where the plaintiff had been accustomed to alight, he prepared to step off from the car by putting one foot down on the lower step and taking hold of the iron handle of the forward end of the car with his right hand, holding on to the stanchion behind him with his left hand. He testifies that the car did not stop exactly where he expected it to stop, but went a few feet further. While standing on this board ready to step off when the car stopped, the wagon which he had noticed before came in contact with the car, overlapping the board of the car, striking plaintiff's right leg, breaking it in two places. For this injury this action was brought. Upon the dismissal of the action after the motion for nonsuit was granted, this appeal was taken.

It is contended by the appellants that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit and rendering judgment for the respondent; that a case was made which should have been submitted to the jury on the two main propositions, viz., whether there was any negligence on the part of the company, and whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the appellant Frank R. Hyde. Appellants rely very strongly on the two cases of Weir v. Seattle Electric Company, 41 Wash. 657, 84 Pac. 597, and Ranous v. Seattle Electric Company (Wash.) 92 Pac. 382. Reference to those cases convinces us that they have no bearing on the principles of law involved in this case. In the Weir case the plaintiff, relying upon the signal to stop at the place of his destination, took his position on the lower step, with his hand on the extension, ready to alight, while the car was slowly approaching the far side of the street; but, instead of stopping, the speed of the car was suddenly accelerated to such an extent that Weir was hurled from the car. Ranous v. Seattle Electric Company was substantially the same case. But here the appellant was not injured by being misled by the respondent into taking an unsafe position, or by any uncustomary or unexpected act on the part of the motorman. It would be a harsh rule to announce that a street car company would be responsible for any damages that might be sustained by a passenger by reason of a vehicle coming in contact with the car. The car traveling on a fixed track has a right to presume that its right of way will be respected. Of course, this is aside from the question of the duty of the street car company to protect its passengers when danger from contact from the outside is known. But in this case the car was pursuing its way, and there was nothing to indicate that the wagon which was traveling parallel with the car would get any nearer to the track than it was. If danger from that source was apparent, it was just as apparent to the appellant as it was to the gripman, for appellant testifies that when he was at Third avenue, which is one block away from the place where the accident occurred, he saw and noticed the wagon. His attention having been called to the wagon at so short a distance from the scene of the accident, and knowing the condition of the street in that locality, he having testified that he had traveled on that car several times a day for a great length of time, it seems to us that the court rightly concluded that he was negligent in attempting to get off in so close proximity to the wagon. Notwithstanding the presumption in which a passenger may indulge, that the street car company will use the highest degree of caution and care, both in protecting its passengers while upon the car and in furnishing them a safe place to alight from the car, the passenger must use some little caution himself, and will not be justified in stepping into a place of imminent and apparent peril when he alights from a car. If a wagon is standing immediately in front of the steps of a car, a passenger would not be justified in stepping into it and entangling himself in its wheels or spokes, or in stepping into a place of danger of any kind.

There is a good deal said in appellants' brief in relation to the passage of an ordinance by the city requiring the street car companies to maintain a watchman at the point where the appellant was injured; but an examination of the ordinance shows that it provided that this duty devolved upon the street car companies only after notification by the city, and there is no testimony that such notice was ever given; so that really the question of the effect of the ordinance need not be discussed. If the respondent was negligent at all, it was by reason of the fact that common prudence would demand of it to maintain a watchman at this place, outside of any legislation on the part of the city. We are not prepared to say that the condition was such that it was the duty of the respondent to maintain a watchman at this place, or that if there had been a watchman there in the prosecution of the ordinary duties of a watchman at such places, viz., the preventing of passengers from getting in the way of moving cars, he probably would have considered it his duty to have prevented this wagon from traveling as close to the track as it did travel. We are satisfied from the testimony that the accident occurred by the wheels of the wagon slipping and lurching through the mud down toward the car; that it was an accident for which the street car company was not responsible, and one which it could not be called upon to anticipate.

It is also contended by the appellants that the testimony shows that an inexperienced motorman was employed to operate the cars in this dangerous street, the grade here being exceedingly steep. But we think there is no testimony that would warrant this contention, or that shows any incompetency on the part of the motorman or other employes of the car company.

Under all the circumstances of the case, we fail to find any negligence on the part of the respondent, but think that there was negligence on the part of the appellant in not noticing the danger in taking the position that he did take when the wagon was in such close proximity to him.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. COSTS—ADDITIONAL SECURITY.

"Insufficient security," within Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5186, providing that non-residents may be required to give security for costs, and that a new or additional bond may be ordered upon proof that the original bond is "insufficient security," means insufficiency in the amount of the bond as well as insufficiency of the sureties.

2. SAME—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO FILE COST BOND—PROPERTY.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5186, providing that nonresidents may be required to give security for costs, that an additional bond may be ordered on proof that the original bond is "insufficient security," and that proceedings may be stayed until such bond is filed, an action is properly dismissed for plaintiff's failure to file an additional cost bond required by the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; W. T. Warren, Judge.

Action by Joseph N. Morris against Maynard Warwick. From an order dismissing the action for plaintiff's failure to file an additional cost bond, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Mulligan, N. T. Caton, and Martin & Wilson, for appellant. Merrill, Hirschman, Oswald & Merrill, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. This action was commenced in the court below on the 1st day of April, 1906. On the 5th day of May, 1906, the defendant entered his appearance and moved the court for an order requiring the plaintiff to execute and file a $200 cost bond on the ground that he was a nonresident of the state. On the same day a cost bond in the sum of $200 was filed on the part of the plaintiff. The case was thereafter tried, and a judgment of nonsuit entered; but the judgment of nonsuit was reversed by this court, and a new trial ordered. Morris v. Warwick, 42 Wash. 480, 85 Pac. 42. After the cause was remanded, another trial was had, and the jury failed to agree. The defendant thereupon moved the court for an order requiring the plaintiff to execute an additional cost bond, filing an affidavit in support of the motion, showing that the costs already incurred by the defendant amounted to the sum of $650. On the 24th day of June, 1907, an order was entered requiring the plaintiff to give and furnish an additional cost bond in the penal sum of $650 within 40 days from that date. After the expiration of the 40 days the defendant moved the court to dismiss the action for failure to file the additional cost bond within the time directed, and from the order granting this motion the present appeal is prosecuted.

On this record two questions are presented: (1) Had the court authority to require the additional cost bond under the circumstances stated? and, (2) if so, was the action properly dismissed for failure to comply with the order of the court in that regard? The statute under which the bond was demanded reads as follows: "When a plaintiff in an action resides out of the county, or is a foreign corporation, security for the costs and charges which may be awarded against such plaintiff may be required by the defendant. When required, all proceedings in the action shall be stayed until a bond, executed by two or more persons, be filed with the clerk, conditioned that they will pay such costs and charges as may be awarded against the plaintiff by judgment, or in the progress of the action, not exceeding the sum of two hundred dollars. A new or additional bond may be ordered by the court or judge, upon proof that the original bond is insufficient security, and proceedings in the action stayed until such new or additional bond be executed and filed. The plaintiff may deposit with the clerk the sum of two hundred dollars in lieu of a bond." Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5186.

Counsel for appellant contend that the term "insufficient security" in the above section means insufficiency of the sureties on the bond filed in the first instance and not insufficiency in the amount of the bond. There are numerous statutes in this state authorizing courts and boards to require additional bonds from officers and litigants. Such are the statutes relating to official bonds (Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 1522); attachments (Id. § 5356); injunctions (Id. § 5439); executors and administrators (Id. § 6157); guardians (Id. § 6404); appeals (Id. § 6512). The context of these several statutes generally shows what is meant by insufficient security. Some of those cited clearly refer to the insufficiency of the sureties on an existing bond, while others as clearly relate to the amount of the bond as well. We think the statute under consideration is of the latter class. The first part of the section requires nonresidents of the county and foreign corporations to give security for costs. The amount of such costs is necessarily indeterminate at the time of the commencement of the action, and the next provision fixes the amount of the original bond at the sum of $200. This sum may not be sufficient security in all cases, and therefore the next provision authorizes the court to require an additional bond. Such was the view taken by this court in Robinson v. Haller, 8 Wash. 309, 36 Pac. 134, where we said: "It is urged by the appellant that in cases where there are numerous defendants the costs would, in all probability, aggregate a sum far in excess of $200, and that therefore a single bond would not be a sufficient protection. But to meet this contingency the same section of the statute provides that a new or additional bond may be ordered by the court or judge upon proof that the original bond is insufficient security, and proceedings in the action stayed until such new or additional bond be executed and filed." See, also, 11 Cyc. 190.

The court, therefore, acted within its jurisdiction in requiring the appellant to give the additional bond, and the action was properly dismissed for failure to comply with the court's order. Carlson Bros. & Co. v. Van De Venter, 19 Wash. 32, 52 Pac. 323.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

TIPTON v. ROBERTS et ux.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 5, 1908.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION—ANSWER—PLEA OF TENDER—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for unlawful detainer, defendant alleged that, after failure of plaintiff to make promised repairs necessary to put the premises in tenable condition, he made such repairs, and on the next rent day paid plaintiff, by check, the rent due, less the amount of the repairs, and also paid him by check the rent for the following month when due, plaintiff retaining both checks until the beginning of this action, when he returned them. Held, that defendant's answer was not demurrable on the ground that it was a counterclaim; it being an averment of tender, and was sufficient to prevent forfeiture for nonpayment of rent.

2. SAME—RENT—PAYMENT.

Where, in an action for unlawful detainer, a tenant, after requesting his landlord to do so, made necessary repairs to property, and paid the next month's rent, by check, less the sum spent for repairs, the acceptance of the receipted bill of repairs by the landlord's agent and its retention by the landlord until the beginning of the action constituted a payment of the part of the rent represented thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Action by Robert Tipton against J. H. Roberts and wife. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred M. Craven, for appellant.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for an alleged unlawful detention of real estate. The defendants concededly occupied the premises as tenants of the plaintiff until November 1, 1906. By the terms of the lease, the rent was payable monthly on the 1st day of each month, and the complaint alleges that it was so paid until the said 1st day of November, when default was made. It is alleged that notice in writing was given to defendants, requiring them to pay the rent or surrender the premises, neither of which things has been done. The failure to pay rent is denied by the defendants. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment dismissing the action, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

It is contended that the court erred in overruling appellant's demurrer to the affirmative defense. The demurrer was interposed upon the theory that the respondents had attempted to plead a counterclaim, which cannot be done in an action for unlawful detainer within the decision in Phillips v. Port Townsend Lodge, etc., 8 Wash. 529, 36 Pac. 476. The court overruled the demurrer upon the theory that the legal effect of the facts alleged was that of an allegation of payment or tender. We think there was no error in this regard. The allegations were that the house needed repairing in the way of papering some rooms; that respondent promised to so repair, but afterwards failed and neglected so to do; that, in order to make the house so that it could be used and occupied by respondents, they were compelled to make the repairs, and did so at an expense to themselves of $12.10. It is alleged that on the 1st day of November, the day the rent became due and before any notice to quit was given, the respondents paid to appellant, by check, the rent due, less the sum paid for repairs, and that they thereafter paid by a similar check the rent for the month of December; that appellant retained the checks until after the commencement of this action, and then returned them to respondents by mail. It is argued that the allegations do not amount to a plea of payment or tender, for the reason that it is not alleged that appellant accepted the checks. Service in the action was made December 27th, which was near two months after the check, less the amount of repairs, was delivered to appellant. The check was not returned until after that time. Such inexcusable delay to reject the payment either in amount or kind should be treated as an acceptance, or at least as effecting a tender to the extent of preventing an attempted forfeiture for nonpayment of rent.

Other errors urged relate to the findings of the court. The findings were in general effect in accord with the affirmative allegations of the answer as above stated. It was also found that, prior to the commencement of the action, respondents duly tendered all rent due, less the said sum paid for repairs and $4 paid for water rent; the tender being kept good in court. No objection was made to the manner of original tender or payment by check; the objection being merely to the amount because of the deduction for repairs. But the receipted bill for repairs was accepted from respondents by appellant's agent, and retained by the latter, so that it represented a payment. The amounts of the remaining tenders were therefore correct, and there was no default.

The findings are sufficiently justified by the evidence, and the judgment is affirmed.

KESTER v. SCHOOL DIST. NO. 34 OF WALLA WALLA COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — ELIGIBILITY OF TEACHERS—ACTIONS.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 2322, providing that no person shall be accounted as a qualified teacher who has not first received a certificate from the state board of education, etc., and section 2416, providing for the issuance of a temporary certificate to any teacher to whom a certificate has been granted by any county board of examiners, etc., an action to recover salary as a school teacher will not lie unless plaintiff shows that he is regularly licensed to teach as provided by law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Schools and School Districts, § 287.]

2. SAME.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. §§ 2322, 2416, a mere letter from a county school superintendent stating that an applicant's papers are sufficient to entitle him to a temporary certificate, and that such certificate will be granted on application as provided by statute, is not the equivalent of a temporary certificate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Walla Walla County; Thos. H. Brents, Judge.

Action by J. W. Kester against School District No. 34 of Walla Walla County, a municipal corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Mitton and Brooks & Bartlett, for appellant. Rader & Barker, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. In the latter part of January, 1907, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant school district, whereby the plaintiff undertook to teach in the school of the district for the remainder of the school term at a salary of $100 per month. On the 5th day of February, 1907, the plaintiff presented himself, and requested that he be allowed to enter upon the discharge of his duties as such teacher, but such request was refused by the defendant. At the time the plaintiff entered into the contract to teach, and at the time he presented himself and offered to enter upon the performance of his duties, the only certificate or authority to teach possessed by him was the following letter from the county school superintendent of Walla Walla county: "Telegram received this morning. Your papers are sufficient to entitle you to a temporary certificate, which will be granted upon application as per statute." On the foregoing facts the court below entered a judgment of dismissal, from which the present appeal is prosecuted.

Sections 2322 and 2416 of Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes provide as follows:

"Sec. 2322. No person shall be accounted as a qualified teacher, within the meaning of the school law, who has not first received a certificate issued by the superintendent of public instruction, or who has not a state certificate or life diploma from the state board of education, or who has not a temporary certificate or a special certificate granted by the county superintendent according to law: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as invalidating any certificate in force at the time of its passage, but the same shall remain in force for the period for which each was issued."

"Sec. 2416. Any teacher to whom a certificate has been granted by any county board of examiners in this state, or by lawful examiners in any state or territory, the requirements to obtain which shall not have been less than the requirements to obtain a certificate in this state, or any teacher holding a diploma or certificate of graduation from any state or territorial normal school, or from the normal department of the university of the state of Washington, may present the same, or a certified copy thereof, to the county superintendent of any county in this state where said teacher desires to teach, and it shall be the duty of said county superintendent, upon such evidence of fitness to teach, to grant to said person a temporary certificate: Provided, That the provisions of this clause shall apply only to such teachers as were not residents of the county at the time of the last preceding examination, or were not able, by reason of sickness or other unavoidable cause, to attend said examination: And provided further, That the county superintendent may require of such a person a written statement of such facts, verified by affidavit."

Under these sections an action to recover salary or wages as a school teacher will not lie unless the plaintiff shows that he or she is regularly licensed to teach as provided by law. Kimball v. School District, 23 Wash. 520, 63 Pac. 213. It seems to us too plain to admit of argument that a mere letter from a county school superintendent stating that an applicant's papers are sufficient to entitle him to a temporary certificate, and that such certificate will be granted on application as provided by statute, is not the equivalent of a temporary certificate. Where a certificate is required as a condition precedent to the right to enter upon an employment or exercise a privilege, a promise to grant the certificate on application will not satisfy the requirements of the law.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

HARRIS v. GREAT NORTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 11, 1908.)

CARRIERS — CARRIAGE OF GOODS — FREIGHT RATES — LIABILITIES.

Where two freight rates are provided by a carrier, one in contemplation of the ordinary carrier's liability, and the other a less rate by reason of a limitation of that liability, and goods are delivered to it for shipment in the ordinary manner, without any agreement relative to any limitation of liability or reduction in freight charges, the carrier assumes the ordinary liability of a carrier, and the law will imply that the usual rate is the one which was intended.

Fullerton, Mount, and Rudkin, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by W. H. Harris against the Great Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. J. Gordon and Charles A. Murray, for appellant. Swanson & Ripley, for respondent.

ROOT, J. This action was begun by the respondent against the appellant to recover $1,454.10, the alleged value of household goods which were shipped by the respondent from Somers, Mont., to Spokane, Wash. Appellant's answer contained two affirmative defenses; one that at the time the goods were shipped respondent signed an agreement accepting a lower rate for the transportation of said goods and binding himself that in the event of loss his recovery should not exceed the valuation of $5 per hundredweight. The second affirmative defense set forth that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce, and kept on file in its offices at stations along its railway schedules of rates at which freight would be transported; that during all of the times involved such schedules were on file at Kallispell, Mont., where the contract of shipment was made for the goods in question, there being no station at Somers, Mont., and that said schedules so on file contained its rates for household furniture from Somers, Mont., to Spokane, Wash., one rate being 50 per cent. lower than the other, and said lower rate being based upon the condition published in said schedules; that in the event of loss of goods shipped at said lower rate the shipper should recover for such loss not to exceed $5 per hundredweight, and that while said rates were so on file the plaintiff, with knowledge of said rates and the conditions pertaining to the respective rates, caused to be shipped the goods described in his complaint from Somers, Mont., to Spokane, Wash., and at the time of delivery of said goods to the appellant for transportation respondent requested that said goods be shipped at said lower rate, based upon said condition pertaining thereto; that the appellant accepted said goods for transportation upon said condition; that while said goods were in transit, and without any fault on the part of the appellant, they were consumed by fire; that the weight of said goods was 4,280 pounds, and the value at $5 per hundredweight $214, which amount appellant offered to pay, and tendered into court, together with $4 accrued costs. The case was tried to a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the respondent for $1,198.85, for which sum judgment was rendered, and from which judgment this appeal is taken.

In his reply respondent denied that he signed the agreement above mentioned, and the verdict may be taken as a finding by the jury that he did not sign the agreement. Respondent in his reply denied that he knew of the schedule of rates being on file, or knew the conditions attached. Respondent also testified that all that was said about freight or rates at the time the goods were shipped was that the freight would be paid to Spokane. It appears to be conceded that the jury found that the respondent did not sign any contract of release. It is urged, however, by appellant that, under the interstate commerce law, the shipper was obliged to take notice of the published tariff rates of the railway company, and must be charged with the knowledge of the two rates that were provided by said tariff schedule. As to what extent the shipper or intending shipper shall take notice of the posted or published schedule of rates, we are not called upon to decide at this time. From evidence offered by appellant it appears that the schedule reads as follows: "Household goods not for sale or speculation; individual personal effects, secondhand furniture, stoves, etc., carrier's liability limited to $5 per hundred pounds in case of loss, and so receipted for, car load shipment prepaid guaranteed, less than car load shipments prepaid, first-class rate. Household goods, not otherwise specified, not for sale or speculation, car load shipments prepaid or guaranteed, less than car load shipments prepaid, first and a half." The clause therein "and so receipted for" would seem to indicate that the rate therein provided for should apply only where a receipt was actually issued showing the limitation of the liability. It does not appear that respondent received any such receipt or entered into any agreement whatever for a limitation of the carrier's ordinary liability. Where two rates are provided, one in contemplation of the ordinary carrier's liability, and the other a less rate by reason of a limitation of that liability, it would seem, in the absence of an understanding or agreement between the shipper and the transportation company, that the carrier would assume the ordinary liability which rests upon a common carrier of goods, and that the usual rate for carrying said goods would be the one which the law implies. In other words, the lesser rate is only available as a matter of special contract, or where it is intended and understood by the shipper and carrier to apply in a given instance. In this case it appears that the respondent delivered his goods to the appellant for shipment in the ordinary manner, without anything being said, and without any arrangement being made, or any agreement being entered into, relative to any limitation of liability or reduction in the freight charges from the usual rate charged for ordinary shipments with the usual carrier's liability.

This being true, we think the rulings of the trial court complained of were not erroneous, and that the judgment of that court is sustained by the evidence and the law. It is therefore affirmed.

HADLEY, C. J., and CROW and DUNBAR, JJ., concur.

FULLERTON, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the conclusion reached in this case. Since there were two published rates fixing different liabilities on the carrier, the shipper had in the first instance the right of selection. But as he did not exercise that right the duty of making the selection devolved from necessity on the carrier. When, therefore, the carrier in good faith selected the lesser rate, and shipped the goods thereunder, the selection in my opinion fixed the rights of both of the parties. The carrier should not be permitted on a successful completion of the contract of carriage to collect the higher tariff, nor should the shipper be permitted to collect any more than the limited value in case of a loss of the goods.

The judgment should be reversed, with instructions to enter a judgment in favor of the appellant.

APPEAL—RECORD—EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF—TIME FOR FILING—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Where a bill of exceptions or statement of facts was not filed within the time required by law, it will be stricken in the absence of any showing in the record that an extension of time was either asked for or granted by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2472-2476.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Benton County; W. W. Zent, Judge.

Action by O. S. Brown against James F. Kinney. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. A. Lane, for appellant. J. W. Callicotte, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion is made to strike appellant's bill of exceptions or statement of facts on the following grounds: (1) That said bill of exceptions or statement of facts was not filed or served as required by law; (2) that said bill of exceptions or statement of facts was not certified to by the judgment in the court where the cause was tried; (3) that no notice was given by the appellant to the respondent as to the time or place when appellant's bill of exceptions or statement of facts would be settled by the court; and (4) that no copy of appellant's certified copy of his bill of exceptions or statement of facts was returned to respondent at the time of the service of his brief. In consideration of the conclusion we have reached on the first ground of the motion, it is unnecessary to discuss the others. The judgment was rendered on the 24th day of April, 1907, and appellant's bill of exceptions was not filed or served until July 27, 1907. The record does not show that any extension of time was either asked for or granted by the court. Under the uniform rulings of this court, the statement of facts must be stricken.

The appeal does not present any questions for determination here excepting such as are embodied in the statement of facts. Therefore the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

FORD v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 7, 1908.)
SALES—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFENSES—BREACH OF WARRANTY—SCIENTER.

Where, in an action for the purchase price of a team of horses, defendants set up a breach of warranty, they are entitled to judgment if they establish the breach, without proving a scienter on the part of the seller, even though the answer alleges false representation and deceit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 1253.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Boyd J. Tallman, Judge.

Action by Thomas Ford against George H. Smith and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions to grant a new trial.

Aust & Terhune, McBride & Dalton, and W. B. Stratton, for appellants. Jay C. Allen, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This action was brought by the respondent to recover the purchase price of a team of horses sold to the appellants. The appellants answered, alleging false representations and deceit on the part of the plaintiff in the sale of the horses, to wit, that the plaintiff represented that the horses were sound and true; also that the plaintiff warranted the horses to be sound and true, and that upon the delivery of the horses to the defendants and trial by them of said horses it was discovered that the representations made by the plaintiff were false, and that the horses were not sound, or at least that one of them was not, in that he was what is termed "wind-broken," or unsound in wind, and also balky. The answer is a long one, setting up with great particularity all the circumstances of the trade, but what we have stated is in substance the answer, and indicates the issues involved. Verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Judgment was entered, and appeal taken.

The court, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: "If you do find that the plaintiff warranted the horses, even if you do find that the horses were not as represented, yet the defendants must show by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff knew at the time that said representations were false; that is, that the plaintiff knew at the time that the horse was unsound in wind and balky, and further that defendants relied on said statements." The court further instructed: "Before you can find a verdict for the defendants you must believe from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff did make the representations as to the horse being sound and free from defects as claimed by defendants, and you must further believe that the defendants relied thereon, and further that they were false, and you must go further and find that plaintiff knew they were false when he made them." Other instructions along the same line were given, but the ones set forth we think sufficiently indicate the error which it is alleged the court made. These instructions constituted prejudicial error. In an action for breach of a warranty it makes no difference whether the seller knew that the alleged facts which he warranted to be true were true or not. The warranty is the contract upon which the purchaser relies, and the breach of the warranty constitutes the gist of the action. If it were otherwise, a warranty would have no more force or effect than a representation without a warranty; and, when a warranty is relied upon, it is well established that the scienter need not be alleged or proven. It is true that the answer in this case also alleges false representation and deceit. But these allegations do not destroy the allegations in relation to warranty, or prevent a recovery upon proof of the breach of the warranty. Shippen v. Bowen, 122 U. S. 575, 7 Sup. Ct. 1283, 30 L. Ed. 1172, and cases cited.

The respondent recognizes the force of this position, but claims that the instructions of a court must be viewed by this court in the light of the circumstances surrounding the case which is tried, and asserts that the theory of a warranty was an afterthought on the part of the appellants, and that the case was framed and tried on the theory only of false representations and deceit. But the answer directly alleges a warranty and the breach thereof, and the testimony of the appellants is plain and positive to the effect that the respondent did warrant and guarantee to the appellants that the horses were sound and true. It is true this testimony is contradicted by the respondent, but the jury had a right to determine these issues under proper instructions; and, in this case, even if they had found that the warranty had been made as alleged and sworn to, they could not have found in favor of the appellants unless they had further found that the respondent knew that the alleged facts which he warranted to be true were untrue at the time the warranty was made, a finding which, as we have seen, it was unnecessary for the jury to make.

In view of the fact that another trial will be had, we express no opinion on the questions of false representations and deceit, which developed in this case, and which raise the questions so often raised in cases of this kind, as to what was a false representation of fact and what was a mere expression of opinion, questions which are largely determined by the circumstances of the particular case. But for the error above discussed, the judgment must be reversed, with instructions to grant a new trial.

REYNOLDS et ux. v. DICKSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 8, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—DEFECTS IN COUNTERCLAIM—CURED BY EVIDENCE.

The defect, if any, in an affirmative defense based on the ground that the facts alleged therein do not arise out of the transaction sued on, and are not available as a counterclaim, is cured by the introduction without objection of testimony in support thereof.

2. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM—CLAIMS CONNECTED WITH TRANSACTION SUED ON.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Set-Off and Counterclaim, §§ 49-51.]

3. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to rescind an agreement for the exchange of real estate for a stock of merchandise on the ground of fraud, evidence held insufficient to show fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; W. T. Warren, Judge.

Action by J. Q. Reynolds and wife against M. M. Dickson and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs' appeal. Affirmed.

Martin & Wilson, for appellants. Merritt. Hirschman, Oswald & Merritt, for respondents.

DUNBAR, J. The complaint in this case, briefly stated, alleged that the respondents, who were engaged in the mercantile business in the town of Reardon, state of Washington, defrauded the appellants, who were farmers and alleged to be inexperienced in the mercantile business, by inducing them to exchange their farm for a stock of goods. The agreed value of the farm or real estate was $7,000. Under the contract they were to receive goods out of the respondents' store to that amount. An invoice was taken, and it was discovered that there was some $1,630 in goods in excess of $7,000, the value of the real estate. For this $1,630 worth of goods the appellants gave their note and chattel mortgage. It is alleged that the goods did not invoice the amount which the invoice showed by the sum of $3,630; the plaintiffs alleging that the invoice book had been stolen by the appellants immediately upon the conclusion of the trade, and that the fraud had not been discovered until about five months after the trade had been made. The prayer was for a temporary restraining order to prevent the respondents from in any way interfering with the goods; that the chattel mortgage be canceled; that the deed to the land which had been executed be canceled; that the agreement made and entered into be rescinded; and that, in case it was found impossible to place the parties to the agreement in the position which they had occupied prior to the contract, they take judgment against the respondents in the sum of $3,630, together with costs and disbursements. The respondents answered, denying all the material allegations of the complaint, and asking for damages by reason of the failure of the appellants to pay certain mortgages on the real estate which they had sold to respondents, and which it was alleged they had agreed to pay, and also asking for a foreclosure of the chattel mortgage aforesaid. After the appellants had introduced their testimony, on motion, a nonsuit was entered against them, and evidence was heard in support of the respondents' cross-complaint, and judgment entered in favor of the respondents upon both demands. A demurrer was interposed to the affirmative answer and cross-complaint of the respondents, which demurrer was overruled. It is assigned that the court erred in overruling this demurrer, in sustaining objection to testimony offered for the purpose of showing the amount of goods on hand in February when the second invoice was taken, in rejecting proof tendered by appellants as shown by the statement of facts, and in granting the nonsuit, in rendering judgment on respondents' cross-complaint, and in not granting a new trial.

The first contention is that the demurrer should have been sustained to the answer and cross-complaint, for the reason that it did not set forth a counterclaim under the statute. It is admitted by appellants that, if the counterclaim arises out of the same transaction, it is sufficient, but it is contended that it did not. Testimony was introduced in support of this affirmative defense without objection on the part of the appellants, and under the rule laid down by this court in Jacobson v. Aberdeen Packing Company, 26 Wash. 175, 66 Pac. 419, the defect, if any has been cured. But, in addition to this, it seems to us that the affirmative matter here was undoubtedly so connected with the subject-matter of the plaintiffs' action that it was entitled to be admitted by way of counterclaim. What was said by this court in Duggar v. Dempsey, 13 Wash. 396, 43 Pac. 357, applies in full force to this case. There it was said: "One of the objects of the suit was to have this mortgage and the notes secured thereby declared invalid, and to have them canceled and delivered up. This being so, their validity was necessarily involved in a trial of the issues made upon the complaint, and that was one of the issues which would necessarily have arisen if an independent action to foreclose the mortgage had been instituted by the defendants. The facts to be determined under the complaint in this action, and in an independent action to foreclose the mortgage, would have been substantially the same; hence there was no good reason why the whole matter should not be determined in the action first brought. The subject-matter of the counterclaim was so connected with the cause of action set out in the complaint that it could properly be interposed."

So far as the merits of the case are concerned, we are not inclined to disturb the judgment of the trial judge. The admission of testimony showing the amount of goods on hand in February would not have aided the court in determining the amount of goods on hand at the time of the sale in September; for, while it is true the appellants testified that they had kept an account of the cash sales and testified to the amount of such sales, it appeared from their own testimony that they were unable to determine from that fact what amount of goods such cash receipts represented according to the original invoice price. They testified that some of the goods were sold at the regular retail price, some at cost, and some below cost, and that they could not tell what proportion had been sold at a profit, what proportion at cost, and what proportion below cost. The whole testimony was so indefinite that the court could only hazard a guess as to the actual amount of the goods delivered. There was no testimony offered showing fraud or conspiracy on the part of the respondents, and no testimony tending to prove the allegation of the complaint that the respondents had stolen the invoice book; all the testimony on that subject being to the effect that the appellants had not been able to find it. This stock of goods had been received by the appellants at the price shown by the invoice. They assumed control of the business and managed it for nearly five months, buying, selling, and replacing goods, before making the discovery that they had been defrauded by misrepresentations as to the amount of goods they had received. Under such circumstances, proof of fraud ought to be more definite and convincing than is the testimony given and tendered in this case.

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT—VOLUNTARY DISMISSAL—RIGHTS AS TO COUNTERCLAIM.

Plaintiff has no right to dismiss his action where the answer not only contained denials of some of the material allegations of the complaint, but also set up an affirmative defense denominated a counterclaim.

4. SAME—FACTS CONNECTED WITH TRANSACTION SUE ON.

Where the complaint alleged that the grantor of defendant held the premises sued for as security for a debt, that the conveyance to defendant was void, and prayed for judgment declaring the conveyance to defendant void and that plaintiff be adjudged the owner of the premises, an affirmative answer alleging that defendant had been the owner in fee simple of the premises since the conveyance, and had been in the actual, open, and notorious possession thereof, that the value of the property had been paid by him to his grantor, that he had no knowledge or information of any claim of plaintiff, and that the land was purchased in good faith, sufficiently showed an adverse claim so as to constitute a counterclaim within Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. §§ 4912, 4913, defining a counterclaim as a cause of action arising out of the transaction sued on, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; W. T. Warren, Judge.

Action by James B. Gray against H. H. Granger and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. White, Cordiner & Cordiner, and John C. Kleber, for appellant. Neal, Sessions & Myers, for respondents.

DUNBAR, J. Epitomizing the pleadings in this case, the complaint alleged that at the time of the commencement of the action, and for more than 15 years immediately prior thereto, plaintiff had been in possession of certain lands described therein; that theretofore the plaintiff had purchased said lands from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, receiving therefor a land contract, and that the said land contract was duly paid by the said plaintiff to the said railroad company as therein provided; that subsequently the plaintiff borrowed from the Big Bend National Bank of Davenport the sum of $610.24, and gave a note to said bank as evidence of such loan; that, in order to secure the payment of the said loan, plaintiff, concurrently with the execution of said note, assigned the said contract to the said bank for security, and as security only; that subsequently the bank procured from the railroad company, under and pursuant to the terms and provisions of the contract aforesaid, a deed to said land; that the said assignment of the said contract and the said deed made under said contract were given, accepted, and held by the said bank as security for said loan only, and that the real title to said land always did, and now does, vest in the plaintiff; that thereafter, to wit, on November 25, 1904, the said bank became insolvent, and one Eugene T. Wilson, as receiver, took charge of its assets, and thereafter, without foreclosing the security given it by the plaintiff and without any proceedings upon the note which had been renewed, to enforce the payment of the same and to condemn the said land for the payment of the same, conveyed the same to the defendants, and alleged that such sale was null and void, and that the claim of the defendants to the land in question was without any right whatever, and that the said defendants had no estate, right, title, or interest whatsoever in or to such land or premises, or any part thereof, and prayed judgment that the plaintiff be pronounced the real owner of the land; that the bank be held to have held such lands as security only for the payment of the note; that the deed by the said receiver to the defendants be declared null and void; that the said defendants be decreed to make, execute, and deliver to plaintiff a deed of conveyance to all of their right, title, and interest in said lands, or, if they fail to do so, that some person be appointed by the court to execute such deed, and in the meantime that the defendants be enjoined from selling, conveying, mortgaging, or otherwise interfering with said lands. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and for an affirmative answer alleged that the defendants since the 14th day of October, 1905, had been the owner in fee simple of the property described in the complaint, and that since said time had been in the actual, open, and notorious possession thereof, and alleged the execution of the deed by the bank to the defendants; that the actual value of the property had been paid by the defendants for the land; that at the time of the purchase there were no improvements upon said premises; that the same were unperfected and unoccupied by plaintiff or any one else; that defendants prior to the purchase of said land went over said land, and examined the same, and ascertained that the same was not in the possession of any person whomsoever; that defendants nor either of them had any knowledge or information of any character from any source whatever of any claim on the part of plaintiff or any other person; that the land was purchased in good faith for a fair and reasonable consideration, relying upon the record title as shown by the county auditor's office of said county, and prayed that plaintiff take nothing by the action; that defendants be decreed to be the absolute owners of said land; that all clouds upon the title of defendants on said property by reason of any claims to said premises be removed, and that defendants' title to said property be purged of all claims whatever by plaintiff against said property. The reply denied the affirmative matter set up in the answer. When the case came on for trial, the plaintiff asked for a continuance, which was denied, and he then moved to dismiss this action, which was also denied by the court. The case then proceeded to trial; both the plaintiff and defendants offering testimony. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from such judgment, assigning that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a continuance and denying appellant's motion to dismiss the action and for judgment of nonsuit, and in entering judgment for respondents.

The appellant's motion for a continuance was based on a purported affidavit by the appellant to the effect that one O. C. May was a necessary and indispensable witness for and on behalf of the plaintiff, and that he was not now, and had not been since the commencement of the action, a resident of the state; setting forth what he expected to prove by said witness. Motion is made to strike this affidavit from the files, which must be sustained under the uniform rulings of this court. So far as the record appears, this affidavit comes to this court without any proof of its having been a part of the record or of the statement of facts. It is true that in the case of State v. Vance, 29 Wash. 485, 70 Pac. 84, affidavits used in the court below are considered on appeal, but, as expressly stated, on the ground that they constituted a part of the motion before the lower court, and were referred to and identified in express terms by the court in passing upon the motion before him. This case was distinguished from the case at bar, and from former and subsequent cases in which this question has arisen, in Chevalier Co. v. Wilson, 30 Wash. 227, 70 Pac. 487, where the cases were reviewed, and where it was stated that the question was settled that affidavits introduced in the lower court would not be considered on appeal unless included in the statement of facts and certificate of the trial judge.

On the second proposition, that the court erred in not allowing the plaintiff to dismiss the action and for a judgment of nonsuit, it was decided in Waite v. Wingate, 4 Wash. 324, 30 Pac. 81, that the plaintiff had a right to dismiss his action where the answer contained denials of some of the material allegations of the complaint, and also affirmative defenses which defendants had denominated a counterclaim, and in which title was set up in themselves, which it will be seen is substantially the condition of the case here. But this case was overruled in Washington National Building, etc., Association v. Saunders, 24 Wash. 321, 64 Pac. 546, where the cases were reviewed at length, and where it was said: "It is concluded that the rule announced in Waite v. Wingate, supra, is not in consonance with the spirit of the Code nor in accord with the better authorities." And in concluding the case it was said: "It would seem inconsistent with our liberal practice to dismiss the action, and then allow the same relief upon the commencement of another action in different form."

It is contended by the appellant that the affirmative matter pleaded in the answer does not constitute a counterclaim, and is not a set-off. Section 4912, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., provides that: "The answer of the defendant must contain: (1) A general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief; (2) a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim, in ordinary and concise language without repetition." Section 4913 says: "The counterclaim mentioned in the preceding section must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action." The subject of the action here is the title to the land in controversy, and certainly the answer of the defendants arises out of both the contract and the transaction set out in the complaint, and is very materially connected with the subject of the action. The general rule is that statutes allowing counterclaims should be construed liberally, to the end that controversies may be adjusted in a single action; and, under the reform procedure adopted by this state, it would be a pernicious practice to drive parties from a court which had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and jurisdiction or the parties to the commencement of another action in the same forum. This has been the uniform decision of this court. That the affirmative matter pleaded in the answer was so connected with the subject-matter of the plaintiff's action as to be entitled to be put in by way of counterclaim. See Duggar v. Dempsey, 13 Wash. 397, 43 Pac. 357; First National Bank of Snohomish v. Parker, 28 Wash. 234, 68 Pac. 756, 92 Am. St. Rep. 828; Reynolds v. Dickson (decided Feb. 8, 1908) 93 Pac. 910. The reason assigned by appellant to sustain his contention that the affirmative answers are insufficient to constitute a counterclaim is that it does not show any adverse claim on the part of the appellant. We think this is too narrow a construction to put upon the answer. While the answer in words does not state that the appellant has an adverse claim, the whole tenor of the answer is to the effect that he does. The complaint which brought forth the answer alleged this claim in no uncertain language, and was notice to the respondents that the appellant did claim the land in question. So that it would be doing violence to a construction of the whole record to hold that there was no allegation in the answer that the appellant alleged a claim to the land; and also the prayer of the answer, which is a part thereof, and which demanded relief from the allegations of the complaint in relation to the title to the land.

The court on the merits found all the questions of fact in favor of the respondents, finding that none of the averments of the complaint had been sustained. These findings are not excepted to. No error is discovered in the record, and the judgment will therefore be affirmed.

JOHNSON v. CONNER et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—ENTRY UNDER CLAIM OF RIGHT—POSSESSION.

While an entry on the land of another under the belief that it is government land, and that the entryman may hold it as such, may not of itself constitute an entry under claim of right, yet, when an entry is made in good faith, and the entryman, on discovering his mistake, proceeds to openly and notoriously hold the same adversely and in hostility to the title of the actual owner, his acts are an adverse holding and a disseisin under a claim of right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 365-370.]

2. SAME—NONPAYMENT OF TAXES—EFFECT.

The nonpayment of taxes by one in possession of land is insufficient in itself to show the holding was not adverse when such adverse holding is clearly shown by competent evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 504-516.]

3. SAME—HOSTILE POSSESSION.

Where an entry on land was made under a claim of right, and the subsequent possession was maintained openly and notoriously in hostility to the title of the real owner, the possession was, after the occupant had learned of the owner's title, adverse, and became a bar to a recovery by the real owner at the expiration of 10 years.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 65-76.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show title in one by adverse possession for 10 years.

5. SAME—EXTENT OF POSSESSION.

It is not necessary for a person claiming a tract of land adversely to prove that he has actually occupied, used, improved, or inclosed all of the tract, but it must appear that he openly and notoriously claimed the entire tract, and that by his possession, use, or improvement of a portion thereof he intended to hold the whole tract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 547-589.]

6. APPEAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—PARTIES.

Where, in an action to quiet title, brought against persons claiming under a conveyance from a grantee of plaintiff, plaintiff claimed title by adverse possession, and that a lease of the premises to him, signed by him and a defendant, and the deed to the grantee, were procured by fraud, and defendants claimed the deed and lease showed a waiver by plaintiff of a claim to the premises, it was within the discretion of the trial court to refuse plaintiff's application, made at the close of his case, and after defendants had introduced a part of their evidence for leave to file a complaint in intervention on the part of the grantee, because made too late.

7. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—FRAUD—MISTAKE—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

A written instrument should not be set aside for fraud or mistake, unless the evidence of fraud or mistake is clear and convincing.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action to quiet title by William Johnson against Herbert S. Conner and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James B. Reavis and Osborne V. Willson, for appellant. McBride, Stratton & Dalton, George Donworth, and Bogle & Spooner, for respondents.

ROOT, J. In the year 1883 appellant established a home upon certain lands abutting the shores of Smith's Cove, in King county. These lands had been conveyed by the government to one Dr. Smith some years before, and he was the owner thereof at the time of the entry by appellant. The latter, however, claims that he supposed the land to belong to the government and to be subject to entry, and that he went upon the same with the intention of acquiring the title there to under the land laws of the government. He continued to reside upon said premises until the commencement of the present suit in 1907. In November, 1905, appellant, apparently without consideration and in trust, executed a quitclaim deed to a portion of these premises to one Czerney, who subsequently executed a quitclaim deed for the same to one Thompson for the benefit of all of these respondents. On the 26th of July, 1906, appellant and wife signed an instrument, also signed by Herbert S. Conner, wherein and whereby the latter assumed to let and lease unto appellant and wife a portion of the lands involved in this litigation. It is urged by respondents that the purpose of this lease and this quitclaim deed was to show a waiver by appellant of any claim to the premises covered by said instruments, and to quiet the title in respondents. Appellant claims that said lease was obtained from him by misrepresentation and fraud, that the deed was likewise obtained, and that he was incompetent to transact business when said instruments were executed, and did not realize or understand their purpose and effect. Respondents claim that $25 was paid to Czerney for the quitclaim deed which he executed. The latter disputes this. The trial court found in favor of respondents upon all the material issues, and entered a decree quieting title to the premises in them. From this decree, the present appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant does not claim to have entered the premises under color of title, but maintains that his entry was under a claim of right. He testified that he believed, at the time he entered the land, that it was government land and subject to entry, and that he located thereupon with the intention of taking it under the land laws of the United States government. Several witnesses as to the acts and statements of the plaintiff during his early occupancy of the land strongly corroborate him; and we do not find any evidence tending to show that he did not so believe and intend at that time. Some time after appellant located upon this land, he ascertained that the same was owned or claimed by Dr. Smith. It is impossible to tell from the evidence how long this was after his entry. It was evidently within a year or two. Dr. Smith testifies that he had some talk with appellant about the matter, and gave him permission to stay there without charging him any rent. He says, however, that to the best of his recollection the appellant occasionally brought eggs to the family, which he took to be payment on the rent. Appellant denies positively that he ever agreed to pay any rent, or that he ever did pay any rent, or that he was a tenant of Dr. Smith, and says that the eggs were delivered to Dr. Smith and family merely as a neighborly courtesy, and especially as a return of courtesy on the part of the doctor's family in sending him berries, fish, etc. Appellant was at this time living in a building left upon the premises by persons who had theretofore been "logging off" the timber. The little evidence shown by the record as to paying rent is indefinite, and does not indicate whether it was for the premises or for the use of the building; it appearing that there were several buildings or shacks upon the land, and that considerable bartering, buying, selling, and leasing of these took place between Smith, plaintiff, and various other persons without much or any reference to the ownership of the land upon which the buildings stood. Whatever may have been the fact as to the rent or as to appellant's possession being permissive on the part of Dr. Smith, it is evident that appellant's occupancy of the land soon after became hostile to the claim of Dr. Smith, and adverse and exclusive as to him and everybody; that appellant proceeded openly and notoriously to exercise exclusive dominion over the premises occupied, and so continued to do for over ten years. He cultivated patches of garden, built some fences, engaged in the business of raising chickens, ducks, fancy dogs, rabbits, Belgian hares, and Australian rats, and kept boats for hire. He made his living there. He and numerous neighbors testified that he claimed the premises as his own, and drove off people who came thereupon to hunt, camp, pick berries, locate buildings, or for other purposes. Some of the old-time neighbors testified that he told them he was holding the premises adversely, and would have perfect title after ten years. Numerous witnesses testified that the place was well known throughout the community as "Dog Johnson's place."

While an entry upon the land of another, under the supposition and belief that it is government land and that the party entering may hold the same as such, may not of itself constitute an entry under claim of right, yet, where such an entry is made in good faith, and the entryman upon discovering his mistake proceeds to openly and notoriously hold the same adversely and in hostility to the title of the actual owner or claimant, we think this constitutes an adverse holding and dissembles under a claim of right as understood in this state. Moore v. Brownfield, 7 Wash. 23, 34 Pac. 199; Flint v. Long, 12 Wash. 342, 41 Pac. 49; Bowers v. Ledgerwood, 25 Wash. 14, 64 Pac. 936; Hesser v. Slepmann, 35 Wash. 14, 76 Pac. 295; Mather v. Walsh, 107 Mo. 121, 17 S. W. 755; Francoeur v. Newhouse (C. C.) 43 Fed. 236; 1 Cyc. 1028. The evidence shows by a clear preponderance that appellant held actual, uninterrupted, and notorious possession of a portion of these premises adversely to everybody for a period of 10 years, after he learned of Dr. Smith's claim, and after he had decided to hold adversely thereto, and prior to the date of the quitclaim deed to Czerney. It is urged that he paid no taxes. The nonpayment of taxes, while evidence against the holding being adverse, is nevertheless insufficient in itself to prove that the holding was not adverse, when such adverse holding is clearly shown by other competent evidence. Appellant would not be expected to pay taxes as long as he thought it was government land. That he did not pay taxes afterwards is merely evidence as to intention, which is readily overcome by the other positive evidence in the case. It is not necessary that the claim of right shall continue through the statutory period; the entry being under such claim and the possession being afterwards maintained openly and notoriously in hostility to the title of the opposing claimants or real owners. After the occupant has learned of such owner's claim or title, the possession is adverse and becomes a bar to a recovery by the owner at the expiration of the 10-year period. We think, under the evidence and facts appearing in this record, that appellant conclusively shows 10 years' open and notorious adverse possession of these premises prior to the date of the Czerney deed and Conner lease.

It next becomes necessary to ascertain the amount of the respondents' land to which appellant thus established adverse possession, or rather to ascertain whether or not of such respondents' lands he obtained title to any other than those covered by the Conner lease and Czerney quitclaim deed. We think the evidence fails to show that he did. In this action he is claiming between 30 and 40 acres of land, but we do not think that the evidence establishes an adverse claim to and holding of all this or any portion of respondents' lands other than those covered by the Conner lease and Czerney deed. Of course, it is not necessary for a person claiming a certain tract of land adversely to prove that he has actually occupied, used, improved, or inclosed all of said tract. But it must appear that he openly and notoriously claimed the entire tract and that his possession, use, or improvement of a portion thereof was intended to hold, not merely that particular portion, but the whole of the entire tract. We do not think that the evidence in this case shows such occupancy, claim, use, or improvement as manifested an intention to hold any portion of the land now claimed other than that covered by said lease and quitclaim deed, which we will now consider.

The trial court apparently entertained the view that the validity of the deed to Czerney could not be questioned in this action, for the reason that Czerney was not made a party to this action. Attorneys for appellant seem not to have seriously questioned this view. After appellant had put in all of his evidence and rested his case, and after respondents had introduced a portion of their evidence, the attorneys for appellant asked to file a complaint in intervention on the part of the said Czerney, under which it would have been possible to go into all questions affecting the validity of said quitclaim deeds. The trial court denied this application upon the ground that it came too late. The writer of this opinion thinks it might have been well to have granted this application; but the majority of the court feel that the trial court acted well within its discretion, and committed no error. We are therefore confined to the evidence now before us. Upon the evidence touching the question of fraud, misrepresentation, and incompetency of appellant to make such lease and deed, the trial court found against appellant. There was much conflict in this evidence. Remembering that written instruments should be set aside for fraud or mistake only where the evidence is clear and convincing, and bearing in mind that the trial judge had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses upon the stand, we are not justified from this record in setting aside his conclusion.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

In re MCKEEVER'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 11, 1908.)

1. HOMESTEAD—SETTING APART HOMESTEAD—ORDER—REVIEW.

An order setting apart premises as a homestead for the widow and children is in the nature of a final judgment, that can only be set aside on motion for new trial within the time limited, or by motion or petition under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4953, authorizing the court to relieve a party from an order taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, or section 5153, empowering the court to vacate or modify an order for the reasons therein specified.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 304.]

2. SAME.

It is not a ground for vacating an order setting apart premises as a homestead for the widow and children that the premises, being the community property of the widow and decedent, and their homestead, and selected as such by the widow, vested on decedent's death in the widow to the exclusion of the children, and for entry of an order to that effect within Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4953, authorizing the court to relieve a party from an order taken against him through mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, or within section 5153, empowering the court to vacate or modify an order for casualty or misfortune and other reasons therein specified.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Juan County; Geo. A. Joiner, Judge.

Petition by Faith Helen McMillin, formerly Faith Helen McKeever, administratrix of William McKeever, deceased, to vacate a former order setting aside the homestead for the use of the widow and minor children of William McKeever, deceased, and to enter an order setting aside the homestead for her sole use and benefit to the exclusion of the children. From an order denying her petition, she appeals. Affirmed.

Douglas, Lane & Douglas, for appellant. W. R. Garrett, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. William McKeever, a resident of San Juan county, in this state, died intestate on the 10th day of January, 1906. On the 8th day of March, 1906, his widow, Faith Helen McKeever, was appointed administratrix of his estate. On the 5th day of February, 1907, an order was entered in the estate matter, on application of the administratrix, setting apart the property now in controversy as a homestead for the use of the widow and two minor children of the deceased. On the 3d day of July, 1907, the widow, having remarried in the meantime, petitioned the court to vacate the former order setting aside the homestead for the use of the widow and minor children, and to enter an order setting the same aside for her sole use and benefit, to the exclusion of the children. The only reason assigned for vacating the first order is contained in the following paragraph of the petition: "That your petitioner is advised and now believes that the above-described property, being the community property of the petitioner and said William McKeever, deceased, and being the homestead of the petitioner and said William McKeever, and having been duly selected as a homestead by the petitioner by declaration filed and recorded as aforesaid, vested upon the death of said William McKeever in your petitioner as the surviving widow of said deceased, free and clear of any claim, right, title, or interest of the said minor children, and your petitioner is informed and believes that it is her legal right to have said premises set apart to her as aforesaid." From an order denying the prayer of this petition, the present appeal is prosecuted.

The order setting aside the homestead in the first instance was in the nature of a final judgment that could only be set aside on motion for new trial within the time limited by law, or by motion or petition based on some statutory ground. The statutory grounds for such a proceeding are specified in sections 4953, 5153, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. It is manifest that the petition under consideration does not fall within any of the provisions of these sections, and the judgment of the court below is accordingly affirmed.

MERRILL v. O'BRYAN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—SCOPE OF BUSINESS.

It is within the scope of a partnership operating freight steamers on a river to purchase lumber for the construction of warehouses at terminal and intermediate points for the housing of freight, or for use in the construction of barges, or in repairing the steamers.

2. SAME.

One dealing with a partner without notice may hold the copartners, where the transaction is such as may be reasonably concluded is embraced within the partnership business as incident or appropriate thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 38, Partnership, § 193.]

3. APPEAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Whether an act of a partner is within the scope of his authority is a question of fact for the trial court, whose finding the court on appeal will not disturb when there is evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3979-3982.]

4. PARTNERSHIP—SCOPE OF BUSINESS—AUTHORITY OF PARTNERS.

A partnership operated freight steamers on a river. A partner, while at one terminal point looking after the firm business, purchased lumber from a third person which was used in the construction of a warehouse there. Held, that the partner had actual and apparent authority to bind his partners, authorizing the third person to sue the partners for the lumber.

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

The authority of an agent is not established by proof of his own declarations.

6. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS BY PARTNERS.

Where, in an action against partners for lumber bought by one of them, the partnership and the general nature of its business were admitted, the declaration of the partner buying the lumber, to the effect that he would use and did use it for a specified purpose, was the mere admission of a fact concerning partnership transactions, and was admissible against all the partners.

7. CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS—SURPRISE AT TRIAL.

Where, in an action against partners operating freight steamers on a river for lumber bought by one of them for a freight warehouse at one of the terminal points, it appeared that a copartner made an affidavit about three months before the trial in which he denied that the lumber was used to erect a warehouse by authority of the partnership, the refusal to grant a continuance on the ground of surprise by reason of plaintiff's evidence showing the necessity for building the warehouse was proper.

Action by John Merrill against Thomas O'Bryan and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Thomas O'Bryan appeals. Affirmed.

P. D. Hughes and Fenley Bryan, for appellant. Peters & Powell, for respondent.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action to recover the contract price of a quantity of lumber and a small amount of building paper. The amount sought to be recovered is $5,890. The action was brought by the vendor of the lumber against Thomas O'Bryan, Edward M. Sullivan, and L. E. J. Davis, copartners under the firm name of Dawson & White Horse Navigation Company. The defendant O'Bryan is the only member of the partnership who was served with summons, or who appeared in the action. The contract of sale was made with the defendant Sullivan at St. Michaels, Alaska, in September, 1901, and the lumber was delivered into his charge at that time and place. He delivered to the plaintiff a draft on the Canadian Bank of Commerce for the payment of $5,800, upon condition expressed in the draft that the lumber and paper, an invoice of which was attached to the draft, should arrive at Dawson, Yukon territory, on or before November 1, 1901. The draft was signed: "Dawson & White Horse Nav. Co., per E. M. Sullivan, Manager." It was presented to said bank about July 1, 1902, and payment was refused. Meantime the lumber did not arrive at Dawson before November 1, 1901, or at all, for the reason that Sullivan used it in the construction of a warehouse at St. Michaels. The defendant partners were the owners of steamers plying the Yukon river, and were at that time engaged in the transportation of freight up and down said river between Dawson and St. Michaels. The defendant O'Bryan, who appeared and defended, admits that Sullivan was a member of the partnership at the time he bought the lumber, but claims that as such partner he had no authority to purchase the lumber in behalf of the partnership, for the reason that the partnership was a nontrading one, and existed for the purpose of carrying on a transportation business only. The court tried the cause without a jury and rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount with interest against the partnership, enforceable against the joint property of the partners, and against the separate or any property of the defendant O'Bryan. Defendant O'Bryan has appealed.

The court found that the sale was made to the partnership through the defendant Sullivan, a member of the firm; that it was agreed that, in the event the lumber was not transferred to Dawson on or before November 1, 1901, then payment for it should be made on July 1, 1902; that it was not transferred to Dawson for the reason before stated, and that the warehouse erected at St. Michaels by the use of the material was for the partnership, and to enable defendants to house and store such freight as might come into their possession at St. Michaels consigned to points up the Yukon river, and which should come into their possession after the closing of navigation by the ice. We think the findings are justified by the evidence. It is contended that the authority of Sullivan to bind the firm was not shown, in that it appeared that the partnership existed for a transportation business only, and that he was therefore not authorized to purchase lumber or other material for trading purposes. There was, however, no evidence to the effect that the purchase was made for trading purposes, and it was certainly within the scope of the partnership business to purchase lumber for some purposes. The partnership operated three steamers upon the Yukon river, and handled a large amount of freight. The use of lumber for the construction of warehouses at terminal points or en route, for the housing of freight, or its use in the construction of barges, scows, or small boats, or in repairing the steamers, was certainly within the scope of the business of such a partnership, and this material was, in fact, used to construct a warehouse at a terminal point. Sullivan was at St. Michaels looking after the business of the partnership, and considering the nature and scope of the business, as above stated, he as a partner, was a principal and had actual authority to purchase the lumber. He also had apparent authority to bind his partners. So far as third persons who deal with a partner without notice are concerned, the copartners are bound if the transaction be such as the public may reasonably conclude is directly and necessarily embraced within the partnership business as being incident or appropriate to such business according to the course and usage of conducting it. Heirn v. McCaughan, 32 Miss. 17, 66 Am. Dec. 588; Pahlman v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 629; Todd v. Jackson, 75 Ind. 272; Seaman v. Ascherman, 57 Wis. 547, 15 N. W. 788; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 141, 142. In the case of Alley v. Bowen-Merrill Company, 76 Ark. 4, 88 S. W. 838, 113 Am. St. Rep. 73, it was held that a partner in a nontrading partnership may effectually bind his partners by an act apparently within the scope of the partnership. Whether the act of a partner is within the scope of his authority is a question of fact, to be determined by the court or jury trying the facts. Dowling v. Exchange Bank of Boston, 145 U. S. 512, 12 Sup. Ct. 928, 36 L. Ed. 795. The fact in this regard having been determined by the trial court against the partnership, and the evidence in the record being as we believe sufficient to sustain the finding, we shall not disturb it.

It is insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence the declaration of Sullivan to the effect that he would use, and did use, the lumber to build the warehouse. It is true the authority of an agent is not established by proof of his own declarations, but in this case the fact of the partnership and the general nature of its business were admitted, and the declarations of the partner that he did a specific act, which act was clearly within the actual or apparent scope of the partnership business, was not a declaration as to his authority as an agent, but was the mere statement or admission of a fact concerning partnership transactions. As such the testimony was admissible against all the partners. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 140; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 595, 82 Am. Dec. 380; Coleman v. Pearce, 26 Minn. 123, 1 N. W. 846.

Some contention is made that appellant was surprised by respondent's evidence tending to show the necessity for building the warehouse, and that the court erred in not granting the continuance at the trial for that reason. We think the point is not well taken. The trial was had in June, 1906, and appellant introduced in evidence the affidavit of Davis, one of the partners, which was, by consent, used as a deposition. The affidavit was subscribed in March, nearly three months before the trial, and it denied that the lumber was used to erect a warehouse by authority of the partnership. It is therefore manifest that appellant anticipated that the question of the necessity for the warehouse would arise at the trial, and he was not in position to claim such surprise upon that subject as justified a continuance.

The judgment is affirmed.

NICHOLS v. DOAK, Sheriff, et al. (two cases).
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

In an action to restrain a sale of property under execution, evidence was inadmissible to impeach recitals in the judgment on which the executions were based that recovery was had because of fraud by the judgment defendant in fraudulently obtaining and retaining goods.

2. JUDGMENT—JURISDICTION OF DEFENDANT.

Where, in an action to recover goods fraudulently obtained, the complaint, summons, affidavit, and bond for return of the property were served upon defendant, who thereafter appeared by attorneys who filed motions to make the complaint more definite and certain, and to strike certain interrogatories which had been filed, and thereafter admitted service of notes of issue of such motions, and also admitted service of motion for default on account of failure of defendant to further appear and plead, the court in which the action was brought had jurisdiction of the person of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 24; vol. 3, Appearance, §§ 79-90.]

3. SAME—FORM—ALTERNATIVE PROVISIONS—COLLATERAL PROCEEDINGS—GIVING JUDGMENT FULL CREDIT.

In an action to recover goods fraudulently obtained, a judgment which recited that it appeared from proof adduced to the satisfaction of the court that defendant was guilty of false and fraudulent representations in the procurement of the goods described, and that the title never passed to him as against the plaintiffs in the action, and which ordered that plaintiff recover specified amounts of damages on account of fraud and failure to return the property, was sufficient in form to sustain the judgment against attack by injunction against its enforcement, though not in the best form with respect to the alternative requirement of return of the property or recovery of damages, since in the injunction suit the judgment in the former action was entitled to full credit, and it would be presumed that the court must have found the return of the property impossible or impracticable, and therefore entered its judgment for damages.

4. BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—DEBTS DISCHARGED—EFFECT OF FRAUD.

A judgment in an action to recover goods fraudulently obtained is within the exception of section 17 of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 550, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423]), providing that a discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as are judgments in actions for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Actions by Ben C. Nichols against Howard B. Doak, as sheriff of Spokane county, and others. From judgments for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James Dawson and R. E. Porterfield, for appellant. Samuel R. Stern, for respondents.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action to enjoin the sheriff of Spokane county from selling certain real estate under execution. In two previous causes in the superior court of Spokane county, in each of which the plaintiff in this action was the defendant, judgments were rendered against him as such defendant. Thereafter he was adjudged a bankrupt, and was discharged as such. Following the date of his said discharge he inherited from his mother the real estate above mentioned. The judgments have never been paid. The holders of them in no way participated in the bankruptcy proceedings, and, unless the discharge in bankruptcy had the legal effect to satisfy the judgments, they are upon their face liens upon the real estate. Proceeding upon the theory that the judgments are liens, the holders of them caused executions to issue, and directed the sheriff to levy upon said land and sell it to satisfy the judgments. This the sheriff was about to do when the judgment debtor brought actions to enjoin the sale and incidentally to have the judgments canceled. The two actions were heard together, with the same testimony applying to each, and the court denied the relief asked in each case. Judgment was entered dismissing the actions, and the plaintiff has appealed from both judgments.

The two cases will be treated on appeal as a consolidated cause, as they were treated by the trial court. Appellant contends that his discharge in bankruptcy had the effect to satisfy the judgments, and that they do not now constitute enforceable liens. Respondents, upon the other hand, maintain that the judgments were taken against appellant because of his fraud in obtaining certain property, and that by the terms of section 17 of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 550, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3423]), appellant's discharge in bankruptcy did not release him from judgments or liabilities of that character. Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to permit him, at the trial of this cause, to introduce testimony to show that he did not fraudulently obtain and retain the goods for which said former suits were brought. The judgments themselves were in evidence, and they recited that the recovery against appellant was because of fraud in obtaining goods and the failure to return them, as alleged in the complaint. We think these recitals were conclusive against appellant. The judgments had stood for years unattacked by appeal or otherwise. To have admitted the testimony offered would have allowed the contradiction of the terms of the judgments, and would have permitted in this action a trial of the former actions upon their merits. Such would have amounted to a collateral attack on the judgments. The relief sought was the restraint of execution sales, and, in order to effect that end, it was sought by the testimony to impeach the judgments which supported the executions in a particular wherein they were fair upon their face. It was not error to reject the testimony.

It is further contended, however, that the judgments were void for lack of jurisdiction; it being urged that there was no service of process upon appellant, and no authorized appearance in his behalf. The court found in this action that service was made upon this appellant as a defendant in the former actions; that the complaint and summons and the affidavit and bond for the return of the property were served upon him; and that he thereafter duly appeared in the actions by Henley, Kellam & Lindsley, his attorneys; that said firm of attorneys, in pursuance of being retained by appellant to defend in said causes, filed motions to make the complaints more definite and certain, which motions were denied by the court; that they also made motions to strike certain interrogatories which had been filed, and thereafter admitted service of notes of issue of said motions; that motions for default on account of failure to further appear and plead in the actions were made, and service thereof admitted by said attorneys; that said attorneys appeared no further in the actions because of a direction to that effect given to them by appellant. We think the above findings are all justified by the evidence. Particularly do we think the finding with reference to the authoritative appearance of appellant through counsel is abundantly supported by the testimony. The court, therefore, had jurisdiction of the person of appellant in the actions, and, inasmuch as it had undoubted jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it was authorized to proceed, and the judgments are not void.

Objection is made to the sufficiency of the form of the judgments entered in the former actions. The judgments definitely recited that it appeared from proof adduced to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant, this appellant, was guilty of false and fraudulent representation in the procurement of the goods described, and that the title never passed to him as against the plaintiffs in this action. It was ordered that the plaintiff should recover specified amounts of damages on account of the fraud and the failure to return the property. The judgments are not in the best form with respect to the alternative feature of requiring the return of the property or the recovery of damages. But in this hearing they are entitled to full credit, and it should be presumed that the court must have found the return of the property impossible or impracticable and therefore entered its judgments for damages.

It follows from what has been said that the judgments are liens upon appellant's real estate, unless they have been discharged from the bankruptcy proceedings. Section 17 of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 550, c. 541), provides among other things as follows: "A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts except such as * * * are judgments in actions for frauds or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations. * * *" 30 Stat. 550 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428]. It is manifest that these judgments come within the above exception, and that they were not affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. They were in full force when appellant acquired the land in question, and they became liens thereon.

The court did not err in refusing to enjoin the execution sales, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. FUNKE v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF PIERCE COUNTY et al.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. STATUTES—TITLE—SUFFICIENCY.

The title of an act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 351, c. 160), "An act changing the title of county surveyor to county engineer, relating to the election powers, and duties of such officer and repealing," etc., is sufficiently broad to comprehend the subject-matter of section 5, which fixes the officer's salary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 189-191.]

2. COUNTIES—COUNTY ENGINEER—COMPENSATION.

Laws 1907, p. 352, c. 160, changes the title of the county surveyor to county engineer; and, while such officers had theretofore received per diem compensation, section 5 provides for an annual salary in certain counties, which materially increases the compensation, but does not expressly state that it shall apply to existing officers. Held, that incumbents when the act was passed are not entitled to compensation thereunder, though the act increases the officers' duties, the new duties being within the proper scope of the office; it being assumed the Legislature intended to provide the new compensation subject to Const. art. 11, § 8, prohibiting an increase in county officers' salaries during their terms, and article 2, § 25, prohibiting an increase in any public officer's compensation during his term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce County; M. L. Clifford, Judge.

Mandamus by state of Washington, on the relation of Adolph Funke, against the board of county commissioners of Pierce county and others. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. R. Warren and A. H. Denman, for appellant. H. G. Rowland and Robert M. Davis, for respondents.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action in mandamus to compel the payment of the salary of the county engineer of Pierce county in accordance with the statute as found in Sess. Laws 1907, p. 351, c. 180. The officer was elected and qualified, and was, at the time said statute became a law, discharging the duties of his office for the term for which he was elected. Prior to the law of 1907 the same office was designated as that of the "county surveyor," but in the new statute the designation was changed to that of "county engineer." The compensation provided by law for the county surveyor prior to the law of 1907 was $5 per day for the time actually and necessarily spent in the discharge of his duties. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. §§ 1563-1594, inclusive. Under the terms of section 5 of the act of 1907 the salary of the county engineer in counties having a population of more than 10,000 is fixed at the same amount as that of the county auditor in such counties. It is conceded that, under that statute, the county engineer of Pierce county would be entitled to $2,400 per annum, which is substantially more than he would be entitled to receive under the law in force at the time of his election and qualification. The trial court denied the writ of mandamus, and the officer has appealed.

The respondents urge that section 5 of the aforesaid act of 1907 is void by reason of the insufficiency of the title of the act. The section deals with the subject of the compensation, or salary of the county engineer. The title of the act is as follows: "An act changing the title of county surveyor to county engineer, relating to the election, powers, and duties of such officer and repealing sections 490 and 491 of Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes of Washington." While it is true the subject of salary or compensation is not specifically mentioned in the title, yet we think the comprehensive nature of the title is sufficient to include that subject. One reading the title as relating to the "election, powers, and duties" of the county engineer would reasonably and very logically expect the subject of his compensation to be treated in an act so entitled. That subject is germane to the general scope of the title. Respondents cite upon this point Anderson v. Whatcom County, 15 Wash. 47, 45 Pac. 665, 33 L. R. A. 137. The title of the act there in question was: "An act to provide for the economical management of county affairs." The act provided that the salary allowed to a justice of the peace should not exceed the amount of legal fees collected by such officer. It was held that such provision did not have the effect to repeal a prior act fixing salaries of justices of the peace in incorporated cities having more than five thousand inhabitants, for the reason that the subject was not embraced in the title. It is sufficient to say that the subject there was so far remote from that suggested by the title that the ordinary reader would not have suspected a repeal of the statute above mentioned. The same comment in effect also applies to the recent decision of State v. Merchant (Wash.) 92 Pac. 880, also cited by respondents. We think the cases cited are not authorities against the sufficiency of the title now before us, and we decline to sustain respondents' contention that section 5 of the act in question is void.

The chief questions presented by the appeal are: (1) Did the Legislature intend the act of 1907 to apply to salaries of county engineers who had theretofore been elected and qualified? (2) If such was intended, is the act void with respect to its salary provisions so far as officers so elected and qualified are concerned? The act in most particulars was undoubtedly intended to have immediate application upon its becoming a law; but it contains no express statement that the salary provision was intended to have immediate force, and, in the absence of such, it should not be held that it was so intended if to do so would array the legislative intent against any constitutional provision. Would the immediate enforcement of the salary provision conflict with constitutional restrictions? Section 8, art. 11, of the state Constitution, is as follows: "The Legislature shall fix the compensation by salaries of all county officers, and of constables in cities having a population of five thousand and upwards, except that public administrators, surveyors, and coroners may or may not be salaried officers. The salary of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased or diminished after his election or during his term of office, nor shall the term of any such officer be extended beyond the period for which he is elected or appointed." It is manifest from the section quoted that the salary of a county officer cannot be increased during the term of office for which he is elected. It is also manifest from the exception made in the section that the county surveyor may or may not be a salaried officer. It is for the Legislature to say whether surveyors, public administrators, and coroners shall be compensated by salary or otherwise. It is well known that such officers are frequently compensated by fees collected by themselves for specific acts or services. Our Legislature had, however, provided before the law of 1907 that the compensation of the county surveyor should be $5 per day for the time actually and necessarily spent in the discharge of his duties, and payable from the public moneys. If that method of compensation is by salary, then it is plain from the foregoing section that it cannot be increased during the term for which the appellant was elected. Appellant contends that it is not a salary for the reason that it is payable only when services are rendered; while a salary, it is contended, is a fixed compensation payable without regard to the amount of service rendered. Our Legislature has, in fact, designated the surveyor's compensation as a salary. Section 1564, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. After naming the different officers of the county of whom the surveyor is one, the section says: "The officers in the different counties in the state shall each receive the salary hereinafter set forth. * * *" The sections following then state the salaries of the officers in the several classes of counties in each of which the amount for the county surveyor is $5 per day; and section 1594 limits the amount to officers paid a per diem to the time actually and necessarily spent in the discharge of their duties. We deem it unnecessary to pursue a discussion as to whether the Legislature properly designated such a compensation as a salary or not. It would be interesting to note the views of different courts as to what is technically a salary; but authorities upon that subject are not harmonious, and they are not material to the determination of this case, as will hereafter appear.

Another section of the Constitution must be considered in this connection. Section 25, art. 2, provides, among other things, as follows: "Nor shall the compensation of any public officer be increased or diminished during his term of office." The above provision is so comprehensive that interpretation seems wholly unnecessary. The proposition is so simple that the statement of it carries its own argument. This provision relates strictly to what the legislative department shall not do; and it is manifest that the two constitutional provisions must be read and construed together. If the term "salary" as used in the one as a more restricted meaning than "compensation" as used in the other, then the more comprehensive term which applies to "any public officer" must control here when we are considering what the Legislature may or may not do. The term "compensation," as used, seems to be broad enough to include any kind of remuneration from the public treasury for a public officer, whether by way of what is called "salary" or otherwise. Appellant, however, contends that this court has already held that the constitutional prohibitions do not apply to county officers who are not paid fixed sums as annual salaries, and he cites State ex rel. Thurston County v. Grimes, 7 Wash. 445, 35 Pac. 361. In that case the court was considering certain justices' and constables' fees. A fee bill materially reducing the fees was passed subsequent to the election, and the constitutional provision was invoked. It was held that the provision applies only to such officers as receive a fixed salary out of the public treasury, and that it does not apply to officers who receive specific fees for specific services. But one authority was cited (Board of Supervisors v. Hackett, 21 Wis. 620), and the reasoning of that case was adopted and followed by this court. From an examination of the Wisconsin opinion it is, we think, manifest that the court found the distinction to be between that large class of officers who are paid by fees for specific services which they usually collect themselves and those officers who are paid from the public treasury sums specified by law. It is true the court used the term "fixed salary"; but it was evidently the intention to draw a distinction merely between officers paid by fees and those paid from the public treasury. Such, in any event, was all that was involved and decided in State ex rel. v. Grimes, supra. The county surveyor is not an officer paid by fees for specific services without regard to time. Under such a system, he might possibly realize $20 for services rendered on a given day, and on other days it might be more or less than that sum. As it is, his compensation is a fixed sum with reference to a specified time, is not variable during the time that official duties require his services, and it is paid from the public treasury as that of other officers. To hold that such an officer and such compensation do not come within the constitutional prohibition would, we believe, do violence to the clear intent of the constitution makers.

Appellant further argues that he is entitled to the salary fixed by the new statute because by that law the duties of his office have been much increased, and beyond what he contends really comes within the reasonable scope of the office of county surveyor. We think the new duties are all reasonably within the scope of an office of that character. It is true the office is made one of record, and in counties of 10,000 or more population the officer must keep his office open at all times, as other county offices of record are kept open. The Legislature has, however, declared that these new duties belong to the office itself, and they are in every way properly incidental to the functions of such an office. Appellant cites the case of State ex rel. Seattle v. Carson, 6 Wash. 250, 33 Pac. 428, as authority for holding that for increased duties an additional salary may be provided, to be paid even to an incumbent of an office theretofore elected and qualified. The statute under consideration in that case made the individual who should occupy the office of county treasurer the collector of city taxes, and a salary of $500 was provided for that service. It was held that the duties for which the salary was provided did not belong to the county treasurer as such, but that they were imposed upon him in the way of collecting city taxes, and were entirely outside of his duties as county treasurer for which his previous salary was fixed. For the above reason only was it decided in that case that the constitutional prohibition did not apply. Again, in Spokane County v. Allen, 9 Wash. 229, 37 Pac. 428, 43 Am. St. Rep. 830, the court emphasized the above view, and refused to apply the rule of the former case to county attorneys whose duties had been much increased, but by new duties within the scope of the office of county attorney itself. In the recent decisions of State ex rel. Davis v. Clausen (Wash.) 91 Pac. 1089, and State ex rel. Ross v. Clausen (Wash.) 92 Pac. 453, statutes materially increasing the duties of the offices were involved, but it was held that the constitutional prohibition was not removed as against office incumbents during the term for which they were theretofore elected. The increase of compensation by those statutes and also by the one now before us was no doubt in each instance a meritorious thing for the Legislature to do, having reference to future office incumbents. But the constitutional provision as to present incumbents must not be so construed in the interest of seeming expediency or even apparent necessity, as shall practically amount to an evasion of the organic law. That the constitutional provision exists is not only true, but it is also true that it is so clear and is founded upon such practical wisdom as calls for no elastic effort to construe it. In State ex rel. Davis v. Clausen, supra, we said: "This wise provision was no doubt intended to prevent pernicious activity on the part of the office holders of the state being brought to bear upon the members of the Legislature—a wise provision which must not be construed out of existence or evaded by legislative enactment."

For the foregoing reasons, we hold that appellant is not entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the new law; and, furthermore, that it was the intention of the Legislature to provide the new compensation subject to the constitutional restriction, and for officers thereafter elected only.

The superior court did not err in denying the writ; and the judgment is affirmed.

WELCH et al. v. BEACON PLACE CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—DELINQUENT TAXES—PROCEEDINGS FOR FORECLOSURE—NOTICE—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY.

On one page of a notice in delinquent tax foreclosure proceedings the words "Seattle Old Limits" appeared, and on the following page, under the heading "Syndicate Add.," with a dash after it, "P. Welch, lot 5, block 7." In the application for judgment under numerous heads the description appeared to be, "Syndicate Add., section or lot 5, township or block 7"; the name of no city or town being given. The description appeared differently in each instance in the decree, in the deed from the treasurer to the county, and in the notice of sale; the description in the treasurer's deed being approximately correct. Besides the "Syndicate addition," there were in the same county a "Kirkland Syndicate's First addition to Seattle," and another known as "Kirkland's Second Syndicate addition to Seattle." Held that, because of inaccuracy and indefiniteness, the description of the property in the foreclosure proceedings was not sufficient to charge the owners of the property with notice, so as to render the decree of foreclosure valid; the sale being in 1902 for taxes of 1892, all the taxes since that time having been paid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, § 1305.]

2. SAME—PROCEEDINGS FOR SALE—NATURE OF PROCEEDING—REQUISITES.

A delinquent tax foreclosure proceeding is in the nature of a proceeding in rem; and hence the property sought to be affected must be described with reasonable accuracy in the proceedings by which it is sought to charge the owner with notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; A. W. Frater, Judge.

Action by Eliza Welch and another against the Beacon Place Company to have certain tax proceedings declared invalid and title to the property involved quieted. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. T. Turner, for appellant. Austin E. Griffiths, for respondents.

ROOT, J. This action involves the ownership of lot 5 in block 7 of Syndicate addition to the city of Seattle, King county, Wash. Plaintiffs, respondents here, claim as sole heirs at law (widow and minor child) of Patrick Welch, who died April 14, 1903. The property was sold November 15, 1902, to King county, at the general county tax foreclosure sale for the taxes of 1892 and prior years. It was conveyed by deed to King county May 8, 1903. Thereafter the county sold and conveyed the property to one Allen, who subsequently conveyed it to appellant. Prior to the commencement of this action respondents tendered appellant the amount of taxes for which the property was sold, with interest to date, and demanded a conveyance of the property to them, which tender and demand were refused by appellant. Respondents brought this action in equity, and asked to have the tax proceedings declared invalid and title to the property quieted in themselves. From a decree in their favor, this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears that the property in question was at all times herein mentioned vacant, and that Patrick Welch had paid all of the taxes subsequent to 1892. Neither said Welch nor respondents appear to have received personal notice, or to have had any actual knowledge, of the delinquent taxes or foreclosure proceedings. Numerous grounds are assigned by respondents for their contention that the sale of the property under the foreclosure proceedings was void. It is urged that, by reason of the long delay of the county in bringing foreclosure proceedings, during which time the owner had annually paid his taxes without receiving any notice of the former taxes being unpaid, the county should be estopped from foreclosing for said former taxes; and it is also urged that under sections 5504-5506, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., the respondents acquired good title to this property as against the tax lien and those claiming under the foreclosure thereof, for the reason that they had continuously paid the taxes thereupon for more than seven years since 1892, and prior to the sale under the foreclosure proceedings.

Certain defects in the form of the summons are alleged; and it is also contended that the description of the property in the foreclosure proceedings was so erroneous and indefinite as to render the decree of foreclosure void. We think it necessary to discuss only the last contention. The notice and summons was headed: "The County of King, Plaintiff, v. Persons to Whom Assessed and All Persons Unknown, If Any, and All Persons Owning or Claiming to Own and Having or Claiming to Have an Interest in and to the Hereinafter Described Real Property, Defendant." The notice and summons then proceeds to notify all such persons that the county of King is owner and holder of the certificate of delinquency, and they were therein notified to appear within 60 days and pay the amount due or suffer judgment of foreclosure against the property. Then follows a description of a large amount of property, and on one page of the notice appear the words, "Seattle Old Limits," and on the following page, under the heading, "Syndicate Add.," with a dash after it, "P. Welch, lot 5, block 7." In the application for judgment, under numerous heads, the description appears to be about this: "Syndicate Add., section or lot 5, township or block 7." The name of no city or town is given. The description appears differently in each instance in the decree, in the deed from the treasurer to King county, and in the notice of sale by the county to Allen; the deed from the treasurer to the county being approximately correct. It is admitted by the parties that, besides this "Syndicate addition," there are in King county a "Kirkland Syndicate's First addition to Seattle," and another known as "Kirkland's Second Syndicate addition to Seattle." A tax foreclosure proceeding of this character is in the nature of a proceeding in rem; and under the rule governing such the property sought to be affected must be described with reasonable accuracy. The owners of this property appear to have paid their taxes regularly for many years. Why the matter was overlooked with reference to the taxes for which this foreclosure was brought we do not know. Doubtless it was a mistake or oversight of some character. The owners were living in the state during all of that time. To take respondents' property from them in payment of these old and evidently overlooked taxes would be a hardship which should not be visited upon them, unless the jurisdictional requirements in the foreclosure proceeding are shown to have been fully complied with. The description of a single lot among a vast number of descriptions might easily escape an owner's notice, even if correct. If incorrect, the more easily could it be overlooked, even if the owner's attention was called to the list without suspecting that he had property mentioned therein. It is evident that the description under which this property was proceeded against was not the correct description of the property sought to be subjected to the tax lien, and we cannot say that this defect, considered together with the obscure place and form in which it appeared in the notice, was not sufficient to, or may not, have misled the respondents or him under whom they claim, and cannot say that it was published in a form and possessed that accuracy and definiteness which can be said as a matter of law to have been sufficient to bind them with notice.

The judgment of the superior court is therefore affirmed.

GREAT NORTHERN RY. CO. et al. v. SNOHOMISH COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—LEVY AND ASSESSMENT—MODE OF ASSESSING CORPORATE PROPERTY—RAILROADS—TRACT—POLLING STOCK—STATUTES.

Const. art. 7, § 2, requires the Legislature to provide a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on property according to its money value. Laws 1897, pp. 150, 151, c. 71, §§ 32, 34, require the main track and rolling stock of railroads to be listed and taxed in the several counties in the proportion that the mileage of main tracks in each county bears to the entire mileage within the state. Held, under these provisions, and under the direct provisions of Laws 1897, p. 153, c. 71, § 42, and Laws 1905, p. 225, c. 115, § 2, subd. 2, creating the state board of tax commissioners, that the main track and rolling stock of a railroad extending through several counties are an entirety for purposes of taxation; that the entire value thereof must be apportioned between the counties through which it passes in the proportion that the main track mileage in each county bears to the entire mileage; that they must be assessed at their true and fair value; that the assessment shall be equalized between the different counties; and that the state board of tax commissioners is given general supervision over assessors and county boards of equalization to that end.

2. SAME — EQUALIZATION OF ASSESSMENTS — STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—POWERS.

Under Laws 1905, p. 2215, c. 115, § 2, subd. 2, requiring the state board of tax commissioners to exercise "general supervision" over assessors and county boards of equalization, and the assessment of taxable property in order to secure equality in taxation, the commissioners do not act merely in an advisory capacity, but have power to classify intercounty railroads and fix the value thereof for purposes of taxation.

3. TAXATION—LEVY AND ASSESSMENT—RAILROADS—ASSESSMENT BY COUNTY ASSESSOR—EXCESS VALUATION—JUSTIFICATION.

Where the county assessor assessed plaintiffs' railroads at a higher valuation than that placed upon them by the state board of equalization, it will not be presumed, to justify such excess assessment, that proportionally higher value was placed on all other property in the county.

4. WORDS AND PHRASES—"GENERAL SUPERVISION"—DEFINITION.

The words "general supervision" imply something more than a mere power to advise and suggest, and confer authority to oversee, and review the acts and to correct the errors of those over whom the right of supervision is granted.

5. STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—LEGISLATIVE CONSTRUCTION—VALIDITY.

A Legislature has no power to construe a law enacted by its predecessor, so as to affect acts done under such preceding statute prior to the enactment of the construing act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 862.]

6. TAXATION—LEVY AND ASSESSMENT—EQUALIZATION OF ASSESSMENTS—EQUALIZATION BY STATE BOARD—EXCESS ASSESSMENT BY COUNTY OFFICERS—VALIDITY.

The state board of tax commissioners classified the railroad tracks of the state for purposes of taxation as "First Class," "First Class B," etc., designating a part of plaintiffs' tracks for the year 1906 as "First Class," and a part as "First Class B," and fixed the assessment at $14,520 per mile for first-class track and $3,168 per mile for the rolling stock thereon, and at $10,560 per mile for first-class B track, and $2,640 per mile for the rolling stock thereon. The assessor of S. county assessed its track designated as first class at $25,900 per mile and the rolling stock thereon at $3,960 per mile, and the first-class B track at $19,000 per mile, and the rolling stock thereon at $3,300 per mile, and refused to reduce the assessment. Held, that there was manifest inequality in the assessment of plaintiffs' properties; and the assessment thereof by the county officials, in disregard of the directions of the tax commissioners, was void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Snohomish County; W. W. Black, Judge.

Suit by the Great Northern Railway Company and other corporations against Snohomish county and William R. Booth, as treasurer, to enjoin defendants from collecting an alleged excess assessment. From a judgment on demurrer dismissing the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and demurrer directed to be overruled.

L. C. Gilman, B. O. Graham, and R. O. Saunders, for appellants. G. D. Eveland and Cooley & Horan, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. The complaint in this action alleges substantially the following facts: That the plaintiff the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota, and is duly authorized to do business in the state of Washington; that said plaintiff is the owner of a line of railway extending from St. Paul, in the state of Minnesota, to the city of Everett, in Snohomish county, in the state of Washington; that of said line of railway there lies within said Snohomish county 43.92 miles of main track and 14.17 of side track; that the plaintiff Seattle & Montana Railway Company is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Washington; that said plaintiff is the owner of a line of railway extending from the city of Seattle to the city of Blaine, in the state of Washington; that of said line of railway there lies in Snohomish county 43.04 miles of main track and 15.48 miles of side track; that all of said lines of railway belonging to the plaintiffs the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company and the Seattle & Montana Railway Company are used, occupied, and operated by the plaintiff Great Northern Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota, as a part of its general system of railway lines extending from the cities of St. Paul and Duluth, in the state of Minnesota, to the cities of Seattle and Blaine, in the state of Washington, under contracts and arrangements requiring said last-named company to pay the taxes assessed against said properties; that in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by law the state board of tax commissioners of the state of Washington, for the purposes of assessment and taxation for the year 1906, classified the different railroad properties owned and operated within the state, and by said classification the railroads above described were classified as follows: Main line tracks of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company as "First Class"; main line tracks of the Seattle & Montana Railway Company from its connection with the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company near Everett Junction south to the county line of Snohomish county as "First Class"; main line tracks of the same company from Everett Junction north to the county line as "First Class B"—that said state board of tax commissioners fixed the assessment for said year for the purposes of taxation on railroad tracks of the first class at the sum of $14,520 per mile, on rolling stock of railroads of the first class at $3,168 per mile, on railroads of the first class B at $10,560 per mile, and on the rolling stock thereon at $2,640 per mile; that said valuation above mentioned was so fixed by said state board of tax commissioners in relation to and based upon the comparative value of all other lines of railway throughout the state, and proper directions and instructions were by said board made and given to the various county assessors in counties through which plaintiffs' said lines of railway extended in the state of Washington, including the assessor of said Snohomish county, so as to procure and secure equality and uniformity of assessment and taxation in the various counties of the state through which said lines of railroad extend, and to secure equality and uniformity in the valuation for assessment of the various lines of railroad throughout the respective counties of the state; that, in conformity with and in obedience to the directions and instructions of the state board of tax commissioners, the county assessors of all counties along the lines of said railroads, except the assessor of Snohomish county, assessed the property of the plaintiffs on the classification and rate per mile thus fixed by the state board of tax commissioners; that the assessor of Snohomish county wrongfully and unlawfully assessed the tracks designated as first class at $25,900 per mile, the rolling stock thereon at $3,960 per mile, the tracks designated as "First Class B" at $19,000 per mile, the rolling stock thereon at $3,300 per mile, and therefore plaintiffs' said properties have been assessed for taxation for the year 1906 at a valuation disproportionate to all other railroad property in the state, and that a valuation relatively greater than the other railroad property in the state has been assessed for said year; that the board of equalization of Snohomish county wrongfully refused to reduce said assessment; that the taxes on said properties for the year 1906 on the valuation fixed by the assessor and board of equalization are $26,108.32 in excess of the taxes based on the valuation of the state board of tax commissioners; that the plaintiffs have tendered and stand willing to pay all taxes and assessments against said property, less said excess of $26,108.32, and that the treasurer of Snohomish county refuses to accept the same. The prayer of the complaint is for an injunction against the collection of such excess and for general relief. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiffs electing to stand on their pleading and refusing to plead further, a judgment of dismissal was entered from which this appeal is prosecuted.

Section 2 of article 7 of the Constitution provides that "the Legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state, according to its value in money, and shall prescribe such regulations by general laws as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his or her or its property." Section 32 of the revenue act of 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 150, c. 71) provides that "the value of the 'railroad track' shall be listed and taxed in the several counties in the proportion that the length of the main track in such county bears to the whole length of the road in the state, except the value of the side or second track, and all turnouts, and all station houses, depots, machine shops, or other buildings belonging to the road, which shall be taxed in the county in which the same are located." Section 34 provides that "the rolling stock shall be listed in the several counties in the proportion that the length of the main track used or operated in such county bears to the whole length of the road used or operated by such person, company or corporation, whether owned or leased by him or them in whole or in part." Section 42 provides that "all property shall be assessed at its true and fair value in money. In determining the true and fair value of real or personal property, the assessor shall not adopt a lower or different standard of values because the same is to serve as a basis of taxation; nor shall he adopt as a criterion of value the price for which the said property would sell at auction, or at a forced sale, or in the aggregate with all the property in the town or district; but he shall value each article or description of property by itself, and at such sum or price as he believes the same to be fairly worth in money at the time such assessment is made. The true cash value of property shall be that value at which the property would be taken in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor." The second subdivision of section 2 of the act creating the state board of tax commissioners (Laws 1905, p. 225, c. 115) provides that "the commissioners shall have power, and it shall be their duty: * * * Second. To exercise general supervision over assessors and county boards of equalization, and the determination and assessment of the taxable property in the several counties, cities and towns of the state, to the end that all taxable property in this state shall be placed upon the assessment rolls and equalized between persons, corporations and companies in the several counties of this state, and between the different municipalities and counties therein, so that equality of taxation shall be secured according to the provision of existing laws."

While these several provisions bear more or less directly on the question under consideration, the case turns principally on the meaning of the term "general supervision" in the act defining the powers and duties of the state board of tax commissioners. From these provisions, constitutional and statutory, we think it is manifest (1) that the main track and rolling stock of a railway extending through two or more counties in this state are an entirety for the purpose of assessment and taxation; (2) that the entire value of such main track and rolling stock must be apportioned between the several counties through which the road passes in the proportion that the mileage in each of such counties bears to the entire mileage in the state; (3) that such main track and rolling stock must be assessed at their true and fair value in money; (4) that the assessment shall be equalized as between the different counties, so that equality of taxation shall be secured according to the provisions of law; and (5) that the state board of tax commissioners is given general supervision over assessors and county boards of equalization to that end. Inequality in the assessment of the property of the appellant companies as between the different counties in the state is apparent on the face of this record. Counsel for respondent suggest that the assessor and taxing officers of Snohomish county may have placed a proportionately higher value on all other property in their county, and that the apparent inequality does not necessarily exist; but, in the face of the statute requiring all property in all counties to be assessed at its true and fair value in money, we cannot indulge in any such speculations or presumptions. The state board of tax commissioners is given general supervision over assessors and county boards of equalization, to the end that all taxable property shall be placed on the assessment rolls and equalized as between the different counties and municipalities, so that equality of taxation shall be secured according to the provisions of law. What is meant by "general supervision"? Counsel for respondents contend that it means to confer with, to advise, and that the board acts in an advisory capacity only. We cannot believe that the Legislature went through the idle formality of creating a board thus impotent. Defining the term "general supervision" in Vanton-geren v. Heffernan, 5 Dak. 180, 88 N. W. 52, the court said: "The Secretary of the Interior, and, under his direction, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, has a general 'supervision over all public business relating to the public lands.' What is meant by 'supervision'? Webster says supervision means 'to oversee for direction; to superintend; to inspect; as to supervise the press for correction.' And, used in its general and accepted meaning, the Secretary has the power to oversee all the acts of the local officers for their direction, or, as illustrated by Mr. Webster, he has the power to supervise their acts for the purpose of correcting the same; and the same power is exercised by the Commissioner under the Secretary of the Interior. It is clear, then, that a fair construction of the statute gives the Secretary of the Interior, and, under his direction, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the power to review all the acts of the local officers, and to correct, or direct a correction of, any errors committed by them. Any less power than this would make the 'supervision' an idle act—a mere overlooking without power of correction or suggestion." Defining the like term in State v. F. E. & M. V. R. R. Co., 22 Neb. 313, 35 N. W. 118, the court said: "Webster defines the word 'supervision' to be 'the act of overseeing; inspection; superintending.' The board therefore is clothed with the power of overseeing, inspecting, and superintending the railways within the state, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and they are clothed with the power to prevent unjust discrimination against either persons or places." It seems to us that the term "general supervision" is correctly defined in these cases. Certainly a person or officer who can only advise or suggest to another has no general supervision over him, his acts or his conduct. The respondents contend that such a construction will substantially do away with county assessors and county boards of equalization, but this conclusion does not follow. How far the state board of tax commissioners may interfere with the local authorities in the valuation of local property for the purpose of local taxation, or how far the Legislature may authorize such interference, is not involved in this case.

It is lastly contended that the Legislature of 1907 has placed a legislative construction on the act of 1905, supra. In the first place, the Legislature of 1907 had no power to construe the act of its predecessor in so far as it related to past transactions; and, in the second place, we fail to find wherein such legislative construction has been given. The section of the act of 1905 above quoted is re-enacted without a change in 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 508, c. 220), and other provisions of the 1907 laws adopt an entirely new system for the assessment and taxation of railroad property. Laws 1907, p. 132, c. 78. But we fail to find in all this any legislative construction of the act of 1905.

On the record before us, we hold that there is a manifest inequality in the assessment of the properties of the appellant companies as between the different counties of the state for 1906, that the state board of tax commissioners acted within its jurisdiction when it fixed the value of intercounty railroads for the purpose of taxation, and that the acts of the Snohomish county officials in disregard of the lawful orders and directions of their superior officers were void, and of no effect.

The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

SPOKANE FALLS & N. RY. CO. v. STEVENS COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Stevens County; E. H. Sullivan, Judge.

Suit by the Spokane Falls & Northern Railway Company against Stevens county and Charles Adams, as treasurer of Stevens county, Wash., to enjoin defendants from collecting alleged excess in taxes. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John D. Atkinson, J. A. Rochford, and John P. Judson, for appellants. M. J. Gordon and A. J. Langhon, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint in this case is in all material respects similar to the complaint considered by this court in Great Northern Railway Company et al. v. Snohomish County et al. (just decided) 93 Pac. 924. There the demurrer to the complaint was sustained, while in this case the demurrer was overruled. In that case the plaintiffs stood on their complaint, while in this case the defendants stood on their demurrer.

For the reasons stated in the opinion just filed, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. HOLCOMB v. YAKKY. Superior Court Judge.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—PORTIONS OF DECREES.

Under the express provisions of Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6503, an appeal may be prosecuted from a portion only of a decree as well as from the whole decree.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 866.]

2. DIVORCE—ALIMONY—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—RIGHT TO.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6506, providing for the form of bonds to stay proceedings pending appeal, a husband appealing from a decree in a divorce suit awarding alimony and directing him to surrender property to his wife is entitled to supersede the decree pending the appeal.

3. MANDAMUS—GROUNDS—FIXING SUPERSEDEAS BOND.

Upon refusal of the court to fix a superseas bond to which the applicant is entitled, a writ of mandamus will be granted to compel its issuance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 68.]

Mandamus by the state of Washington, on the relation of Augustus H. Holcomb, against John B. Yakey, to compel respondent, as judge of the superior court of King county, Wash., to fix the amount of a bond to supersede a judgment. Peremptory writ issued against respondent.

Herbert E. Snook, for appellant. Bo Sweeney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 2d day of December, 1907, a decree of divorce was entered in a certain action then pending in the superior court of King county, wherein Eva Holcomb was plaintiff and the relator herein was defendant. The decree disposed of the property rights of the parties, and awarded to the plaintiff the sum of $50 per month alimony, and the care and custody of a minor child. On the 20th day of December, 1907, the defendant gave written notice of appeal from the decree, excepting that portion thereof awarding a divorce to the plaintiff, and that portion awarding certain personal property to the defendant. He then applied to the trial court to fix the amount of the superseas bond pending the appeal in order to effect a stay of proceedings. The court refused to fix the amount of the bond, or to supersede the judgment, and application was thereupon made to this court for a writ of mandamus requiring it so to do. The alternative writ issued, and the matter is now before us on the return thereto. The petition for the writ and the return are devoted largely to a discussion of the merits of the original case and to certain contempt proceedings instituted to enforce the payment of the alimony awarded by the original decree, but these questions are not now before us. The return further challenges the sufficiency of the notice of appeal, because the appeal is prosecuted from a portion of the decree only; but such an appeal is expressly authorized by statute. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6503.

The only question we can consider at this time is, has an appellant a statutory right to supersede the judgment in a divorce action pending an appeal therefrom? Our statute, and the decisions of this court construing the same, would seem to leave no room for doubt on that question. In State ex rel. Bank v. Superior Court, 12 Wash. 677, 42 Pac. 123, this court said: "Our statute as to appeals in one section provides at length what judgments and orders may be appealed from, and in another section, in the same act, provides how proceedings on an order or judgment appealed from may be stayed, and, in our opinion, it is clear that the Legislature intended to give to the party prosecuting an appeal from any order or judgment the right to take advantage of the provisions for staying execution. There is no reason for holding that the provision as to stay bonds applies to one order or judgment mentioned in the preceding section and not to another, and as it must apply to some we feel compelled to hold that it applies to all, and since an order appointing a receiver is in express terms made appealable by the provisions of the act, it must be held that the provision as to stay of proceedings, in the same act, applies to an order of that kind." To the same effect see State ex rel. Denham v. Superior Court, 28 Wash. 590, 68 Pac. 1051, and cases there cited. In fact we have repeatedly held that prohibitory injunctions and other self-executing judgments are substantially the only ones that may not be superseded under section 6506, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.

A decree awarding alimony and directing one of the parties thereto to surrender property to the other falls clearly within the provisions of the superseas statute, and the peremptory writ will issue as prayed.

ROWEN v. ALLADIO et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 25, 1908.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—NOTICE—NATURE OF WORK.

B. & C. Comp. § 5640, provides that every person performing labor on or furnishing material in the alteration or repair of any building shall have a lien thereon; and section 5644 requires the filing of a claim containing a true statement of the claimant's demand, together with certain other facts. Held, that a notice of a claim for lien for certain materials and labor furnished for S., to be used and which were used in alteration and repair of certain electric wiring and in making connections in and about the building, which was situated on the land described, should be construed to aver that the alteration, repair, and connections were made in and about the building, and was therefore sufficient to make a prima facie case for lien.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 234-236.]

2. SAME—RIGHT TO A LIEN—NATURE OF IMPROVEMENT—ELECTRIC WIRING.

Where electric wires are inserted in a building so as to indicate an intention to make them fixtures, they become the property of the owner of the building, and may therefore be the proper subject of a mechanic's lien, under B. & C. Comp. § 5640.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, § 36.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Arthur L. Frazer, Judge.

Suit by W. G. Rowen against P. Alladio and others to foreclose an alleged lien for material furnished and labor performed on a building owned by Louise E. Hamilton. From a judgment dismissing the suit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. Denlinger, for appellant. Wm. T. Muir, for respondent Hamilton.

MOORE, J. This is a suit by W. G. Rowen against P. Alladio, B. Sargousse, and Louise E. Hamilton, to foreclose an alleged lien for material furnished and labor performed in placing electric wires in a building owned by Mrs. Hamilton. A demurrer contesting the sufficiency of the lien notice, a copy of which is set forth in the complaint, having been sustained, the suit was dismissed, and the plaintiff appeals.

The part of the notification thus challenged is as follows: "That W. G. Rowen, by virtue of a direct contract heretofore made with P. Alladio and B. Sargousse, copartners, have furnished certain materials to and have performed certain labor for said P. Alladio and B. Sargousse, to be used and which were used by them in the alteration and repair of certain electric wiring and fixing and in making connections in and about the building which is situated on the land hereinafter described." The statute conferring the right to impose a charge upon specific property as security for the performance of an act is, so far as involved herein, as follows: "Every * * * person performing labor upon or furnishing material of any kind to be used in the * * * alteration or repair * * * of any building * * * shall have a lien upon the same for the work or labor done * * * or material furnished at the instance of the owner of the building * * * or his agent." B. & C. Comp. § 5640. The person desiring to secure the benefits thus granted is required, within a stated time after the completion of his contract, to file with the county clerk of the county in which the building is situated "a claim containing a true statement of his demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner, or reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed or to whom he furnished the materials, and also a description of the property to be charged with said lien, sufficient for identification, which claim shall be verified by the oath of himself or of some other person having knowledge of the facts." Id. § 5644.

Although the claim filed herein complies with all these necessary requirements, it is argued by defendants' counsel that the lien undertaken to be imposed on the property for material furnished and labor performed was not for the alteration or repair of a building, but of a certain electric wiring and fixing, and also in making connections in and about a building; that it is possible for electric wires to be run into a building and connections made without such wires being attached in any manner to the structure; that the lien notice herein embraces a claim for "the alteration and repair of certain electric wiring," and also for labor performed "in making connections in and about a building"; that, assuming such union was made on the building, the statute does not give a lien for the alteration or repair of electric wires, and as a nonlienable item is thus united in a lump sum with a lienable charge, from which it is incapable of segregation, the entire claim is unauthorized, and the court properly sustained the demurrer and dismissed the suit. Electricity is now generally used in all cities of any importance in civilized countries to illuminate buildings; but, before such artificial light can be employed for that purpose, wires for transmitting the current must be extended from the station where the electricity is generated to the places where it is to be put into requisition. The persons, firms, or corporations engaged in furnishing electricity usually at their own expense set poles and suspend wires thereon, with which connections are made by other wires, so that the current may be conducted into buildings and there used for illumination or for other purposes. The wires employed to distribute electricity to one or more rooms in a building, if attached in such manner as to indicate an intention to make them fixtures, become a part of the structure and are as necessary as conduits for gas or water. These connecting and distributing wires, when made fixtures, become the property of the owner of the building in which they are placed, and the value of the material furnished and of the labor employed in making the improvements are burdens which, under a statute like ours, may be imposed on the land for the construction, alteration, or repair of any building. Joyce, Electric Law (2d Ed.) § 1015; 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 310; 27 Cyc. 38; Scannevin v. Consolidated Mineral Water Co., 25 R. I. 318, 55 Atl. 754. Applying this rule to the notice of lien, though the statement therein, "in the alteration and repair of certain electric wiring and fixing and in making connections in and about the building," etc., might be susceptible to the interpretation given by the defendants' counsel, a reasonable construction of the language employed tends to show a purpose to aver that the alteration, repair, and connection set forth were made in and about the building.

The notice herein makes a prima facie case, which, if uncontroverted, would, in our opinion, entitle the plaintiff to a decree of foreclosure; and, this being so, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for such other proceedings as may be necessary, not inconsistent with this opinion.

OREGON ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. TERWIL-LIGER LAND CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. COSTS—COSTS ON APPEAL—TAXATION—OBJECTIONS—VERIFICATION.

Where on taxation of costs on appeal the right to recover a certain item is practically admitted, but the reasonableness of the amount is disputed, the amount not being fixed by law, it would seem that the objection should be verified; but, where the right to recover an entire item is disputed, the objection is in the nature of a demurrer, and is sufficient without verification.

2. SAME.

Where after judgment in condemnation proceedings plaintiff lost its right to appeal by paying the damages and taking possession of the premises, defendant, who had knowledge of such fact, and moved to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal therefor, was not entitled to recover costs of additional brief and abstract, incurred after such knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, § 972.]

Motion to retax costs.

For original hearing see 93 Pac. 334.

MOORE, J. This is a motion to retax costs. The appeals herein were dismissed, whereupon defendants' counsel filed a bill of the costs and disbursements, incurred by their clients in preparing for trial in this court. An objection to the items for printing an additional abstract and a brief, $9.10 and $78, respectively, having been sustained by our clerk, his action is sought to be reviewed in this summary manner. The defendants' counsel insist that, as the objections were not verified, the items mentioned were improperly rejected, and should now be allowed.

The rules of this court (35 Or. 587) were amended July 25, 1907, in respect to the taxation of costs, thereby changing in most particulars the decisions heretofore rendered on that subject. When the right to recover an item of disbursements is practically admitted by the adverse party who disputes the reasonableness of the charge, the objection interposed ought to state that not more than a specified sum of money should be allowed; and it would seem that in such case the objection should be verified, because the value or the measure, not being fixed by law, must be determined upon affidavits as a question of fact. When, however, an entire item is challenged on the ground that the charge is unwarranted, the exception is in the nature of a demurrer, which presents a legal question, and we are unable to perceive why the objection in such case should be verified. In the case at bar the objections contest the right of the defendants to collect any sum of money on account of the items charged, and, upon principle, are sufficient, without verification.

The transcript shows that it was filed in this court September 30, 1907, at which time the defendants knew that plaintiff had taken possession of the real property condemned, and built a railway thereon. If it were not for the rule firmly established by repeated adjudication of this court, that jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be waived by the parties, the filing of an additional abstract or a brief by a respondent should be deemed such a relinquishment of his right as to entitle an appellant to have his cause heard on the merits. Though this cannot be done under our practice, no party respondent should be permitted to recover any item of disbursement incurred after the trial of the cause in the lower court, when his motion to dismiss an appeal for want of jurisdiction is sustained. A few days after the transcript herein was filed, this court was in session, and could then have heard the motion to dismiss the appeal as well as at any other time. The defendants became liable for the expense of printing the abstract and the brief after they knew the existence of the facts which they successfully invoked to defeat the trial of the appeals; and, this being so, they are not entitled to recover the sums demanded therefor.

The action of the clerk in rejecting the items is approved.

WINTER v. UNION PACKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—VENUE—TRANSITORY ACTIONS.

A transitory action must be brought against a domestic corporation either in the county where it has its principal office or place of business or in the county where the cause of action arose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 1935-1946.]

2. APPEARANCE—CHALLENGING JURISDICTION—EFFECT OF SPECIAL APPEARANCE.

A defendant may appear specially to challenge the jurisdiction of the court either by motion or by plea in abatement, where the want of jurisdiction does not appear on the face of the record, without subjecting himself to its jurisdiction for any other purpose; but, if jurisdiction is necessary to the granting of the relief sought, the appearance is general, regardless of the purpose or character of the appearance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appearance, §§ 42-52.]

3. SAME—EFFECT OF FORTHCOMING BOND—MOTION TO DISMISS—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—BOND TO DISCHARGE ATTACHMENT.

The execution of a forthcoming bond in attachment, under B. & C. Comp. § 306, does not constitute a general appearance, neither does a special appearance to move for dismissal for want of jurisdiction, nor a subsequent plea in abatement setting up the same ground, although an application to the court to discharge an attachment on giving an undertaking conditioned to pay any judgment in the action is an acknowledgment of the court's jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appearance, §§ 42-52.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Alfred F. Sears, Jr., Judge.

Action by Howard Winter against the Union Packing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

The defendant is a domestic corporation, having its principal office and place of business in Astoria, Clatsop county. On March 12, 1904, plaintiff commenced an action against it in the justice's court for Portland district, Multnomah county, on a cause of action arising in Clatsop county, and caused summons to be served upon defendant in the latter county. At the time the action was commenced a writ of attachment was issued and levied upon certain personal property belonging to defendant in Multnomah county. On March 14th defendant executed and delivered to the officer making the attachment a redelivery or forthcoming bond, with two sureties, conditioned as provided in section 306, B. & C. Comp., and the possession of the attached property was surrendered to it. Thereafter it appeared specially and moved to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction, because defendant was a resident of Clatsop county, the cause of action arose in such county, and service was made upon it there. The motion was overruled, whereupon defendant filed a plea in abatement, alleging substantially the same state of facts. The plea was stricken out on motion, and defendant, declining to appear or plead further, judgment was rendered against it, as prayed for in the complaint. From this judgment it appealed to the circuit court, where the judgment of the justice's court was affirmed, and it now brings the case here for final determination.

A. M. Smith, for appellant. Wm. M. La Force, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). It is clear that the judgment appealed from is erroneous, unless the defendant voluntarily submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the justice's court for Multnomah county. A transitory action must be brought against a domestic corporation either in the county where it has its principal office or place of business or in the county where the cause of action arose. Holgate v. O. P. R. Co., 16 Or. 123, 17 Pac. 859; Bailey v. Malheur Irrigation Co., 36 Or. 54, 57 Pac. 910. This rule is not disputed by plaintiff; but it is contended that defendant voluntarily submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the justice's court by appearing therein and moving to dismiss, and especially by giving a redelivery or forthcoming bond to secure possession of the attached property. The appearance of the defendant was for the sole purpose of challenging the jurisdiction of the court, and was not, therefore, a general appearance, or equivalent to the service of summons. A defendant may appear specially in an action for the purpose of taking advantage of a defect in the notice or service, or to question the jurisdiction of the court without subjecting himself to its jurisdiction for any other purpose. Kinkade v. Myers, 17 Or. 470, 21 Pac. 557; Belknap v. Charlton, 25 Or. 41, 34 Pac. 758. This he may do either by motion, or, where the want of jurisdiction does not appear on the face of the record, by plea in abatement. Brown v. Webber & Trustee, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 560; Gregg v. Sumner, 21 Ill. App. 110. But where a defendant appears and invokes the judgment of the court upon a matter, which presupposes jurisdiction, or asks relief which can only be granted after jurisdiction has attached, his appearance is general, and gives the court jurisdiction of the person whether limited to a special purpose or not. The character of the appearance does not depend upon the form of the motion or pleading, but upon its substance, and the relief sought. Belknap v. Charlton, supra.

The remaining question is the effect of the redelivery bond given by defendant to the officer serving the writ of attachment. There are two bonds provided by statute, by the giving of which a defendant may obtain possession of attached property. One is an undertaking, as provided in section 306, "to deliver it or pay the value thereof to the sheriff, to whom execution upon a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in the action may be issued"; and the other is by an application to the court for the discharge of the attachment upon executing and delivering to such court, or the judge thereof, an undertaking to the effect "that the sureties will pay to the plaintiff the amount of the judgment that may be recovered against the defendant in the action." Section 312, B. & C. Comp. There is, it will be noticed, a marked distinction between the method of procedure and the terms and effect of these two undertakings. The latter is given on an application to the court to discharge the attachment, and obligates the sureties to pay such judgment as may be recovered in the action. Under many of the authorities it binds the defendant to enter an appearance, or be liable to be proceeded against as in case of personal service. Drake on Attachment, § 822; Delano v. Kennedy, 5 Ark. 457; Childress v. Fowler, 9 Ark. 159; Ferguson v. Glidewell, 48 Ark. 195, 2 S. W. 711; Blyler v. Kline, 64 Pa. 130; Peebles v. Weir, 60 Ala. 413; Richard v. Mooney, 39 Miss. 357; Williams v. Gilkerson-Sloss Com. Co., 45 La. 1031, 13 South. 394; Cheatham v. Morrison, 37 S. C. 187, 15 S. E. 924; New Albany Mfg. Co. v. Sulzer, 29 Ind. App. 89, 63 N. E. 873. The former, however, requires no action of the court, runs to the sheriff, and is not for the payment of the judgment recovered in the action. It is merely an engagement to redeliver the attached property, or pay the value thereof, to the sheriff, to whom execution upon a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in the action may be issued, and authorizes the sheriff to surrender the actual possession of the property to defendant or other person claiming it, but does not dissolve the attachment, nor withdraw the property from the operation of the lien thereof. Drake v. Sworts, 24 Or. 198, 33 Pac. 563; Coos Bay R. R. Co. v. Welder, 26 Or. 453, 38 Pac. 338; Dickson v. Back, 32 Or. 217, 51 Pac. 727. It, therefore, cannot have the same effect as a bail bond or undertaking for the discharge of an attachment. It does not release the lien of the attachment, nor stand in the place of the attached property. The giving of such an undertaking is not an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the court or the validity of the attachment; and we have not been referred to, nor have we been able to find, any authorities holding that the giving of such a bond is an admission of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. An application to the court to discharge an attachment on giving an undertaking, conditioned to pay any judgment that may be recovered in the action, may well be held to be an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the court over the person, and render a defendant liable to be proceeded against, as in case of personal service; but no such effect can be accorded a mere undertaking to redeliver the attached property or pay its value to the officer to whom execution upon the judgment recovered by the plaintiff in the action may issue. The one is an obligation to pay any judgment which may be recovered if the attachment is dissolved by the court, and the other is a mere engagement of the obligors to redeliver the property or pay its value to the officer, in case plaintiff should recover judgment and execution should be issued thereon, and does not affect the lien of the attachment. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the defendant did not submit itself to the jurisdiction of the court either by its motion to dismiss or plea in abatement or by giving the redelivery bond. Judgment of the court below is reversed.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—COMPLAINT—MOTION TO MAKE MORE DEFINITE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—ALIENATION OF AFFECTION.

It is not error to overrule a motion to make more specific a complaint alleging that defendant "seduced" plaintiff's wife and enticed her away, where plaintiff's counsel stated that he intended to charge adultery by defendant and plaintiff's wife, whereupon defendant's counsel remarked, "That is all I want to know," and the case was tried on the theory of the explanation given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1173-1193.]

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"SEDUCE."

The word "seduce," when used to denote the conduct of a man toward a woman, is generally understood to mean the use of some influence, promise, arts, or means on his part by which she is induced to surrender her chastity and virtue to his embraces.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6388-6393.]

3. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—SHOWING GROUNDS FOR ADMISSION.

A witness, becoming ill during cross-examination, was excused for the time, and afterward her physician was asked, "What is her condition, and what is its cause, if you can tell?" Held that, as the question did not suggest the answer desired, and counsel did not state that he expected to show by the expected answer that her illness was real, and not simulated, in order to avoid further cross-examination, sustaining an objection to the question was not error.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR—RECORD—GROUNDS OF REVIEW.

Error, if any, in overruling an objection to remarks of counsel is not available, where the exceptions do not show that the remarks were not a proper answer to remarks by the opposing counsel.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE—ALIENATING AFFECTIONS—MATTERS TO BE SHOWN.

To maintain an action for the alienation of the affections of plaintiff's wife, and enticing her away, it is not necessary to show that defendant had sexual intercourse with her.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Husband and Wife, § 1118.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lane County; L. T. Harris, Judge.

Action by William H. Ireland against Albert J. Ward. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action by William H. Ireland against Albert J. Ward to recover damages for the alleged alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's wife. The complaint avers the marriage of the plaintiff and his wife; the existence of the connubial relation at all the times stated herein; that the spouses lived happily together until their domestic felicity was disturbed by the wrongful acts and conduct of the defendant, specifically setting them forth; that the defendant, by means of undue influence, and with intent to injure the plaintiff, maliciously seduced the latter's wife and alienated her affections from her husband; and that in May, 1905, the defendant, intending to deprive the plaintiff of the comfort, society, fellowship, and assistance of his wife, maliciously enticed her away from him. A motion to make the complaint more definite and certain having been overruled, an answer was filed denying generally each allegation of the complaint, on which issues the cause was tried; and a judgment having been rendered against the defendant for the sum of $5,000, he appeals.

L. Bilyeu and A. C. Woodcock, for appellant. J. M. Williams, for respondent.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended by defendant's counsel that an error was committed in denying the motion to make the complaint more definite and certain. The bill of exceptions states that when this motion was argued the plaintiff's counsel admitted that he intended to charge in the complaint, by the use of the word "seduced," that the defendant had committed adultery with the plaintiff's wife, whereupon the defendant's counsel remarked: "That is all I want to know." Webster's International Dictionary defines the word "seduce" as follows: "To draw aside from the path of rectitude and duty in any manner." The word "seduce," however, when employed to denote the conduct of a man towards a woman, is generally understood to mean the use of some influence, promise, arts, or means on his part by which she is induced to surrender her chastity and virtue to his embraces. Patterson v. Hayden, 17 Or. 239, 21 Pac. 129, 3 L. R. A. 529, 11 Am. St. Rep. 822. The word under consideration is susceptible to two meanings; but as the plaintiff's counsel stated the sense in which he intended to employ the term, and his explanation being satisfactory, no error was committed in denying the motion. The cause was tried upon the averments of the complaint as though it specifically charged the defendant with alienating the affections of the plaintiff's wife by committing adultery with her, and also by unlawfully enticing her away from her husband.

Mrs. Ireland appeared at the trial herein as a witness for the defendant, but on her cross-examination she became ill, whereupon the plaintiff's counsel waived the right to obtain from her any further testimony. She was taken to a room in the courthouse, and Dr. J. W. Harris, a graduate of medicine, waited upon her, and thereafter, appearing as a witness for the defendant, he was interrogated, in relation to the patient, as follows: "What is her condition, and what is its cause, if you can tell?" An objection to the question, on the ground that it was immaterial and incompetent, having been sustained, an exception was allowed. It is maintained that an error was thus committed, the defendant's counsel arguing that the question was intended to show that the illness of the witness was real, and that her physical condition was not simulated in order to avoid cross-examination. If, from the form of a question propounded to a witness, the answer is apparent, it is not necessary for counsel, when an objection is interposed, to state to the court what reply is reasonably expected to the interrogatory, for that is obvious. Stanley v. Smith, 15 Or. 505, 16 Pac. 174; State v. Savage, 36 Or. 191, 60 Pac. 610, 61 Pac. 1128; Beers v. Aylsworth, 41 Or. 251, 69 Pac. 1025. Where, however, the answer solicited is not manifest from an inspection of the question asked, and an objection to the inquiry is urged, it is incumbent upon counsel conducting the examination to state what reply he reasonably expects from the witness. Kelley v. Highfield, 15 Or. 277, 14 Pac. 744; State v. Bartmess, 33 Or. 110, 54 Pac. 167; Jennings v. Oregon Land Co., 48 Or. 287, 86 Pac. 367. A statement by the physician of the nature of Mrs. Ireland's sudden illness, or of the causes that contributed to her indisposition, would not, in all probability, have disclosed the answer which it is now claimed by counsel that they desired to elicit from him. It is not to be supposed that her sickness was caused by nervous prostration, superinduced by the rigid cross-examination to which she was subjected, for, if such had been the case, the court would have undoubtedly permitted the question to have been answered. Testimony tending to show any other form of disease would have been immaterial; and, as no statement was made by defendant's counsel of the reply reasonably to be expected from the inquiry, and the question asked did not suggest the answer now desired, no error was committed in sustaining the objection.

The plaintiff's counsel, in his closing argument, stated to the jury that Mrs. Ireland's illness deprived him of an important right, and that, if he could have further cross-examined her, he might have been able to produce much testimony favorable to his client. An objection to this remark having been overruled, and an exception allowed, it is insisted that an error was committed. An attorney, in arguing a cause to a jury, ought to confine his remarks to the facts in evidence, and for any departure from this requirement it should be the duty of a court to interrupt the discourse, and particularly so, when attention is called thereto, and objection made on that ground. An attorney is entitled to advert to such reasonable inferences as he thinks are deducible from the evidence. A sense of fair treatment also prompts a court to permit, over objection and exception, a reply to be made to the argument which the opposing counsel have advanced. In civil actions, unless the remarks of an attorney are clearly without the legitimate range of the evidence, the bill of exceptions ought to show that the language complained of was not provoked. The reason for this rule is stated in a note to the text in 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 732, as follows: "Remarks which would not be primarily legitimate may under all the circumstances be entirely within bounds as answers to statements or arguments of opposing counsel." The bill of exceptions does not show that the observations to which exceptions were taken were not instigated by adverse remarks. Whether or not the inference which plaintiff's counsel sought to establish from his preclusion of a complete cross-examination of Mrs. Ireland is a legitimate deduction which entitled him, in a civil action, to comment thereon before the jury, is not necessary to determine at this time, for the remarks are not, in our opinion, such a violation of the privilege of an attorney as, in the absence of the showing mentioned, would render the argument objectionable; and hence, if an error was committed, it has not been made available.

The court charged the jury, in effect, that, if they should find that the defendant, by his intentional acts or conduct, alienated the affections of Mrs. Ireland, or by such means caused her to remain away from her husband, it was not necessary to prove that the defendant had sexual intercourse with her to entitle the plaintiff to recover a judgment herein. An exception having been taken to this instruction, it is contended that an error was committed in giving it. It is argued that the gravamen of the charge, as explained by plaintiff's counsel when the motion to make the complaint more definite and certain was interposed, is the alleged violation by the defendant of the chastity of the plaintiff's wife; and, the cause having been tried on that theory, the jury were erroneously permitted to place their verdict on another ground. "The action for seducing the wife away from the husband," says a noted author, "is by no means confined to the case of improper and adulterous relations: but it extends to all cases of wrongful interference in the family affairs of others whereby the wife is induced to leave the husband, or to so conduct herself that the comfort of the married life is destroyed." Cooley, Torts (3d Ed.) *264. The gist of the action by a husband for enticing away his wife, without justifiable cause, is the loss of the comfort, society, and services of the wife (Barnes v. Allen, *40 N. Y. 390), and the allegation and proof of adultery are not necessary to the maintenance of such an action (Higham v. Vanosdol, 101 Ind. 160; Adams v. Main, 3 Ind. App. 232, 29 N. E. 792, 50 Am. St. Rep. 266). The gist of the complaint is not the commission of adultery, but the alienation of the wife's affections; and hence the instruction complained of was authorized, and no error was committed in giving it.

Other exceptions are noted, but, deeming them unimportant, the judgment is affirmed.

(51 Or. 116)

ANDERSON v. GRIFFITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 25, 1908.)

1. USURY—DEFENSE—NECESSITY OF PLEA.

Plaintiff sued on a note for $2,025, alleging a balance of $625.95 due, with interest, etc. Two of the defendants answered, admitting the execution of the note, and alleging that in addition to the indorsements admitted they had paid $500, which plaintiff had neglected to credit, and prior to the action had tendered $350.20 in full payment of the debt, when but $160.89 was due. The reply denied the new matter pleaded, and on the trial plaintiff proved that the $500 had been paid without any application, and that plaintiff had applied it to a debt of that amount which defendants had agreed to pay as extra compensation for plaintiff's agreement to extend payment until certain mining claims mortgaged to secure the debt had been sold. Held, that defendants were entitled to presume that the only question involved was the payment of the $500 as alleged, so that they had no opportunity to plead usury prior to the raising of the issue at the trial, and were therefore not barred from such defense, because it was not pleaded.

2. PAYMENT—APPLICATION—NATURE OF DEBT.

Where a debtor owes more than one debt to a creditor, the creditor is bound to follow the debtor's directions as to application of payments, but in the absence of any direction, may apply the payment to any lawful demand, excluding a spurious or a pretended claim, an immoral one, a gambling contract, or usury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, §§ 104-114.]

3. USURY—AMOUNT OF INTEREST.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 4595, allowing a charge of 10 per cent. interest for the use of money, a payment of $500 for the use of $2,025 for 2 years, 5 months, and 19 days would not have been usury; but, the entire money not having been retained for that length of time, the charge became usurious.

4. INTEREST—MATURITY OF DEBT—RESCISSION OF USURIOUS CONTRACT.

Defendants agreed to pay plaintiff $2,025 on or before five years from March 19, 1897, secured by a mortgage on certain mining claims, providing that on a sale of the premises the debt should be at once payable. The claims were sold August 25, 1903, when the obligation matured, and thereafter bore interest at 6 per cent. On March 19, 1902, it was orally agreed that in consideration of $500 extra compensation the mortgage debt might be deferred until the claims were sold. Plaintiff sued for a balance of $625.95, having applied a payment of $500 on the extension agreement. Defendants deposited $160.89, which they permitted plaintiff to recover. Held, that defendants' concession that the sum deposited was due to plaintiff was a rescission of the usurious agreement to pay $500 for plaintiff's forbearance, and thereby entitled plaintiff to interest at 6 per cent. from March 19, 1902, when the note matured, instead of August 25, 1903, when the mining claims were sold.

5. TENDER—NONACCEPTANCE—KEEPING TENDER GOOD.

Where defendants made a written offer to pay plaintiff more than was due him, but only deposited with the clerk a sum less than plaintiff was entitled to recover, the tender was not kept good.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Tender, §§ 55, 56.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lane County; L. T. Harris, Judge.

Suit by A. J. Anderson against William Griffith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

This is a suit by A. J. Anderson against William Griffith, J. W. Reed, and the Oregon Securities Company, a corporation, to foreclose a mortgage. It is alleged in the complaint: "That on March 19, 1897, Griffith and

Reed gave to the plaintiff their promissory note for $2,025, due on or before five years, without interest, and to secure the payment thereof they executed to him a mortgage of an undivided one-fourth interest in three mining claims. That the mortgage provided that, in case of a sale of the premises within the time specified, the debt should at once become payable. That the claims were sold August 25, 1903, when the obligation matured, and the debt thereafter bore interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per year. That the following payments, and no others, have been made, to wit: August 28, 1903, $1,000; September 4, 1904, $250; and September 27, 1905, $250; thus leaving due $625.95, with interest thereon since the latter date. That $65 is a reasonable sum as attorney's fees, as provided for in the note. That the interest of the Oregon Securities Company in the premises is subject to plaintiff's lien thereon. The defendants Griffith and Reed, answering, admit that their codefendant is a corporation, that they executed the mortgage mentioned, that the premises were sold August 25, 1903, that the debt thereafter bore interest at the legal rate, and that they made the payments stated, but deny all the other allegations of the complaint. For a separate defense they aver that, in addition to the indorsements specified, they paid on account of the note, November 13, 1905, $500, which sum the plaintiff unlawfully neglected to credit thereon; that prior to the commencement of this suit they made a written tender to him of $350.20 in full payment of the debt, when there was due thereon only $160.89, which latter sum they deposited with the clerk of the court for him. The reply denies the allegations of new matter in the answer, and, the cause having been tried, the defendants were awarded their costs and disbursements, and the suit was dismissed, from which decree the plaintiff appeals.

W. W. Cardwell, for appellant. C. A. Hardy, for respondents.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The testimony given at the trial shows that on March 19, 1897, the plaintiff was the owner of the specified interest in the several mining claims, which property he at that time sold and conveyed to Griffith and Reed for $2,025, taking as security therefor a mortgage on the premises; that about March 19, 1902, when the note evidencing the debt matured, it was orally agreed that in consideration of $500 extra compensation the payment of the mortgage debt might be deferred until the mining claims could be sold; that a sale thereof was effected August 25, 1903, and there was paid on account of the purchase price $3,000, of which sum the plaintiff received and credited on the note $1,000, and thereafter obtained the money evidenced by the other indorsements appearing on the negotiable instrument; that on November 13, 1905, the defendants sent a check for $500 to the plaintiff, without indicating how the money represented thereby should be credited, whereupon he applied it in discharging their promise to pay for the indulgence. Griffith and Reed severally testified, and the court found, though denied by the plaintiff, that the stipulation to pay the extra remuneration was in lieu of interest, that the plaintiff agreed to wait for his money until it was received from the sale of the premises, and that at the time this suit was instituted the entire purchase price had not been paid.

It is contended by plaintiff's counsel that, as Griffith and Reed were indebted on the promissory note and on the oral agreement to pay for the delay, when they sent the $500, without directions as to what account should be credited therewith, the plaintiff was entitled to apply the money in discharging their obligation for the postponement, and that the question of usury is not involved herein, because it is not made an issue by the pleadings. It is maintained by the defendants' counsel, however, that an agreement is usurious when a party seeks to obtain for a forbearance to enforce a legal remedy a greater compensation than is allowed by law for the use of money; that a creditor, in the absence of directions, cannot apply money received upon an illegal claim; and that the court properly devoted the sum specified in the check as a payment on account of the principal. The editors of the Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, in discussing the necessity of pleading usury as a defense, say: "As a general rule, both at law and in equity, where usury does not appear on the face of the plaintiff's pleadings, a defendant who desires to avail himself of that defense must plead it, or in some way give notice thereof to the adverse party; and this rule will be departed from only in exceptional cases, as, for instance, where the defendant has had no opportunity to plead." 22 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 421. In the case at bar the defense interposed is based on the alleged payment of $500 made by the defendants November 13, 1905, for which sum they assert proper credit was not given; and the allegation is denied in the reply. From the issue thus framed the defendants had the right to suppose that the only question involved was the payment of the sum alleged. At the trial, however, the plaintiff admitted he received the money, but applied it on another account. The defendants, therefore, had no opportunity to plead usury; but, as an issue on that question was made by the evidence, it was proper for the court, as intimated in Sujette v. Wilson, 13 Or. 514, 518, 11 Pac. 287, to consider the matter.

The right of a debtor, at or prior to making a payment, to direct the application thereof to a particular debt, where he owes more than one, and the corresponding duty of a creditor to obey the command, are recognized and fully established. Montour v. Grand Lodge, 38 Or. 47, 62 Pac. 524. In the absence of such direction, the creditor may apply the money or property received to any lawful demand he has against the debtor. Trullinger v. Kofoed, 7 Or. 223, 33 Am. Rep. 708. In Greene v. Tyler, 39 Pa. 361, the court, in speaking of the application of a payment, says: "It could not be made to a spurious or pretended claim; nor to an immoral one, like a gambling contract; nor to usury, for that is forbidden by statute." To the same effect, see Real Estate Trust Co. v. Keech, 7 Hun, 253; Turner v. Turner, 80 Va. 379; Stone v. Talbot, 4 Wis. 442, 468.

Ten per cent. interest per annum is the highest rate allowed by law in this state for the use of money. B. & C. Comp. § 4595. The payment of $500 for the use of $2,025 for 2 years, 5 months, and 19 days would have been no more than 10 per cent. interest for that time, and therefore not usurious. It will be remembered that the mortgage note matured March 19, 1902, and that the mining claims were sold August 25, 1903. For this extension of 1 year, 5 months, and 6 days $500 was appropriated by the plaintiff, who, after the sale of the premises, charged 6 per cent. interest per annum for the use of the money. The plaintiff could have received $500 for the use of the money for that time, and if he had thereafter permitted the defendants to retain the entire sum for 2 years, 7 months, and 2 days at 6 per cent. per annum, making in all 4 years and 8 days, the interest received would not have exceeded 10 per cent. per annum. The entire money was not retained for that length of time, and hence the sum sought to be recovered for the use of it would have been usurious.

Permitting the plaintiff to recover the sum deposited is tantamount to a rescission of the agreement to pay $500 for the forbearance. In such case the parties should be placed in statu quo, thereby entitling the plaintiff to interest at 6 per cent. per annum from March 19, 1902, when the note matured, instead of August 25, 1903, when the mining claims were sold. Computing the interest at the legal rate from the maturity of the note, and deducting the payments as they were severally made, there remained due from the defendants to the plaintiff, February 13, 1906, when this suit was instituted, $349.95, instead of the sum as found by the lower court. It will be remembered that the defendants made a written offer to pay the plaintiff $350.-20, or 25 cents more than was due him; but they did not keep their offer good by depositing that sum with the clerk, and left with that offer only $160.89.

The decree will therefore be modified, so as to allow the plaintiff the sum of $349.95; but, as he refused that offer when it was made, we believe he is only entitled to the costs and disbursements incurred in this court, which are awarded him.

ABERNETHY et al. v. UHLMAN et al.
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 25, 1906.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES—ADVANCES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—FORECLOSURE.

Where a chattel mortgagee agrees to advance a definite amount, but only a portion thereof is advanced, the mortgagee may nevertheless foreclose the mortgage for the amount due, subject to a set-off for any damages the mortgagor may have suffered by reason of the mortgagee's failure to advance the whole sum.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT—CROPPING CONTRACT—NATURE OF RELATION.

A lessor and lessee under a cropping contract are tenants in common in the crop, and if the lessee mortgages his interest, the mortgagee is subrogated only to the lessee's rights and interest, and to the extent of his mortgage is a tenant in common with the lessor, so that, in order to claim as against the lessor, the mortgagee must fulfill the lessee's contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Landlord and Tenant, § 1397.]

3. SAME—PRESERVATION—LIEN FOR ADVANCES.

Plaintiffs leased certain land to G. for hop culture for one-third of the crop, which it was G.'s duty to harvest and bale. G. mortgaged his two-thirds to defendants to secure $1,500 advances to enable him to make the crop, but defendants, after advancing $700, refused to advance further sums, and, G. being unable to procure pickers, plaintiffs procured and paid them under an agreement with defendants' agent to pay the pickers when the work was finished. Held, that plaintiffs were not compelled to care for the crop in fulfillment of G.'s agreement in the mortgage for defendants' benefit to do so, but were entitled to advance money to harvest the whole crop in order to protect their own interest, so that G.'s share was applicable, first, to the payment of the costs and disbursements of the suit; second, to plaintiffs' claim for advances; and, third, to the payment of defendants' mortgage.

4. SAME—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where a complaint alleged that a tenant under a cropping contract delivered the crop to the landlords as a pledge to secure money advanced by the latter to harvest the crop, and also that the tenant was unable to procure the labor to care for the crop, and requested the landlords to assist him, and that they rendered services, hired laborers, and that defendants, mortgagees of the tenant's interest, directed and requested plaintiffs to cause the hops to be picked and baled, and agreed to pay the expenses, evidence that plaintiffs harvested the crop with the tenant's consent, and were holding the same accordingly, was not a variance.

5. SAME—CROPPING CONTRACT—MORTGAGES.

Where a tenant under a cropping contract mortgaged his share of the crop, and was thereafter unable to procure funds with which to harvest the crop, which funds were thereupon advanced by the landlords, the fact that the harvesting was done by the tenant would not defeat the landlords' right to priority for the amount so advanced as against the mortgagee.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yamhill County; William Galloway, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Abernethy and others against S. Uhlman and others. From a decree directing that the proceeds of a portion of a crop belonging to defendant Go Sun be applied pro rata on the claims of plaintiffs and defendants Uhlman, both parties appeal. Reversed and rendered.

This is a suit commenced by cross-bill to an action pending as to the right to possess-sion of 55 bales of hops; the conflict growing out of the following facts: The plaintiffs leased to defendant, Go Sun, a Chinaman, 19 acres of hops for a term of five years from February, 1902, plaintiffs to furnish him with team, tools, dryhouse, wood, poles, water, and dwelling, and to pay for one-half of the burlap and sulphur, Go Sun to cultivate, care for, harvest, cure, and bale the crop at his own expense, and when so harvested and baled, to deliver to plaintiffs one-third of such crop on the place, and on March 11, 1905, for the purpose of securing money with which to cultivate and harvest said crop under said lease for the year 1905, Go Sun made arrangements with defendants, S. and F. Uhlman, who were hop dealers, to advance to him $1,500. To secure the said Uhlmans for such advancement as should be made, he executed to them a chattel mortgage on his two-thirds of such crop for that year: the reference in the mortgage to such advancements being in the following language: "That, whereas, the party of the first part expects to become indebted to the parties of the second part within six months from the date of this instrument, for advances and loans to be made by the parties of the second part to the party of the first part, to an amount not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars, gold coin of the United States, for which loans and advances the party of the first part is to execute to the parties of the second part, one or more negotiable promissory notes, payable at such periods as may be agreed upon by the parties hereto, and bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from the date of said notes and at the dates in schedule hereunto annexed."

To this is appended a schedule as follows:

"Schedule of dates when advances are to be made hereunder and notes given and amounts of each are as follows, about:

March 11, 1905, the sum of.....	$ 100
April 15, 1905	50
June 1, 1905	150
September 1, 1905	600
On close of picking, bal.....	600
	<hr/> $1,500"

It appears also from the testimony of Judge Woodward and M. H. Gilbertson that defendants promised to advance said sum to Go Sun for such purposes; that prior to September 1, 1905, defendants, the Uhlmans, had advanced to Go Sun, under the terms of said mortgage, the sum of $700, and finally refused to advance any further sums; that on about September 1st Go Sun was unable to procure laborers to pick said hops on his own credit, and applied to the plaintiffs to employ them for him, assuring plaintiffs that the money therefor would be advanced by the Uhlmans; and on or prior to September 8th plaintiffs secured the laborers for Go Sun, and expended for such labor and other expenses in harvesting the crop, $841.51. As security for the repayment thereof, Go Sun delivered the hops to them, whereupon the Uhlmans brought replevin to recover the hops under their mortgage, and plaintiffs brought this suit to establish their superior right to the hops to reimburse themselves for such advances. The lower court decreed that the liens of defendants S. and F. Uhlman and plaintiffs are equal, and that the proceeds of Go Sun's portion of the crop be applied pro rata upon the claims; and both parties appeal.

W. M. Kiser, for appellants. M. L. Pipes, for respondents.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The question involved is whether plaintiffs' claim for such advances is superior to defendants' mortgage. Chas. Abernethy testifies that Gilbertson, who was the agent for the defendants, S. and F. Uhlman, throughout this transaction, sent for him to come over to the Eldriedge yard on September 6th, and while there Gilbertson gave him instructions to go ahead and gather the hops. He asked Gilbertson about picking money, and the latter said he would be on hand to pay the pickers when the work was finished. This is corroborated by Go Sun, who was present, and by Mrs. Eldriedge, who had a conversation with Gilbertson on the morning of that day. Gilbertson admits part of the conversation with Abernethy, but does not remember any of the conversation with him as to picking money for his place, and claims that his talk with Go Sun and Mrs. Eldriedge referred only to the Eldriedge yard, which was also cropped by Go Sun. Gilbertson was undoubtedly anxious that the crop should be harvested, and used this plan to interest Abernethy; and we conclude from the evidence and circumstances that Gilbertson did on September 6th promise Abernethy and Go Sun that he would be on hand at the close of the picking to pay the hands, and requested Abernethy to assume the liability of the harvesting and he would repay him. The general rule as to the effect of a mortgage given to secure advances, even where the mortgagee agrees to advance a definite amount, if only a part of such amount is advanced, the mortgagee may nevertheless foreclose the mortgage for the amount due, subject to a set-off for any damages the mortgagor may have suffered by reason of the failure of the mortgagee to advance the whole sum. Coleman v. Galbreath, 53 Miss. 303; Watts v. Bonner, 68 Miss. 629, 6 South. 187. But there are additional elements involved here which preclude the application of that rule. This promised advancement was for the accomplishment of a particular thing, namely, cultivating and harvesting the crop covered by the mortgage.

Plaintiffs were interested in the crop to the amount of their one-third as rental, and the mortgagees were interested to the extent of Go Sun's two-thirds interest. Go Sun's contract with the plaintiffs was to make a crop for plaintiffs' benefit, and defendants were aware of this duty and agreed to make the advance for that purpose, and in case of any default by Go Sun, if necessary for their own protection, they must take his place. Plaintiffs were not compelled to remain indifferent and see the crop lost. Nor were they compelled, for the purpose of protecting their interests, to care for the crop in fulfillment of Go Sun's agreement in the mortgage for the Uhlmanns' benefit. Even if the mortgagees were not under obligation to advance the money to harvest the crop, they had the right, upon the failure or inability of Go Sun, to furnish the money, in order to prevent waste, and thus protect their security; but, if they failed to do so, then plaintiffs, to save themselves, had a right to advance the money to care for the crop, and to be first reimbursed therefor out of the crop. The case is much stronger in plaintiffs' favor, by reason of the fact that the defendants, the mortgagees, were under obligation to do this, and had requested plaintiffs to incur the liability, and that they would reimburse them. Plaintiffs' interest was an undivided one, and could not be segregated until the crop was harvested, and to protect themselves they must care for the whole crop. It is the law in Oregon that the lessor and lessee are tenants in common in the crop (Cooper v. McGrew, 8 Or. 327; Messinger v. Union Warehouse Co., 39 Or. 546, 65 Pac. 808); and, although the lessee may mortgage his interest, the mortgagee is subrogated only to the lessee's rights and interest; and, to the extent of his mortgage, is also a tenant in common with the lessor (Sunol v. Molloy, 63 Cal. 369; McGee v. Fitzer, 37 Tex. 27; Jones, Chattel Mortgages, § 47). To claim any interest under the mortgage as against the lessor the mortgagee must stand in the shoes of the lessee and fulfill his contract. The Abernethy's rights and remedies are the same against the mortgagee as against the lessee.

It appears from the testimony that Go Sun was unable to pick the hops without the money promised by defendants. He went to Portland to employ pickers, but came back without them, saying to Chas. Abernethy that he was unable to get pickers. They would not come for him, so he asked Abernethy to go and get them, with the assurance that defendants were to advance the money to pay them. Plaintiffs did go to Portland and got pickers pursuant to this request, viz., about 45, and brought them to the yard on or before September 6th. When Chas. Abernethy came over to the Eldridge yard upon the request of Gilbertson, the latter gave him instructions about picking the hops and looking after the books, saying that he would be on hand to pay the pickers when harvesting was completed. He instructed Abernethy not to let the tickets go out of the yard, that he, Abernethy, should have money on hand to take care of them in the meantime, thus clearly recognizing that Abernethy was in charge of the harvesting. Abernethy himself says that plaintiffs did the picking, that they employed the pickers, worked in the yard, and paid the help. It does not appear that Go Sun had anything to do with the harvesting. When asked how he got possession of the hops, Abernethy said that after they were baled they were put in the storeroom and stayed there; that they did not separate their third, but all were put in together; and that he kept them. When asked what Go Sun said as to Abernethy taking charge of the hops and having a lien upon them, the latter says that it was with his consent; thus showing that the plaintiffs understood that they themselves had charge of the crop during the harvesting, and that Go Sun so recognized it. In Hughes v. Johnson, 33 Ark. 285, 296, it is said: "It is further a well-settled principle in equity that one who has an interest in a security may advance what is fairly necessary to its preservation, and may retain the advances out of the proceeds before crediting any portion of his debt. There can, at least, be no doubt of that where such advances are made by the consent of all parties interested in the property or fund. * * * This is not upon the idea that the security of the mortgage is thereby extended to other advances, but rather upon the consideration that the proceeds of the property have been diminished by the expenses of preservation." That was a case of a chattel mortgage upon a growing cotton crop; a suit being brought by the mortgagor to compel an accounting of the crop and a cancellation of the mortgage, without payment of the advances to harvest it. Wheat v. Watson, 57 Ala. 581, was a case where the landlord had a lien by statute for the rental. The defendant Watson had a cropper's lien for $500 advanced to the tenants to enable them to make the crop. In July the tenants abandoned the crop. The landlord offered to permit the defendant to take the place of the tenants and to complete the crop, which he declined to do. The landlord then took charge of the crop and harvested it; and the question was whether the landlord was entitled to be reimbursed from the crop for such expenses, in preference to the defendant's lien for prior advances to the tenants.

It is held that if the defendant, when given the opportunity, fails to cultivate and gather the crop, he relinquishes to the landlord the whole crop, and, if he has any remedy, it is only for the surplus after the landlord is fully paid for the expenses of making the crop. It is held in Caldwell v. Hall, 49 Ark. 503, 1 S. W. 62, 4 Am. St. Rep. 64, that it is a well-settled principle in equity that one who has a lien on a growing crop may advance what is fairly necessary to prevent waste or destruction of the security, and may retain the advances thus made out of the proceeds of the sale before crediting any portion of his debt. That was the claim of a mortgagee of a growing crop made for advances to care for and harvest the crop. We conclude, therefore, that plaintiffs were justified in taking care of the crop for their own protection, and may hold the crop for their expenses thus incurred.

It is insisted by defendants that, by the allegations of the complaint, Go Sun was in possession of the hops and yard at the time of the picking and baling, and that plaintiffs cannot now claim that they were in possession during the harvesting. The complaint does allege that after the picking Go Sun delivered the hops to the plaintiffs as a pledge to secure the repayment of the money so advanced and expended by them; but it is also alleged that Go Sun was unable to procure the labor required to take care of the crop, and requested plaintiffs to assist him, and that plaintiffs rendered their services, hired and employed the laborers to pick and care for the crop, and that defendants directed and requested plaintiffs to cause the hops to be picked and baled, and they would pay the expenses therefor. In view of these allegations, we do not deem it a variance from the pleading for plaintiffs to prove that they harvested the crop with Go Sun's consent, and are holding the crop accordingly. However, if the harvesting was done by Go Sun, that fact could not defeat plaintiffs' rights where it is alleged and proved that it was necessary for plaintiffs to advance the money to preserve the crop for the safety of their own interest therein.

Therefore the decree is reversed, and a decree rendered here that the proceeds of Go Sun's share of the crop be applied, first, in the payment of the costs and disbursements of this suit; and, secondly, to the payment of the claim of the plaintiffs, $841.51; and, thirdly, to the payment of the mortgage debt of defendants, S. and F. Uhlman; and that the said Uhlmans have judgment against Go Sun for any balance remaining unpaid.

PARNELL v. DAVENPORT et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 25, 1908.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—DUEBILLS—SUFFICIENT FUNDS—DEFENSES.

Defendant was assignee of money to be earned on certain contracts entered into by the assignor. Plaintiff procured from the assignor an order for the payment of money for services rendered, drawn on defendant, and on presentation the defendant paid part in money and issued a duebill for the balance. Held, in an action on the duebill, that it was no defense that the duebill was issued on condition of defendant having sufficient funds of the assignor to pay the duebill, since, under Civ. Code, §§ 1350, 1351, relating to things in action and the transfer thereof, the transaction amounted to an assignment of a chose in action.

2. SAME—CONSIDERATION.

A duebill, issued to the holder of an order for the payment of money for his services by the drawee of the order in part payment thereof, is supported by sufficient consideration, under Civ. Code, §§ 2160, 2161, relating to "good consideration," since, the transaction amounting to an assignment of the order, the payee of the order lost his right to a statutory lien for his services, and the drawee (the maker of the duebill) gained the benefit of its waiver.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, §§ 166-212.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A finding on conflicting evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

4. SAME—WAIVER OF ERRORS—JOINT DEFENDANTS.

Where two joint defendants jointly moved for a new trial, and the notice of appeal from the refusal to grant the new trial is a joint one, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict as against one of the defendants, whether the evidence is sufficient as against the other, need not be considered.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by Samuel Parnell against J. R. Davenport and another on a duebill. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

John A. Smith, for appellants. T. F. Nolan, for respondent.

HOLLOWAY, J. In 1905 F. W. Warnock had a contract with the Original Mining Company to supply certain mining timbers, which he procured in Jefferson county and shipped to the company in Butte. In order to prosecute his work Warnock borrowed money from the appellant, the Davenport Company, and as partial security for such loan assigned to the Davenport Company the moneys due him each month for timber sold to the Original Mining Company. Parnell, the plaintiff and respondent, was employed by Warnock in cutting and preparing these mining timbers. On December 12, 1905, Warnock executed and delivered to Parnell the following order: "Warnock's Camp, Dec. 12, 1905. J. R. Davenport: Please pay to Samuel Parnell the sum of one hundred and twenty-seven and $\frac{58}{100}$ (\$127.58) dollars, in full payment to date, and charge the same to my account, and greatly oblige. F. W. Warnock." This order Parnell took to the Davenport Company, and received from the company \$75 in cash and the following duebill: "December 14, 1905. Due Sam Parnell \$52.58 on Warnock account, to be paid in January. J. R. Davenport." Demand having been made for the payment of the amount represented by this duebill, and payment having been refused, Parnell commenced this action to enforce payment as for a balance due on an account assigned to J. R. Davenport and the Davenport Company. The joint answer of the defendants admits the execution, delivery, and presentation of the Warnock order, and the payment by the Davenport Company of \$75, but alleges that the promise to pay the balance was made upon condition that sufficient funds from Warnock should come into the hands of Davenport or the Davenport Company; and it is further alleged that there were not any funds whatever from Warnock received by either of the defendants from which such payment could be made. An attempt was also made to plead a counterclaim; but the allegations are insufficient for that purpose, and there is not any contention made here with reference to that so-called counterclaim. The case was commenced in a justice of the peace court, where plaintiff had judgment. The defendants appealed to the district court, where the case was tried to the court sitting with a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff, and a judgment rendered and entered thereon. From an order denying defendants a new trial, this appeal was taken.

We think the liability of the defendant Davenport Company was properly fixed by the judgment in this case. Taking the defendants' own theory of the transaction, as disclosed by the testimony of J. R. Davenport, a witness for the defendants, and it seems to us that a different conclusion could scarcely be reached. That testimony discloses the business relations between Warnock and the Davenport Company. It further discloses that, when Parnell presented the Warnock order, an assignment of all moneys due from Warnock was taken by the Davenport Company, $75 paid in cash, and the duebill representing the balance given. It is entirely immaterial, then, what particular designation be given to the Warnock order, since it is manifest that the transaction between Parnell and the Davenport Company amounted to an assignment of a chose in action by Parnell to that company. Civ. Code, §§ 1350, 1351.

But it is said that there was not any consideration for the promise on the part of the Davenport Company to pay the balance represented by the duebill. With this we do not agree. Other matters aside, it is apparent that Parnell by such assignment waived his right to a statutory lien, while the Davenport Company gained the advantage of having such lien out of the way of asserting its claim to moneys which would accrue to Warnock from the sale of mining timbers prepared by Parnell, and which moneys the Davenport Company could claim under its assignment from Warnock, provided a lien upon the timbers was not asserted. Under these circumstances we deem the consideration sufficient. Civ. Code, §§ 2160, 2161.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether the promise to pay the balance represented by the duebill was an absolute or a conditional promise; but by the general verdict that controversy was settled in favor of plaintiff's contention that it was an absolute one.

Whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict as against J. R. Davenport need not be considered. The motion for new trial was a joint motion, and the notice of appeal was a joint notice. In 1 Spelling on New Trial and Appellate Procedure, § 372, it is said: "A party having ground for a new trial may lose the benefit of it by proceeding jointly with a party not so favorably situated with reference to the proceeding; and, where there is any doubt as to the identity of relation or equality of rights therein, a separate notice should be given, though they be represented by the same attorney." Capital Lumber Co. v. Barth, 33 Mont. 94, 81 Pac. 994.

The order from which this appeal is taken is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BIRSCH v. CITIZENS' ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 25, 1908.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ACTIONS—PLEADING—NECESSITY.

The defense of contributory negligence, in order to be available to defendant, must be specially pleaded, unless such contributory negligence appears from the allegations of the complaint, or unless the plaintiff's case raises a presumption of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 195-216.]

2. SAME.

In an action to recover for personal injuries, an allegation in the answer that plaintiff's injury was wholly due to his own negligence and was not in any way due to the negligence of defendant is insufficient to raise the defense of contributory negligence, since contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff presupposes negligence on the part of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 195-197.]

3. ELECTRICITY — INJURIES — PRESUMPTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, it appeared that plaintiff was working as a hod carrier in the construction of a building, and while working on a high scaffold in the rain stepped on a wet mortar board and slipped. He threw out his hands, and one struck defendant's heavily charged electric wire, burning him badly, rendering him insensible, and causing him to fall to the ground, whereby he sustained further injuries. Held, that there could be no inference of negligence on plaintiff's part, as it was a fair inference that the throwing out of his arms was involuntary.

4. NEGLIGENCE—"NEGLECT" DEFINED.

"Negligence" is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person, under the existing circumstances would not have done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 1-6, 354-377.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4743-4764; vol. 8, pp. 7729-7731.]

5. SAME — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, where contributory negligence is properly pleaded as a defense, the burden of proof to establish it is on defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 217-234.]

6. ELECTRICITY—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against an electric company for injuries sustained by plaintiff, a hod carrier, by slipping on a wet scaffold and striking one of defendant's wires, the question whether defendant was negligent in not insulating the wire was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Electricity, § 11.]

7. SAME—ORDINARY CARE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 3266, subd. 4, it is presumed "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concern," and hence, where a workman slips on a wet scaffold and throws out his arm, so as to come in contact with defendant's live wire, and is injured, the slipping cannot be said to be negligence per se on his part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Electricity, §§ 10, 11.]

8. NEGLIGENCE—"PROXIMATE CAUSE."

Where the cause of an injury is a pure accident, and without fault of the injured party, if the negligent act of the defendant is a co-operating or culminating cause of the injury, or if the accident would not have resulted in the injury, except for the negligent act, the negligence is the "proximate cause" of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 74, 75, 378-381.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5758-5769; vol. 8, p. 7711.]

Appeal from District Court, Fergus County; E. K. Cheadle, Judge.

Action by Joseph Birsch against the Citizens' Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rudolf Von Tobel and M. S. Gunn, for appellant. Frank E. Smith and J. C. Huntoon, for respondent.

HOLLOWAY, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff was employed as a hod carrier and mason's helper in the construction of a building for the Bank of Fergus County. At the time the plaintiff received his injuries, one wall of the building had been erected to a height of more than 20 feet. Scaffoldings were built against this wall for the use of the workmen; the second of these scaffolds being about 20 to 22 feet above the ground. The defendant electric company had certain wires strung on poles within 3 or 4 feet of this wall; the topmost wire being about 2 feet above the second scaffold, which scaffold was about 2½ feet wide. This topmost wire carried an electro-motive force of about 6,000 volts. On the day of the injury the plaintiff was directed by a mason to move certain mortar from a mortar board at one end of the second scaffold to a mortar board at the other end of the same scaffold. It was raining, and the scaffold, boards, and tools were wet. In the act of performing his work the plaintiff stepped upon the mortar board and slipped. Apparently he involuntarily threw out his hands to save himself or restore his equilibrium, when his left forearm came in contact with the heavily charged wire. He became at once insensible and fell to the ground and upon a pile of rock. The result of his contact with the wire was a burn on his left arm and a shock to his nervous system. His fall upon the pile of rock resulted in broken ribs, an injured shoulder, and other wounds and bruises. He commenced this action to recover damages, and charged the defendant electric company with negligence in maintaining the wire in close proximity to the building without having it sufficiently insulated, and with having it charged with a high and dangerous current of electricity. The answer consists of a denial of most of the material allegations of the complaint. It also contains the following paragraph: "(6) That if plaintiff was injured at the time alleged, or at any other time, by coming in contact with one of the defendant's wires charged with electricity, such injury was wholly due to plaintiff's own neglect, and was not in any way due to any negligence on the part of defendant, or of any of its officers." To the affirmative allegations of the answer the plaintiff replied. The cause was tried to the court sitting with a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered and entered thereon, from which judgment, and an order denying it a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The appellant makes three assignments of error, but in the opening paragraph of its brief its counsel tersely say: "The first contention of appellant is that the negligence complained of was not the proximate cause of the injuries sustained by plaintiff. All the errors specified are based upon this contention, and the contention that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence." We have, then, for consideration, as counsel have outlined, but two questions, and these, stated in the reverse order, are: (1) Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? and (2) was the negligence of the defendant the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries?

1. Objection is made to a consideration of the first question, upon the ground that the defense of contributory negligence is not pleaded in the answer. It is a rule, now well established in this state, that the defense of contributory negligence, in order to be available to the defendant, must be specially pleaded (Pryor v. City of Walkerville, 31 Mont. 618, 79 Pac. 240; Orient Insurance Co. v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 31 Mont. 502, 78 Pac. 1036, and cases cited), unless such contributory negligence appears from the allegations of the complaint (Nord v. Boston & Mont. Con. C. & S. Min. Co., 33 Mont. 464, 84 Pac. 1116, 89 Pac. 647), or unless the plaintiff's own case raises a presumption of contributory negligence (Nelson v. Boston & Mont. Con. C. & S. Min. Co., 35 Mont. 223, 88 Pac. 785). The only attempt made to plead contributory negligence is found in the paragraph of the answer quoted above, and that the allegations of that paragraph are insufficient is apparent. In the paragraph it is alleged that plaintiff's injury was wholly due to his own negligence, and was not in any way due to the negligence of the defendant. Contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff presupposes negligence on the part of the defendant. Beach on Contributory Negligence (2d Ed.) § 64; Wastl v.

Montana Union Ry. Co., 24 Mont. 159, 61 Pac. 9. "Contributory negligence is a want of ordinary care upon the part of a person injured by the actionable negligence of another, combining and concurring with that negligence, and contributing to the injury as a proximate cause thereof, without which the injury would not have occurred." 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 371. This definition is approved in Moakler v. Willamette V. R. Co., 18 Or. 189, 22 Pac. 948, 6 L. R. A. 656, 17 Am. St. Rep. 717, and Montgomery G. L. Co. v. Montgomery & E. Ry. Co., 86 Ala. 372, 5 South. 735. In Washington v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 190, it is said: "Properly speaking, contributory negligence, as the very words import, arises when the plaintiff as well as the defendant has done some act negligently, or has omitted through negligence to do some act, which it was their respective duty to do, and the combined negligence of the two parties has directly produced the injury."

It goes without saying, then, that an answer which denies any negligence on the part of the defendant, and alleges that the injury resulted wholly from plaintiff's negligence, does not plead contributory negligence; and the defendant, having failed to plead contributory negligence, cannot rely upon it, unless this case falls within one of the two exceptions noted above. It does not fall within the first exception, for the complaint alleges: "That the said injuries complained of herein were caused by the gross negligence of the defendant, its agents and servants; that the said plaintiff was entirely without negligence on his part." Does the case, then, fall within the second exception, or, in other words, did the plaintiff's own case raise a presumption of contributory negligence? In their brief counsel for appellant say: "The evidence conclusively establishes the fact that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. He fell onto the wire by reason of his own heedlessness and carelessness." The testimony tends to show that the plaintiff stepped on the mortar board and slipped; that he threw his hands out, and in so doing his left arm came in contact with the wire. The only fair inference deducible would seem to be that his slipping was an accident, and the throwing out of his arms a purely involuntary act. In Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. Ed. 506, negligence is defined as follows: "Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done." We approve this definition, and under its terms we cannot see how it can be said that the plaintiff's case raised a presumption of his negligence.

Appellant's counsel cite Bessey v. Newich-awanick Co., 94 Me. 61, 46 Atl. 806. Just how this case was tried does not appear clearly from the report, but the opinion is prefaced with this observation: "The essential facts in this case are not really in dispute, but only the inferences to be fairly deduced therefrom. To the court, by agreement of the parties, is left the decision of the case upon both the law and the fact." Counsel quote the concluding paragraph of the opinion, as follows: "We feel forced, above all else, to the conclusion that whether defendant was or not in any fault, actual or theoretical merely, the case falls to show that the plaintiff's own heedlessness was not the great cause of the accident." This would seem to indicate that a rule prevails in Maine different from that recognized here. In a case of this character the plaintiff does not assume the burden of proving the negative; that is, he is not called upon to show that his own heedlessness was not the cause of his injury. On the contrary, the burden is upon the defendant to show the affirmative; that is, that the injury resulted from plaintiff's heedlessness as a contributing cause, where contributory negligence is properly pleaded. The authority cited above would be applicable if this case belonged to the class of which Kennon v. Gilmer, 4 Mont. 433, 2 Pac. 21, is an example; but it does not.

2. Was the negligence of the defendant the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury? We are not prepared to say that appellant is not correct in contending that "the only injury resulting from the wire was the burn on the wrist and a shock. The broken shoulder blade, broken ribs, and other injuries are attributable to the fall on the rocks. It is difficult to determine from the record whether the plaintiff would have fallen to the ground in any event, whether he came in contact with the wire or not. But it is a fact that he came in contact with the wire, was rendered insensible and helpless, and that he did fall to the ground and upon the pile of rock. The trial court had the witnesses before it, observed their demeanor, and apparently had the advantage of seeing the illustrations made by the plaintiff as to his situation when he came in contact with the wire, which we have not; and it may be that, if the defendant had requested the trial court to withdraw from the consideration of the jury all testimony relating to the injury resulting from his coming in contact with the pile of rock, the request would have been granted; but such a request was not made, and it is not contended that the verdict is excessive. In order to coincide with appellant's view, we would have to say that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything, and this we cannot do. So far as the injuries received by plaintiff from coming in contact with the wire directly are concerned, we think it is a fair inference from the evidence that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause thereof. At least, we are satisfied that it was a matter properly submitted to the jury for its determination. This is the holding of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Griffin v. United Electric Light Co., 164 Mass. 492, 41 N. E. 675, 32 L. R. A. 400, 49 Am. St. Rep. 477, a case somewhat similar in its facts. Certainly it cannot be said that plaintiff's accidental slipping was per se negligence on his part. In this state the law presumes that the plaintiff exercised ordinary care. Code Civ. Proc. § 3266, subd. 4.

We think it may be said to be the general rule, sustained by the great weight of authority, that "where the primary cause of an injury is a pure accident, occasioned without fault of the injured party, if the negligent act of the defendant is a co-operating or culminating cause of the injury, or if the accident would not have resulted in the injury excepting for the negligent act, the negligence is the proximate cause of the injury, for which damages may be recovered." Goe v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 30 Wash. 654, 71 Pac. 182. This doctrine has been directly recognized and applied in this state. Lundeen v. Livingston E. L. Co., 17 Mont. 32, 41 Pac. 995; Cannon v. Lewis, 18 Mont. 402, 45 Pac. 572. In Melsner v. City of Dillon, 29 Mont. 116, 74 Pac. 130, the same rule is stated as follows: "Where two causes contribute to an injury, one of which is directly traceable to the defendant's negligence, and for the other of which neither party is responsible, the defendant will be held liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for such negligence." Counsel for appellant cite Elliott v. Allegheny Light Co., 204 Pa. 568, 54 Atl. 278, which seems to be somewhat in conflict with the rule just stated; but we do not see any reason for departing from the former holdings of this court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RUSH v. LEWIS AND CLARK COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—TAX TITLES—TAX DEEDS—RE- CITALS—SALES—COMPETITIVE BIDDER OF COUNTY—EFFECT.

Pol. Code, § 3882, provides that property sold for taxes may be struck off to the county as purchaser where there was no other purchaser. Land belonging to plaintiff's grantor was sold for taxes, and defendant county became the purchaser thereof, the tax deed reciting that at the sale the county was the bidder willing to take the lowest quantity sufficient to pay the taxes, etc. Held, that the statute prohibited the county from becoming a competitive bidder at a tax sale, and the deed, showing that defendant county was a competitive bidder, was void on its face.

2. SAME.

The recitals in a tax deed of land sold to a county must show affirmatively the right of the county to take the land, and that it was not a competitive bidder at the tax sale.

3. SAME—SALE OF LAND FOR TAXES—POWER TO SELL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CON- STRUCTION.

A county cannot purchase land at a tax sale unless expressly authorized to do so, and a strict compliance with the statute is necessary in order to divest the owner of title thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, §§ 1357-1362.]

4. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO VALIDITY— CONFLICTING PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a tax deed for land purchased by a county showed affirmatively that the county was a competitive bidder at the sale in violation of the statute, the purchaser thereof will not be protected by a presumption of regularity in the proceeding, or by Pol. Code, § 3897, making tax deeds prima facie evidence of certain matters, since a tax deed is construed most strongly against the grantee thereunder, and, where two presumptions are admissible from a deed, that must be indulged most favorable to the owner.

Appeal from District Court, Lewis and Clark County; Henry C. Smith, Judge.

Suit by T. C. Rush against Lewis and Clark county and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McConnell & McConnell, for appellants.
Massena Bullard and Edward Horskey, for respondent.

WINSTON, District Judge. This action was commenced for the purpose of having canceled and set aside two tax deeds, issued to Lewis and Clark county, for 160 acres of land situated in said county, each deed being for 80 acres, and also a deed from Lewis and Clark county to the defendant O. W. McConnell, and a deed from the said McConnell and his wife, Annie S. McConnell, to the defendant E. N. Hart, for the same property. The lands described in them were assessed to Samuel E. Richardson, the owner, for the year 1900. The tax not having been paid, publication was duly made that the lands would be sold by the county treasurer to satisfy the delinquency, with costs, penalties, etc., and on January 25, 1901, they were sold and struck off to the defendant the county of Lewis and Clark. At the expiration of the three-year period of redemption the county caused to be executed to it two deeds, one of said deeds being to the lands in section 5, and the other to the lands in section 8. Subsequently the county, at public auction, sold the same to the defendant O. W. McConnell, who conveyed to E. N. Hart. The action was instituted by Catherine Richardson, who had received a deed from Samuel E. Richardson, her husband, on March 11, 1905. Catherine Richardson subsequently deeded the property to T. C. Rush, the respondent herein, who was afterwards substituted as plaintiff in the action. There was tendered with the complaint a sum sufficient to pay all the demands which the defendants, or any of them, might have against the property on account of taxes, penalties, interest, and charges paid thereon.

It is alleged that both the tax deeds are void for a number of reasons growing out of the proceedings had by the treasurer, the principal one of which may be stated as follows: That each of the deeds is void on its face, for that it appears from the recitals therein that at the sale of lands for taxes delinquent for the year 1900, had by the treasurer of Lewis and Clark county on January 25, 1901, the county of Lewis and Clark became the purchaser of the lands in controversy as a competitive bidder; whereas, under the provisions of law applicable, it could not become a purchaser at all, but could only take them by having them struck off to it by the treasurer after they had been offered for sale at auction on successive days and there was no bona fide bidder for them. The court found the issues for the plaintiff, adjudged the tax deeds and the subsequent conveyances void, and directed that they be canceled of record. The defendants have appealed from the judgment and an order denying them a new trial. Many assignments of error are made in appellants' brief, but these do not require notice, for the reason that we are of the opinion that the tax deeds are void because of the recitals referred to, and that the judgment of the district court must therefore be affirmed.

The deeds are identical in every respect, except in the description of the property. The deed for the lands in section 5 recites: "That at said auction Lewis and Clark county was the bidder who was willing to take the least quantity or the smallest portion of the said land and pay the taxes, costs, and charges due thereon, which taxes, costs, and charges amounted to the sum of seven and $\frac{2}{100}$ dollars; that the said least quantity or smallest portion of the said land, lying and being within the said county of Lewis and Clark, state of Montana, described as follows, to wit, land S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ S. E., $\frac{1}{4}$ S. E., $\frac{1}{4}$ S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, 80 acres in sec. 5, Tp. 12 N., R. 5 W., was by the said William Steele, as county treasurer aforesaid, struck off to the said Lewis and Clark county, who paid the full amount of the said taxes, costs, and charges, and thereby became the purchaser of the last described piece or parcel of land," etc.

Section 3882 of the Political Code provides, among other things, how the county may acquire property "struck off" to it for delinquent taxes, as follows: " * * * But in case there is no purchaser in good faith for the same, as provided in this chapter, on the first day that the property is offered for sale, then when the property is offered thereafter for sale and there is no purchaser in good faith for the same, the whole amount of the property assessed must be struck off to the county as the purchaser, and the duplicate certificate delivered to the county treasurer and filed by him in his office." This section prohibits the county from becoming a competitive bidder at the sale of property for delinquent taxes, and it can only acquire it when there is no other purchaser in good faith; and the recitals in the deed must show the right of the county to take the property, and that it did not enter the lists as a competitive bidder for the same. Unless the recitals of the deed show these things, or if the deed recites, as does the deed in question, matters showing that the county was a competitive bidder at the sale, the deed on its face is void. Norton v. Friend, 13 Kan. 532; Magill v. Martin, 14 Kan. 67; Babbitt v. Johnson, 15 Kan. 252; Larkin v. Wilson, 28 Kan. 513; Hanenkratt v. Hamil, 10 Okl. 219, 61 Pac. 1050; Keller v. Hawk (Okl.) 91 Pac. 778. The county cannot purchase lands at a tax sale unless authorized to do so by statute, and a strict compliance with the statute must be had before the title of the owner can be divested, and the conduct of those vested with the power to sell lands for delinquent taxes must be closely scrutinized, in order that there may be some security for property rights. The officer who makes the sale sells that which he does not own. The proceedings are to a large extent ex parte. The owner is an unwilling party, is seldom, if ever, present at the sale, is generally ignorant of it, and the tax almost always bears a very small proportion to the value of the property sold. Upon these considerations it has generally been held that proceedings on tax sales should strictly comply with the statute; and this is the construction of the law recently applied by this court in the case of North Real Estate L. & T. Co. v. Billings L. & T. Co., 36 Mont. —, 93 Pac. 40.

Counsel for appellants contend that the presumption that official duty has been regularly performed and that the law has been obeyed, as well as the provisions of section 3897 of the Political Code, making tax deeds prima facie evidence of certain matters, should protect the purchaser at a tax sale. But they cannot prevail against the presumption which must be drawn from the wording of the deed; and, where two presumptions may be drawn therefrom, that one must be indulged which is most favorable to the owner of the property. A tax deed must be construed most strongly against him who claims under it, and, if one of two constructions will support the claim of the citizen, the deed must be held invalid. When we look at the recitals of the deeds before us, and apply to them this rule of construction, it is apparent that the county became a competitive bidder, and that each of them is void on the face. The tax deeds, the foundation of defendant Hart's title, being void, it necessarily follows that the subsequent conveyances under which he claims title are also void.

For these reasons, we think the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Affirmed.

STATE v. NORTHERN PAC. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 25, 1908.)

1. COMMERCE—SUBJECTS OF REGULATION—RAILROADS.

Act Feb. 5, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 6, c. 5), providing that those employed in running or operating locomotive engines or railroad trains in this state shall not be required to work more than a certain number of hours without rest, and prescribing penalties for its violation, is not unconstitutional as being a regulation of interstate commerce, in the absence of federal legislation on the subject.

2. STATUTES—REPEAL—IMPLIED REPEAL BY ACT RELATING TO SAME SUBJECT—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

Act Feb. 5, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 6, c. 5), regulating the time a railroad may require its employes to work, is not made ineffective by the passage of Act March 4, 1907, c. 2939, 34 Stat. 1415 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 913], similar in substance, but not to become operative till March 4, 1908, since legislation is not effective for any purpose until it becomes operative.

Appeal from District Court, Lewis and Clark County; J. M. Clements, Judge.

Action by the state of Montana against the Northern Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Wallace, Jr., John G. Brown, and R. F. Gaines, for appellant. Albert J. Galen, Atty. Gen., E. M. Hall, Ass't. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BRANTLY, C. J. The defendant is a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and is engaged in operating a line of railroad from a point on the shore of Lake Superior, through Montana and other states, to a point on the shore of Puget Sound. In the conduct of its business as a common carrier it transports passengers and freight from points without to points within the state of Montana, from point to point within the state, and from points within to points without the state. On January 9, 1908, the Attorney General filed an information in the district court of Lewis and Clark county, charging, in substance, that on or about December 30, 1907, the defendant, while engaged in the transportation of freight in the usual course of its business in said county, did willfully, intentionally, and unlawfully permit and require certain of its employes, being its engine and train crews in charge of one of its freight trains, to labor in the operation thereof for more than 16 consecutive hours, to wit, for 23 consecutive hours, there being no particular occasion by reason of accident, storm, wreck, washout, unavoidable delay, or other like cause, permitting or requiring said employes to so labor. The charge was preferred under the provisions of the act of the Tenth legislative assembly, approved February 5, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 6, c. 5) entitled, "An act to regulate the hours of labor of locomotive engineers, locomotive firemen, conductors, trainmen, operators and agents acting as operators, and to provide penalties and civil liabilities for the violation thereof." To the information the defendant interposed a general demurrer. This having been disallowed, it entered its plea of not guilty. At the trial counsel submitted an agreed statement of facts, embodying substantially the allegations in the information. The defendant was found guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine. It has appealed from the judgment and an order denying it a new trial.

It is not questioned that the information is sufficient, in form and substance, to state an offense, if the statute is a valid exercise of legislative power. The contention is that the judgment cannot be sustained because the legislation is invalid, in that (1) it is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, the power to do which is vested by the federal Constitution, exclusively in the Congress of the United States; and (2), even though it was a valid exercise of power at the time of its enactment, it became invalid and inoperative upon the passage of the act of Congress, approved March 4, 1907, dealing with the same subject. 34 Stat. 1415, c. 2939 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 913]. Section 1 of the act declares: "On all lines of steam railroads or railways operated in whole or in part within this state the time of labor of locomotive engineers, locomotive firemen, conductors, trainmen, operators and agents acting as operators, employed in running or operating the locomotive engines or trains on or over such railroads or railways in this state, shall not at any time exceed sixteen (16) consecutive hours or to be on duty for more than sixteen (16) hours in the aggregate in any twenty-four (24) hour period. At least eight (8) hours shall be allowed them off duty before said engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen, operators and agents acting as operators, are again ordered or required to go on duty; provided, however, that nothing in this section shall be construed to allow any engineer, fireman, conductor or trainman to desert his locomotive or train in case of accident, storms, wrecks, washouts, snow blockade or any unavoidable delay arising from like causes, or to allow said engineer, fireman, conductor or trainman to tie up any passenger or mail train between terminals." Section 2 prescribes penalties and imposes civil liabilities for violations of these provisions. Section 4 (page 7) repeals conflicting legislation, and section 5 declares the act immediately operative.

1. Upon the first proposition the argument is that the grant of power to Congress under the federal Constitution "to regulate commerce * * * among the several states * * *" is exclusive; and since the defendant is, and at the time the alleged offense was committed was, engaged in interstate commerce, and the act in question assumes to impose burdens and restrictions upon it in the transaction of its business in this connection, as well as upon that done exclusively between points within the state, the act is the result of an unwarranted assumption of power by the Legislature. The purpose of the Legislature in the enactment of this statute was to secure better service at the hands of all persons operating lines of railroad within or through this state, and at the same time to promote the safety of the lives and property entrusted to them. It is apparent to every one that a continuance beyond a reasonable time each day in the performance of the exacting duties incident to an employment that is always attended with danger tends to impair both the health and efficiency of employes, and should not be permitted except in cases of necessity. The Legislature was seeking, then, by an exercise of the police power of the state, not only to serve the general welfare of the public, but also to preserve the lives and health of all persons employed in, or having direct connection with, the running of trains. Now, the police power is inherent in the several states. It remains with them notwithstanding the grant of power by them to the federal government, and may be exercised by their several Legislatures upon all matters coming within its purview, without limitation or restriction. Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 19 Sup. Ct. 465, 43 L. Ed. 702; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 16 Sup. Ct. 1086, 41 L. Ed. 166; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 919. When, however, the state undertakes to legislate upon the general subject of commerce, the distinction between what is local and what is national in character must be kept in mind.

In Covington, etc., Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 209, 14 Sup. Ct. 1087, 38 L. Ed. 962, the Supreme Court of the United States distinguishes the subjects of legislation in this connection into three classes: (1) Those over which the power of the state is exclusive; (2) those in which the state may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; and (3) those over which the power of Congress is exclusive, and the state cannot interfere at all. It is pointed out that in the first class fall many subjects of legislation which may affect interstate commerce indirectly, but their bearing upon it is of a local character so remote that they cannot be deemed in any just sense an interference. In the second class are embraced laws for the regulation of pilots employed upon navigable rivers over which the federal government has jurisdiction; quarantine and inspection laws and the policing of harbors; the improvement of navigable channels; the regulation of wharfs, piers, and docks; the construction of dams and bridges across navigable streams and the establishment of ferries. Citing and quoting with approval from the decision in Cooley v.

Philadelphia Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 290, 13 L. Ed. 996, the conclusion is announced that on all these subjects the states are free to legislate, so long as the effect is to control matters local in character only, until Congress chooses to act, though such legislation indirectly affects commerce with foreign nations and between the states. In the third class fall all those subjects of legislation which are not local in their nature, and do not affect interstate commerce incidentally only, but are national in their character. Over all such subjects Congress has exclusive power, and, in so far as it refrains from acting upon them, it indicates its will that in these respects commerce shall be free from regulation. In the case of Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, one of the questions decided was whether an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, regulating pilots and pilotage, was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution. It was held that, though Congress had the power to deal with the subject, the mere grant of the power did not amount to a denial of it to the state, and hence that the act was valid until it should be superseded by an act of Congress. Statutes like the one before us have often been drawn in question before the courts, and they have invariably been held valid by the highest court of last resort, except when they were clearly unreasonable interferences with interstate commerce. Cases holding such laws valid are collected by Mr. Justice Brown, in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. People of the State of Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 20 Sup. Ct. 722, 44 L. Ed. 868, who makes the following summary: "We have recently applied this doctrine to state laws requiring locomotive engineers to be examined and licensed by the state authorities (Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 508); requiring such engineers to be examined from time to time with respect to their ability to distinguish colors (Nashville, etc., Railway v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 9 Sup. Ct. 28, 32 L. Ed. 352); requiring telegraph companies to receive dispatches and to transmit and deliver them with due diligence, as applied to messages from outside the state (Western Union Tel. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105); forbidding the running of freight trains on Sunday (Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 16 Sup. Ct. 1086, 41 L. Ed. 166); requiring railway companies to fix their rates annually for the transportation of passengers and freight, and also requiring them to post a printed copy of such rates at all their stations (Railway Company v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. Ed. 710); forbidding the consolidation of parallel or competing lines of railway (Louisville & Nashville Railroad v. Kentucky, 161 U. S. 677, 16 Sup. Ct. 714, 40 L. Ed. 849); regulating the heating of passenger cars, and directing guards and guard posts to be placed on railroad bridges and trestles and the approaches thereto (N. Y., N. H., etc., Railroad Company v. New York, 165 U. S. 623, 17 Sup. Ct. 418, 41 L. Ed. 853); providing that no contract shall exempt any railroad corporation from the liability of a common carrier or a carrier of passengers which would have existed if no contract had been made (Chicago, Milwaukee, etc., Railway v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 18 Sup. Ct. 289, 42 L. Ed. 688); and declaring that, when a common carrier accepts for transportation anything directed to a point of destination beyond the terminus of his own line or route, he shall be deemed thereby to assume an obligation for its safe carriage to such point of destination, unless at the time of such acceptance such carrier be released or exempted from such liability by contract in writing, signed by the owner or his agent (Richmond & Allegheny Railroad v. Patterson Tobacco Co., 169 U. S. 311, 18 Sup. Ct. 335, 42 L. Ed. 759. In none of these cases was it thought that the regulations were unreasonable, or operated in any just sense as a restriction upon interstate commerce." In the Illinois case, a statute requiring railway companies to stop all trains at all county seats was held to be direct interference with interstate commerce, and therefore unconstitutional, but the Ohio case (Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. Co. v. Ohio, supra) is distinguished and the result approved. Among the numerous decisions by this court some are found which seem to be out of line with others, but generally the rule has been observed that upon all such subjects, if Congress has not acted, the states are free to legislate, so long as they seek to promote the public safety and convenience, and do not undertake to hamper unnecessarily or substantially control the agencies of interstate commerce in the conduct of their business. In Lake Shore v. Michigan Southern Ry. Co. v. Ohio, supra, a statute of Ohio requiring each railway company to stop three of its trains, going each way, daily except Sundays, at all stations, cities, or villages containing over three thousand inhabitants, to receive and let off passengers, was upheld on the ground that it was a proper exercise of police power by the state, and, though the decision was by a divided court, the doctrine of the cases cited by Mr. Justice Brown, in Cleveland, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. People of Illinois, was approved. In this connection the case of Henington v. Georgia is also in point, though it is disapproved by the dissenting justices in the Ohio case.

On principle we cannot distinguish between the effect of a statute such as that of the state of Alabama, which was considered in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 472, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 512, and the one here involved. In that case, in order to secure the maximum of efficiency in railroad engineers, they were required to submit themselves to an examination to test their mechanical skill and knowledge, and to be licensed by a competent board of examiners, before they could be employed by any railway company. An additional requirement was that they must be men of careful and temperate habits. The statute in question applied generally to the business of railroads, without making any distinction between that which was strictly interstate commerce, and that which was commerce within the state exclusively. So in Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 9 Sup. Ct. 28, 32 L. Ed. 352, and for the same reason, all employes having charge of or directly connected with the operation of trains were required to submit themselves from time to time to examination to test their ability to distinguish color signals, and to obtain a license certifying to their efficiency in this regard, before they could enter or continue in the service of any railroad operating in the state. The mechanical efficiency or personal habits of engineers, or their capacity or that of other railway employes to distinguish colors, and hence their greater efficiency in the business of handling trains does not more nearly concern the public safety than does the necessity for sleep and rest. In order that they may have full possession of their mental powers and physical strength to aid them in the performance of their responsible duties. Nor does the requirement in the one case more seriously interfere with or restrain commerce than in the other. In all such cases an additional burden is imposed upon the railroad corporation, and to the extent of this additional burden there is an interference with the conduct of its business. The cases cited, it seems to us, are conclusive; and, while we think it properly conceded that the subject, so far as it affects interstate commerce, falls within the power of federal legislation under the Constitution, yet, in the absence of such legislation on the subject, it is a matter for state control, under the exercise of its police power, to provide for the public safety and also for the health and lives of railroad employes themselves.

2. It remains to inquire whether the law is still operative, notwithstanding the act of Congress, referred to above, deals with the same subject. The state statute became a law on February 5, 1907. The federal statute does not by its own terms become operative until March 4, 1908. This being the situation, did it upon its approval invalidate the state statute, on the theory that it is a direct utterance of Congress under its constitutional power upon the same subject? The two acts embody substantially the same provisions, and it is clear that it was the intention of Congress to assume control of the subject, so far as it concerns companies engaged in interstate commerce. Counsel for appellant cite no authority in support of their contention, nor do we know of any directly in point. It seems to us, however, that in the absence of some declaration on the subject in the act itself, indicating the intention to supersede at once existing state legislation.

there is no foundation in reason for the assertion that an act, to take effect in the future, has that effect. In Smith v. Alabama, supra, it is said: "But for the provisions on the subject found in the local law of each state, there would be no legal obligation on the part of the carrier, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, to those who employed him, or, if the local law is held not to apply where the carrier is engaged in foreign or interstate commerce, then, in the absence of laws passed by Congress or presumed to be adopted by it, there can be no rule of decision based upon rights and duties supposed to grow out of the relation of such carriers to the public or to individuals. In other words, if the law of the particular state does not govern that relation, and prescribe the rights and duties which it implies, then there is and can be no law that does until Congress expressly supplies it, or is held by implication to have supplied it, in cases within its jurisdiction over foreign and interstate commerce. The failure of Congress to legislate can be construed only as an intention not to disturb what already exists, and is the mode by which it adopts, for cases within the scope of its power, the rule of the state law, which until displaced covers the subject." While the above quotation is not directly in point, it seems to lend support to the notion that, until legislation by Congress upon any subject upon which the state has concurrent jurisdiction becomes operative, the existing state legislation is not displaced, but in the interim remains in full force, especially so in the absence of any declaration by Congress on that subject. The case of Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 819, seems also to support this conclusion. We do not see how an act which does not by its own terms become a rule of conduct until a future time can be said to displace another existing rule on the same subject during the interval between the time of its enactment and the time it becomes operative, even though the existing rule be inconsistent with it, in the absence of some express or implied declaration of a purpose that such shall be the result. Legislation is not effective for any purpose until it becomes operative. In a given case the effective operation of a statute requiring expensive preparation, or a change in the mode of conducting business on the part of those whom it is intended to affect, may very properly be deferred to a future time. So far as it provides for such adjustment and changes, it may be said to have a quasi operative effect; but even in such cases the existing law must be regarded as remaining in force until it is actually displaced by the new one. The act of Congress contains no such declaration, and we hold that the state statute, which was valid and in force at the time of its passage, remains in force until the act of Congress becomes effective.

We are of the opinion that there is no merit in either of the contentions made by the appellant. Consequently the judgment and order denying a new trial must be affirmed. Affirmed.

RILEY v. NORTHERN PAC. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 17, 1908.)

1. RAILROADS — INJURIES TO PERSONS AT CROSSINGS—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether decedent, who was killed by a switch engine, was guilty of contributory negligence in being at the crossing, and whether the railroad was negligent in not properly guarding the crossing while the engine was passing over it, held, under the evidence, to be questions for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1150-1159, 1160-1180.]

2. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT—POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE EVIDENCE.

When one witness testifies positively that a certain thing existed or happened, and another witness, with equal means of knowing, testifies that the thing did not exist or happen, the so-called negative testimony is so far positive in its character that a court cannot say that it is entitled to less weight than the affirmative testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2432-2435.]

3. RAILROADS — INJURIES TO PERSONS AT CROSSINGS—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, there was evidence for defendant that the bell was ringing and a headlight burning. Plaintiff's witnesses testified that they did not hear any bell or see any light. Defendant's witnesses swore that they did not see the deceased at all, although the engineer claimed he was looking toward the very spot where the accident happened. Held, that the court properly refused to charge that it was proved by the uncontradicted evidence that the bell was ringing and the headlight burning, that the ringing and the light were a sufficient warning, and that, if no other negligence was shown, the verdict must be for defendant.

4. SAME.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, where it was alleged that the speed of the engine exceeded six miles per hour, but the evidence showed positively that the speed was not so great, it was not prejudicial to defendant to refuse to charge that the evidence uncontradictedly showed that the speed of the engine was less than six miles per hour, that the speed could not be considered as a ground of recovery, and that, if no other negligence were shown, the verdict must be for defendant, where the court did not otherwise tell the jury that they should consider the speed of the engine in arriving at a verdict, and did give an instruction limiting the jury to a consideration of the faults proven by the evidence.

5. SAME.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, where it was alleged that defendant violated an ordinance relating to flagmen, it was not error to refuse a charge that the ordinance had no application to crossing where the accident occurred, that there was no duty to have a flagman at that crossing, and that, if no other negligence were shown, the verdict must be for de-defendant, even though the evidence showed that the ordinance was not violated, since the absence of an ordinance requiring a flagman at that crossing was not conclusive upon the question of the necessity for one there.

6. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the death of one struck by a switch engine while crossing defendant's tracks, where it was shown that there was a gate at each side of the crossing, but that on account of the lessened travel between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight and 6 o'clock in the morning the gates were not used, and that the deceased was killed during such hours, and further that the mayor had never designated the crossing as one where a flagman was required, it was not prejudicial to defendant to admit in evidence an ordinance requiring a railroad to keep a flagman at such crossings unprotected by gates as may be designated by the mayor from time to time, since the jury must have known that the mayor had never required a flagman at the crossing in question, and therefore they could not have considered that the company was negligent in failing to provide a flagman at such crossing on account of the fact that the mayor had designated it as one of the crossings where a flagman should be employed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161-4170.]

7. RAILROADS—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—INSTRUCTIONS—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, where witnesses who were approaching the tracks testified that they saw the switch engine moving, it was not error to refuse a charge that, in determining whether a reasonable person coming along the street toward the crossing would have seen the engine, the jury might consider what other persons coming after the deceased along the same track did see in that regard, such matter being argumentative, and for attorneys to suggest.

8. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while on defendant's crossing and attempting to get out of the way of a coming passenger train, there being no evidence that the deceased assumed a position of known danger, or that his situation was not apparently a place of safety when he went into it, it was not error to refuse to charge that, if in passing the second track south of the main line on which the passenger train was approaching, the deceased could have seen the conditions in time to take a position of safety with regard to the two tracks immediately south of the main line, it was his duty in the exercise of ordinary care to have done so, and that, knowing that the passenger train was approaching, he was bound to so conduct himself as to that train as not to put himself in a known place of danger while it was passing; the proposed instructions having no reference to defendant's duty to exercise ordinary care to protect the deceased in the position in which he was.

9. SAME.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks and attempting to get out of the way of a coming passenger train, there was no error in refusing to charge that in any event, if the deceased was at fault in putting himself in a position where a movement to avoid the dust of the passenger train would bring him within striking distance of the switch engine, there could be no recovery on the ground of the speed of the passenger train, since the instruction omitted the element of defendant's duty to take reasonable care to avoid injuring the deceased in the position in which he placed himself.

10. SAME.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, the accident occurring between the hours of 2 and 4 o'clock a. m., there was no error in refusing to charge that there was nothing in the evidence showing any traffic conditions at the crossing in question between such hours of any day requiring the operation of crossing gates, independently of law, ordinance, or regulation, since the instruction would have withdrawn from the jury evidence on the particular question they were to decide—whether defendant exercised ordinary care in moving the switch engine across the street under all the circumstances disclosed.

11. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action for the death of one struck by an engine while crossing defendant's tracks, whether defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, might have discovered the position of the deceased in time to have avoided injuring him, held a question for the jury, irrespective of whether or not the deceased had exercised ordinary care in going into the place where he was.

12. SAME—CARE REQUIRED OF RAILROAD.

Upon a railroad company is imposed the duty of using all reasonable efforts to avoid injury to one who has accidentally placed himself in a position of danger, if the peril is known, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, might have been known.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 981-987.]

13. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LAST CLEAR CHANCE—INSTRUCTIONS—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

Where all the testimony relating to the last clear chance to avoid the injury went in without objection under the issues made by the complaint and answer, the doctrine of the last clear chance was a legitimate subject for argument to the jury, and of instructions by the court, though no such issue was raised by the reply to the plea of contributory negligence.

Appeal from District Court, Yellowstone County; C. H. Loud, Judge.

Action by Esther L. Riley, as administratrix, against the Northern Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace & Donnelly, for appellant. Geo. W. Farr and Fred H. Hathhorn, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Between 2 and 3 o'clock on the morning of July 18, 1903, two men, named Reuben A. Riley and George Cresap, were struck and instantly killed by a switch engine of the Northern Pacific Railway Company on the Twenty-Seventh street crossing of the tracks of that company in Billings, Mont. This action was begun by the plaintiff, the widow and administratrix of the estate of Reuben A. Riley, to recover damages for his death, on the ground that it was due to the negligence of the railway company and its employes. Foster L. Skillman, the engineer in charge of the switch engine, was joined with the railway company as defendant; but no verdict was returned or judgment entered against him. The railway company appeals from a judgment against it, founded upon a verdict for $12,600, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

As is well said in the brief of counsel for the appellant, the negligence relied on by the plaintiff is set forth in the complaint with a degree of fullness seldom found in cases of this character. The tracks of the defendant company extend east and west through the city of Billings. The streets immediately north and south, and running parallel with them, are, respectively, Montana avenue and Minnesota avenue. A number of streets cross the tracks at right angles from north to south, among them Twenty-Seventh street. This last-named street is the first street east of the depot of the defendant, and is one of the streets most used in passing to and fro between Montana and Minnesota avenues. At the time of the accident the defendant had seven tracks constructed and in use across Twenty-Seventh street. Starting with the most northerly track, and numbering them as they lay, track No. 2, or the first track south of the most northerly track, was the main line, tracks Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 being sidings. The distance from the south rail of the main line to the north rail of track No. 3 was 10.4 feet. Sidewalks 12 feet wide extend north and south along each side of Twenty-Seventh street. The street is 80 feet in width, including the sidewalks, and 56 feet in width between the sidewalks. The planking of the walk is practically level with the rails of the track. Between tracks 1 and 2, and a little to the east of the east sidewalk, there is a watchtower from which crossing gates are raised by a man stationed there. A watchman was kept in the tower from 7 a. m. until midnight. From about 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening of July 17th until shortly before he was killed the deceased was at the Topic Saloon or Theater on Minnesota avenue, about 250 feet east of the east walk of Twenty-Seventh street, and was expecting to meet his wife, the plaintiff, who was coming to Billings from Miles City on train No. 3, due to arrive in Billings at 2:05 a. m., and which did arrive at 2:23 a. m. All that is known of the manner in which deceased was killed is what was told on the stand by plaintiff's witness Mueller. The witnesses Hayden and Rex were with Mueller at the time, but neither would believe that a man had been struck when Mueller affirmed that he had observed the fact. The testimony of Mueller was, in substance, as follows: Just before the accident Mueller, Hayden, and Rex were together on Minnesota avenue, west of Twenty-Seventh street. Hayden was to leave for the west on train No. 3, and Mueller and Rex were going to see him off. They heard the train whistle, and the three men came together to the southwest corner of Minnesota avenue and Twenty-Seventh street, and crossed diagonally to the northeast corner, striking the east sidewalk of Twenty-Seventh street near the south corner of a woolhouse there situated, and then walking north on the east walk of Twenty-Seventh street. As they crossed to the wool-house corner, Mueller noticed two men right ahead. The crossing gates were up, and the witness saw no one in the tower. When he first saw the two men, they may have been on track 3 or track 4, and were going north on the east sidewalk. By the time witness had walked probably 50 feet on the east sidewalk the two men ahead stopped. The witness did not know who they were or why they stopped, though the passenger train was going across Twenty-Seventh street just then, and they stopped on the south side of the passenger train. He estimated that the passenger train, which was on the main line going west, was running fully 20 miles an hour until it struck the Twenty-Seventh street crossing, and was going very fast across the street. As this train No. 3 was crossing the street he noticed a switch engine backing up from the west side of Twenty-Seventh street on track No. 3, the first track south of the main line. It had been standing on the west side of the street, and when he saw it start to back up train No. 3 was in motion across Twenty-Seventh street. The train and the engine passed at the same time, train No. 3 moving west, and the switch engine backing east across that street. When the switch engine crossed the east walk, the witness and his two friends stopped to let it pass. He thought that he and his friends were then on or just north of track No. 4, within 6 or 8 feet of the switch engine. Just as he stopped he saw the men he had noticed in front of him. One of them stepped back, and witness saw him fall. As the passenger train was coming in the witness saw a cloud of dust roll up beneath the train. He could not say to what extent it rolled up, any more than that he saw the dust. It was sufficient so that he could see it from where he stood. He could not say for sure whether the man who, as he had said, stepped back, had really stepped back, or whether he had faced the other way and stepped forward, but, whichever it was, the movement was made just as the passenger train was alongside where this man stood. The witness thought the man was standing between track No. 2 and track No. 3, on which the switch engine was moving when he made this backward movement. On seeing the man fall, witness said to his friends: "There was a man run over." After the switch engine had passed they saw a corpse lying 20 feet away. The witness went to send in an alarm to the police station, and his friends ran east to notify the switching crew. A little east of the point where lay the first body a second body was found. The bodies were those of Reuben A. Riley and George Cresap. The foregoing is a summary of Mueller's testimony, substantially as set forth in the brief of appellant.

Now as to the pleadings. The plaintiff charged in her complaint that the negligence of the defendant consisted in the following: (1) Failure to lower the crossing gates before the deceased started across the tracks;

(2) excessive speed of train No. 3 in crossing Twenty-Seventh street; (3) excessive speed of the switch engine in backing across Twenty-Seventh street; (4) failure of the employes in charge of the switch engine to give any warning, or ring a bell, or blow a whistle, in backing across the street; (5) negligence in moving the switch engine across the street while the passenger train was coming in to the depot; (6) failure to have a switchman at the rear end of the switch engine while it was backing across the street; (7) failure to have any light or signal at the rear end of the switch engine to warn persons of its approach; (8) failure of the engineer and fireman of the switch engine to keep a lookout for persons on the street while they were backing across it; and (9) failure to have a flagman at the crossing to warn people of the approach of trains, by waving a red flag, as required by the city ordinances. The defendant railway company denied negligence on its part, or that of its servants, and alleged that the death of Riley was caused by his contributing fault and carelessness.

The first error complained of is the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant at the close of plaintiff's case. We are of opinion that the court was right in refusing to grant this motion. The specifications of negligence set forth in the complaint, numbered from 3 to 9, comprehend, in substance, the proposition that the railroad company was negligent in not properly guarding this crossing while the switch engine was passing over it. Whether the company was or was not negligent in this regard was a proper question to be submitted to the jury under the testimony of Mueller, as herein recited. We think the question of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased was also properly submitted. We cannot say that different minds might not properly reach different conclusions relative to both of these questions under the evidence.

The second contention is that the court erred in giving instruction No. 1 to the jury. This instruction is very long, and it is unnecessary to repeat it here. It is, in effect, a statement of the matters set forth in plaintiff's complaint, including the various reasons assigned by the plaintiff as a basis for her averment that the defendant was negligent. This instruction embodies the language of the complaint almost literally, and, regarding it as merely a statement of the issues made by the pleadings, we find no error in it, but think the jury must have understood that it was simply a statement of what the plaintiff claimed and what the defendant relied upon as a defense. In this connection it is claimed by the defendant that the reason the giving of instruction No. 1 may have been prejudicial was because it contained a recital of claims made by the plaintiff which were not afterwards substantiated by testimony, and that the court refused to give certain other instructions eliminating from the consideration of the jury those alleged acts of negligence which were unproven.

The next instruction complained of is No. 9, which reads as follows: "The complaint in this action sets forth the particular respects in which the plaintiff claims there was a breach of duty. The plaintiff, having detailed thus the features of claimed negligence, must be limited to those specifically, and you have no right to consider in this case any other alleged grounds of negligence than those enumerated in the fifth paragraph of the complaint, and it is your duty as jurymen to limit your deliberations to those and to those only in so far as the alleged fault of the defendant railway is concerned." This instruction is so palpably in favor of the defendant that it cannot be complained of except in this regard—that the court, having limited the matters to be considered by the jury to the specific acts of negligence set forth in the complaint, should have gone further and given other instructions, taking from the jury's consideration accusations of negligence which the defendant claims were not proven. We shall consider this later.

It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give defendant's requested instructions Nos. 33, 34, 35, and 36. Those tendered instructions read as follows: "(33) As to the alleged ground of negligence set forth in subdivision B of said paragraph of the complaint, which claims that the switch engine was moved without a light, or any warning by bell, or otherwise, I advise you that, though it was proven that there was no switchman or other person on the rear of such switch engine as it moved backward, yet it is proved by the uncontradicted evidence that the bell was ringing, and that there was a headlight upon the rear end of the switch engine, lit, and shining in the direction towards which the engine was moving, that the ringing of the bell and the presence of the headlight were a sufficient warning, and that the law did not impose upon the defendant any duty in addition to have any person upon the footboard of the rear of the engine to give additional warning, and that, therefore, the averments of this subdivision are unproven, and that the absence of a switchman or other person at the rear of said engine would not be a ground of recovery in this case, and, if there were no other negligence proven, your verdict must be for the defendant railway. (34) As to the alleged negligence set forth in subdivision C of said paragraph of the complaint, the alleged failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle while the switch engine was crossing Twenty-Seventh street, and the averment that its speed then was greater than six miles per hour, I advise you that the evidence uncontradictedly shows that the bell was rung, and that the rate of speed of the switch engine was less than six miles per hour, and that this alleged ground of negligence is not only unproven, but is disproved, and you cannot consider it as a ground of recovery, and, if no other negligence were proven, your verdict must be for the defendant. (35) As to the alleged ground of negligence set forth in subdivision F of paragraph 5 of the complaint, viz., the allegation that defendant's engineer did not ring the bell as required by the provisions of section 2 of the same article of the Billings ordinances, I advise you that the ringing of the bell by the fireman of the locomotive would be a compliance with this ordinance. I further advise you that the evidence uncontradictedly discloses that the bell was rung as required by this ordinance, and that you cannot consider this question as a ground of recovery, because no breach of any duty in this respect has been proven. (36) As to the specifications of the alleged fault of the defendant company contained in subdivision G of the fifth paragraph of the complaint, the violation of section 3 of article 2 of chapter 12 of the Billings ordinances, dealing with flagmen, I instruct you that that ordinance has no application to this case, and that, while it was read in evidence, and it appeared that there was no flagman at this crossing, there was no duty to have a flagman at this crossing, and the failure to have a flagman at this crossing cannot be considered by you as a ground of recovery, and, if no other alleged negligence than this were proven, your verdict must be for the defendant railway."

Appellant affirms that it was proven by the uncontradicted evidence that the bell was ringing and that there was a headlight upon the rear of the switch engine. On the part of the defendant there was positive testimony that the bell was ringing and the light burning. The plaintiff's witnesses simply testified that they did not hear any bell or see any light. Appellant argues that this negative testimony is of no weight, in view of the positive testimony opposed to it. Ordinarily, when one witness testifies positively that a certain thing existed or happened, and another witness, with equal means of knowing, testifies that the thing did not exist or happen, the so-called negative testimony is so far positive in its character that a court could not say that it was entitled to less weight than the affirmative testimony. State v. McLeod, 35 Mont. 372, 89 Pac. 831. But the appellant says that in this case the testimony that the witnesses did not hear the bell rung or see the light burning is in no sense a statement that the bell was not rung or the light not burning, and consequently the positive statements are uncontradicted. But, in passing upon the weight to be given to this testimony, the jury had a right to take into consideration all of the surrounding circumstances, including the fact that defendant's witnesses, who were its employees, swore that they did not see the deceased at all, although, if the light had been burning, as these witnesses testify it was, it seems almost impossible that the engineer, who claims he was looking toward the very spot where the travelers were, should not have seen them. In view of this situation, it is equally clear to us that the jury had a right to take into consideration the testimony regarding the headlight in determining whether or not the defendant's witnesses were entitled to credit in testifying that the bell was ringing. This being the case, the court properly refused to give proposed instruction No. 33 to the jury.

What is said last above partly covers the action of the court in refusing to give proposed instruction No. 34. In addition to that, however, there is incorporated in this proposed instruction the feature that the evidence uncontradictedly shows that the rate of speed of the switch engine was less than six miles per hour; and defendant argues that for this reason the court should have taken from the jury the right to consider the speed of the switch engine in determining their verdict. Let it be remembered that instruction No. 1 is simply a recital of the issues made by the pleadings, and nowhere in the instructions did the court tell the jury that they should consider the speed at which the switch engine was going in arriving at a verdict. The error complained of is the refusal of the court to tell the jury that they must not consider the matter at all, for the reason that the evidence wholly fails to substantiate this allegation of negligence. It is true that the evidence does show positively that the switch engine was not moving at a rate of speed exceeding six miles an hour. How can it possibly be conceived that the jury determined that the engine was exceeding six miles per hour and considered that fact in arriving at a verdict? This jury, of course, knew that there was no testimony whatsoever warranting them predicating negligence upon the speed of the switch engine. They must have known it; therefore they could not have given any consideration to the subject in determining the liability of the defendant. It would have been proper for the court to withdraw this matter from the jury's consideration peremptorily, and we do not desire to be understood as holding that, in a proper case, the court should not do so. In this case, however, we are satisfied, in view of the state of the testimony, that no prejudice resulted to the defendant from the refusal of the court. Note, also, the following instruction given by the court, limiting the jury to a consideration of those "faults * * * proven by the evidence": "If you fail to find fault on the part of the defendants in the respect in which you are told above that under this complaint you may consider whether they are at fault, you will proceed no further in the case, but stop your deliberations, and return a verdict for the defendants. If you should find that fault in a respect which I have told you would entitle the plaintiff to recover, and which has been proven by the evidence, then you will next proceed to consider the question as to whether the deceased (Riley) himself was guilty of any fault contributing to his own death."

So far as proposed instruction No. 36 is concerned, it may be said, generally, that the question of the negligence of a railroad company in failing to provide a flagman at a crossing cannot alone be determined by ascertaining whether or not a city has by ordinance required that a flagman should be employed. It is oftentimes a question of fact, to be determined by the jury, whether, in the exercise of that degree of care with which the defendant is charged, it should or should not maintain a flagman. The existence of an ordinance requiring a flagman may be some evidence of the necessity for one, but the absence of such an ordinance is not conclusive upon the question.

The defendant also contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over its objection, section 3 of article 2, c. 12, of the Ordinances of the city of Billings, providing that a railroad company shall be required to keep a flagman at such crossings, not protected by gates, as may be designated by the mayor from time to time, "whose duty it shall be to warn people of the approach of engines or trains by the waving of a red flag, so as to fully protect the public as to their persons and property." The testimony shows that there was a gate on each side of this Twenty-Seventh street crossing, but that on account of the lessened travel between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight and 6 o'clock in the morning the gates were not used. It is argued by counsel for the railroad company that no flagman was required at this crossing, because it was a crossing where gates were used, and, in addition to that, that the mayor had never designated this crossing as one where a flagman was required. The testimony shows this latter contention to be true. But we do not think it was prejudicial error on the part of the court to admit this evidence over the defendant's objection, because the jury must have known that the mayor had never designated a flagman at this crossing, and therefore could not possibly have been misled to the prejudice of the defendant by this evidence, and could not have considered that the company was negligent in failing to provide a flagman at this crossing on account of the fact that the mayor had designated it as one of the crossings where a flagman should be employed.

Again, it is said that the court erred in refusing this tendered instruction: "In determining whether a reasonable person so going along Twenty-Seventh street would have seen the switch engine you may consider what other persons coming after the deceased along the same walk and line of travel did see in that regard." The refusal of the court was not error. The testimony of what others saw was in the record. It was a proper subject of argument to the jury. It had not been withdrawn from their consideration. The presumption is that, as reasonable men, they gave this testimony the same consideration, as jurors, that, as men, they would give it in deciding an important question outside of the jury room. How could they overlook the fact that others saw the switch engine moving? The writer of this opinion thinks it is a reflection upon a juror's intelligence to assume that he will overlook testimony unless it is specifically pointed out to him by the court, or will neglect to consider it unless told to do so. It is the duty of the attorneys to suggest these argumentative matters to the jury, not of the court.

Defendant requested the trial court to give two instructions, as follows: "(7) If in passing track No. 4, the second track south of the main line track, on which train No. 3 was approaching, the deceased, Riley, could have seen the conditions in time to have taken a position of safety with regard to track No. 3 as well as track No. 4, it was his duty, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have done this, and, if he did not, and his failure to do so caused his death, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. (8) Knowing that train No. 3 was approaching the passenger depot, and would cross the Twenty-Seventh street crossing, he was bound to so conduct himself as to that train as not to put himself in a known place of danger while it was passing, and, if reasonable prudence had required him to take a position to the southward of track No. 3 because of the slight space between it and the track on which the passenger train was coming, and he did not do so, and his failure to do this resulted in his being struck and killed, this of itself and alone would constitute contributory negligence, and demand a verdict for the defendant railway." The fault of these instructions lies in the fact that they are not applicable to the evidence in the case. There is no evidence that the deceased assumed a position of known danger, or that the place where he was was not a place of safety, apparently, when he went into it. These proposed instructions omit any reference to the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care to protect the deceased in the position in which he was. The court fully covered the question of contributory negligence in other instructions.

Instruction No. 26, proposed by the defendant, reads as follows: "In any event, if Riley was at fault in putting himself in a position where a movement to avoid the dust of train 3 would bring him within striking distance of the switch engine, there could be no recovery on the ground of the speed of train No. 3." The court refused to give the instruction, and the action is assigned as error. This instruction also omits the element of defendant's duty to take reasonable care to avoid injuring Riley in the position in which he placed himself.

It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to give defendant's instruction No.

29, which reads as follows: "I further instruct you that there is nothing in the evidence showing any traffic conditions or travel conditions between the hours of 2 a. m. and 4 a. m. of any day at the said Twenty-Seventh street crossing requiring the operation of said gates during that time independently at [of?] law, ordinance, or regulation." If this instruction had been given, it would have withdrawn from the consideration of the jury a part of the evidence on the very question they were to decide, that is, whether the defendant exercised ordinary care in moving the switch engine across Twenty-Seventh street, under the circumstances disclosed by the record. The question of what precautions were necessary to be observed in the exercise of reasonable care, under the circumstances was for the jury to decide.

It is contended by the respondent that the deceased was justified in assuming that the crossing was safe because the gates were up; while the defendant claims that the fact of the gates being up is immaterial, because the deceased knew that No. 3 was about to cross the street. It is unnecessary to decide this point, because the jury had a right to consider that the gates were up, in deciding whether or not the defendant exercised ordinary care in moving the switch engine under the circumstances that the gates were up and there was no watchman in the tower.

It was a question for the jury to decide whether the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, might have discovered the position of the deceased in time to have avoided injuring him, and this, whether the deceased had exercised ordinary care in going into the place where he was, or not. Upon a railroad company is imposed the duty of using all reasonable efforts to avoid injury to one who has accidentally placed himself in a position of danger, if the peril is known, or, under certain circumstances, by the exercise of reasonable care, might have been known. See 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 239; 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 596.

But it is claimed by the appellant that the doctrine, if such it may be termed, of the last clear chance, cannot be invoked or relied upon by the plaintiff, because no such issue was raised by the reply. Counsel cite the case of Orient Ins. Co. v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 31 Mont. 502, 78 Pac. 1036, in which this court held that in that particular case the defense of contributory negligence could not be relied upon as a basis for proposed instructions, because not pleaded in the answer. There may be cases where the claim that the defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the injury, being relied upon by the plaintiff as a basis for affirmative testimony in rebuttal, must be set forth in a reply in answer to defendant's plea of contributory negligence. But in this case no such necessity arose. The only rebuttal testimony offered related to the deceased's condition, whether he was under the influence of liquor. All of the testimony relating to the last clear chance went in under the issues made by the complaint and answer, without objection. Under these circumstances the plaintiff could rely upon the so-called doctrine. It was a legitimate subject for argument to the jury, and of instruction by the court. See Nelson v. Boston & Mont. Con. C. & S. M. Co., 35 Mont. 223, 88 Pac. 785. Not only that, but we think the claim that defendant had the last clear chance is comprehended within the specific allegations of the complaint, and that an inference in support of it may be gathered from all of the testimony.

We find no error in this case of which the defendant can complain. Conceding that technical errors were committed during the hurry of the trial, we find no prejudice to the defendant. Indeed, it seems to us that the learned trial judge was particularly careful and painstaking in the conduct of the trial, and, reading all of the instructions together, we do not feel that the defendant has reason to complain of any action of the court below. IDAHO PLACER MINING CO., Limited, v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Feb. 7, 1908.)

1. REPLEVIN—PLEADING—SPECIFIC DENIAL—MATTERS PUT IN ISSUE.

In an action for claim and delivery, a specific denial puts in issue all the essential averments of the complaint, and puts the burden of proving them upon the plaintiff.

2. SAME.

In an action for claim and delivery, under a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint, the defendant may offer evidence, (1) to controvert plaintiff's evidence, (2) to disprove his allegations, and (3) to prove other and inconsistent facts. Under the general denial the defendant may prove his right to possession, or that he, as an officer, levied on the property at the suit of a creditor of him from whom the plaintiff obtained it in fraud of creditors, or he may show title in a stranger, and may also show his own right to possession by virtue of a lien.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Replevin, §§ 272-275.]

3. SAME.

In an action for claim and delivery, where the defendant files a specific denial, it is not error to sustain a demurrer to a further answer and defense which sets up facts which may be proven under such specific denial.

4. SAME.

In an action for claim and delivery, where the defendant files a specific denial, it is error for the court to exclude any evidence which tends to defeat the plaintiff's right to possession by showing the right to possession to be in the defendant or in a third party.

5. SAME.

In an action for claim and delivery, the real question at issue is the right of possession of the property in controversy, and, this being so, it is competent for the defendant to offer any evidence which may tend to show that the plaintiff did not have the right of possession at the time the action was commenced, as the plaintiff's right to recover depends wholly upon his right to possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Replevin, § 289.]

6. WITNESSES — IMPEACHMENT — EXPLANATION OF IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

Where a written document is offered in evidence for the purpose of impeaching or contradicting a witness, it is error for the court to refuse such witness an opportunity to explain such written document or evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Washington County; Ed. L. Bryan, Judge.

Action by the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, against Charles Green. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Lot L. Feltham, for appellant. Ed. R. Coulter, for respondent.

STEWART, J. This is an action in claim and delivery. The complaint is in the ordinary form, and alleges ownership and a right of possession in the plaintiff to certain personal property. The defendant (appellant in this court) denied specifically the allegations of the complaint, and then filed what is denominated "a further answer and defense." In this further answer and defense the defendant set up: The organization of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, and an effort made to dissolve said company and reincorporate under the title of the "Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited." That during the existence of the old corporation the defendant herein became the owner of 397,000 shares of capital stock of said company, and is still the owner of 169,000 shares. That the defendant sold 225,000 shares for $10,000 to one John W. Waitz, and agreed with said John W. Waitz that said sum of $10,000 should be used by the defendant for the purpose of building a dredge for the said Idaho Placer Mining Company, and that, in accordance with said agreement, the defendant planned and constructed a mining dredge, expending therein $10,000, and by reason of said sum not being sufficient to finish said dredge this defendant incurred personal obligations and expended his own funds in the sum of $285.82, and performed personal services in the planning and constructing of the same of the value of $5 per day, amounting to $1,825, which with the $10,000 made the total cost of the dredge $12,110.82. That in order to raise funds for the purpose of paying the outstanding indebtedness of the Idaho Placer Mining Company to this defendant and other persons a meeting of the stockholders of said company was held, in which there was represented 482,000 shares of the capital stock of said company, at which meeting it was attempted to reorganize and reincorporate said company under the name of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, for the purpose of adjusting all outstanding claims against the Idaho Placer Mining Company, and to take whatever other action was necessary pertaining to the affairs of the company. That at the time of the meeting of said stockholders it was found that the Idaho Placer Mining Company had no funds with which to carry out the object of the organization, and at which time this defendant entered into an agreement with the stockholders, directors, and officers of the corporation to convey, as president of the company, the mining dredge (the property in controversy) to a new corporation, to be known as the "Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited," in consideration of the stockholders, directors, and officers reorganizing said company and raising funds sufficient to pay the indebtedness against said mining dredge, including the services of this defendant in planning and constructing the same, and that, in accordance with said understanding, the stockholders and directors of said company prepared and filed the articles of incorporation of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, and elected a board of directors, and that this defendant executed and delivered, as president of the said Idaho Placer Mining Company, a deed for all the real property of said company, and a bill of sale for the dredge plant to the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, and performed on his part all his obligations agreed upon between him and the stockholders and officers of the two companies, and that at said time it was also agreed between the defendant and the stockholders and directors and officers of said companies that the defendant should be issued in lieu of stock held by him in the Idaho Placer Mining Company, to wit, 169,000 shares, a like number of shares in the new company. That the new company and its officers have failed to keep or perform their part of said agreement, and have failed to comply with the conditions of said agreement, and have neglected to pay to the defendant the amount laid out by him in the construction of said dredging plant in excess of the moneys received by the sale of his stocks in said company to John W. Waitz, or to pay the defendant for his services any sum whatever. That at the time the agreement aforesaid was made it was also agreed that this defendant should be employed as the general manager of the dredging plant at a fixed salary, which was a part of the consideration to the defendant for his executing and delivering to the plaintiffs a bill of sale for the said dredging plant. That the plaintiff is indebted to him for his services in planning and constructing the dredge, and for moneys expended by him in the construction of the same, in the sum of $2,110.82, which is due and unpaid, and that plaintiff never was entitled to an accounting for the money spent in the construction of said dredge plant, and never had any interest in or title to the said dredging plant, after the bill of sale was made, and that the defendant executed the bill of sale, and trusted to the honesty of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, its directors and officers, but that said bill of sale was without consideration, and that the consideration has never been paid by the plaintiffs as agreed upon. That the moneys expended by the defendant in excess of the sums received by him from John W. Waltz, and the labor expended by him upon the planning and construction of said dredge, were expended and laid out for the improvement and completion of said plant while the same was in his possession, and that he has a special lien upon said plant for said moneys and for his services in the sum of $2,110.82, no part of which has been paid. To this further answer and defense the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the complaint. The court sustained the demurrer. The cause was tried to a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment rendered accordingly. A statement of the case was prepared and settled, upon which defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled by the court. The appeal is from the judgment and the order overruling the motion for a new trial.

The first error assigned and argued in this court was the sustaining of the demurrer to the further answer and defense. The court committed no error in sustaining this demurrer. All the facts attempted to be pleaded by this further answer and defense, in so far as the same was competent and constituted a defense, could be proved under the special denial. In the case of Gallick v. Bordeaux, 22 Mont. 470, 56 Pac. 961, the Supreme Court of Montana quotes with approval from Mr. Phillips on Code Pleading, as follows: "A general denial puts in issue all the essential averments of the complaint, puts the burden of proving them upon the plaintiff, and admits evidence by the defendant (1) to controvert plaintiff's evidence, (2) to disprove his allegations, and (3) to prove other and inconsistent facts. Under such denial the defendant may prove his right to possession, or that he, as an officer, levied on the property at the suit of a creditor of him from whom the plaintiff obtained it in fraud of creditors, or he may show title in a stranger." To the same effect are Lindsay v. Wyatt, 1 Idaho, 738; Cornwall v. Mix, 3 Hasb. (Idaho) 687, 34 Pac. 893; Jones v. McQueen, 13 Utah. 178, 45 Pac. 202; Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 76 Pac. 243. Under the general denial the defendant may show his right to possession by virtue of a lien. Lindsay v. Wyatt, 1 Idaho, 738; Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 505; Sutton v. Stephan, 101 Cal. 545, 36 Pac. 106. General denial as used in these cases means the same as a special denial under the statute of this state where the complaint is verified.

Upon the trial of the cause one Edward C.

Cleaver, the general manager of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, testified on behalf of the plaintiff. In the course of his testimony he produced, and it was admitted in evidence, his appointment as agent and general manager of said company. He testified to a demand made upon the defendant for the property in controversy in this case. He also produced a bill of sale from the Idaho Placer Mining Company to the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, signed by the defendant, as president of the Idaho Placer Mining Company, and O. M. Harvey, secretary, conveying to the plaintiff from the Idaho Placer Mining Company the property in dispute in this case. On cross-examination he testified that he was present when the bill of sale was prepared and signed; and he also testified that the consideration named in the bill of sale had been paid, except that part of the consideration wherein it was provided that the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, would issue to each stockholder of the Idaho Placer Mining Company the same number of shares as held in the original company. He testified also that at the time of making the bill of sale, and simultaneous with it, a deed was made by the original company to the new company, and that the deed recited certain conditions under which the transfers were made from the old company to the new, whereupon he was asked by counsel for defendant this question, "You will produce it, please?" to which question the plaintiff objects as being "irrelevant and immaterial and not proper cross-examination," and the objection was sustained by the court, and the defendant excepts. This was clearly error, as under the issues in the case the defendant might show any facts from which the court or jury might conclude that the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the property in controversy, or that the defendant had the right to this possession by virtue of a lien or otherwise, or that the right of possession remained in a third party. In other words, this witness, having produced the bill of sale, and having testified that a deed to the real property was made at the same time and that it contained the recital of certain conditions upon which the sale was made, it was certainly competent for the defendant to inquire what those conditions were, in order that the court or jury might determine whether the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property in dispute.

The defendant, having been called as a witness in his own behalf, on direct examination, was asked by his counsel this question: "While you were president and general manager of this company, what was done with the stock of the company?" This question was preliminary, and, in aid of the record testimony, might have a tendency to show whether or not the money with which the property in controversy was constructed and created was obtained by the sale of the stock belonging to the old company, or to this defendant. The defendant was also asked by his counsel this question: "Whose money was it that constructed that dredge?" The plaintiff objected to this question, and the court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted. The defendant certainly had a right to show whether or not the property in controversy was created or purchased with his own money or with the money of the old company. The right of possession might turn on the question as to whom the dredge belonged. Its ownership might depend upon whose money purchased it. If so, this evidence might be very material in determining the right to the possession. This evidence should have been allowed, and the trial court erred in sustaining the objection to these two questions. Later on in the evidence of this witness, after he had testified to his possession of this property, he testified as follows: "They always contended the boat was mine until I got paid for it. It was my money that bought the boat, and my stock that got the money." On motion of the plaintiff, the court struck this answer out, and defendant excepted. This was clearly error. Whose money purchased the boat, and to whom the dredge belonged, was material and competent for the purpose of aiding the jury and court to determine the right of possession to the dredge.

It appears from the evidence that in another action in the district court of Washington county wherein the Idaho Placer Mining Company, Limited, was plaintiff, and the plaintiff herein was defendant, in a cross-complaint filed in said action certain allegations and statements were made which the plaintiff in this action claims contradicted the defendant's testimony, and the plaintiff offered such cross-complaint in evidence for the purpose of impeaching and contradicting the defendant's testimony in this action. Upon re-examination of the defendant by his counsel as to the statements made in his cross-complaint, and why they were so made, he was asked to explain the same, to which plaintiff objected, and the court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted. This was clearly error. Where a writing of a witness is offered in evidence which seems to impeach or contradict such witness, it is always the privilege of the witness to explain such statements if he can, and to detail the circumstances under which the same were made, and then the jury or court may determine the truth or falsity of his evidence. Douglas v. Douglas, 4 Idaho, 293, 38 Pac. 984.

Upon the trial the defendant called as a witness on his behalf O. M. Harvey, who was secretary of the Idaho Placer Mining Company at the time the bill of sale and deed referred to in this opinion were made; and counsel for defendant asked him to produce the by-laws of the company, and offered in evidence article 9 of such by-laws for the purpose of showing that the meeting held, which resulted in the making of the bill of sale and deed, was not called in accordance with the by-laws of said company. This was not error. The old company was making no objection to said transfer, and was not seeking to avoid the same, and the defendant is not in a position to make such claim for said company, especially in view of the fact that he signed the bill of sale as president, and, so far as the old company is concerned, it surrendered the right of possession under said transfer to the plaintiff herein. In an action in claim and delivery, the real question at issue is the right of possession of the property in controversy, and, this being the issue, it is competent for the defendant to offer any evidence which may tend to show that the plaintiff did not have the right of possession at the time the action was commenced, as the plaintiff's right to recover depends wholly upon its right to possession. The court in this case should have admitted all evidence offered by the defendant which in any way challenged or contradicted the plaintiff's right to possession at the time the action was commenced.

The judgment in this case will be reversed, and a new trial granted, and the cause remanded. Costs awarded to the appellant.

(14 Idaho, 192)

TARR v. OREGON SHORT LINE R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 31, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—PASSENGERS' EFFECTS—CHECKS—RIGHT TO—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under the provisions of section 2674, Rev. St. 1837, a railroad corporation doing business in this state is required to affix a check to every parcel of baggage received by it, and to deliver a duplicate thereof to the passenger or person delivering the same, and, if such check is refused on demand therefor, the railroad company is liable in the sum of $20 to such person, and, in addition thereto, cannot collect any fare or toll from such passenger.

2. SAME.

Where a railroad company has no night agent at a station to receive and check baggage, but stops its train at such station, and takes on a passenger and his baggage, and after the passenger boards the train and demands a check for his baggage, and declines to pay his fare or deliver up his ticket until he receives such check, and the employees of the company in charge of the train neglect and refuse to deliver a baggage check, and, on the contrary, eject the passenger from the train, the railroad company will be held liable in damages for the tort so committed.

3. SAME.

Where a passenger purchases a ticket, and on the arrival of the train at the station points out to the conductor and brakeman his baggage, and they receive the same and take it on board the train, and the passenger boards the same train for the purposes of transportation to another station on the line of the company's road, and demands of the conductor on the train a baggage check, he is entitled to receive such check before delivering up his ticket or paying his fare, and, on failure to receive such baggage check and refusal to pay his fare until he does receive it, he does not thereby become a trespasser on such train, and the employees of the company have no right to eject him from the train until they have either delivered to him his baggage check, or until he has reached the station to which he notified the employees receiving the baggage that he desired the same checked.

4. SAME.

Under the provisions of section 2674, Rev. St. 1887, the liability to furnish the passenger free transportation to the point of his destination in case of refusal to deliver him a check for his baggage is as much a part of the penalty for refusal to check the baggage as is the $20 cash penalty named therein.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—REGULATION OF CARRIERS.

The requirements of section 2674, Rev. St. 1887, that a railroad company shall not collect toll or fare from a passenger when it fails, neglects, or refuses to deliver the passenger a check for his baggage, is valid and binding upon such company as a part of the penalty for its failure and neglect to comply with the statute, and is in no sense a taking of property without due process of law within the inhibition of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

6. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO PLEADING AND PROOF.

The instruction "that every particular phase of the injury may enter into the consideration of the jury in estimating compensation, loss of time with reference to the injured party's condition and ability to earn money, his loss from permanent impairment of faculties, mental and physical pain, suffering and disfigurement, are all elements to be considered by the jury in estimating plaintiff's damages," while correct as a general principle of law, is erroneous in a case where there is no allegation of loss of time, and no evidence has been introduced showing the loss of any particular or specified time or the value thereof or amount of damage sustained by reason of loss of time.

7. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court has instructed the jury that they must be governed by the evidence in assessing damages, and that they must find the data therefor within the evidence, and the entire record in the case discloses that no claim has been made for damages on account of loss of time, and no evidence has been introduced thereon, and it is reasonably clear from the record that the jury did not consider such element in assessing damages, an erroneous instruction to the effect that loss of time is a proper element to be considered in such cases is not within itself such error as will cause a reversal of the judgment.

8. DAMAGES—PAIN AND HUMILIATION—NECESSITY OF EVIDENCE OF.

It is unnecessary to submit any evidence as to a proper and just compensation to be awarded for wounded feelings and physical and mental pain and suffering and humiliation, but the compensation to be allowed therefor is a matter addressed to the judgment and good sense of the jury, and to be determined by them in view of all the evidence submitted in the case as to the wrongs and injuries inflicted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, §§ 100-105.]

9. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

All the instructions given in a case must be read and considered together as a whole, and where they are not inconsistent, but may be reasonably and fairly harmonized, it will be assumed that the jury gave due consideration to the instructions as a whole rather than to an isolated portion thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Trial, §§ 703-718.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Bingham County; J. M. Stevens, Judge.

Action by Jacob E. Tarr against the Oregon Short Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. L. Williams and D. Worth Clark, for appellant. G. F. Hansbrough, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The appellant recovered judgment in the lower court against the defendant for the sum of $1,000 damages on account of the agents and employees of the defendant company wrongfully and unlawfully ejecting him from one of its railway trains. The respondent, Jacob E. Tarr, was on the 23d day of December, 1905, residing with his family at Shelley, Idaho, and on the evening of that day purchased from the ticket agent at that place three tickets to Pocatello. It seems that the railway company had no night agent at Shelley, and that it was the practice of the company to take on baggage without the same being checked on the passenger's pointing out his baggage to the conductor or brakeman or other employee of the company. About 2 o'clock on the morning of the 24th the south-bound passenger arrived at the station, where respondent, together with his wife and daughter, was waiting to board the train. When the train stopped, the respondent pointed out to the conductor and brakeman a trunk and roll of bedding he had on the platform, and told them that he wanted to take that baggage with him to Pocatello. When the respondent asked them to put the baggage on board, they made some profane remarks concerning it, but put the trunk on the baggage car, and left the roll of bedding. No question is raised here concerning the roll of bedding that was left on the platform. Respondent helped his wife and daughter on the train. After the train pulled out, the conductor came through taking up tickets and collecting fare, and, when he came to respondent, the respondent gave him one ticket and told him that he had a trunk on board, for which he wanted a baggage check. He also told the conductor that, when he got his check for his trunk, he would give him the other two tickets. The conductor insisted on his surrendering up the tickets, but the respondent declined to do so. This demand for the tickets was made two or three times; the conductor telling him that, if he did not surrender them, he would put him off the train. Finally, when the train was about a mile out of the station of Blackfoot, the conductor came to respondent and told him, if he did not surrender the tickets, he was going to put him off. Respondent replied that he would not do so unless the conductor gave him a check for his trunk. Thereupon the conductor called the brakeman, and the two of them proceeded to eject the respondent from the train. Before they had completely ejected him, he told the conductor that he would not give up the tickets, but that, if he would let him ride to Pocatello, he would pay the fare in cash. They disregarded this offer, however, and put him off the train. It seems to be generally agreed by all the witnesses that the train did not fully stop, but "slowed up," as the witnesses put it. As the last coach passed respondent swung on to the platform, and, as he did so, he encountered the brakeman, who kicked him off, and in his endeavor to do so injured and bruised respondent's hands and dislocated a thumb. When he was kicked off the train, he was either struck by the brakeman one blow on the back over the lungs and another over the kidneys, which made bad bruises, or else he received those injuries when he fell from the moving train. Respondent was under the care of a physician for a couple of weeks, and the physician testified that he had a bad bruise over his lung and also over his kidneys, and that he had incipient pneumonia, which might have been caused by the blow over the lungs.

The respondent contends that under the provisions of section 2674 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 he was entitled to demand and receive a check for his baggage before surrendering his transportation, and that he was entitled to remain on appellant's train until such time as he received a check for his baggage, or until he reached his destination. Appellant, on the other hand, contends that, while the company would have been liable for the penalty prescribed in section 2674 for failing and neglecting to furnish the baggage check, notwithstanding that, respondent was not entitled to ride on the train without paying his fare or surrendering up his ticket. Section 2674 provides as follows: "A check must be affixed to every package or parcel of baggage when taken for transportation by any agent or employé of a railroad corporation, and a duplicate thereof given to the passenger or person delivering the same in his behalf; and if such check is refused on demand, the railroad corporation must pay to such passenger the sum of twenty dollars to be recovered in an action for damages; and no fare or toll must be collected or received from such passenger, and if such passenger has paid his fare the same must be returned by the conductor in charge of the train; and on producing the check, if his baggage is not delivered to him by the agent or employé of the railroad corporation, he may recover the value thereof from the corporation." It will be seen from the foregoing provision of the statute that it is made the duty of the railway corporation to affix a check to every parcel of baggage and deliver a duplicate thereof to the owner. In this case the company, having no night agent at the station, received baggage on its being pointed out by the passenger, and was in the habit of attaching a check on the train, and delivering the duplicate to the passenger. Our decision on this point turns upon the question as to whether the railway company had a right to demand the fare from respondent as a condition precedent to furnishing him with a check for his baggage. Was defendant justified in ejecting him from the train upon his refusal to surrender up his ticket or pay his fare? There can be no question but that he rightfully boarded the train. He had bought his ticket, had caused his baggage to be placed upon the train, and he had a lawful right to board appellant's railway train. The question is, then: Did he, after entering the car, do any act that converted him into a trespasser? The primary duty devolving upon the passenger is to pay his fare, and on the railway company to carry the passenger. In addition to carrying the passenger, the company agrees to carry a certain amount of baggage with each passenger. In this case the company received the respondent's baggage, and, under the provisions of the statute above quoted, was clearly liable to check the same and furnish a duplicate to the passenger. A failure to do so subjected the company to a certain penalty: First, to pay the sum of $20 as damages for the neglect and failure; and, in addition thereto, defendant was prohibited from collecting or receiving any "fare or toll" from the passenger. Clearly, then, the passenger's transportation is made as much a part of the penalty as is the $20. Upon failure to furnish the passenger with his baggage check, it was not only liable to pay a $20 penalty, but it was also liable to carry the passenger free of "fare or toll" until such time as it should furnish such check or until he reached his destination—the point to which he had requested a check for his baggage. We do not think this statute is capable of any other reasonable construction. We therefore conclude that the respondent was rightfully upon the appellant's railway train, and his ejection by the company's agents and employes was wrongful and unlawful, and in violation of his rights. If it was unlawful for them to eject him, it was unlawful for them to keep him off the train. If he was rightfully on the train, and they put him off, he had a clear right to return to the train, and their using force and violence in keeping him off was as much of a wrong and trespass upon his rights as it would have been for them to have used that violence on him in the first instance. This case, it must be remembered, involves transportation exclusively within the confines of this state, and is purely a domestic transaction.

Counsel for appellant have argued that the company in the discharge of its duty has a right to establish certain rules and regulations to facilitate business, and that, among other things, it was the duty of the passenger to pay his fare or surrender his ticket before demanding his baggage checked. The law does not say which act shall be performed first, but they are clearly concurrent duties; one resting upon the passenger and the other upon the transportation company. The passenger had an undoubted right to demand his baggage check. The company's agent in this case did not give him any assurance that they would ever furnish him a check for his baggage. The only assurance he ever had was that the conductor said to him: "You give me your tickets, and, if your baggage is lost, I think we can locate it for you later." This was far from an assurance that the conductor would discharge his duty under the statute and secure the passenger a check for his baggage before reaching his destination. We think the doctrine is correct as stated by 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1036, cited by appellant, to the effect that passengers are required to show their tickets to the conductor at reasonable times and be subject to the reasonable requirements of the company. In this case the company had already received the passenger's baggage on its train, and had complete charge and control thereof, and the conductor had received from the passenger one ticket, and knew that he had two other tickets in his possession on the same train. A somewhat different rule would apply, we apprehend, where a prospective passenger takes his baggage to the depot, and demands that it be checked. In such case he would have to produce a ticket, and, if required, deliver it to the agent for the purpose of being punched.

Counsel for appellant insist that the statute (section 2674, supra) should not receive the construction we are placing on it, for the reason that such a construction would be in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it would deprive the railroad company of property without due process of law. Counsel admit that the company would be liable for the $20 penalty under the statute on a failure to furnish the passenger with a baggage check, but say it would be taking its property without due process of law to allow a passenger to ride without paying his fare. Such an argument is unsound, for the reason that free transportation under the condition named in the statute is no more a taking of property without due process of law than the collection of the $20 penalty. Indeed, we think one is as much a part of the penalty as the other. In the matter of transportation the statute says the company shall not collect fare unless the check is furnished. As to the payment of the $20 penalty, the company might do that without action, or, if it fails to do so, it is liable to an action for the recovery of the same. In this case, however, the company refused to carry the passenger as required to do by section 2674, and proceeded to eject him from the train. In doing so, it committed a tort for which it is liable in this action. This, it should be observed, is not an action for breach of the contract, but an action in tort to recover for the wrongs committed. The passenger is not endeavoring to collect the $20 penalty prescribed by the statute, but insists that he was rightfully on the appellant's train, and that he had a right to remain there until he reached his destination, and that, under such circumstances, the employes of the railroad company committed a tort for which this action has been prosecuted. This case is not parallel with, or subject to, the same rule that governs cases where a passenger goes upon a railway train, and refuses to pay fare or surrender his ticket until he is furnished a seat. In those cases it is held that, if he remains on the train, he must pay his fare, but that, on the other hand, he may leave the train at the first opportunity and sue for a breach of the contract and recover his damages. Memphis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Benson, 85 Tenn. 627, 4 S. W. 5, 4 Am. St. Rep. 776; Pittsburg R. R. Co. v. Van Houten, 48 Ind. 90; St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Leigh, 45 Ark. 368, 55 Am. Rep. 558; Davis v. Kansas City, etc., R. R. Co., 53 Mo. 317, 14 Am. Rep. 457.

On the trial of this case, defendant's counsel objected to the introduction of evidence showing that the passenger, when being ejected from the train, offered to pay his fare if the employes of the company would permit him to continue on his journey. If it be conceded that it is a correct principle of law that a passenger after refusing to surrender his ticket or pay fare, and the employes of the company have commenced to eject him, cannot then offer to pay fare and reinstate himself in the right to continue on the train, then, of course, such evidence as was offered in this case would be immaterial and was improperly admitted. When it came to giving the instructions, however, to the jury, the court adopted the appellant's theory of the law, and gave an instruction on its request, to the effect that a "passenger who refuses to pay his fare or furnish and deliver up a ticket good for such transportation, and on account of such refusal the train is stopped for the purpose of ejecting him, he cannot then by a tender of his fare, or an offer to deliver up his ticket, reimpose upon the carrier the duty of carrying him." In the case at bar this question became entirely immaterial, and evidently did not enter into the consideration of the jury in making up their verdict for the reason that the passenger was rightfully on the train, and the company had no right to eject him in the first instance.

The next and most serious question that arises on this appeal is directed against the instructions given by the court to the jury. The objectionable instruction is plaintiff's request No. 3, which is as follows: "The jury is instructed that every particular phase of the injury may enter into the consideration of the jury in estimating compensation, loss of time with reference to the injured party's condition, and ability to earn money in business or calling. His loss from permanent impairment of faculties, mental and physical pain, suffering and disfigurement, are all elements to be considered by the jury in estimating plaintiff's damage, if you find from the evidence that plaintiff is entitled to recover." The causes and injuries for which plaintiff demanded damages in his complaint are in substance as follows: "A bad bruise on the back over the left lung; a bad bruise over the left kidney; his right hand badly bruised and sprained, and two bruises on both legs and hands, and by reason of the insult, humiliation, and the bodily and mental suffering of the plaintiff, caused by the said unlawful acts of the defendant in forcibly, violently, and unlawfully assaulting, bruising, and ejecting the plaintiff from its said train of cars." Damages were claimed for these injuries in the sum of $1,975. On the trial no evidence whatever was introduced showing any particular or specific loss of time nor the value of any time lost, nor was there any evidence introduced showing the amount paid out for medical attention or for any other item of loss, damage, or injury, and no evidence whatever was given placing an estimate as to a just compensation for the injuries sustained. The court also instructed the jury that for mental and physical injury and suffering and for humiliation and wounding a man's feelings the measure of damages was a question entirely for the jury to determine as nearly as possible from the evidence in the case. The court also instructed the jury that they must be governed by the evidence, and that, if they should find for the plaintiff, they could only assess such damages as they found him entitled to from the evidence.

Defendant's requested instruction No. 11 was given by the court, and that instruction also advised the jury that, if they found in favor of the plaintiff, the only damage they could assess was such as was within the evidence and justified thereby, and that they must secure their data from the evidence itself upon which they calculated and assessed the damages. It must be conceded in the outset that the plaintiff's requested instruction No. 3, as given by the court, while entirely correct as a general principle of law, was improper and erroneous in this particular case, for the reason that no claim appears to have been made on account of loss of time, and that no evidence was given showing the loss of any particular or specific amount of time or the value thereof. It is well settled that, as to mental and physical pain and suffering and humiliation, it is unnecessary to submit any evidence as to the value thereof and the amount of damages to compensate therefor, but that the same is a question entirely and exclusively for the jury. North Chicago St. Ry. Co. v. Fitzgibbons, 180 Ill. 466, 54 N. E. 483; Springfield Consol. Ry. Co. v. Hoeffner, 175 Ill. 642, 51 N. E. 885; Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 1243; Hughes' Instructions to Jurors, §§ 652, 653. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that, where the party claims special damages for loss of time, he must prove both the amount of time lost and the value thereof, and that the jury must be governed by the evidence in relation thereto. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Morris, 83 Fed. 992, 28 C. C. A. 56; Platt v. City of Ottumwa (Iowa) 113 N. W. 831; Barron v. N. P. Ry. Co. (N. D.) 113 N. W. 102; Gardner v. B., C. R. & N. R. Co., 68 Iowa, 588, 27 N. W. 768; So. Ry. Co. v. Hawkins, 89 S. W. 258, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 364.

It will be seen, however, on an examination of the authorities, that, where a case has been reversed on account of such an instruction, it has been where there was either evidence of loss of time and no evidence of its value, or where the court had told the jury that they might assess the damages for loss of time without any evidence as to its value or without reference to such evidence if any had been given. The latter condition is peculiarly noticeable and prominent in Platt v. City of Ottumwa, supra. In the case at bar there is no evidence of any particular or specific loss of time, and the most that could be said in that regard would be that it contained a mere inference of the loss of some period of time less than two weeks while respondent was receiving medical treatment, and no evidence whatever as to the value of any time lost. The record is convincing from the complaint to the last word of evidence and instruction in the case that the real cause for which the plaintiff was seeking to recover damages, and against which the defendant was waging its defense, was the physical and mental suffering, pain, and humiliation as the direct and immediate result of the wrongful acts of the railway company in ejecting plaintiff from its train. The record nowhere contains any suggestion or intimation that the jury was asked to give the plaintiff any special damages on account of loss of time. The question, then, arises whether the error committed in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 3 was, under the facts and circumstances of this case, and in view of the evidence produced, and of the other instructions given, such an error as prejudiced any substantial right of the defendant for which this court would be justified in reversing the judgment under the purview of section 4231, Rev. St. 1887. In the first place, we must assume that the jury were reasonable and fair-minded men and limited their finding as to the plaintiff's damages to that shown by the evidence in the case as they were instructed by the court. In the second place, there is nothing in the record that indicates that the jury were acting under any sense of passion, prejudice, or bias. The evidence is abundant to justify the verdict without taking into consideration any loss of time whatever, or any other element of damages, except that of physical and mental pain and suffering, and the humiliation consequent upon plaintiff's unlawful ejection from the train. Indeed, we think the appellant company were under the facts and circumstances of this case exceedingly fortunate in reducing plaintiff's demand to the sum allowed by the jury. In the third place, there is nothing in the record that suggests or intimates that the jury took into consideration loss of time in estimating damages or any other matter than that entirely proper for their consideration.

Lastly, instruction No. 3 is a correct general principle of law, and, although there was no allegation in the complaint and no evidence in the case claiming damage for the one element, namely, loss of time mentioned in this instruction, we think it would be far-fetched and illogical for an appellate court to hold that under such facts and circumstances the judgment should be reversed, and thereby assume that the jury went outside of the pleadings and proofs under such an instruction as this in order to render an unjust verdict against the defendant. There is no doubt but that the court should not give an instruction on a question of law that is not involved in the pleadings or proofs, but we are equally satisfied in this case that the appellant has not been prejudiced or injured or damaged on account of the instruction, and we are unwilling to reverse the judgment for that reason. Again, we have repeatedly held that all the instructions given in a case must be read and considered together as a whole, and that, where they are not inconsistent but may be reasonably and fairly harmonized, it will be assumed that the jury gave due consideration to the whole instruction rather than to an isolated portion thereof. Lufkins v. Collins, 2 Hasb. (Idaho) 256, 10 Pac. 300; State v. Corcoran, 7 Idaho, 220, 61 Pac. 1034; Hansen v. Haley, 11 Idaho, 293, 81 Pac. 935; State v. Bond, 12 Idaho, 424, 86 Pac. 43; State v. Niel (Idaho) 90 Pac. 860.

The other instructions given by the court we think correctly stated the law, and the assignments of error in reference thereto are without merit. All of the defendant's requested instructions that correctly stated the law were given, either literally or in substance by the court. Those rejected were clearly erroneous, and properly refused by the court. We think the judgment in this case is a just one, and that no sufficient grounds have been shown why it should be reversed.

Judgment is affirmed, with costs in favor of respondent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Canyon County; Frank J. Smith, Judge.

Action by M. F. Hall against J. M. Jensen and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals, and defendants move to strike from the transcript a certain affidavit used on motion for a new trial. Motion to strike denied. Judgment affirmed.

Rice & Thompson, for appellant. Stone & MacLane, for respondents.

SULLIVAN, J. This action was brought in the district court to set aside a judgment entered by a justice of the peace, on the ground that the alias summons issued by the justice was not served on the defendant in that action, which was an action by J. M. Jensen and another, under the firm name of the "Bank of Brigham City," as plaintiffs, v. M. F. Hall, defendant, to recover a money judgment. The cause was tried by the court, without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the respondents, who are the defendants in this action. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

A motion has been made to strike from the transcript the affidavit of M. F. Hall on motion for a new trial, on the ground that said affidavit is not identified or certified by the trial judge as having been used or considered on the hearing of the motion for a new trial. To the transcript is attached the following stipulation, signed by the respective attorneys: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the attorneys for the respective parties that the foregoing transcript contains full, true, and correct copies of the judgment roll, notice of motion for a new trial, statement and affidavit used on motion for a new trial, order denying motion for a new trial, and notice of appeal herein, and that an undertaking in due form has been filed herein." It will be observed that counsel stipulated that the affidavit referred to was used on motion for a new trial; but it is contended by counsel for respondent under the decision of this court in Crowley v. Croesus Mining Co., 12 Idaho, 530, 86 Pac. 536, wherein it was held that the certificate of the clerk of the district court, to the effect that certain affidavits were used on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, was not sufficient to authorize this court to consider the affidavits, and that such certificate must be made by the trial judge, or that such affidavits must be contained in an authenticated record, certified by the judge, showing that such affidavits were used on the hearing. That decision is clearly wrong, and contrary to the statute and former decisions of this court. On examination of that case we find that that decision was based on the decision of this court in State v. Larkin, 5 Idaho, 200, 47 Pac. 945. That was a criminal case, and the decision was rendered under the provisions of sections 7940 to 7946, inclusive, of the Penal Code of 1887, which provisions apply to appeals in criminal cases only. The decision in the Crowley Case upon the point under consideration is hereby expressly overruled, as applied to civil cases.

And it is contended that the stipulation of attorneys in that regard can have no greater effect than the certificate of the clerk, and for that reason said affidavit should be stricken from the transcript. It is also contended that no one but the judge can identify or certify the papers considered by him on the hearing of such motion. This question was under consideration by this court in the case of Simmons Hdw. Co. v. Alturas Com. Co., 4 Idaho, 386, 39 Pac. 553. The opinion in that case was prepared by Chief Justice Morgan, and is quite exhaustive on the question here under consideration; and, after reviewing a number of California authorities upon this question, the learned Chief Justice said: "As to the decisions of the California Supreme Court, which we are requested to follow, we must respectfully say that the path is too devious." And further on it is said: "We think a fair construction of section 4821 would authorize the clerk of the district court or attorneys to certify, as in this case, that the transcript contains full, true, and correct copies of all the papers used on the hearing of the motion of defendant in the trial below, or as the case may be. This certificate, if incorrect, would be subject to correction by either party upon a suggestion of diminution of the record." Said section 4821 is as follows: "The copies provided for in the last three sections must be certified to be correct by the clerk or the attorneys, and must be accompanied with a certificate of the clerk, or attorneys, that an undertaking on appeal, in due form, has been properly filed or a stipulation of the parties waiving an undertaking." Sections 4818-4820, Rev. St. 1887, referred to in said section 4821, provide what papers the transcript must contain on the appeals mentioned therein. No other papers have any place in such transcripts, and the copies of the papers included in such transcripts, under the provisions of section 4821, may be certified to be correct by the clerk or the attorneys for the respective parties, and this court is authorized, on appeal, to consider affidavits or other papers used on the hearing of a motion for a new trial so certified or stipulated to be correct by the respective counsel.

In Village of Sandpoint v. Doyle, 9 Idaho, 236, 74 Pac. 861, in considering the effect to be given to the provisions of said section 4821, the court said: "A bill of exceptions is not necessary in such cases; but the papers used upon the hearing in the court below must be identified by certificate from the judge, clerk or attorneys, so that this court may know that it is passing upon the same facts which were before the district judge." As bearing on the question under consideration, see Steve v. Bonner Ferry Lumber Co. (Idaho) 92 Pac. 363. Under the provisions of section 4427, Rev. St. 1887, it is provided that certain decisions and orders are deemed excepted to, and that, where such order or decision, and the papers upon which they were made, are a part of the records and files in the action, they need not be embodied in a bill of exceptions, and, if the same appear in the records or files, they may be reviewed upon appeal as though settled in a bill of exceptions. It is clear from the provisions of that section that all the motions or orders mentioned in said section which are made a part of the files and records may be used upon the appeal the same as if saved in a bill of exceptions, and said section 4821 provides the manner and method of identifying such papers when not saved in a bill of exceptions or identified by the court or judge. In the case at bar the attorneys have stipulated that the affidavit referred to was used on the motion for a new trial, and that stipulation is sufficient to warrant this court in considering it on this appeal. The motion to strike the same from the transcript must therefore be denied.

The action of the court in denying a motion to reopen the case and permit J. U. Hammond to testify as a witness for appellant in rebuttal is assigned as error. It appears from the transcript that this cause was tried on the 16th day of November, 1906, and an adjournment of the court was taken until the following morning, and on the convening of the court counsel for plaintiff moved to reopen the case and permit the plaintiff to call in rebuttal the witness, J. U. Hammond, and to permit him to testify in said cause, which motion was denied by the court. After the appellant had submitted his evidence and rested, the respondent Monroe testified that he served said alias summons on the appellant on the 18th day of September, 1906, at a time when appellant called at his (Monroe's) office to pay a certain note referred to as the Ludrick note. On rebuttal appellant's attention was called to that testimony, and he denied that said summons was served on him at that time. Both sides then rested, and we infer from the record that the court then took the case under advisement. On the following morning appellant asked to have the case reopened and to permit him to introduce another witness, one Hammond, who was present during the trial on the previous day, and who, appellant alleges, was present at Monroe's office at the time the Ludrick note was paid. It appears from the affidavits used on the hearing of said motion that said witness would testify, in substance, as follows: That at the time the appellant went to the office of Monroe to pay the Ludrick note said witness was present, and that no papers were served on the appellant at that time; that said witness was in the courtroom at the time this action was tried, but did not tell appellant's attorney of the fact of his presence at Monroe's office until after the adjournment of the court, for the reason that he did not know that he had the right to say anything. An affidavit of the appellant was also presented on that motion, in which the appellant deposed that he had no knowledge until the trial that Monroe claimed that he had served a summons on him at the time of the payment of said Ludrick note, and that it did not occur to him that the said witness Hammond was present when he paid the note, and that said witness reminded him of that fact after the adjournment of court on the previous evening. It is clear that the testimony of the witness Hammond would have been proper rebuttal testimony, had it been offered on the trial. It was testimony tending to corroborate that of the appellant, and we think it was in the sound discretion of the court to reopen the case after it had once been taken under advisement, and permit the introduction of that testimony; but we do not think it was an abuse of such discretion for the court to refuse to do so, and for that reason the action of the court in that matter is not error. The fact that said witness Hammond was present at the time said Ludrick note was paid, and would testify that he did not see Monroe hand the appellant the summons referred to, would tend to corroborate the evidence of the appellant on that point. But the court on the hearing of said motion to open the case no doubt considered that matter, and concluded that, even if that evidence were admitted, it would not change the finding of the court upon the question as to whether said summons had been served or not. The court, perhaps, took that view of it, and concluded that the evidence offered would make no difference with the court's decision, and hence declined to reopen the case.

The next error assigned is that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial. Motion for a new trial was heard upon a statement of the case containing the evidence introduced on the trial, and the affidavits used on the motion to reopen the case and permit the appellant to introduce rebuttal testimony, and the affidavit of the appellant, which is in words and figures, as follows: "M. F. Hall, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that on the 4th day of October, 1906, affiant paid to said Finley Monroe, at Finley Monroe's law office at Emmett, Idaho, the note held by said Finley Monroe for collection in favor of one Edward Ludrick against affiant. That at the time said affiant paid said note to said Finley Monroe he wrote the date of the payment of said note upon the face thereof, in red ink, in words, as follows: 'Paid Oct. 4, 1905, Edward Ludrick by Finley Monroe'—and delivered said note so written upon to this affiant, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof. That said note was not paid on the 18th of September, 1905, as was testified by said Finley Monroe at the trial of the above-entitled cause in the district court of the Seventh judicial district of the state of Idaho, in and for the county of Canyon, but was paid on the date above stated—October 4, 1905. That said note of Edward Ludrick is the only note held by any one by the name of Ludrick which the affiant has ever paid through said Finley Monroe. That said note is the one referred to in the testimony of said Finley Monroe in said trial as the Ludrick note paid by affiant to said Finley Monroe for Ludrick." It appears from the transcript that Finley Monroe testified that he served the summons in the action in the justice's court on M. F. Hall on the date that said Hall had appeared at the latter's office in Emmett and paid to said Monroe the amount due on a certain promissory note in favor of Edward Ludrick, and the effect of said affidavit is to show that the payment of said note was made on the 4th day of October, 1905, some nine days after the judgment in the justice's court was entered, and about 15 days after the date that Monroe testified that he served said summons on the appellant Hall. That evidence would simply contradict the testimony given by Monroe on a collateral fact, and newly discovered evidence that is cumulative and contradictory on collateral facts is not sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial, and it does not appear from the affidavit whether the appellant relies on surprise or on newly discovered evidence. If, on surprise, the affidavit should show of what the surprise consisted, as he certainly knew at the time of the trial that he had paid said Ludrick note, and until it appears otherwise, the presumption would be that said note was in his possession. If the appellant contends that this is newly discovered evidence, the statute requires that it must be made to appear that such evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been discovered and produced at the trial. Section 4439, Rev. St. 1887. It is clear from the provisions of said section that the accident or surprise therein referred to, and diligence in attempting to obtain the evidence desired, must appear from the affidavit. As bearing upon this question, see Schellhaus v. Ball, 20 Cal. 605; Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 173; Mowry v. Raabe, 89 Cal. 606, 27 Pac. 157.

The issue was whether the summons was served by Monroe on the appellant. The facts disclosed by the combined statement and affidavit are as follows: The appellant testified that the summons had not been served on him. The defendant Monroe then testified to service of summons at a time when the appellant paid said Ludrick note. Appellant, in rebuttal, denied that Monroe had served the summons on him at the time he paid the Ludrick note. Both parties rested, and the case was closed. At the opening of the court on the following morning a motion was made to reopen the case for the purpose of introducing further rebuttal and to permit the witness Hammond to testify that he was present at the time the Ludrick note was paid and no summons was served on the appellant at that time. It further appears that said Hammond was present during the trial, and was not called as a witness by the appellant, apparently for the reason that he had forgotten that Hammond was present when he paid the Ludrick note. By the affidavit on motion for a new trial it appears that the Ludrick note states on its face that it was paid some days after the alleged service of summons, and there is nothing in the affidavit to show that the appellant did not have the possession of that note at the time of the trial, at least, there is nothing in the affidavit to indicate that with ordinary prudence or reasonable diligence the appellant could not have produced said promissory note on the trial. If appellant was surprised at Monroe's testimony to the effect that he had served said summons at the time appellant paid the Ludrick note, he ought then and there to have asked for a postponement of the trial until he could procure said note, and not rested his case as he did. The court, no doubt, on reasonable application, would have given appellant time to produce said note.

In such affidavits diligence must appear, and, if one relies on newly discovered evidence, such evidence must not be merely cumulative or tending to impeach or contradict a witness. Wood v. Moulton, 146 Cal. 317, 80 Pac. 92. The showing in this case is insufficient to warrant an order granting a new trial, in this: (1) No diligence is shown; and (2) the evidence tends merely to impeach the respondent Finley Monroe. The granting of a new trial is largely in the discretion of the court. The judgment is affirmed, with costs in favor of the respondent.

KESSLER v. PRUITT et al.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 31, 1908. On Rehearing, Feb. 24, 1908.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER — SALE DISTINGUISHED FROM OTHER TRANSACTIONS — OPTION.

An agreement for the sale of real property, in which A. agrees to sell and B. agrees to buy, to be performed in the future, and, if fulfilled, resulting in a sale, is a contract to sell real property, and not a mere option.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—DEPENDENT STIPULATIONS.

The stipulations in a contract for the sale of real property, whereby A. agrees to furnish to B. an abstract of title to the premises, showing a good and clear title upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price, are mutual, dependent, and concurrent stipulations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 88, 89.]

3. SAME—PERFORMANCE—DEPENDENT STIPULATIONS.

Where the stipulations in a contract for the sale of real property are mutual and dependent, an actual tender and demand by one party is necessary to put the other party in default or to cut off his right to treat the agreement as still subsisting.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 285-295, 343.]

4. SAME.

In all contracts for the sale of real property, where the time of payment by the vendee is essential, and not simply material, the vendor is required to make tender and offer to comply with the stipulations to be by him performed before the vendee can be put in default.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 290-295, 344-348.]

5. SAME.

Where a contract for the sale of real property provides that the seller will furnish an abstract of title upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price, the acts of the parties are to be considered as concurrent; the purchaser to pay the money, the seller to deliver an abstract of title, and neither party can put the other in default without tendering performance.

6. SAME.

Where the contract does not provide for a forfeiture of that part of the purchase money paid, upon failure to make payment of the balance, and where time is not made of the essence of the contract, by its terms time will not be considered as of the essence of the contract, unless it clearly appears from the character of the property, or the acts of the parties indicate that they considered and treated the contract as if time was of the essence thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 121-124.]

7. SAME.

Where the purchaser tenders to the bank holding a deed in escrow a check for the balance of the purchase money, which the bank offers to cash and pay cash in lieu of the check, the tender is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, § 345.]

8. SAME.

Where the vendor insists that the vendee is in default to such an extent as to entitle him to have the contract rescinded, he must allege and prove that he has made tender as provided by the contract, and demanded of the vendee a performance of the same, and notified the vendee that the contract would be rescinded unless the vendee complied with the stipulations in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 162, 290-295.]

9. SAME.

The mere failure to pay the purchase money according to the terms of an agreement to sell real property will not be held a repudiation of the contract so as to authorize a suit by the vendor to have it rescinded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 153, 154.]

10. SAME.

Where both parties to a contract for the sale of real property have treated the same as in force after the time limit fixed in the contract, before either party is in a position to declare the contract at an end and put the other in default, it is necessary for such party to make tender as stipulated in the contract and notify the other party to comply with the stipulations, or the contract will be rescinded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 290-295, 344-348.]

11. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Under a contract for the sale of real property, where one of the parties recognized the contract after the time limit, and makes an effort to comply therewith, it is error to refuse a question asking such party to explain his acts with reference to such matter.

On Petition for Rehearing.

12. SAME.

Held, that the contract sued on was only an option to purchase, and not a contract. Conclusion reached in the original decision adhered to.

Stewart, J., dissenting in part.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Canyon County; Ed. L. Bryan, Judge.

Specific performance by Harry S. Kessler against Moses Elmer Pruitt and another. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded with directions.

Harry S. Kessler, pro se, and R. B. Scatterday, for appellant. Finley Monroe and Stone & MacLane, for respondents.

STEWART, J. This action was brought for the specific enforcement of a contract for the conveyance of certain land situated in Canyon county, Idaho. Judgment was rendered for the defendants—respondents on this appeal. The appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The appellant alleges as error the action of the trial court in denying the plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The motion for judgment on the pleadings is in the record, but there is nothing in the record to show that the court ever passed upon this motion. The record of the alleged error is not such that this court can review the same. The appellant specifies as error the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision of the court, and that the decision is contrary to law; that the court erred in the following findings: First. "That time was of the essence of the agreement, and the same was to terminate absolutely in case the balance of the purchase price was not paid or tendered on or before March 1, 1906." Second. "That the stipulation for an abstract of title to be furnished by the defendants was not concurrent with, but was dependent upon, the payment of the purchase price." Third. "That the plaintiff did not, either in person or by his agent, or at any time within the period of time described by the extended agreement, nor afterwards, nor at all, ever pay or tender the balance of the purchase price to the defendants or the First National Bank of Emmett, nor to any person for the defendants." Fourth. "Nor has any excuse been shown by the plaintiff for his failure to make such payment or tender." Fifth. "Neither was said tender waived by the defendants."

The specifications of errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the appellant are as follows: First. "The court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings." Second. "The court erred in refusing to allow plaintiff's witness John F. Kessler to show the intention of the parties as to the meaning of the word 'upon,' used in the contract regarding the payment of the balance of the purchase price." Third. "The court erred in refusing to admit in evidence plaintiff's Exhibits D and E." Fourth. "The court erred in refusing to allow M. E. Pruitt, on cross-examination, to explain why he got the abstract completed and forwarded to the plaintiff after March 14th and not before."

On December 21, 1905, John F. Kessler, the father of the appellant, made a contract with the respondents for the purchase of the property described in the complaint, and paid $50 on the purchase price of $3,500, for which the respondents gave a written receipt. Afterwards, on the 10th day of January, 1906, Harry S. Kessler, the appellant, having succeeded to the interests of John F. Kessler, entered into a contract with the respondents, and paid thereon the sum of $100. The controversy turns upon the construction to be placed upon the agreement entered into by the appellant and respondents on the 10th day of January, 1906, and the modification thereof thereafter made.

The agreement of January 10, 1906, omitting the formal part thereof and the description of the land, reads as follows: "Witnesseth, that whereas parties of the first part have this day agreed to sell and convey, according to the terms and conditions herein-after specified, certain lands situate and being in Canyon county, Idaho, and more particularly described as follows: * * * And the said parties of the first part for and in consideration of the sum of one hundred fifty dollars ($150.00), cash to them in hand paid by the said Harry S. Kessler as part of the purchase price for said land, having this day executed a warranty deed for said land, it is hereby agreed by the parties hereto that the said warranty deed, together with a copy of this contract, shall be placed in escrow with the First National Bank of Emmett, Idaho, to be delivered by said bank to the said Harry S. Kessler, his heirs or assigns, upon the balance of the purchase price, to wit: The sum of three thousand three hundred fifty dollars ($3,350.00) being paid on or before March 1, 1906. And it is further agreed that if said Harry S. Kessler fail to pay the balance of said purchase price ($3,350.00) on or prior to March 1, 1906, the said bank shall deliver said deed to the said parties of the first part. The said parties of the first part further agree to furnish to the said second party upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price aforesaid, an abstract of title of the said premises showing a good and legal title to the said premises showing that the said premises are free and clear from all incumbrances. M. E. Pruitt, Anna Pruitt, Harry S. Kessler." Afterwards, to wit, on the 27th day of February, the respondents executed and delivered to the First National Bank of Emmett the following authority: "To First National Bank of Emmett—We have this day agreed to extend the time for the final payment on our land contract with Harry S. Kessler, dated January 10, 1906, from March 1st to March 15th, 1906, and you are hereby authorized to hold the deed now held in escrow for him until that date. Dated at Falk's Store, Idaho, this 27th day of February, 1906. M. E. Pruitt, Anna Pruitt." There is some dispute in the evidence as to just what took place between the appellant and respondents after the extension of time to March 15th, but it sufficiently appears from the evidence that there was a mortgage on the property covered by the agreement, and that the plaintiff requested the defendants to release this mortgage and have an abstract of title made. On the 14th day of April, 1906, the plaintiff received the following letter: "Emmett, Idaho, April 14, 1906. Mr. H. S. Kessler, Boise, Idaho—Dear Sir: I herewith inclose Pruitt abstract. Have not yet received the deed to the other 40 from the Varners. Mr. Pruitt says to send the money to the First National Bank here. Yours very truly, Finley Monroe." This letter was received in Boise on the 14th day of April, at 11 p. m., and was delivered to the plaintiff on the 15th of April. The abstract accompanying this letter showed that a certain mortgage, executed by Elmer Pruitt and Anna L. Pruitt to John Smerage, was released on the records of said county on the 9th day of April, 1907, and on the same day the abstract was certified to by the abstracter. On the 16th day of April the plaintiff sent his father, John F. Kessler, to the First National Bank of Emmett, Idaho, to make payment of the balance due on the purchase price of said property, and demand the deed, and when he reached the bank he found that on the 16th day of April, before he arrived there, the respondents had applied to the bank and received the deed placed in escrow, as provided by the contract of January 10th. The plaintiff then called on the defendants and offered to make payment of the balance due on the contract, and the defendants refused to receive the same; likewise the bank refused to receive such payment. The questions are: Was "time of the essence of the contract"? Was "the contract to terminate absolutely in case the balance of the purchase price was not paid or tendered on or before March 1, 1906"? Was the "stipulation for an abstract of title to be furnished by defendants concurrent with the payment of the purchase price by the plaintiff"?

An examination of the contract of January 10, 1906, shows that the respondents agreed to sell and convey to the appellant for $3,450 the property described in the contract. At the same time the respondents made and executed a deed to the appellant, and deposited the same with the First National Bank of Emmett, to be delivered to the appellant upon his paying the balance of the purchase price, to wit, $3,350; $100 having been paid at the date of the execution of the contract. The contract provided that if the appellant failed to pay the balance of the purchase price on or prior to March 1st the bank should deliver the deed to the respondents. It was further agreed that the respondents should furnish to the appellant upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price an abstract of title to said premises, showing a good and clear title to the same, free and clear from all incumbrances. The time for final payment was thereafter extended to March 15th. The contract of January 10th contains mutual, concurrent, and dependent provisions. The appellant was to pay the respondents $3,350 on or before March 1st, and the respondents were to furnish the appellant an abstract of title showing a good and legal title, free and clear of all incumbrances. The contract does not provide for a forfeiture of that part of the purchase money paid upon failure to make payment of the balance; neither was time made of the essence of the contract by the terms of the contract; neither do the acts of the parties indicate that they considered time of the essence of the contract. This contract was a contract for the sale of real property, and not a mere option as contended by respondents. The seller agreed to sell, and the purchaser agreed to buy. It was to be performed in the future, and, if fulfilled, results in a sale. The contract was fully executed, in that the contract to sell is completed. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 21, p. 924; Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Pac. 695, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249; Newell v. Lamping (Wash.) 88 Pac. 194.

It is admitted that there was a mortgage on the premises, which was not released until April 9, 1906. It is also admitted that the respondents did not furnish the appellant with an abstract of title until the 14th day of April, 1906, which reached the appellant on the 15th day of April, 1906, which was Sunday. On the following day the appellant offered to pay to the bank, and also the respondents, the balance of the amount due, to wit, $3,350. Appellant urges that "time was not of the essence of the contract," and that the stipulations of contract were mutual, concurrent, and dependent; that the furnishing of the abstract of title showing a good and clear title, free from incumbrances, was to be concurrent with the payment of the balance of the purchase money; that the appellant would not be in default in making such payment until the respondents had tendered abstract of title showing a good and clear title, free and clear from all incumbrances; that, so long as neither party makes tender—the appellant the purchase money, and the respondents an abstract of title, showing a good and clear title free from all incumbrances—neither party is in default, and that the respondents could not treat the agreement as at an end until they had made a tender of the abstract and returned the part of the purchase price paid; that, until default, the appellant was entitled to have the contract regarded as still in force, and have it specifically enforced any time within the period of the statute of limitation.

Mr. Pomeroy on Specific Performance, at sections 361 and 362, points out the distinction between granting specific performance of contracts when time is, and when not, made essential. He says: "Where the stipulations are mutual and dependent—that is, where the deed is to be delivered upon the payment of the price, either on a day named or without any day being specified—an actual tender and demand by one party is absolutely necessary to put the other in default, and to cut off his right to treat the agreement as still subsisting. So long as neither party makes such tender—of the deed by the vendor, and of the price or security by the vendee—neither party is in default; the contract remains in force, and either party may make a proper tender or offer and sue, until barred by the statute of limitations. This rule, however, does not apply to those contracts in which the time of performance has been made essential, and the agreement itself is to be regarded as void or rescinded if the vendee fails to make his payments on the stipulated day. In all those contracts where the time of payment by the vendee is essential, and not simply material, and a fortiori in those where, if the vendee's payments are not made upon the exact day named, the vendor may treat the agreement as at an end, the vendee must make an actual tender of the price and a demand of the deed at the specified time, as a condition precedent to his maintaining a suit. The same is true of the vendor when the time of his conveyance is made essential. This rule is involved in the very notion of time being of the essence of the contract." When, therefore, the stipulations of the contract are mutual, concurrent, and dependent, and time only material, but not essential, so long as both parties have taken no steps to assert their respective rights or demands for a completion, and so long as the vendor has made no tender or offer of deed or demand on the vendee, and the vendee has made no tender of the price or demand on the vendor, the contract continues to subsist until barred by limitation; so, too, when time is of the essence, yet if neither party has exercised his right to declare an end to the contract, or where the one party has remained silent and inactive, or has otherwise done something amounting to a waiver, or has treated the contract as still subsisting, he cannot, when the stipulations of the contract are mutual, dependent, and concurrent, legally place the other party in default until he himself has tendered performance, or offered to perform. In such cases, in order that he may terminate the contract, the vendor must make tender or offer of the deed, and account for the purchase money paid. Roberts v. Braffett (Utah) 92 Pac. 789.

In the case at bar, the time for final payment was fixed first on March 1st, and afterward extended to March 15th, and as the respondents agreed that they would furnish an abstract of title showing a clear title with said premises, free and clear from all incumbrances, they were not in a position to enforce payment or declare forfeiture until they tendered the abstract of title showing clear title. The contract was considered to be, and was treated by both parties, as in force up to and including April 16, 1906. Respondents say they were willing to take the money at any time up until the deed was withdrawn on April 16th. On April 14th the respondents, through Finley Monroe, sent an abstract of title to the appellant. The latter had a reasonable time thereafter to make payment under said contract. On the 16th he called at the bank to make payment and take up the deed. There is some dispute about the respondents employing Mr. Monroe to secure the abstract and send it to the appellant, but it sufficiently appears that Mr. Monroe was to get the abstract and forward it to the appellant. Mr. Pruitt testifies: "He had only spoken to Mr. Monroe about the abstract. I had him order it for me. I wanted Mr. Monroe to get the abstract, but don't remember when it was, but approximately along in April. I wanted this abstract to give to you [the appellant]. That was some time in April. I called the deal off on April 16th. I did not call it off on the 15th of March, not if the money came around. I employed Mr. Monroe to get the abstract. I did not tell him what to do with it. I think I told him he could send it to you. I suppose he had the authority to send it. I wanted him to mail the abstract. I expected the money to be at the bank Monday, and went up several times and asked for it." It appears clearly from this evidence that the contract was not rescinded, but was extended, at least, until the 16th day of April. The respondents were not then in a position, under the authorities, to rescind the contract or terminate it without a reasonable notice to the appellant and an opportunity given him to make payment. It appears from the contract that the right of the respondents to the purchase money was conditioned upon the delivery to the appellant of an abstract of title showing clear title free from incumbrance. No other construction can be placed upon this contract. It is not reasonable to suppose that a party purchasing real property, where the contract provides for an abstract of title, would be required to pay the purchase money, and depend thereafter upon the seller discharging the incumbrances and procuring and delivering to him abstract of title. The acts of the parties were to be concurrent, the seller to deliver an abstract showing clear title free from incumbrances, and the purchaser to pay the money; and neither party could put the other in default without tendering performance. In order for the respondents to put the appellant in default, it was incumbent upon them to tender an abstract of title showing clear title free from incumbrances, and demand payment of purchase price. This they did not do. Penn. Min. Co. v. Thomas, 204 Pa. 325, 54 Atl. 101. "As a general rule, a party who asks for the rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate must be himself without fault; and when, as in this case, the payment of the purchase money, and the making or tender of the deed, are to occur simultaneously, they are regarded as mutual and concurrent acts, which disable either party from putting an end to the contract, without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part, and, so far as the question of time is concerned, both parties, after the day provided for the consummation, may be considered equally in default; and neither can hold himself discharged from the obligation of complete performance until he has tendered performance on his own side, and demanded it on the other." Frink v. Thomas, 20 Or. 265, 25 Pac. 717, 12 L. R. A. 239. "When the vendor insists that the vendee is in default, to such an extent as to entitle him to have the contract rescinded, he must allege and prove that he has tendered to the vendee a deed conveying to him all the land according to the terms of the agreement and demanded performance on the part of the vendee, and must have notified him that the contract would be rescinded unless purchase money was paid within a reasonable time. The mere failure to pay the purchase money according to the terms of the agreement will not be held a repudiation of the contract so as to authorize a suit by the vendor to have it rescinded." Frink v. Thomas, supra.

So, in the case at bar, both parties having treated the contract in force after the time limit fixed in the contract, and time not being of the essence of the contract, before the respondents were in a position to declare the contract at an end, and to put the appellant in default, it was necessary for the respondents to tender an abstract of title showing clear title, and notify the appellants to make payment within a reasonable time, or the contract would be rescinded by the respondents. The obligation of the appellant to pay the purchase money depended upon the duty of the respondents to tender to the appellant an abstract of title showing clear title. It is not claimed on the part of the respondents that they ever offered to perform the contract on their part with reference to tendering an abstract of title showing clear title to the property sold, and without such offer they are not in a position to rescind the contract and defeat the plaintiff's action to compel a specific performance thereof.

The evidence as to a tender shows that on the 16th day of April, 1906, John F. Kessler, the agent of the plaintiff, went to the First National Bank of Emmett, the place where the deed had been left in escrow, with a check for $3,350 on the Bank of Commerce at Boise, and he asked the cashier whether he would accept this check as legal tender and in lieu of the funds, and he said he would consider it as currency. The cashier testifies, also, that J. F. Kessler came to the bank and offered him a check for $3,350 on the Bank of Commerce, and asked him if he would take it for a tender, and was told that the deed was gone, that he could not take it, but told Mr. Kessler that he would cash the check for him if he wanted it. This took place after the respondents had withdrawn the deed from the bank, and, as the respondent testified, "He had declared the deed off." It sufficiently appears that the defendant was ready, willing, and had the ability, and would have paid the balance of the purchase money on the 16th day of April, had the deed been at the bank, or had the respondents been willing to accept the money therefor. Certainly the respondents were not in a position to rescind or end this contract and put the appellant in default without giving the appellant a reasonable opportunity to comply with the contract after the abstract was furnished, and at the earliest moment possible for the appellant to reach the bank he did so, and found the deed withdrawn, and was met by a statement of the respondents that the deal was off. The tender was sufficient.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth findings of fact, and the conclusions of law thereon, are clearly erroneous, and call for a reversal of the case. Appellant also contends that the court erred in refusing to allow the witness John F. Kessler to testify as to the meaning of the word "upon" as used in the contract regarding the payment of the balance of the purchase money. This was not error. The word "upon," as used in the contract, did not call for any explanation by the witness. Its meaning clearly appears from the contract itself, and is that the payment of the purchase price was to be made upon the furnishing of the abstract of title—that is, the two acts were to be simultaneous, and each dependent upon the other. Counsel for appellant also contends that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence Exhibits D and E. Exhibit D was a letter written by the appellant to Finley Monroe after the receipt of the abstract from him and the withdrawal of the deed by the respondents from the bank. This letter was written after the transaction had been closed, and could throw no light upon the contract or the acts of the parties complying therewith. Exhibit E was a letter written by the appellant to the respondents on the 17th day of April, and is of the same general character as Exhibit D, and was written after the transaction was closed, and was immaterial, and could throw no light upon the transaction. It was not error for the court to refuse to admit either of these exhibits. The appellant also alleges as error the refusal of the court to allow M. E. Pruitt, on cross-examination, to explain why he got the abstract completed and forwarded to plaintiff after March 14th, and not before. This was clearly error, and the question should have been answered. It was perfectly proper for the appellant to inquire into the acts of the respondents in relation to the contract while said contract was still in existence, and before the same had been terminated: The judgment in this case is reversed, and the order denying a new trial is overruled, and the cause remanded, and the trial court is directed to make findings of fact and conclusions of law and enter judgment in accordance with this opinion. Costs awarded to appellant.

AILSHIE, C. J., and SULLIVAN, J., concur.

On Rehearing.

SULLIVAN, J. A petition for a rehearing has been filed in this case, and it is contended that the court misconstrued the contract when it held as follows, to wit: "That the contract on which the action was based bound the appellant to purchase the property which is the subject of the action." The contention of counsel for the petitioner is that the contract was only an option and could not be enforced against the purchaser. We have carefully considered said contract, and the majority of the court finds no provision in said contract whereby appellant agrees to purchase said real estate. By one provision of said contract the respondents agree to sell and convey to appellant, according to the terms and conditions of said contract, the real estate described therein. Another provision is that, if the appellant fails to pay the balance of the purchase price on or prior to March 1, 1906, the said bank shall deliver the deed to the respondents; and there is a further provision in the contract whereby the respondents agree to furnish to the appellant an abstract of the title to said premises showing a good and legal title to the same. It is stipulated in said contract to the effect that the result of the failure of the appellant to pay the balance of the purchase price shall be the return to them of the deed placed in escrow. It contains no agreement on the part of the appellant to purchase said premises. This contract, then, is only an option to purchase. It was a right acquired by appellant under said contract to purchase said real estate within a certain time, upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price upon respondent's furnishing a proper abstract of title. The appellant had the option to purchase, but did not make the purchase at the time said agreement was entered into. An option is not a sale. An option to purchase does not become a contract to purchase until the privilege given by the option has been exercised by an acceptance. Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 924.

The majority of the court now holds that the court erred in its former opinion in holding that said contract bound the appellant to purchase said real estate, and holds that said contract was a contract to sell and an option given to the would-be purchaser and could not have been enforced against him. The court is, however, unanimously agreed upon the question that, whether said contract be considered an option or a contract to purchase that could be enforced against the appellant, the same conclusion must be reached in either case, and that is, that the judgment must be reversed. The appellant had done and performed everything required to be done and performed by him, and the seller had failed to furnish an abstract of the title to said real estate as soon as he expected to do so, or as contemplated by said contract, and for that reason he was in default, while the other party was not in default. The seller could not evade the liability imposed by his contract by failing to comply with its terms on his part. A rehearing is therefore denied.

AILSHIE, C. J., concurs.

STEWART, J., concurs in conclusion, but dissents from that part of this opinion on petition for a rehearing which holds the contract sued on to be an option.

GREEN v. WILHITE et al.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Feb. 7, 1908.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—RESERVATIONS TO UNITED STATES—RIGHT OF WAY FOR IRRIGATION CANALS.

Under the provisions of Sundry Civil Appropriation Act Cong. Aug. 30, 1890, c. 837, 26 Stat. 391 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1570], which provides "that in all patents for lands hereafter taken up under any of the land laws of the United States, or on entries or claims validated by this act, west of the one hundredth meridian, it shall be expressed that there is reserved from the land in said patent described a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States," the word "constructed," as there used, has a general reference and application to ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States, without reference to the time of such construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1468.]

2. SAME.

Under the provisions of the act above quoted, it was the evident intention of Congress to reserve perpetually to the government an easement and right of way through and over any and all lands west of the one hundredth meridian that the government might grant to settlers and purchasers subsequent to the passage of the act, and to thereby reserve the easement and right of way for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any ditches and canals the government may construct at any time in the future for the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Canyon County; Frank J. Smith, Judge.

Action by Kate Green against Charles Wilhite and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with direction.

Action by the plaintiff, as the owner of certain lands described in her complaint, to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants, as contractors under the United States, from trespassing upon plaintiff's land and doing excavation and constructing a canal across the same. The plaintiff alleged that she was the owner of a certain tract of land, which she acquired from the United States on or about the 7th day of December, 1893, and subsequent to the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890; that the defendants are contractors under the government of the United States for the construction of a portion of an irrigation canal known as the "Boise-Payette Government Irrigation Project"; and that as such contractors they had, without the permission or consent of the plaintiff, entered upon her lands and done certain work and excavation, and threatened to continue the same, to her injury and damage, etc. It was also alleged in the complaint that the defendants claimed the right to enter upon the plaintiff's lands by authority of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. 391, c. 837 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1570]), wherein and whereby it was and is provided "that all patents for lands hereafter taken up under any of the land laws of the United States, or on entries or claims validated by this act, west of the one hundredth meridian, it shall be expressed that there is reserved from the land in said patent described a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States." It was further alleged that the plaintiff's lands were entered and patented under the desert land laws of the United States, and that the entry and patent were subsequent to the approval of the act of August 30, 1890. Defendants demurred to the complaint, and the demurrer was overruled. They declined to answer, and judgment was accordingly entered against them. This appeal is from the judgment.

N. M. Ruick, for appellant. Edgar Wilson, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question to be determined in this case is as to the true meaning and intent of the proviso found in the Sundry Civil Appropriation Act of Congress of August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. 391, c. 837, 6 Fed. St. Ann. 508 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1570]), which reads as follows: "That in all patents for lands hereafter taken up under any of the land laws of the United States, or on entries or claims validated by this act, west of the one hundredth meridian, it shall be expressed that there is reserved from the land in said patent described a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States." The determination must rest upon the meaning of the word "constructed," as used in the foregoing statute, and the significance it bears in that connection. Has it been used in this connection with reference to time, or independent of time altogether? Counsel for appellant contends that it should be understood in the general sense of ditches or canals constructed by authority of the United States, without any reference to time whatever. Taking the sentence as it stands alone, without reference to any extraneous facts or circumstances, it is perhaps equally liable to either construction claimed for it. When we consider, however, the previous legislation by Congress on the same and kindred subjects, and the policy that the Congress was then outlining with reference to the irrigation and the reclamation of arid lands, we get an insight into the purpose of this legislation, which it does not so clearly bear on its face. By Act Oct. 2, 1888, c. 1069, 25 Stat. 526 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1552], Congress enacted a law "for the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation and segregation of the irrigable lands in said arid region and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows." By the terms of that act it was provided that "all lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches or canals for irrigation purposes, and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth, hereafter reserved from sale as the property of the United States and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement or occupation until further provided by law." Under the foregoing provisions of the statute the Secretary of the Interior, on the advice of the Attorney General (Opinion of the Attorney General, May 27, 1890), held that no entry of any kind could be made upon any land west of the one hundredth meridian until irrigable lands had been determined and the proclamation of the President had been made opening the lands to settlement. The interpretation and construction of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior placed upon the act of 1888 aroused the Congress, and especially the Senate, to take immediate steps toward the repeal of that portion of the act of 1888 reserving unselected reservoir, ditch, and canal sites from settlement. An examination of the Congressional Record (volume 21, pp. 7269 to 7967 and 8270 to 9156) discloses various views on the subject and amendments offered with a view to correcting the vices and evils in the act of 1888. The Senate and House failed to agree upon the amendment, and something like a dozen conferences seem to have been held, and the statute as it now exists was a compromise finally agreed upon by the House and Senate conference committee. In presenting the conference report to the House of Representatives, Mr. Sayers, of the committee, said: "One further concession was obtained from the Senate conferees—that in the issuance of all patents by the government of the United States to any person whomsoever, under the operation of this law, there should be reserved in the arid land district the right of easement over lands embraced in the patents for irrigating ditches for public use."

In speaking of the same report in the Senate on August 26, 1890, Senator Reagan said: "It seems to me that it is so important to the settlement of that country, to the interests of the people who are to occupy that country, that monopoly of the water should not be had by private persons or by corporations, that it would have been wise in the committee to agree that all reservoir sites and places for canals and ditches should be reserved. I see that they have done the equivalent in reserving places for canals and ditches by requiring that those who obtain lands, in their patents, should have a clause inserted that the right of way for canals and ditches shall be reserved. * * * However much may be said about the House of Representatives in resisting that, they, in my judgment, are entitled to the profound gratitude of the American people for saving to them the little that they have saved in this conference report." Senator Dolph, who was very bitterly opposed to the act of 1888 as construed by the Attorney General, in speaking upon the proposed amendment which was afterward adopted and became the act of August 30, 1890, said: "But now it appears that this provision will legalize and intrench in the statutes of the United States the withdrawal from the operations of the public land laws of tracts within a single state larger than the entire area of some of the states of the Union on the pretense that they are needed for reservoirs. Not only that, Mr. President, but by the last clause of the amendment proposed by the committee there is to be perpetuated a portion of the evil of this act of 1888 in every muniment of title that shall issue from the government of the United States for an acre of land west of the one hundredth meridian. It is provided that it shall be expressed in every patent issued for public land west of this meridian "that there is reserved from the land in said patent described a right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the United States." This provision, while it will be of no practicable value to any one, will be a cloud or incumbrance on every man's title who secures a portion of the public domain."

It will be seen, from an examination of all the reports and debates had in reference to the proposed amendments, and the amendment itself as finally passed on August 30, 1890, that the members of Congress, both those favoring and those opposing the act, believed and understood that it would have the effect of reserving a perpetual easement and right of way to the government for ditches and canals that might thereafter be constructed by authority of the government over lands which should be entered and patented subsequent to the passage of the act. It is further worthy of notice that prior to that time the government had not entered upon the construction of irrigation works, ditches, and canals, and had never authorized the construction of any such works, except in Indian and military reservations. The first intimation of such a scheme as a national project was contained in the act of October 2, 1888. The act authorized the irrigation surveys, and was made in the nature of a provision for obtaining accurate information concerning arid lands and the feasibility of the construction of reservoirs, dams, and canals and the amount of lands that could be irrigated thereby. This policy had more fully developed in the minds of the members of Congress when the act of Congress of August 30, 1890, was passed, and at that time a national irrigation policy seems to have been at least anticipated by some of the members. It is clear that in the adoption of this proviso it was intended to reserve to the government easements and rights of way over the lands it might subsequently grant for any ditches or canals that it might construct in the future. Congress had made no provision for constructing any canals or ditches by the government, and, if it should be held that the act only applied to ditches or canals that had been constructed at the time patent issued, it would in effect amount to a holding that the proviso had no meaning or effect whatever. Without subsequent legislation authorizing the government to construct ditches and canals, it would have been impossible for any ditches or canals to have been constructed by the government prior to the issuance of patents to any one, and the proviso would have been meaningless. The Congress was taking this precautionary measure for the protection of a right of way to the government in the event it should later adopt a reclamation policy and enter upon such works. It intended thereby to save the government from the expense of purchasing and condemning rights of way when it got ready to construct any canal or ditch. Early in the history of this Western country, Congress enacted sections 2339 and 2340, Rev. St. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1437], recognizing and granting rights of way across public lands for ditches and canals "used for mining, agriculture, manufacturing, or other purposes," and provided that all patents thereafter issued should be subject to such easements and rights of way for ditches previously constructed. These provisions, however, had no reference to ditches or canals constructed by the government itself, for the obvious reason that the government was not at that time in the business of constructing ditches and canals. So far as we have been able to discover, there was no act of Congress prior to the act of August 30, 1890, which made any provision whatever for a reservation of easement or right of way to the government for or on account of ditches and canals constructed by its authority over any of the public lands.

In view of the foregoing considerations, we turn to the statute, and at once observe that it is necessary to read this statute with certain words implied which have been omitted, in order to arrive at either conclusion contended for on this appeal. First, if it be held that the statute intended only to reserve the right of way for ditches or canals that had been constructed across the lands prior to the entry of the lands or the issuance of patent, it would be necessary to supply the words, so as to make the statute read, "for ditches or canals that have been constructed by the authority of the United States." If it means to include those that may hereafter be constructed, then the statute would read, "for ditches or canals that may hereafter be constructed by the authority of the United States." The construction would be no more strained in the one instance than the other. In view of this condition of the statute, we should be governed by the legislative intent as gathered from the debates and discussions had at the time of the passage of the act, as well as the history of legislation leading up to it, and of the contemplated legislation which this act was intended to aid and facilitate. So far as we are advised, the statute has never been passed upon by any court prior to this case, except on October 31, 1906, in the case of Richard E. Green, Administrator, v. Charles Wilhite et al. (in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Idaho) 160 Fed. 755. In that case District Judge Beatty, in passing on a demurrer to the complaint, considered this statute, and among other things said: "The only serious contention by counsel is concerning the word 'constructed,' as used in the latter part of the clause above quoted from the act of 1890, to wit: 'A right of way thereon for ditches or canals constructed by authority of the United States.' The complainant contends that it refers only to ditches or canals already constructed in connection with the irrigation reclamation service under the direct control of the government. But for the doubts suggested by counsel, none would have occurred to me as to the meaning of this word from a reading of the entire paragraph or the statute in which it is used. The acts referred to show that the Congress had been contemplating a system of government irrigation of the arid lands of the West, which would require reservoirs and a canal system, and which would be under the direct management and control of the government. We know that often in such matters the government moves slowly, and takes its preliminary steps and discussions long before it finally puts the chief work into operation. In the legislation referred to it was providing for preliminary surveys and investigations. Up to this time it never had entered upon any system of irrigation for the interest or benefit of the general public, although it may have had some small irrigating schemes on government reservations, where it owned or controlled all the lands, and which were not open to settlement by its citizens. * * * I cannot doubt that this word 'constructed' is used in the statute in a general sense, and applies to ditches or canals constructed by the authority of the government without reference to time."

This being a federal statute, and the foregoing decision, being from a federal court, although not the court of last resort, is necessarily strong persuasive authority in a state court. Notwithstanding that, however, we are satisfied that the statute should be construed as above suggested. We hold, therefore, that the demurrer in this case should have been sustained.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to sustain the demurrer. Costs awarded in favor of the appellant.

Ex parte CAIN.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. WORDS AND PHRASES—"IMPRISONMENT."

The word "imprisonment," in its ordinary sense, contemplates and means within the common jail, rather than in the penitentiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3445-3447.]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—VIOLATION OF PROHIBITORY LAW—MISDEMEANOR.

The offense of manufacturing, selling, bartering, giving away, or otherwise furnishing any intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, and wine, contrary to the provisions of the prohibition article of the Constitution, is a misdemeanor.

3. SAME—PUNISHMENT.

The maximum punishment for said offense is by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, and by fine not exceeding $500.

4. SAME.

The prohibition provision in the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, barter or giving away of any intoxicating liquors, including ale, beer, and wine, contrary to said provisions is valid and self-executing.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition by Jim Cain for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

F. E. Riddle, for petitioner. W. C. Reeves, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. D. Carmichael, Asst. Co. Atty., for respondent.

WILLIAMS, C. J. The petitioner in this case was tried in the county court of Grady county, sitting as such and exercising the jurisdiction of a county court of the state of Oklahoma, on the 11th day of January, 1908, and adjudged guilty of the crime of selling intoxicating liquor, and is now confined in the jail of said county in the custody of M. B. Louthan, sheriff of said county, under a commitment duly issued out of said court by virtue of said adjudication. The information made against said petitioner, and on which he was convicted, is in due form, and charges that the said petitioner "at and within said county and state on the 23d day of November, 1907, then and there being, did then and there willfully and unlawfully sell to one Emmett Ades intoxicating liquors, to wit, one-half pint of whisky, for a price unknown to the affiant, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. This cause is now properly before this court on writ of habeas corpus; the petitioner contending that said county court was without jurisdiction to try said cause or to sentence said petitioner under said conviction, and for the reason of said want of jurisdiction that he is now unlawfully restrained of his liberty by said sheriff.

"Any person, individual or corporation who shall manufacture, sell, barter, give away or otherwise furnish intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, and wine, contrary to the provisions of this section * * * shall be punished on conviction thereof, by a fine not less than fifty dollars and by imprisonment not less than thirty days for each offense. * * * Upon the admission of this state into the Union, these provisions shall be immediately enforceable in the courts of the state. * * * Prohibition article of the Constitution. Counsel for petitioner earnestly contends that the offense charged is a felony, and that, the county court having no jurisdiction of felonies, the judgment rendered in said court adjudging said defendant guilty of said charge is absolutely void. The retail liquor traffic is a mere privilege, and, in defining the extent to which the privilege goes, the law should be strictly construed against the traffic. Schmidt v. State, 14 Mo. 137. That the state in the exercise of its police powers has the right to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is no longer an open question. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 129, 21 L. Ed. 929; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 33, 24 L. Ed. 992; Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 205, 5 Sup. Ct. 8, 97, 28 L. Ed. 629; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205.

But is said provision self-executing? If not, the statutes of Oklahoma Territory relative to the licensing of the liquor traffic are still in force, and will so remain until statutory provisions are enacted to make said prohibition provision effective. C. & F. R. Co. v. Trout, 32 Ark. 17; Lamb v. Lane, 4 Ohio St. 167; Doddridge v. Stout, 9 W. Va. 703; Chahoon v. Commonwealth, 20 Gratt. (Va.) 733. The doctrine is well settled that, as a rule, negative or prohibitory clauses in a Constitution are self-executing. Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385; Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 479, 11 Pac. 3; De Turk v. Commonwealth, 129 Pa. 151, 18 Atl. 757, 5 L. R. A. 853, 15 Am. St. Rep. 705; State v. Woodward, 89 Ind. 110, 46 Am. Rep. 160. If it supplies the rule for enforcement and fixes the penalty for violation, there can be no doubt as to its character; but a provision may sometimes be both prohibitive and mandatory, and not self-executing; hence in such cases it always becomes a question of intention, and to determine the intent the rule is courts will consider the language used, the object to be accomplished by the provision, and the surrounding circumstances, and to determine these questions from which the intention is to be gathered courts will utilize extrinsic matters when it becomes necessary. Even though there may be no penalty attached for violations of constitutional provisions, it does not necessarily imply that the provision is not self-executing. The want of a penalty, however, is a circumstance which should be given great weight in determining as to whether or not the same is self-executing, though it is not conclusive. The proper rule is that prohibitive and restrictive provisions are self-executing when they may be enforced by the courts independent of statutory enactments.

The next thing to determine is whether or not a penalty has been prescribed for such violation. Was it the intention that the words "shall be punished on conviction thereof by fine of not less than fifty dollars and by imprisonment of not less than thirty days for each offense," should be a limitation upon the action of the Legislature, or prescribe a penalty that was immediately enforceable in the courts? The same provision states: "Upon the admission of this state into the Union this provision shall be immediately enforceable in the courts of the state." The rules of construction should be so applied to written Constitutions as to give effect, if possible, to the intent of the framers and of the people who have adopted it, and to promote the objects for which the same was framed and adopted. But it may be contended, if we adopt the literal words of this provision, that, whilst it is stated that the same shall be immediately enforceable, yet we find no maximum punishment provided, and that consequently the same is not a complete criminal statute without such definite provision, and that, therefore, it is not enforceable without additional legislation to give it effect. A statute providing a minimum, without fixing the maximum, punishment, is neither invalid as being in violation of section 9, art. 2, of our Constitution, nor as being too vague and indefinite to be enforced, at least as to the minimum punishment which is valid without additional enactments. State v. Fackler, 91 Wis. 419, 64 N. W. 1029; State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 310. Hence it is not necessary, in considering as to whether or not said provision is self-executing, to determine as to whether or not punishment in excess of 90 days' imprisonment and $50 fine under said prohibition provision incorporated in our Constitution, without further legislation, could be imposed; for, having determined that said prohibitory provision prescribed an enforceable minimum punishment, we necessarily conclude that said provision, as it appears in said Constitution, is self-executing. Section 13 of the enabling act provides as follows: "That said state, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute * * *; and that the laws in force in the territory of Oklahoma, as far as applicable, shall extend over and apply to said state until changed by the Legislature thereof." Also section 2 of the schedule of the Constitution reads as follows: "All laws in force in the territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of the state into the Union which are not repugnant to this Constitution and which are not locally inapplicable shall be extended to and remain in force in the state of Oklahoma until they expire by their own limitation or are altered or repealed by law." Section 1935, Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. Okl. T. 1903, being section 14, art. 1, c. 25, is as follows: "Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code or by some existing provisions of law, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year and by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or both such fine and imprisonment. * * *" The question now arises as to whether or not said section 1935 is in conflict with the prohibition provision of the Constitution heretofore referred to. In said section 1935 it is stated that, except in cases where definite punishment is prescribed by the Code or by some existing provision of law, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year or by a fine not exceeding $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Said section is in conflict or inapplicable to the penalty in said prohibition provision only in one respect; and that is where it provides that said misdemeanor may be punished by imprisonment not to exceed one year in the county jail or by a fine not exceeding $500, but that otherwise it is applicable; and hence we reach the conclusion that the maximum punishment for the offense of which the relator stands convicted is punishable by not exceeding one year's imprisonment and also a fine not exceeding $500, provided the charge is a misdemeanor.

A felony at common law is an offense which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods or both and to which capital or other punishment may be superadded according to the degree of guilt. 1 Russell on Crimes, c. 4, p. 77. "By the early common law in England felonies were those crimes punishable capitally, or by forfeiture of land, or goods, or both, but the term was not one of settled meaning, and by some authorities the test was the liability to forfeiture rather than the liability to capital punishment. * * * In statutes creating or defining offenses, the language usually expressly indicates whether the offense is to be deemed a felony or misdemeanor, and for practical purposes it may be said that those crimes which, by the common law, were punishable capitally, or which are expressly made felonies by statute, are now to be considered of that class, while all other criminal offenses are to be deemed misdemeanors, and no offense is to be deemed a felony unless it comes within this description. But, if the offense has been a felony, the mere reduction of the punishment will not of itself change it to a misdemeanor." 1 McClain on Criminal Law, § 18. "An offense shall never be made felony by the construction of any doubtful and ambiguous words of a statute; and therefore, if it be prohibited under 'a pain of forfeiting all that a man has,' or of 'forfeiting body and goods,' it shall amount to no more than a high misdemeanor. * * * The word 'misdemeanor,' in its usual acceptation, is applied to all those crimes and offenses for which the law has not provided a particular name; and they may be punished according to the degree of the offense, by fine or imprisonment, or both. A misdemeanor is, in truth, any crime less than a felony; and the word is generally used in contradistinction to felony, misdemeanors comprehending all indictable offenses which do not amount to felony." 1 Russell on Crimes (9th Ed.) c. 4, p. 78. The selling of intoxicating liquors at common law was not a felony, not even a crime. So, when it is made a crime, and the statute does not expressly state as to whether it is a felony or misdemeanor, the presumption is that it is a misdemeanor. State v.

Hill, 91 N. C. 561; U. S. v. Belvin (C. C.) 46 Fed. 385. Constitutions being instruments in the nature of re-enactments of approved systems and principles coeval with, and a part of, the common law, itself a subject of judicial interpretation, though there is exception, it necessarily follows that the definitions of the terms used in Constitutions are, to a great extent, to be found in the common law. People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15, 21 Am. Rep. 677; State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 350, 21 N. E. 244, 4 L. R. A. 101, 10 Am. St. Rep. 143; Durham v. State, 117 Ind. 477, 19 N. E. 327; *People v. C. 913, 12 S. E. 115, 10 L. R. A. 50; 8 Cyc. p. 740-1. Section 1931 of Wilson's Revised & Annotated Statutes of Oklahoma Territory of 1903 is as follows: "The rule of the common law that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. All of its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms with a view to effect its object and to promote justice." This section has no application to the interpretation or construction of the Constitution, for the Legislature has the power to repeal or amend this section. And, whilst it is a fact that the Legislature has the power to repeal or amend certain sections in the Constitution, yet they are specifically designated therein, and if the relator's contention that said section 1931 applies to the interpretation of the Constitution, the Legislature would have it within its power to hereafter change the Constitution by providing as to the interpretation or construction of the same. Such a proposition is without merit.

Hence we come to the proposition as to the meaning of "imprisonment" in the section under consideration; that is, whether it means imprisonment within a jail, or state prison or penitentiary. The word "imprisonment" means imprisonment in the county jail or local prison unless expressed to be in the penitentiary. Cheaney v. State, 36 Ark. 75; State v. McNeill, 75 N. C. 15; Hockhelmer on Crimes and Criminal Procedure, §§ 112, 345. There is a distinction in law between the gaol, or jail, and penitentiary. Black's Law Dictionary; Anderson's Law Dictionary; Bouvier's Law Dictionary. Under the statute imposing as to certain offenses a punishment by imprisonment not more than one year, which is silent as to the place of imprisonment, a sentence inflicting punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary for one year, is error, and must be reversed. Horne v. State, 1 Or. 268. A person convicted of conspiracy to defraud under a section of the Colorado Code which did not prescribe the place of imprisonment was illegally sentenced and sent to penitentiary in place of the county jail, holding that, where two statutes are susceptible of the same construction, that is to be preferred which is most favorable to defendant. Brooks v. People, 14 Colo. 413, 24 Pac. 553. Section 18 of article 7 of the Constitution limits the jurisdiction of justices of the peace to misdemeanors in which the punishment may not exceed a fine of $200 or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 30 days, or both such fine and imprisonment. Section 12 of article 7 also provides that the county court shall have jurisdiction concurrent with justices of the peace in misdemeanor cases, and exclusive jurisdiction in all misdemeanor cases in which the justices of the peace have no jurisdiction. The relator having been convicted of a misdemeanor for which the maximum punishment is more than 30 days in jail or a fine of $200 or both the county court has exclusive jurisdiction in his case.

For these reasons, we overrule relator's demurrer to the sheriff's return herein, and remand the relator to the custody of the sheriff of Grady county, with directions that he be recommitted to the jail of said county, pursuant to the judgment of said county court.

Writ of habeas corpus denied. All the Justices concurring.

T. & H. SMITH & CO. v. THESMANN.
(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE—PAROL—TO EXPLAIN CONTRACT—ADMISSIBILITY.

In the absence of misrepresentation, fraud, or deceit, a party to a transaction is bound by the writing evidencing the agreement, though he was in fact ignorant of its contents; but, where the signature to the agreement is induced by the misrepresentations of the other party as to its contents, and the signer was ignorant thereof, he may introduce parol evidence of contemporaneous acts, declarations, and conversations to show the true nature of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2007-2020.]

2. GUARANTY — CONSTRUCTION — OFFER OF GUARANTY.

An indorsement, reading as follows: "For value received, and for the purpose of inducing S. & Co. to approve of this contract, I hereby guarantee to said S. & Co. the payment in lawful money of all claims arising and of any notes taken under within contract and hereby waive demand, notice of non-payment and protest and consent that S. & Co. may vary in any way the time of payment or method of settling accounts arising under within contract without affecting my liability as guarantor,"—where made and executed by F. T. upon an order for merchandise from D. H. to S. & Co., which order contained a condition that it should not be a complete and binding contract until approved by S. & Co., and where said order was not approved by S. & Co. until six days after the execution of said indorsement, held, in legal effect, to be an offer of guaranty, and not an absolute guaranty.

3. SAME—ACCEPTANCE—NOTICE.

An offer or proposal of guaranty does not become a binding obligation upon the guarantor until such offer or proposal has been accepted by the guarantee, and notice of his acceptance given the guarantor.

HAYES, J. On July 29, 1899, D. H. Tessman, who then resided at Henderson, Neb., made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff, T. & H. Smith & Co., a corporation, with its place of business at Pekin, Ill., a certain written order and contract for goods, which order was delivered to R. C. Stephens, the agent of the plaintiff, and which order is as follows:

"[Signed] D. H. Tessman.

"Approved August 5, 99.

"[Signed] T. & H. Smith & Co., by H. V.

"Order taken by C. R. Stephens."

On the back of this contract are nine conditions referred to in the contract. The fifth of these conditions is as follows: "This order does not become a complete and binding contract until it has been approved at the office of T. & H. Smith & Co., in Pekin, Ill., and no allowance or credits of any nature will be made in settlement, except by T. & H. Smith & Co. at its office in Pekin, Ill." Indorsed on this contract is the following agreement signed by Frank Thesmann, a brother of D. H. Tessman: "Guaranty. For value received and for the purpose of inducing T. & H. Smith & Co. to approve of this contract, I hereby guarantee to said T. & H.

Smith & Co. the payment in lawful money of all claims arising and of any notes taken under within contract and hereby waive demand, notice of non-payment and protest and consent that T. & H. Smith & Co. may vary in any way the time of payment or method of settling accounts arising under within contract without affecting my liability as guarantor." Under the above order plaintiff shipped to the defendant, D. H. Tessman, goods, wares, and merchandise, and for a part of the same D. H. Tessman on August 20, 1900, executed to the plaintiff in error three promissory notes, each for the sum of $325, payable at different dates, and bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, leaving the sum of $10.50 due on open account by said defendant in error, for which amounts plaintiff in error brought this suit against D. H. Tessman on the contract, notes, and open account and against the defendant in error, Frank Thesmann, on said alleged guaranty. The facts set out above are substantially as alleged in the plaintiff's petition. Defendant, Frank Thesmann, filed his separate answer to the plaintiff's petition, and denied all of the allegations contained in said petition, and further answered that on the 29th day of July, 1899, plaintiff, through its agent, R. C. Stephens, requested him to sign the written statement, the contents of which the said R. C. Stephens represented and stated were that D. H. Tessman was a business man, worthy of credit, and the defendant in error further plead in his answer that R. C. Stephens made other false and fraudulent representations to him to induce him to sign said statement; that he, the defendant in error, is a German, unacquainted with the English language, and cannot understand or comprehend an ordinary conversation unless it is in the German language, and that of this the said R. C. Stephens had knowledge at the time; and that by said divers false representations said R. C. Stephens obtained his signature to the alleged contract of guaranty set out in plaintiff's petition. Defendant pleads several other matters in defense of plaintiff's action; but it is not necessary to our consideration of this case to repeat them here. Plaintiff filed a general and special demurrer to the separate answer of the defendant, Frank Thesmann, and also a motion to strike out certain paragraphs of said answer, both of which were overruled by the court. Thereupon a jury was waived by both parties, and the cause was tried before the court. The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant.

Plaintiff in error makes eight assignments of error. Of these only the third, fourth, and fifth assignments have sufficient merit to demand the consideration of this court.

The third assignment of error is that the court erred in admitting parol testimony to contradict and vary the terms of the alleged written guaranty. One of the defenses plead by defendant in his answer was that he was unable to read the English language, and that he signed the alleged guaranty on the representations of the plaintiff in error made by R. C. Stephens, its agent, that said alleged guaranty was for the purpose of recommending to the plaintiff the character and reputation of D. H. Tessman, and was not for the purpose of creating any liability or obligation against him, and that he relied upon said false and fraudulent representations made by said R. C. Stephens, and was induced thereby to sign said alleged guaranty. It is a general rule of evidence that parol testimony is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract, but parol testimony is always admissible for the purpose of invalidating a written instrument, the execution of which was secured by fraud, or by misrepresentations as to the contents thereof upon which the party injured thereby had a right to rely. 17 Cyc. 695; Bank of Gunterville v. Webb & Butler, 108 Ala. 132, 19 South. 14; McKesson v. Sherman et al., 51 Wis. 303, 8 N. W. 200. Since defendant in error had plead in his answer that he had been induced by fraud and fraudulent representations to execute said alleged guaranty, the court did not commit error in admitting parol testimony for the purpose of proving whether such misrepresentations as to the contents of said contract were made by the plaintiff in order to induce the execution of the same by the defendant, Frank Thesmann.

The substance of the fourth, fifth, and sixth assignments of error is that the court erred in holding that the contract of guaranty did not become binding upon the guarantor, Frank Thesmann, without notice of the acceptance thereof to him by the plaintiff in error, and in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant in error. The defendant in error has filed no brief, and nothing in the record discloses upon what theory the trial court rendered judgment for the defendant in error other than is set out in the fifth and sixth assignments of error, and in the brief of the plaintiff in error. In those assignments of error and in the brief of the plaintiff in error it is complained that the court held that, before the plaintiff could recover in the action, it had to prove that Frank Thesmann was notified that plaintiff accepted his guaranty on the order of D. H. Tessman. The uncontradicted evidence in the case is that on the day that D. H. Tessman signed the order to T. & H. Smith & Co. he and R. C. Stephens, the agent of the said company, went to the farm of defendant, Frank Thesmann, near the town of Henderson, Neb., and defendant was asked by them to sign the guaranty indorsed on said contract. The evidence establishes that Frank Thesmann is a German, unable to read the English language or to write, and that his use of the English language is very broken; and there is some evidence that misrepresentations were made to him by the said R. C. Stephens to procure his signature to the contract of guaranty; but the testimony about the circumstances under which the contract was signed and the conversation at the time is very brief. The only evidence relative thereto is the testimony of the defendant, Frank Thesmann. He testified that his brother and Stephens came to his place on that day and asked him to sign the paper; that no explanation was made, except that it had to be signed by him, so that his brother, David, could handle goods. There is no evidence in the record that Stephens represented that, if defendant signed said guaranty, the goods would be shipped in accordance with the order, nor is there any evidence that Stephens had authority to make any contract for plaintiff with said D. H. Tessman or the defendant, Frank Thesmann. There is no evidence that the plaintiff in error, through Stephens or any one else, had stated to D. H. Tessman or to Frank Thesmann that the goods described in said order would be shipped to D. H. Tessman in accordance with said order upon the receipt of the guaranty of the defendant in error, or that, upon the receipt of such guaranty, said order would be approved; but it clearly appears from the conditions recited in said order that such was not the understanding between Stephens and D. H. Tessman and Frank Thesmann, for the reason that the order contains the provision that it should not be binding until approved by T. & H. Smith & Co., and the guaranty signed by Frank Thesmann states specifically that it is made for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to approve said contract.

It is a settled rule of law of the Supreme Court of the United States that, before a guarantor is bound by any offer of guaranty, the guarantee must have accepted the offer of guaranty, and the guarantor received notice of such acceptance; and the same rule prevails in nearly all of the state courts. There is no little confusion and what appears to be contradiction in the decisions of many of the state courts, but most of this confusion, and what appears to be conflict of authorities, result from the courts construing very similar instruments in some cases to be offers of guaranty and in other instances as being absolute guaranties, or completed guaranty contracts. The Supreme Court of the United States, in construing an instrument similar to the alleged guaranty in this case, in the case of Davis Sewing Machine Co. v. Richards, 115 U. S. 524, 6 Sup. Ct. 173, 29 L. Ed. 480, summed up the rules of law governing that court as follows: "A contract of guaranty, like every other contract, can only be made by the mutual assent of the parties. If the guaranty is signed by the guarantor at the request of the other party, or if the latter's agreement to accept is contemporaneous with the guaranty, or if the receipt from him of a valuable consideration, however small, is acknowledged in the guaranty, the mutual assent is proved, and the delivery of the guaranty to him or for his use completes the contract; but if the guaranty is signed by the guarantor without any previous request of the other party, and in his absence, for no consideration moving between them except future advances to be made to the principal debtor, the guaranty is in legal effect an offer or proposal on the part of the guarantor, needing an acceptance by the other party to complete the contract." There is no contention in the case at bar, and can be none under the facts disclosed by the testimony, that there was any mutual assent of the parties to the alleged guaranty at the time of the execution of the same by the defendant, Frank Thesmann. There is no evidence that any valuable consideration passed from the plaintiff to Frank Thesmann at the time of its execution. The instrument itself acknowledged no receipt by the guarantor of any valuable consideration from the guarantee. It is true that in said alleged guaranty the words "for value received" appear; but it is not stated from whom such valuable consideration is received, and, as held by the court in Davis Sewing Machine Co. v. Richards, supra, this phrase is as susceptible of the construction that such valuable consideration was received by the guarantor, Frank Thesmann, from D. H. Tessman, the principal debtor, as it is of the construction that the consideration was received from the guarantee. There is no evidence that plaintiff agreed at the time of the execution by Frank Thesmann of the guaranty that it would accept the order of D. H. Tessman on the guaranty of Frank Thesmann. The conditions of the contract and the terms of the guaranty, on the other hand, clearly indicate and establish, in the absence of contrary evidence, that no such agreement was made at that time, for the reason that the order contains the condition that it was subject to the approval of the plaintiff; and upon the order, which was introduced in evidence in the case, is the approval of the plaintiff, dated several days after the execution of the guaranty of the guarantor; and in the guaranty is the recital that one of the purposes of the guarantor's executing the same was to induce the plaintiff to approve the contract. The guaranty was not made in consideration of past advances to the principal debtor; but in consideration of future advances to be made to him under the contract or order. It is contended by plaintiff in error, however, that such guaranty was signed by the guarantor, Frank Thesmann, upon the request of the plaintiff in error, and therefore no notice of acceptance was necessary. There is no evidence in the record that plaintiff in error requested the guarantor to sign the instrument, except the testimony of the defendant, Frank Thesmann, to the effect that on the day the order was executed by his brother, D. H. Tessman, his brother and R. C. Stephens came to his place and requested him to sign the instrument, stating that it was necessary for him to do so in order that his brother could have credit and do business.

Defendant in his answer pleads as a defense to the action that plaintiff, through its agent, R. C. Stephens, requested him to sign the written statement, the contents of which were misrepresented to him by the agent of the plaintiff, and that the request of the plaintiff to sign said statement was not for the purpose of creating any liability or obligation to answer for the obligations of D. H. Tessman, and that by said false and fraudulent representations he was induced to sign the statement without knowing the contents thereof. This clause of the defendant's answer, in our opinion, is not susceptible of the construction that defendant, Frank Thesmann, thereby admits he signed the agreement of guaranty involved in this action upon such a request of the plaintiff as would imply plaintiff's assent to the contract. The language of the order, and of the guaranty, and the uncontradicted testimony of Frank Thesmann in the trial of the case, all go to establish that the transaction between Stephens and Thesmann was that Stephens, as agent of the plaintiff in error, procured the order from D. H. Tessman, and accompanied D. H. Tessman to the home of Frank Thesmann, and sought to procure this guaranty for the purpose of inducing the ultimate acceptance of the order by plaintiff, without knowing whether plaintiff would accept it or not. The legal effect of the guaranty signed by defendant was, therefore, an offer or proposal of guaranty on the part of Frank Thesmann as guarantor, and notice of the acceptance thereof by the plaintiff to Frank Thesmann was necessary to his becoming bound as guarantor. All of the evidence is to the effect that no such notice was given or received by him.

It is therefore the opinion of this court that the action of the trial court in rendering judgment for the defendant, Frank Thesmann, was not error; and it is ordered by this court that the judgment of the lower court be affirmed.

In re THOMAS et al.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. BAIL — APPLICATION FOR — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Upon an application to the Supreme Court for bail, by writ of habeas corpus, after commitment for a capital offense by a justice of the peace, the burden is upon the petitioner to show that he is illegally deprived of his liberty.

(Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Bail, § 199.)

2. SAME—CAPITAL OFFENSE.

If, after hearing the whole evidence, introduced on the application for bail, it is insufficient to generate in the mind of the court a reasonable doubt whether the accused committed the act charged, and in doing so they were guilty of a capital offense, bail should be refused.

(Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Bail, §§ 200, 201.)

3. SAME—REASONABLE DOUBT

It is not all conflicting exculpatory evidence that will have the effect to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt, and destroy or impair the force of "evident proof" made by inculpatory evidence. It is for the judge or court who hears the testimony to consider the evidence as a whole, and if by the entire evidence a reasonable doubt of the applicant's guilt of a capital offense is not generated the proof is evident and bail should be denied.

(Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Bail, §§ 148, 200, 201.)

Williams, C. J., and Hayes, J., dissenting in part.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of John F. Thomas and Will Thomas for writ of habeas corpus. Bail refused.

T. J. McMurray, Al J. Jennings, and John H. Burford, for petitioners. Charles West, Atty. Gen., W. C. Reeves, Asst. Atty. Gen., S. M. Cunningham, Fain & Young, and W. Poindexter, for the State.

KANE, J. This cause is here on a petition for writ of habeas corpus by John F. Thomas and Will Thomas, in which they contend they are unlawfully imprisoned and restrained at Lawton in the common jail of Comanche county, state of Oklahoma, by Rufe Le Fors, sheriff of said county, and one Julian, jailer of said Comanche county jail; that the cause of restraint, according to their best knowledge and belief, is that they have been committed to said Comanche county jail for the crime of murder, without bail, by a justice of the peace sitting as an examining magistrate. Said petitioners further allege that they are innocent of the crime of murder and that the proof, as shown by the record of this cause in the examining trial under which they were committed, shows that the proof against them is not evident nor the presumption thereof great. On this petition a writ of habeas corpus was issued. For his return to the writ Rufe Le Fors, sheriff of Comanche county, state of Oklahoma, shows to the court that he holds the petitioners in his custody and restrains them of their liberty by virtue of a writ of commitment issued by S. Armstrong, justice of the peace in and for the city of Lawton, Comanche county, state of Oklahoma, to him issued and delivered on the 22d day of January, 1908, upon hearing before said S. Armstrong, justice of the peace, in a preliminary trial in said court, charging the petitioners with the crime of murder; that the petitioners were committed to the common jail of Comanche county, Okla., and are being held by him as the duly qualified and acting sheriff of Comanche county, under and by virtue of said commitment; and that he now produces said petitioners in person in this court in obedience to said writ of habeas corpus.

Upon agreement of counsel the case was heard in this court upon the record and testimony introduced at the preliminary examination before Hon. S. Armstrong, Justice of the peace within and for the city of Lawton, Comanche county, Okl. The question, then, before the court, is: Are the petitioners entitled to bail upon the showing made at the preliminary examination before the committing magistrate, under section 8, art. 2, of the Bill of Rights of the state of Oklahoma? which reads: "All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses when the proof of guilt is evident, or the presumption thereof is great."

The first appearance of the above terms in American statutory or constitutional law seems to have been in a part of article 2 of an Ordinance for the Government of the Territories of the United States North of the River Ohio, which reads as follows: "The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury, of a proportionate representation of the people in the Legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great." 1 Stat. 52. From this original this language has been copied into most of the state Constitutions and statutes. With the exception that some Constitutions contain only provisions as to "excessive bail," and that others use the words "before conviction," or words of like import, or the words "murder" and "treason," instead of the words "capital offenses," and other slight changes, the language used above is substantially that of all the Constitutions.

The only use of the term, "when the proof is evident or the presumption great," independent of statute or Constitution, we have been able to find in the Reports is in Territory v. Benoit, 1 Mart. (O. S.) 141, by the Supreme Court of Louisiana. The indictment was for a capital offense, and the motion was to have the defendant bailed. The court said: "It cannot be done. Bail is never allowed in offenses punishable by death, when the proof is evident or the presumption great." In Hight v. United States, reported in Morris (Iowa) 407, 43 Am. Dec. 111, Mr. Chief Justice Mason, speaking of this provision as it appears in the Ordinance of 1787, says: "The Ordinance of 1787, the benefits of which have been transmitted to us, declares that 'all persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great.' This is no new provision, but is in express terms incorporated into the Constitutions of at least one-half of the states of the Union, and is the rule of action in all the rest. It is merely declaratory of the common law of the United States."

By the common law all offenses, including treason, murder, and other felonies, were bailable before indictment found. Certain restrictions were, however, imposed upon justices of the peace concerning their right to let to bail; but in the Court of King's Bench bail was not a matter of right in capital felonies, being limited by judicial discretion exercised according to the degree of proof of guilt. Rex v. Marks, 3 East, 157; Ex parte Baronett, 16 Eng. L. & Eq. 361; 2 Hale, P. C. 129. These principles of the common law are materially modified, in all except capital offenses, by our constitutional provision quoted above, and now, instead of all cases being bailable in the discretion of the court and not as a matter of right, under section 17 of the Bill of Rights all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, as a matter of right, except for capital offenses when the proof of guilt is evident or the presumption thereof is great. "If the offense is not shown by evident proof or great presumption to be one for the commission of which the law inflicts capital punishment, bail is not a matter of mere discretion with the court, but of right to the prisoner." Ex parte Bryant, 34 Ala. 270.

The policy pervading our jurisprudence is to commit as little as possible to judicial discretion, presuming that "that system of laws is best which confides as little as possible to the discretion of the judge—that judge is best who relies as little as possible upon his own opinion." In pursuance to this policy, ever since the provision "that all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties except for capital offenses, where the proof of guilt is evident or the presumption thereof is great," became a part of the settled constitutional and statutory law of nearly all the states of the Union, the courts have endeavored, with more or less success, to formulate some stable rule to guide their judgment in cases like the one at bar. Thus it was said by the court of common pleas of Philadelphia county in an early case, construing exactly the same provision in the Pennsylvania Constitution: "It is a safe rule, where malicious homicide is charged, to refuse bail in all cases where a judge would sustain a capital conviction if pronounced by a jury on such evidence of guilt as was exhibited to him on the hearing of the application to admit to bail." Com. v. Keeper of Prison, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 227.

This doctrine is approved in a per curiam opinion in the Matter of Salvador Trola on Habeas Corpus, 64 Cal. 152, 28 Pac. 231, where the court adopts the above excerpt from the Pennsylvania case as part of its syllabus. Simrall, J., in Street v. State, 43 Miss. 1, cites the rule laid down in the same case approvingly, saying: "There is much force in the words of the Pennsylvania court in the case of Commonwealth v. Keeper of Prison, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 234." Street v. State, supra, was in the Supreme Court on a writ of error issued to the district court of Yazoo county, and Justice Simrall stated as a reason for adopting the Pennsylvania rule that: "It would be going very far in the appellate court to reverse the judgment of the court who saw, heard, and observed the witnesses." Ohio, in State v. Summons, 19 Ohio, 139, Indiana, in Lumm v. State, 3 Ind. 293, California, in the Matter of Salvador Troia on Habeas Corpus, 64 Cal. 152, 28 Pac. 231, Texas, in Re Foster, 5 Tex. App. 625, 32 Am. Rep. 577, and possibly one or two other cases, refer to the Pennsylvania case approvingly. But most of these cases were in the Supreme Courts on appeal, and in others of them the rule has since been disapproved by the highest courts of the same states.

Another line of decisions hold that the terms, "when the proof of guilt is evident, or the presumption thereof is great," are as definite to the legal mind as any words of explanation could make them. In the states where this rule prevails the courts, when they refuse bail, do so with the statement "that bail should be refused where the proof of guilt is evident or the presumption thereof is great"; and when bail is granted, by the statement, "that where the proof of guilt is not evident, nor the presumption thereof great, bail should be allowed in capital cases." Thus in California, in Ex parte Walpole, 85 Cal. 362, 24 Pac. 657, Fox, J., without commenting on the rule laid down in the Matter of Salvador Troia, supra, says: "On the question of admission to bail, the offense charged is punishable with death, unless the jury fix it at imprisonment for life. The defendant, therefore, cannot be admitted to bail if the proof of his guilt is evident or the presumption thereof great." Colorado, Kansas, Kentucky, and Texas in several cases have followed this rule.

This court does not look with favor on either of the above rules. The first one seems to us to be unmindful of the inherent right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness of the citizen, and casts burdens upon those charged with capital offenses not contemplated by the law. The second is too general to be useful as a guide to the judgment of the court in weighing the evidence when the liberty of the citizen is in the balance. Primarily a person charged with a capital offense cannot demand bail as a matter of right, since, upon ascertaining the character of the charge against the accused, the next question would be as to the degree of proof and the nature of the presumption of guilt. Upon an application to the Supreme Court for bail, by writ of habeas corpus, after commitment for a capital offense by a justice of the peace, the burden is upon the petitioner to show that he is illegally deprived of his liberty. Ex parte Hammock, 78 Ala. 414; Ex parte Rhear, 77 Ala. 92; Ex parte Vaughan, 44 Ala. 417. On this question there is little conflict in the authorities. Alabama, California, Florida, Indiana, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Utah, and Wyoming all support the proposition. Texas seems to be the only state placing the burden of proof upon the state to show that the offense is a capital one and that the proof is evident; but even there the doctrine of the text prevailed until it was upset in the case of Ex parte Bud Newman, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 164, 41 S. W. 628, 70 Am. St. Rep. 740.

We believe that, with the burden of proof on the petitioners, if, after hearing the whole evidence introduced on the application for bail, it is insufficient to generate in the mind of the court a reasonable doubt whether the accused committed the act charged, and in doing so they were guilty of a capital offense, bail should be refused. But we do not wish to be understood as laying this down as a hard and fast rule, to which there may be no exceptions. There may be exceptional circumstances, such as the serious and probably fatal injury to health, or unusual and protracted delay upon the part of the state in bringing the prisoner to trial, that may warrant the court hearing all the evidence to admit to bail, when the proof of guilt is evident or the presumption thereof is great. The admission to bail, however, under these circumstances, is not a constitutional right, but a matter resting in the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge, who should not grant it save under extraordinary circumstances. The rule herein laid down is supported by an array of well-settled cases. Those we particularly rely on are Ex parte McAnally, 53 Ala. 495, 25 Am. Rep. 646; Ex parte Bridewell, 57 Miss. 39; Ex parte Tom Smith, Jr., 23 Tex. App. 100, 5 S. W. 99. In Ex parte McAnally, Brickell, C. J., states the rule thus: "If the evidence is clear and strong, leading a well-guarded and dispassionate judgment to the conclusion that the offense has been committed, that the accused is the guilty agent, and that he would probably be punished capitally if the law is administered, bail is not a matter of right." In Ex parte Bridewell, Chalmers, J., states the rule as follows: "Upon an application for bail by writ of habeas corpus, the burden is upon the relator to show that he is illegally deprived of his liberty. * * * If, upon the whole testimony adduced, the court entertains a reasonable doubt whether the relator committed the act, or whether in so doing he was guilty of a capital crime, he should admit him to bail in such sum and with such sureties as will in his opinion certainly insure his appearance."

We wish here to quote with approval the language of Chalmers, J., in rejecting the Pennsylvania rule laid down in Com. v. Keeper of Prison, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 227: "The error of the Pennsylvania rule is in failing to give due effect to a verdict of conviction, or in overlooking the vast change it effects in the attitude of the party. By it the legal presumption of innocence is overthrown, all doubtful questions of fact are resolved in favor of the state, and the credibility or noncredibility of witnesses is conclusively established. A verdict of conviction where no error of law has intervened will never be set aside unless manifestly wrong, or, as is sometimes said, if there be any evidence to support it. To say that bail will only be granted where there is no evidence showing guilt, or where the proof of guilt is so slight upon the whole testimony that a conviction would be manifestly wrong, is plainly inconsistent with the constitutional requirement that it shall be granted in all cases except where the proof is evident or the presumption great." Both of the foregoing cases were reviewed in Ex parte Tom Smith, Jr., supra. Mr. Justice Willson, speaking of the rule laid down in the Case of McNally, supra, said: "With regard to the second rule, it is not, as we can perceive, objectionable. It is, as we understand it, in harmony with the constitutional requirement that bail shall be granted unless the proof is evident. It is, in effect, the same rule stated as a correct one in the Bridewell Case, supra, but in different language."

We approve the Alabama rule, as stated in the McAnally Case, in the main; but we believe that the part reading, "and that he would probably be punished capitally if the law is administered," is a little more liberal in favor of the accused than a fair construction of the provision under discussion warrants. Under the statutes of Oklahoma the jury have the power in all cases of murder to determine whether the punishment shall be death or imprisonment for life; but this does not make the offense less capital. It would seem to us that a rule that would require the court to speculate as to what punishment a jury might probably inflict upon any given state of facts would be more harmful than helpful. Speaking of the rule of the Pennsylvania case, supra, Justice Willson, in Ex parte Tom Smith, Jr., said: "With respect to the first rule, we are convinced that it is wrong and should no longer be recognized as a guide. It is ably and justly criticised in the Bridewell Case, 57 Miss. 39."

And the doctrine of this case is not without support from the courts where the common-law rule prevails. The law is laid down to the same effect in 4 Bl. Com. 299; and in Rex v. Marks, 3 East, 165, the rule is advanced in these cautious and qualified terms: "The court will bail whenever there is any doubt on the law or the facts in the case." And again in New York, a state following the common-law rule, we find the following in relation to a case similar to the one at bar: "If there be no reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, he ought not to be bailed." Ex parte Tayloe, 5 Cow. 39. The same doctrine is sanctioned in State v. McNab, 20 N. H. 160, and State v. Rockafellow, 6 N. J. Law, 332. The rule is practically the same in the federal courts: "On testimony given in court on the return of a writ of habeas corpus, if it is clear to the mind of the judge that a conviction for murder should not take place, he will order the prisoner to give bail for his appearance." U. S. v. Marshal of Dist. of Col., Fed. Cas. No. 15,725a.

The point is made that; as there is a conflict in the testimony adduced at the hearing, the proof of guilt cannot be said to be evident or the presumption thereof great. This contention cannot be sustained. "To the mind of the tribunal passing upon the evidence the guilt of the applicant of a capital offense may be evident—that is, clear, strong, not admitting of a reasonable doubt—and yet there may be evidence in conflict with such inculpatory evidence. It is not all conflicting exculpatory evidence that will have the effect to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt and destroy or impair the force of 'evident proof' made by inculpatory evidence. It is for the judge or court who hears the testimony to consider the evidence as a whole, and if by the entire evidence a reasonable doubt of the applicant's guilt of a capital offense is not generated the proof is evident and bail should be denied." Ex parte Tom Smith, Jr., 23 Tex. App. 127, 5 S. W. 102.

We will not comment upon the evidence, lest our comments should influence the final trial. To decline to do so seems to be the uniform practice, as it has always obtained in such cases. We will only say that, applying the rules herein enunciated to the facts as shown by all the evidence before us, we are of the opinion that the proof of guilt is evident and the presumption thereof is great. We do not wish to be understood as saying that the petitioners are guilty of murder, or that their innocence of the offense charged or of a lower degree of homicide may not be made to appear most fully upon their final trial. We are only passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence exhibited in this record, and upon it alone is our opinion predicated.

It follows that bail must be refused.

DUNN and TURNER, JJ., concur. HAYES, J., concurs in the reasoning and the rules enunciated, but dissents from the conclusion refusing bail to petitioner John F. Thomas. WILLIAMS, C. J., dissents from some of the reasoning and some of the rules enunciated, but concurs in the conclusion refusing bail.

NATIONAL LIVE STOCK COMMISSION
CO. et al. v. TALIAFERRO et al.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. STATUTES—ADOPTION FROM ANOTHER STATE —CONSTRUCTION.

It will be presumed that Congress, in adopting the statutes of Arkansas for the Indian Territory, adopted them with the construction and interpretation that had been placed on them by the Supreme Court of Arkansas prior to their adoption by Congress.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 307.]

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES — COMMISSION OF MORTGAGED PROPERTY—ACTION BY MORTGAGEE.

An action for conversion under the statutes of Arkansas on mortgages, put in force in the Indian Territory, will not lie in favor of the mortgagee under a mortgage against the purchaser of the mortgaged property, where the mortgage was filed, but not recorded, and where such action is not begun until after the lapse of one year from the filing of such mortgage, unless such mortgage has been extended as required by statute, although the purchaser purchased the mortgaged property before the expiration of one year from the filing of the mortgage. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from the United States Court for the Southern District of the Indian Territory; before Justice Hosea Townsend.

Action by the National Live Stock Commission Company and R. H. McNatt, trustee, against W. N. Tallafarro and D. B. Tallafarro. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This action was instituted on the 12th day of August, 1903, in the United States Court for the Southern District of the Indian Territory, at Tishomingo, by the National Live Stock Commission Company and R. H. McNatt, trustee, against W. N. Tallafarro and D. B. Tallafarro. The portion of the plaintiffs' complaint that attempts to allege a cause of action against the defendants is as follows: "For cause of action plaintiffs state that on April 26, 1900, one Sam Loughmiller, of Grayson county, Tex., for a valid consideration executed to R. H. McNatt, trustee for the National Live Stock Commission Co., a deed of trust covering 135 head of steer yearlings and 30 cows, branded L on left side, and located in Hume pasture, near Woodville, Ind. T.; a certified copy of said deed of trust being attached hereto and made a part hereof, and marked 'Exhibit A.' That said deed of trust was properly indorsed and filed with the United States clerk at Ardmore, Ind. T., on May 5, 1900. That in the month of November or December, 1900, while said deed of trust was in full force and effect, and without the consent or knowledge of these plaintiffs, or either of them, the said Sam Loughmiller sold said cattle to the defendants herein, W. N. Tallafarro and D. B. Tallafarro, who converted same to their own use and benefit; but plaintiff alleges that said mortgage was not extended by filing an extension affidavit as required by the statute, and that when this suit was filed the same was not properly recorded or filed for record. That by the terms of said deed of trust these plaintiffs had a special property interest in said cattle at time of said conversion by said defendants, and at time of said conversion said cattle were of the reasonable value of $1,500." A copy of the deed of trust attached to said complaint fully confirms the allegations set out in plaintiffs' complaint as to the facts alleged therein relative to said deed of trust. To plaintiffs' complaint defendants filed a demurrer, which was sustained by the court. Plaintiffs thereupon refused to plead further, and the court rendered judgment dismissing the action and taxing the cost against plaintiffs. Whereupon the case was appealed by the plaintiffs to the United States Court of Appeals for the Indian Territory, where it was pending at the time of the admission of Oklahoma as a state, and comes to this court under the provisions of the enabling act.

Herbert, Walker & Cannon, for appellants. Cruce, Cruce & Bleakmore and Henshaw & Faulkner, for appellees.

HAYES, J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellants make two assignments of error, both of which go to the action of the court in sustaining appellees' demurrer to the complaint and in dismissing said cause from the docket of the trial court and taxing costs against the appellants. On May 2, 1890, Congress by an act extended over and put in force in the Indian Territory certain chapters of Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, published in 1884. Among the chapters of said digest put in force in the Indian Territory was chapter 110, on "Mortgages," which contained, among other sections, the following sections:

"Sec. 4742. All mortgages, whether for real or personal estate, shall be proved or acknowledged in the same manner that deeds for the conveyance of real estate are now required by law to be proved or acknowledged; and when so proved or acknowledged shall be recorded—if for lands, in the county or counties in which the lands lie, and, if for personal property, in the county in which the mortgagor resides.

"Sec. 4743. Every mortgage, whether for real or personal property, shall be a lien on the mortgaged property from the time the same is filed in the recorder's office for record, and not before; which filing shall be notice to all persons of the existence of such mortgage."

"Sec. 4750. Whenever any mortgage or conveyance, intended to operate as a mortgage of personal property or any deed of trust upon personal property, shall be filed with any recorder in this state upon which is indorsed the following words: 'This instrument is to be filed but not recorded'—and which indorsement is signed by the mortgagee, his agent or attorney, the said instrument, when so received, shall be marked 'Filed' by the recorder, with the time of filing, upon the back of such instrument; and he shall file the same in his office and it shall be a lien on the property therein described from the time of filing, and the same shall be kept there for the inspection of all persons interested; and said instrument shall be thenceforth notice to all the world of the contents thereof without further record, except as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 4751. Every mortgage so indorsed and filed shall be void as against the creditors of the person making the same, or against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith, after the expiration of one year after the filing thereof, unless within thirty days next preceding the expiration of one year from such filing, and each year thereafter, the mortgagee, his agent or attorney, shall make an affidavit exhibiting the interest of the mortgagee at the time last aforesaid claimed by virtue of such mortgage, and, if said mortgage is to secure the payment of money, the amount yet due and unpaid; such affidavit shall be attached to and filed with the instrument or copy on file to which it relates." Ind. T. Ann. St. 1899, §§ 3053, 3054, 3061, 3062.

On February 3, 1897 (29 Stat. 510, c. 136), an act of Congress, amending section 4742 of Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas [Ind. T. Ann. St. 1899, § 3053], above set out, was approved, which amendment, omitting the caption, was as follows: "Provided, that if the mortgagor is a nonresident of the Indian Territory, the mortgage shall be recorded in the judicial district in which the property is situated at the time the mortgage is executed. All mortgages of personal property in the Indian Territory heretofore executed and recorded in the judicial district thereof in which the property was situated at the time they were executed are hereby validated."

In the deed of trust attached to the complaint of plaintiffs as an exhibit it is stated that Sam Loughmiller, the mortgagor, was at the time of the execution of the same a resident of Grayson county, Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory, which was a part of the Southern district of the Indian Territory. The proper place, then, for recording said deed of trust was in the office of the clerk of the United States Court at Ardmore, Ind. T., where it was filed, but not recorded, on the 5th day of May, 1900. Therefore, under the pleadings in the trial court and the assignments of error in this court, there is but one question presented to this court for its consideration and answer, to wit: Could a trustee, joined by the beneficiary, under a deed of trust conveying personal property which had been filed as by law provided, maintain an action for conversion against one who had purchased the mortgaged property prior to the expiration of 12 months from the date of the filing of the deed of trust, when no affidavit for a renewal or extension of said deed of trust was filed within 30 days next preceding the expiration of 1 year from the date of the filing of the deed of trust, when such suit for conversion was not instituted until after the expiration of said period of 1 year from the filing of said deed of trust?

The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in the case of McKennon v. May, 39 Ark. 442, prior to the act of Congress extending in force in the Indian Territory said chapter on mortgages, construed said section 4751 [section 3002], and held that a chattel mortgage which had been filed, but not recorded, and which had not been extended as provided and required by section 4751, becomes void as to creditors, subsequent mortgagees, and purchasers of the mortgaged property after the lapse of 1 year from the filing. In that case, the plaintiff had taken a mortgage on a crop of cotton and filed his mortgage as provided by law. Subsequently, and prior to the expiration of 1 year from such filing of the mortgage by plaintiff, the defendant had taken a mortgage upon the same crop of cotton. After the expiration of 1 year plaintiff, without having filed an affidavit within 30 days next preceding the expiration of 1 year from the filing of his mortgage, instituted a replevin suit against the defendant, May, who was the mortgagee under the second mortgage, and who had taken possession of the crop of cotton mortgaged. The court held that plaintiff's mortgage lost its superiority upon his failure to file the extension affidavit as required by the statute, and that his mortgage, as to the defendant's mortgage, had expired and was of no force and effect. The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in the case of Crawford v. Trigg et al., 15 S. W. 185, not without some criticism thereon, adhered to the ruling of the court in the case of McKennon v. May. The case of Crawford v. Trigg, however, was rendered by the court subsequent to the act of Congress extending said laws of Arkansas over the Indian Territory, and it alone would have no binding force upon the trial court or upon this court in the case at bar; but we call attention to same for the reason that the decision of the court therein clearly shows that there is no misunderstanding in that court about the rule laid down in McKennon v. May.

Was the construction of the statute made by the Supreme Court of Arkansas in McKennon v. May binding upon the trial court? Counsel for appellants, relying upon the case of Evans-Snider-Buel Co. v. McFadden, 105 Fed. 293, 44 C. C. A. 494, 58 L. R. A. 900, which case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (185 U. S. 505, 22 Sup. Ct. 758, 46 L. Ed. 1012), contend in their brief that the trial court was not bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of Arkansas in the case of McKennon v. May. The facts in the case of Evans-Snider-Buel Co. v. McFadden were that in the months of April and May, 1896, one John R. Blocker executed to Evans-Snider-Buel Company two deeds of trust in the nature of mortgages, whereby he conveyed to the said Evans-Snider-Buel Company something like 6,000 head of cattle. At the time of the execution of the mortgage Blocker was a resident of the state of Texas, and the cattle were located in a pasture in the Creek Nation of the Indian Territory. Both deeds of trust were recorded in the office of the clerk of the United States Court for the Northern District of the Indian Territory a day or two after the execution of the same. At the time of the execution and filing of said mortgages sections 4742 and 4743 [sections 3053 and 3054], supra, were in force in the Indian Territory; but the act of Congress of February 3, 1897, amending section 4742, had not been enacted. On January 29, 1897, McFadden & Son brought suit in the United States Court for the Northern District of the Indian Territory upon a judgment theretofore recovered by them against Blocker in Jefferson county, Tex., and sued out a writ of attachment, and caused the cattle covered by the two mortgages of Evans-Snyder-Buel Company to be attached. It was the contention of McFadden & Son in that case that under sections 4742 and 4743 [sections 3053, 3054], supra, said mortgages constituted no lien upon the property as against them, the attaching creditors, for the reason they were not filed in the county where the mortgagor resided at the time of the execution of the same. Evans-Snyder-Buel Company contended that the act of Congress of February 3, 1897, which was enacted a few days before the trial of the case in the trial court of the Northern District of the Indian Territory, cured the defects in the chapter on mortgages extended in force in the Indian Territory, and validated their mortgages. A careful examination of the decisions of the Circuit Court of Appeals and of the Supreme Court of the United States in this case will disclose that the question decided in both courts was whether or not the act of Congress of February 3, 1897, cured the defects of the mortgage laws extended in force in the Indian Territory and validated the mortgages of appellants. A careful examination of the decisions rendered by both courts will disclose that neither of them decided, or attempted to decide, whether the courts of the Indian Territory were bound by the construction of the statutes put in force in the Indian Territory which had been given to said statutes by the Supreme Court of Arkansas prior to the extension in force of such laws in the Indian Territory. It appears that the Circuit Court of Appeals, in its opinion in the case, endeavored to prevent creating any such impression by using the following language: "Learned counsel for the interpleader have argued at some length that the United States Courts in the Indian Territory were and are under no obligation to construe sections 4742 and 4743 of the chapter concerning mortgages as they were construed in Main v. Alexander, supra, because that decision is in conflict with other decisions of the Supreme Court of Arkansas on kindred questions, and because it has been discredited by judicial criticism in the state of Arkansas, and cannot be regarded as settling the true construction of the statute in controversy, even in the state where it originated. They also claim that the attachment writ only operated upon such interest in the cattle as the mortgagor had at the time the writ was levied, and that this interest was a mere equity of redemption; the mortgage being, in any event, good as against the mortgagor. Some other propositions are also advanced, all of which have been noticed; but, without expressing an opinion thereon, we prefer to rest our decision on the ground, heretofore stated, that the act of Congress operated to validate the interpleader's mortgage."

The question of what weight the United States Courts in the Indian Territory should give to the construction of statutes (extended in force in the Indian Territory) by the Supreme Court of Arkansas prior to the extension of such statutes in force was presented directly to and passed upon by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Sanger v. Flow, 48 Fed. 152, 1 C. C. A. 56. The Circuit Court of Appeals in that case held that in adopting the Arkansas statutes for the Indian Territory it would be presumed they were adopted with the construction and interpretation placed upon them by the Supreme Court of Arkansas prior to their adoption by Congress. In the case of Appolos et al. v. Brady et al., 49 Fed. 401, 1 C. C. A. 299, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit, without referring to Sanger v. Flow, announced the same rule as announced in that case, and that rule was followed and adopted by the United States Court of Appeals in the Indian Territory in the case of Zufall v. United States, 1 Ind. T. 639, 43 S. W. 760; and this rule of construction, while never passed upon so far as we know by the Supreme Court of the United States in any case arising in the Indian Territory, has been announced as the rule of that court in similar cases. Henrietta Mining & Milling Co. v. Gardner, 173 U. S. 123, 19 Sup. Ct. 327, 43 L. Ed. 637; Edward M. Willis v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co., 169 U. S. 295, 18 Sup. Ct. 347, 42 L. Ed. 752.

The facts alleged in plaintiffs' complaint do not constitute a cause of action against defendants, and the action of the court in sustaining defendants' demurrer and dismissing the cause was not error.

The facts in this case suggest this further question to this court: Since plaintiffs were nonresidents of the Indian Territory at the time of the execution of the mortgage to them, would the filing of their mortgage with the clerk of the United States Court at Ardmore, without recording the same, be a sufficient compliance with said chapter on mortgages as amended by the act of Congress of February 3, 1897, to constitute a notice of the existence of such mortgage to all persons? This court has not undertaken to decide this question, for the reason that the same was not presented in the brief of either of the parties to the action, and it does not appear from the record that this question was raised in the trial court, and whatever decision this court might reach upon the same could not change the judgment of this court.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court be affirmed.

LUND v. BOOTH, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 29, 1908.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JUDGMENT—ABSTRACT—DOCKETING IN DISTRICT COURT—VACATING—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT.

Rev. St. 1898, § 3733, provides that the justice, on the demand of a party in whose favor judgment is rendered, must give him an abstract of the judgment. Section 3734 provides that the abstract may be filed with the clerk of the district court of any county, and must be docketed in the judgment docket of such court. Section 3735 provides that from the time of the docketing execution may be issued thereon as on a judgment of the district court. Section 3736 makes a judgment when so docketed a lien on the real property of the judgment debtor in such county. The statute does not require the abstract to recite that the justice had jurisdiction, nor the means by which he obtained such jurisdiction. Held that, when an abstract of a judgment, complying with the requirements of the statute is filed and docketed, the district court of the county where so filed and docketed was not authorized on motion to strike the abstract from the record on the ground that the justice court had not acquired jurisdiction of defendant, such fact not appearing on the face of the abstract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 608.]

Original application by L. P. Lund for a writ of certiorari against John E. Booth, judge of the Fourth judicial district court, to review the proceedings of the district court in the case of L. P. Lund against Ellen Ivers. Order of district court annulled.

E. A. Walton, for petitioner. A. L. Booth, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. On application made to us a writ of certiorari was issued to review the proceedings of the court of the Fourth judicial district, in the case of L. P. Lund v. Ellen Ivers. A transcript of the proceedings sent to us shows that on the 15th day of September, 1906, Lund obtained a judgment against Ivers in the justice court of Murray precinct, Salt Lake county, Utah; that on the 3d day of October, 1906, an abstract of the judgment was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Utah county, and was docketed in the judgment docket of the district court of that county. Thereafter Ivers appeared, by motion, before the district court for Utah county, and moved the court to cancel and set aside the docketing of the judgment, on the grounds that she had not been served with summons or process from the justice court, and had no knowledge that the plaintiff had obtained a judgment against her until the docketing of the abstract in Utah county; that she never had any business transaction with the plaintiff, and was not indebted to him, and never contracted any obligation, payable in Salt Lake county, and within the jurisdiction of the justice at Murray precinct. Notice of the motion was served upon plaintiff. On the day set for the hearing of the motion the defendant appeared, but the plaintiff failed to appear. The transcript of the proceedings recites that testimony was taken by the court in support of the motion, and that it was made to appear that the defendant was not served with summons out of the justice court, and that she had no knowledge of the judgment until it was docketed in Utah county. Thereupon the court ordered the docketing of the judgment annulled and vacated, the apparent lien upon the defendant's property in Utah county removed, and directed the clerk to vacate the docketing of the judgment.

The point presented for decision involves the question whether the district court, in such a proceeding as was had before it, was authorized to go behind the face of the abstract and inquire into the matters presented to it, on a mere motion. The statute provides that the justice, on the demand of a party in whose favor judgment is entered, must give him an abstract of the judgment in the form which is fully set forth in the statute. This form requires the abstract to recite the title of the court and cause, stating the names of the plaintiff and the defendant, the name of the justice court, the precinct or city, the date when the judgment was entered, and the amount of the judgment. The foregoing matters are required to be certified to by the justice. It is further provided that the abstract may be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of any county in the state, and must be docketed in the judgment docket of the district court thereof; that from the time of the docketing in the office of the clerk of any district court execution may be issued thereon in the same manner and with like effect as if issued on a judgment of the district court; that when so filed and docketed the judgment is a lien upon the real property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, situate in such county. Section 3733 et seq., Rev. St. 1898.

The abstract of the judgment filed and docketed in Utah county was an exact copy, as prescribed by the statute, with the necessary blanks filled in. It in every particular complied with the statute. No irregularity or voidness appeared upon its face. It did not appear thereon that the justice court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, or of the person of the defendant. The abstract did not affirmatively recite that the justice had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, nor the facts or means by which the justice obtained such jurisdiction. But the statute does not require the abstract to recite or set forth such fact. The Legislature has expressly provided what the abstract shall contain, and that, when such an abstract is made and certified to by the justice, and it is filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of any county, and there docketed, an execution may issue thereon, and a lien on the real property of the judgment debtor is created. When such an abstract of a judgment is filed and docketed, the district court of the county where filed and docketed cannot, on motion, vacate the judgment so transferred and docketed, and strike the abstract from the record, unless it appears on the face of the abstract that the judgment is void. The docketing of the judgment in the office of the clerk of Utah county did not give the district court of that county jurisdiction of the action in which such judgment was rendered. The docketing of the judgment was for the purpose of creating a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor, and enforcing the same by execution. If an execution is issued which does not follow the judgment as docketed, the court undoubtedly has power, on motion, to recall or quash it. But such motion would not reach any defect in the judgment not shown upon the face of the record. The court, however, was not authorized to go behind the face of the abstract and to determine whether the justice rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or to inquire into the merits of the cause. If the judgment rendered in the justice court is erroneous or void for want of jurisdiction, not appearing on the face of the abstract, relief therefrom must be obtained in some other manner authorized by law or equity.

We are therefore of the opinion that the district court was not authorized, on motion, to inquire into the matters presented to it, or to strike the abstract from the record. The following cases fully support the views herein expressed and the conclusion reached by us: 23 Cyc. p. 893; Garlock v. Calkins, 14 S. D. 90, 84 N. W. 393; Birdsey v. Harris, 68 N. C. 92; Whitehurst v. Transportation Co., 109 N. C. 342, 13 S. E. 937; Lacock v. White, 19 Pa. 495; Littster v. Littster, 151 Pa. 474, 25 Atl. 117.

The order of the district court canceling and vacating the docketing of the abstract of judgment is therefore annulled, and the docketing of the abstract restored. No costs are allowed against the district judge; but, inasmuch as the defendant, Ellen Ivers, applied for the order canceling the docketing of the abstract, maintained and prosecuted her motion therefor before the district court, and defended the same in this court, the plaintiff is entitled to costs of this proceeding to be taxed against her.

WINNOVICH v. EMERY.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS—NATURE OF PROCEEDING—CIVIL OR CRIMINAL.

Habeas corpus proceedings are civil, and not criminal.

2. SAME—SPECIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Habeas corpus belongs to what, under the Code, are termed "special proceedings."

3. SAME—APPEAL.

Rev. St. 1898, § 3027, provides that a party prosecuting a special proceeding may be known as plaintiff, and the adverse party as defendant. Section 3303 provides that any party to a judgment may appeal therefrom, and that the party appealing shall be known as appellant, and the adverse party as respondent. Held, that a proceeding in habeas corpus being civil, the applicant is the plaintiff and the party who restrains the applicant is the defendant, and therefore an appeal by defendant is not an attempted appeal by the state.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—"FINALITY OF JUDGMENT."

The test of finality for the purpose of an appeal is not necessarily whether the whole matter involved in the action is concluded, but whether the particular proceeding or action is terminated by the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 426-443.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, p. 2777; vol. 8, p. 7603.]

5. HABEAS CORPUS—APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINALITY.

In a habeas corpus proceeding, the judgment of the court which either remands or discharges the petitioner is a final judgment, notwithstanding the fact that another similar proceeding may be commenced by the petitioner if he elects to do so.¹

6. SAME—EFFECT—STAY OF PROCEEDING.

Without an express statutory provision to that effect, an appeal does not of its own force suspend the judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding.

7. SAME—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF.

Where the common law is in force or under statutes which are in effect merely declaratory of the common law, courts, on habeas corpus, may not extend the investigation beyond jurisdictional matters.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 23.]

8. SAME—REVIEW OR EVIDENCE.

There is no statutory authority in this state whereby a court or judge on habeas corpus may review the evidence adduced before a magistrate in support of a criminal charge for the purpose of determining whether the evidence was either competent or sufficient to warrant the magistrate in holding the accused for trial to the district court and in committing him for that purpose.

9. SAME.

If the accused should allege and offer to prove that the magistrate did not in fact hear any evidence in support of the charge, and the accused did not waive examination, and that the record showing the proceedings of the magistrate is false, then the court or judge in habeas corpus proceedings should hear the evidence in that regard; and, if it is found that there was no preliminary examination by the magistrate, the accused should be discharged.

Appeal from District Court, Third District; Geo. G. Armstrong, Judge.

Habeas corpus by Emil Winnovich against C. Frank Emery. From a judgment discharging petitioner, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Willard Hanson and Thos. Marioneaux, for appellant. P. P. Christensen, for respondent.

FRICK, J. On the 15th day of June, 1907, a complaint in due form was filed before Joseph J. Williams, a justice of the peace of Salt Lake county, charging Emil Winnovich, the respondent in this appeal, with the crime of murder. He was duly arrested upon a warrant, and taken before said justice, who regularly proceeded to examine into the charge, and on the 18th day of June, 1907, after hearing the evidence adduced thereon, found that there was probable cause to believe that the accused, Emil Winnovich, had committed the crime of murder, and entered an order or judgment requiring the accused to appear before the district court of Salt Lake county, and to that end issued a mittimus or commitment directed to the sheriff of Salt Lake county, the appellant herein, to safely keep said accused and bring him before the district court of Salt Lake county to be dealt with according to law. The appellant accordingly held the respondent in custody in the common jail of Salt Lake county by virtue of said commitment. On the 26th day of June, 1907, the respondent presented his petition to George G. Armstrong, one of the district judges of Salt Lake county, wherein he alleged that he was unlawfully restrained of his liberty, and prayed that a writ of habeas corpus issue requiring appellant to show cause why he detained the respondent and restrained him of his liberty. Appellant duly produced the respondent in court as directed by said writ, and for cause of detention produced the commitment issued as aforesaid. On the 29th day of June following the petition was submitted to said district judge, sitting as a court, without argument. The evidence adduced at the hearing before the justice, duly certified to by him, was submitted to the court, together with the return of appellant as aforesaid. On the 9th day of July, 1907, the court granted the petition of respondent, upon the sole ground, as appears from the record, that "It does not appear to the court that there is sufficient evidence in the record to warrant the holding of defendant." The court accordingly entered an order or judgment discharging the respondent from the custody of appellant, and restored respondent to liberty. From the order or judgment, Emery appeals.

A motion to dismiss the appeal is interposed by respondent upon the grounds (1) that this is in effect an appeal by the state, and that the state has not the right to appeal in such a proceeding; (2) that, in any event, no appeal lies from habeas corpus proceedings in this state because the order or judgment of discharge is not a final judgment.

We will first examine into the first ground urged why this appeal should be dismissed, namely, that an appeal in this case is an appeal by the state. This brings up the question whether the proceedings are civil or criminal. We think there is little, if any, room for doubt, in view of the authorities, that the proceedings are civil, and not criminal. The purpose is to protect or vindicate a civil right. The person is restrained of his liberty, and the purpose of the whole proceeding is to have that liberty restored to him at the earliest possible moment. When liberty is restored, the proceeding has accomplished its purpose, and no other or further consequences follow. That habeas corpus proceedings are civil, and the reasons why they are so, are well stated by Mr. Chief Justice Waite in Ex parte Tom Tong, 108 U. S. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. 872, 27 L. Ed. 826, where he says: "The writ of habeas corpus is the remedy which the law gives for the enforcement of the civil right of personal liberty. Resort to it sometimes becomes necessary, because of what is done to enforce laws for the punishment of crimes, but the judicial proceeding under it is not to inquire into the criminal act which is complained of, but into the right to liberty notwithstanding the act. Proceedings to enforce civil rights are civil proceedings, and proceedings for the punishment of crimes are criminal proceedings. In the present case the petitioner is held under criminal process. The prosecution against him is a criminal prosecution, but the writ of habeas corpus which he has obtained is not a proceeding in that prosecution. On the contrary, it is a new suit brought by him to enforce a civil right which he claims, as against those who are holding him in custody under the criminal process. If he fails to establish his right to his liberty, he may be detained for trial for the offense; but, if he succeeds, he must be discharged from custody. The proceeding is one instituted by himself for his liberty, not by the government to punish him for his crime." In Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 88, 13 Sup. Ct. 24, 36 L. Ed. 896, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in passing upon the question, says: "It is well settled that a proceeding in habeas corpus is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding." In support of this, he cites Farnsworth v. Montana, 129 U. S. 104, 9 Sup. Ct. 253, 32 L. Ed. 616; Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 6 Sup. Ct. 148, 29 L. Ed. 458, and the Tong Case, above quoted from. We desire also to call special attention to the case of Ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 189, 85 N. W. 1046. In the case last referred to, as in this, the sheriff took the proceedings to the Supreme Court for review from an order or judgment by the lower court discharging the prisoner. That case is one of the best considered cases we can find upon the subject, and, as it so completely covers the whole ground with regard to habeas corpus proceedings, we refer the reader to that case. In re Foye, 21 Wash. 250, 57 Pac. 825, In re Baker, 21 Wash. 259, 57 Pac. 827, and In re Sylvester, 21 Wash. 263, 57 Pac. 829, are also cases in which the nature of the proceedings, the right of appeal, and kindred questions are discussed. Moreover, section 4510, Rev. St. 1898, defines a criminal action thus: "The proceedings by which a person charged with a public offense is accused and brought to trial and punishment, is known as a criminal action." The section following provides that such actions shall be prosecuted in the name of the state of Utah as a party against the person charged with the offense, who, the next section provides, shall be designated as defendant. The person charged, therefore, is prosecuted by and in the name of the state. While in some proceedings, in their nature civil, the name of the state may also be used, this in habeas corpus proceedings, as we hope to make clear, is wholly unnecessary and of no importance.

Having thus established that a proceeding in habeas corpus is civil, what is its character under our system of procedure? Is it a suit, an action, or may it be classed as a special proceeding? It seems to us that there can be no doubt that it belongs to what, under the Code, are termed "special proceedings." This is also the conclusion reached by the courts who decided the cases above cited, as well as the conclusion reached by many other courts. The conclusion is reinforced by the fact that the writ of habeas corpus, well known to the common law, did not receive the respect from the common-law courts its importance merited, and for that reason it was made more effective in the reign of Charles II by what is known as the "Habeas Corpus Act." Since then, to a large extent, it has been and now is regulated by statute. 21 Cyc. 283. In modern times habeas corpus may, therefore, be considered as a statutory proceeding, although it had its origin in the common law. Under the statute it may well be classed as a special proceeding. If it is, who are the parties to such a proceeding? In referring to our Code we find that section 3627, Rev. St. 1898, provides as follows: "The party prosecuting a special proceeding may be known as the plaintiff, and the adverse party as the defendant." Who prosecutes in a habeas corpus proceeding? It is either the person restrained of his liberty, or some one in his behalf. He institutes the proceeding the same as he does any other, without leave from any one. Against whom is it directed? Against the person alone who deprives the applicant of his liberty. We thus have one who complains of some illegal act or acts attributed to another. We thus have a plaintiff. The person against whom the illegal acts are alleged is the defendant. The terms "plaintiff" and "defendant," therefore, are as proper and as applicable in a habeas corpus proceeding as they are in any other special proceeding. The plaintiff seeks to vindicate a legal right. The defendant opposes plaintiff's claims. That both claim under a special law cannot affect the matter one way or another. By section 3303, Rev. St. 1898, it is provided that any party to a judgment may appeal therefrom; that on appeal the party appealing shall be known as appellant and the adverse party as respondent. It also provides that the title of the action or proceeding is not changed by an appeal. From all this it seems clear to us that a proceeding in habeas corpus is civil, that the applicant is the plaintiff and the party who restrains the applicant is the defendant, and that, on appeal, the one who appeals is the appellant, and the other the respondent. From this it follows that in this case no appeal is attempted by the state, but the appeal is taken and prosecuted by the sheriff, C. Frank Emery, the appellant, who, it was claimed in the petition for a writ of habeas corpus, unlawfully restrained the respondent of his liberty. The appeal, therefore, should not be dismissed upon the first ground.

Can the appeal stand as against the second ground urged? It is asserted that the decisions of this court in Mead v. Metcalf, 7 Utah, 103, 25 Pac. 729, and In re Clasby, 3 Utah, 183, 1 Pac. 852, are decisive of this question. It is true that in Mead v. Metcalf this court held that an order or judgment discharging a prisoner upon habeas corpus is not a final judgment from which an appeal will lie; and it was further held in both cases referred to that no appeal is permissible in any event in habeas corpus proceedings. Since those cases were decided the territorial government has been merged into a state government, and the right of an appeal is fixed in the Constitution of the state, which, so far as material here, is found in section 9 of article 8, which provides: "From all final judgments of the district courts, there shall be a right of appeal to the Supreme Court. The appeal shall be upon the record made in the court below, and under such regulations as may be provided by law." The right of appeal, therefore, is a constitutional right, which cannot be interfered with by the Legislature. Under the law in force when the two Utah cases above referred to were decided the statute likewise permitted an appeal from final judgments. If, therefore, a judgment in a certain proceeding was not final under the territorial statute, it would seem that, for the same reasons, it will not be final under the Constitution. In view that the territorial court has directly passed upon the question, and for the reason that the authorities are in hopeless conflict upon the question, we should not, under ordinary circumstances, be inclined to reconsider the question, but would feel constrained to abide by the decisions of the territorial Supreme Court of which this court is the successor. The ruling, however, that a judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding is not final is based in those cases upon the ground that such a judgment is not res adjudicata, and hence does not prevent a further proceeding of the same character in the same court or before the same judge, or in another court, or before another judge having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. This may all be granted; and yet it does not follow that a judgment which does not finally estop a party to it from proceeding again in the same manner is not, for the purpose of an appeal, a final judgment. This has been decided so often that it has become elementary. This court, in a later decision entitled Honerine M. & M. Co. v. Tallerdar Steel P. & T. Co., 30 Utah, 449, 85 Pac. 626, has so held. Mr. Justice Straup, at page 451 of 30 Utah, page 626 of 85 Pac., states the rule in this regard tersely and correctly in the following language: "It is the termination of the particular action which marks the finality of the judgment. A decision which terminates the suit, or puts the case out of court without an adjudication on the merits, is nevertheless a final judgment." This doctrine is supported by many cases, some of which are cited by Mr. Justice Straup and need not again be cited here. If this were not so, it would not be permitted to appeal from a judgment granting an involuntary nonsuit, because the judgment in such a case does not estop the plaintiff from prosecuting another action for the same cause of action. The test of finality for the purpose of an appeal, therefore, is not necessarily whether the whole matter involved in the action is concluded, but whether the particular proceeding or action is terminated by the judgment. If it is, and, in order to proceed farther with regard to the same subject-matter, a new action or proceeding must be commenced, then, as a general rule, the judgment which ends the particular action or proceeding is final for the purposes of an appeal, if an appeal is permissible at all. Both of the Utah cases referred to have thus been greatly weakened with regard to the doctrine of finality of judgments by what is said in the Honerine Case. Nor can the doctrine, as it is stated to be in the Honerine Case, be successfully assailed. We are constrained to hold therefore that in a habeas corpus proceeding the judgment of the court which either remands or discharges the petitioner is a final judgment, notwithstanding the fact that another similar proceeding may be commenced by the petitioner if he elects to do so. If this conclusion be sound, then it would seem logically to follow that, under our Constitution, where the right of appeal is given from all final judgments, this court has no power to deny the right, but must permit the exercise thereof in all cases and proceedings.

It is argued that, although the language of a constitutional provision or a statute be such as would authorize or confer the right of appeal generally, in view that the policy of the law with regard to appeals in habeas corpus proceedings is opposed to the exercise of the right, therefore appeals in such proceedings should not be permitted by the courts under general provisions, but only when the right to an appeal is given by a special statute or by constitutional provision. This argument is based upon the theory that to permit appeals in habeas corpus proceedings destroys the effectiveness of the remedy; that it may delay the party in obtaining his liberty, the very thing that by habeas corpus was intended to be speedily restored to him. It is urged that, if appeals are permitted, then the judgment of the court discharging the prisoner must be suspended, and the very purpose of the writ is defeated. This argument or conclusion, to our minds, assumes that to follow which does not follow. Without an express statutory provision to that effect, an appeal does not of its own force suspend the judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding. 21 Cyc. pp. 338-341. Even in those states where an express right of an appeal is given by statute, the courts have held that the taking of an appeal does not suspend the judgment. State v. Kirkpatrick, 54 Iowa, 373, 6 N. W. 588.

But this question is not involved in this case, and we therefore express no opinion upon it, except to suggest that such a result does not necessarily follow from the allowance of an appeal, and therefore that it is not a conclusive reason or argument against the allowance of appeals in such proceedings. Nor is the further reason that a habeas corpus proceeding may be commenced in this court and thus make an appeal unnecessary of much force. If this reason applies to habeas corpus proceedings, it should also apply to proceedings of mandamus, prohibition, certiorari, and quo warranto, all of which may be originally commenced in this court. We think no one would seriously contend that for that reason no appeal should be permitted to this court from the judgment of the district court entered in any one of the special proceedings referred to. But let us examine a little farther into the assumption that an appeal in effect would destroy the effectiveness of the writ of habeas corpus under our law as it is now in force. For this purpose, it must be conceded that, if a judgment of discharge is not final, then a judgment refusing a discharge and remanding the prisoner cannot be so. What, then, would be the result, in view of our present law upon the subject of habeas corpus proceedings? This law has been materially changed since the decisions of Mead v. Metcalf and In re Clabby were announced. Section 1069, Rev. St. 1898, which took effect on January 1, 1898, with regard to what the petition in a habeas corpus proceeding must contain, in substance provides that it must state the name of the person who detains the petitioner and the place where detained; the cause of restraint, and that it is illegal; that the legality of the imprisonment has not already been adjudged upon a prior proceeding of the same character, and whether the application for the writ has been before made to and refused by any court or judge, and, if so, to attach a copy of the petition and the reasons of the refusal to the petition. Section 1077 provides that any court or judge disallowing a writ must append his reasons therefor to the petition, and return both to the applicant. The petition must be verified. The statements that the legality of the petition has not been already adjudicated and the refusal of a former application are both essential, and without them the petition does not contain the necessary statements authorizing the issuance of the writ. If this be so, what is the natural effect of such statements? As it seems to us, it naturally must result in imposing restrictions upon petitioner in making successive applications. Is it not manifest that, if a petition is presented to one court or judge which shows upon its face that another court or judge of the same or higher grade has already passed upon the identical questions involved, in nine out of ten cases the court or judge would therefore decline to issue a new writ, or, if he did, would likely follow the judgment in the prior case unless something new was made to appear? This in its practical effect, in most cases, would result in but one application. If no right of appeal is given, we would thus have the very thing which, in the minds of some of the courts, has been in the way of an appeal also stand in the way of successive applications. But there are still other reasons. Suppose a person applies for a writ which is allowed, and a hearing had upon it. Upon the hearing the court refuses a discharge from the restraint, regardless of what the cause of such restraint may be. To this the court in the case of Mead v. Metcalf and some of the other courts make answer that the applicant for the writ can apply again; that he may even come to this court and make a new application, and he may continue this until he finds some court or judge who feels more favorably inclined to grant his request. But such an applicant and all of his witnesses may be hundreds of miles distant from this court, and, in view of our judicial districts being large, may be a great distance from any other judge or court. Moreover, he may have presented his whole case in which the facts are entirely undisputed, and the whole question may be one of law merely. Must he, then, in order to obtain the judgment of this court upon the law, institute a new proceeding somewhere, and produce all of his witnesses or take their testimony by the expensive and often unsatisfactory method of depositions, when he already has it in another form. May not the inconvenience and costs thus entailed upon him result in preventing another application upon the same state of facts when by a simple appeal with a bill of exceptions containing the evidence and ruling of the court he can obtain the judgment of this court with respect to the legality of his detention? This, it seems to us, is strictly in furtherance of the policy of the law which aims to make the writ effective, and the final result to be gained by it as speedy as possible. Upon the other hand, let us assume a case where the person charged with a crime makes the application and is given a hearing on which the district court discharges him upon a point of law. The officer having him in charge may have in his custody a number of persons charged or contemplated to be charged with the same or some other crime, but all involving the same question of law. He thinks the district court erred in his decision in discharging the first applicant. If there is no appeal, the judgment of the district court granting the discharge certainly is final so far as that charge is concerned, and the officer of the law cannot proceed farther with that or any other case involving the same legal questions, unless he could have the law distinctly and authoritatively settled by the highest court. If this court agrees with the district court, no one is or can be harmed. If, upon the other hand, it does not so agree, and holds that, under the law, the detention was just and proper, then, again, no one is legally injured. It needs no argument that it is just as important to enforce the laws against criminals as it is to enforce them in favor of liberty and against illegal restraint. It is by a strict enforcement of all the laws that liberty is best protected. In view of the foregoing, is it not reasonably certain that the exercise of the right of appeal is not against the policy of the law which aims at making the writ of habeas corpus effective? And it in no way retards the speedy determination of the application. The argument or reason, therefore, falls that an appeal should not be allowed in such proceedings. If an appeal is in harmony with the ultimate object and purpose of the writ, and tends to facilitate, rather than hinder, both the applicant and the officers of the law in establishing legal rights, is there any reason left why a court should resort to nice distinctions and strained constructions to avoid appeals in such proceedings? In what we have said we do not wish to be understood as holding that an appeal lies from a mere refusal to grant the writ. Many courts where the right of appeal is expressly given by statute deny the right of an appeal from a mere refusal to issue a writ. But upon this question, like upon nearly all others in habeas corpus proceedings, the courts differ. 21 Cyc. 340, notes 31, 33. As the question is not involved in this case, however, we express no opinion upon it. We think the question with regard to appeals in habeas corpus proceedings, in view of the provisions of law in force in this state, should be treated precisely as such a question would be treated with respect to all other actions or proceedings. In view of what we have said, and for the reasons that a departure from the doctrine announced in Mead v. Metcalf and In re Clasby will in no way interfere with, or in any way involve, property rights, nor disturb any rights that could have been acquired thereunder, we have less hesitancy in overruling those cases in so far as the conclusions herein reached are in conflict with them. It follows, therefore, that the motion to dismiss must be denied.

This brings us to the merits of the case. It appears from the record and judgment of the district court that the respondent was discharged upon the sole ground that, in the opinion of the court, the evidence adduced at the preliminary hearing was insufficient to show probable cause to believe that respondent was guilty of the crime charged. It is clear, therefore that the district court undertook to determine from the evidence whether there was probable cause or not. Did the court have the legal right to do this in a habeas corpus proceeding? Upon this question, again, the courts are not in harmony. As a general rule, the courts hold that on habeas corpus, in the absence of a statute conferring the right, the courts cannot go into the evidence adduced before the magistrate, but must confine the inquiry to questions of jurisdiction, and, if it be found that the magistrate had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person of the defendant, that the complaint stated an offense and a hearing was had upon the charge and the mittimus under which the accused is held is regular, and that the magistrate acted within his jurisdiction, then the court may not discharge the prisoner. Some courts, under statutory provisions, have held that the court may, on habeas corpus, determine whether the accused should be held upon the evidence, and may even hear additional evidence. A distinction is also made with regard to the time an application for the writ of habeas corpus is made. If made before an indictment is returned, the powers of the court to examine into the evidence are greater than after indictment found. 21 Cyc. pp. 324-327, where the authorities are collected, and the different views of the courts stated in the notes. The diversity of opinion is, however, more apparent than real. It arises out of the different statutory provisions applicable to habeas corpus proceedings. In habeas corpus proceedings instituted for the purpose of voiding a commitment issued by an examining magistrate many states have enacted statutes which enlarge the powers of the judges or courts in passing upon the legality of the commitment. It is under such statutes that courts sometimes examine into the facts adduced before the magistrate and the preliminary examination held by him for the purpose of determining whether the evidence is sufficient to warrant the holding of the accused who has been committed by the magistrate into the custody of the officer. In the absence of such special statutes, however, the courts on habeas corpus have not the power to review the evidence heard by the magistrate, and pass upon its sufficiency to authorize the holding of the accused. The controlling principles are well stated by Judge Coolidge in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 495, where he says: "In the great anxiety on the part of our Legislatures to make the most ample provisions for speedy relief from unlawful confinement, authority to issue the writ of habeas corpus has been conferred upon inferior judicial officers, who make use of it sometimes as if it were a writ of error, under which they might correct the errors and irregularities of other judges and courts, whatever their relative jurisdiction and dignity. Any such employment of the writ is an abuse. Where a party who is in confinement under judicial process is brought up on habeas corpus, the court or judge before whom he is returned will inquire: (1) Whether the court or officer issuing the process under which he is detained had jurisdiction of the case, and has acted within that jurisdiction in issuing such process. If so, mere irregularities or errors of judgment in the exercise of that jurisdiction must be disregarded on this writ, and must be corrected either by the court issuing the process, or on regular appellate proceedings. (2) If the process is not void for want of jurisdiction, the further inquiry will be made, whether, by law, the case is bailable, and, if so, bail will be taken if the party offers it; otherwise he will be remanded to the proper custody." The writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the purpose of an appeal or writ of review, unless some statute specially authorizes this to be done. But, even when authorized by statute, such review must be strictly limited to the special proceeding to which the statute applies. This is well illustrated by the decisions emanating from the same courts in habeas corpus proceedings. In California, where there is a special statute authorizing the courts on habeas corpus to determine whether or not there is probable cause to commit the accused on preliminary hearing by the magistrate, the Supreme Court of California hold that the courts on habeas corpus may examine into the facts to determine whether there is any evidence that justifies the findings of probable cause by the magistrate. People v. Smith, 1 Cal. 9. Similar holdings based upon similar statutes are found in State v. Hayden, 35 Minn. 283, 28 N. W. 659, and other cases; but the authority to do this comes from the statute, and, where there is no statutory provision, the courts do not extend the scope of the investigation on habeas corpus so as to make the proceeding in effect one of review. This is again illustrated by the decisions of the same courts, to which we have already referred, in the following cases: State v. Kinmore, 54 Minn. 135, 55 N. W. 830, 40 Am. St. Rep. 303; Ex parte Miller, 82 Cal. 454, 22 Pac. 1113. Where the common law is in force, or under statutes which are in effect merely declaratory of the common law, the courts, on habeas corpus, may not extend the investigation beyond jurisdictional matters. The following cases, among a large number that might be cited, clearly state the rule: Turner v. Conkey, 132 Ind. 248, 31 N. E. 777, 17 L. R. A. 509, 32 Am. St. Rep. 251; State v. Kinmore, 54 Minn. 135, 55 N. W. 830, 40 Am. St. Rep. 305; Smith v. Clausmeyer, 136 Ind. 105, 35 N. E. 904, 43 Am. St. Rep. 311; Horn-er v. United States, 143 U. S. 570-578, 12 Sup. Ct. 522, 36 L. Ed. 268; Young v. Fain, 121 Ga. 737, 49 S. E. 731; Ex parte Perdue, 58 Ark. 285, 24 S. W. 423; Merriman v. Morgan, 7 Or. 69. There is no statutory authority in this state whereby a court or judge, on habeas corpus, may review the evidence adduced before a magistrate in support of a criminal charge for the purpose of determining whether the evidence was either competent or sufficient to warrant the magistrate in holding the accused for trial to the district court and in committing him for that purpose. The proceedings had before the magistrate in this case are not attacked upon jurisdictional grounds. There was a proper complaint which charged an offense. The magistrate had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of the accused. A hearing was had. Witnesses were sworn, and testified both for the state and the accused, and their testimony was reduced to writing. All this was in compliance with the law of this state. The commitment papers are not attacked. In addition to the foregoing, the transcript of all the proceedings had before the magistrate discloses that the law had been complied with in every particular. This being so, the district court who heard the habeas corpus proceeding had no authority to review the evidence heard by the magistrate for the purpose of determining its sufficiency to support the judgment or order entered by him in holding the accused to answer to the district court. In order to justify the district court to so review the evidence would require that the writ of habeas corpus be transformed to a writ of review, which, as Judge Cooley well says, would be an abuse of the writ. It is not the province of a court or judge, on habeas corpus, to determine whether in his judgment the evidence is sufficient to warrant the binding over of the accused or not. The only question in such a proceeding is: Is the accused illegally restrained of his liberty? The magistrate may err in his judgment both with regard to the competency and the sufficiency of the evidence, but this alone does not make the restraint illegal. It would at most make it erroneous. Errors must be cured by an appeal or in proceedings provided by law and instituted for that purpose.

But the district court in this proceeding went beyond what the authorities justify even in those states where there are special statutes permitting courts on habeas corpus to review the findings of the magistrate made on preliminary examinations. In those states the general rule is that the court or judge on habeas corpus may examine into the evidence for the purpose only of determining whether there is any legal evidence which fairly tends to support the findings and order of the magistrate. State v. Hayden, supra; United States v. Greene (D. C.) 108 Fed. 818; In re Henry, 13 Misc. Rep. 734, 35 N. Y. Supp. 210; State v. Beaverstad, 12 N. D. 527, 97 N. W. 548; Ex parte Becker, 86 Cal. 402, 25 Pac. 9. The evidence in the record directly and positively connects the respondent with the shooting which it is claimed resulted in the death of the person named in the complaint filed with the magistrate. This being so, the district court was not authorized to pass upon the competency of the evidence in a habeas corpus proceeding. In view of the statutes of this state governing preliminary examinations and the fundamental principles underlying proceedings in habeas corpus, we are constrained to hold that where the record, certified to by the magistrate, affirmatively shows what we have stated the record in this case discloses, and there is no attack upon the truthfulness of the facts recited in the record, the court is powerless to go behind the judgment of the magistrate. If, however, the accused should allege and offer to prove that the magistrate did not in fact hear any evidence in support of the charge, and the accused did not, with the consent of the state, waive an examination, and that the record showing the proceedings of the magistrate is false, then the court or judge, on habeas corpus proceeding, should hear the evidence in that regard; and, if he finds that there was no preliminary examination or hearing by the magistrate, the accused should be discharged.

The order or judgment of the district court discharging the respondent therefore should be, and accordingly is, reversed.

JONES v. BLYTHE.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 30, 1908.)

1. ANIMALS—RUNNING AT LARGE—FENCE LAWS.

Though under Rev. St. 1898, § 20, providing that if sheep, etc., shall trespass on the premises of any person, except where such premises are not inclosed by a lawful fence in counties in which a fence is required by law, the party aggrieved may recover damages by action or by distraining, as therein provided, an owner of sheep is not liable for damages resulting from an unintentional trespass on uninclosed lands in a county in which a fence law is in force, yet he is liable where he intentionally drives his sheep on such land.

2. SAME—TRESPASSING ANIMALS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in an action for damages caused by sheep trespassing on premises held to show that the owner of the sheep, after being notified to keep them off the premises, willfully drove them thereon and kept them there till they had eaten and destroyed much of the grass.*

Appeal from District Court, Box Elder County; W. W. Maughan, Judge.

Action by William Jones against John Blythe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Maginnis & Corn, for appellant. J. D. Call, for respondent.

McCARTY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered in the district court of Box Elder county in favor of plaintiff for damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's sheep trespassing upon and eating off and destroying the grass and herbage upon certain lands of plaintiff situated in the northwestern part of Box Elder county, this state. The land is described in the complaint as follows: "All of sections 29, 30, 31, and 32, township 14 N., of range 17 W., Salt Lake Meridian"—and is situated in what is known as "Cotton Thomas Basin." This basin has an area of about 25 or 30 square miles, and is surrounded by mountains. At the time of the alleged trespass the land was partly inclosed by a fence, which extended along the eastern and northern boundary thereof. A few rods south of the southern boundary there was a line of fence posts extending east and west along the south side of the premises. There was no fence along the western line or boundary of the land. The premises were covered with different kinds of grass, brush, and herbage, upon which cattle and other animals fed and browsed. This land was used by plaintiff for grazing purposes, and during the summer season of each year he pastured thereon several hundred head of cattle. The complaint contains two causes of action. In the first cause of action it is alleged that the damage was caused between the 1st day of June and the 11th day of July, 1906; and in the second cause of action it is alleged that the trespass complained of was committed between the 1st day of June and the 15th day of July, 1905. The particular acts of trespass relied on for recovery in the first cause of action are alleged in the complaint as follows: "That at divers times, and upon each and every day between the dates herein alleged, the defendant, his agents, and employes, willfully trespassed upon said land by driving in and upon said land a large number of sheep, to wit, about 6,000 head, and maintained camps and sheep beds, and herded said sheep thereon for and during all of said period of time, * * * and as a result thereof the said sheep ate, browsed, killed, and destroyed the grass, verdure, underbrush, and a large number of small trees growing on said land." It is further alleged that "plaintiff warned said defendant against driving and herding his said sheep upon said real estate, or permitting them to go thereon, and that defendant has threatened and still threatens to and will use force and violence against plaintiff if he attempts to keep said sheep from said premises." The allegations describing the alleged trespass are substantially the same in both causes of action. Defendant answered, and specifically denied each and every material allegation of the complaint, and as a further defense pleaded an ordinance entitled "An ordinance defining a lawful fence in Box Elder county, state of Utah," which ordinance, the record shows, was duly and regularly passed by the board of county commissioners of Box Elder county, and was at the time of the alleged trespass in full force and effect.

The evidence, without conflict, shows that plaintiff, long prior to the alleged trespass, notified defendant to keep off the land in question, and not to herd or bed his sheep thereon. On this point defendant testified in part as follows: "I remember a conversation with Mr. Jones [plaintiff and respondent herein]. It was about five or six years ago. He came and told me the sheep were on his land, and wanted me to keep them off. * * * He asked me if I would keep them off. I said, 'No,' that I would not; that he was trying to control too much country; that I did not believe he could take up the land in the shape he said he was doing." And again the defendant testified: "At the time charged that my sheep were upon this land I had no means of knowing where the sections were, except by the posts and what fencing there was there." That the trespass was willful and intentional is shown by the testimony of defendant's witness R. C. Reid, who testified in part as follows: "I have been Mr. Blythe's [defendant's] foreman for two years. Mr. Rice, Mr. Bronson, and Jess Jones came to the camp and asked me if I intended to run on those four sections of Jones'. * * * I told them that I intended to run upon the basin there. They asked me if I did not know what Jones claimed, and I said I knew he claimed inside of the posts, and that I was going to run in there, leaving a place for his horses. * * * Mr. Blythe told me to run in the basin there; * * * that he didn't think Jones had any land in there; and that he intended to feed in there." On cross-examination the witness stated that he was on the four sections of land in question with defendant's sheep in June, July, and August of 1906; that on one occasion two camps or beds were maintained there continuously for six days; and that the sheep could "go over in two days and take all the feed off pretty close." To the question, "You went on intentionally, did you?" he answered, "I undoubtedly did, because I told the men to let the sheep feed up through there." As to the effect the herding and bedding of the sheep on the premises had on the grass and other vegetation growing thereon, Mr. Rice, who had charge of plaintiff's cattle and the land in question at the time of the trespasses complained of, testified (and his testimony is not denied): "They [referring to defendant's sheep] were on the biggest part of the four sections. * * * Before they went on, the grass was good; and when they went off, the roots were all trampled down. * * * The whole country there, for at least three-quarters of a mile square, looked as though it had been harrowed when they left." The undisputed evidence also shows that cattle will not graze or feed on the same range where sheep in large numbers are kept and herded, and that when defendant drove his sheep on the land in question many of plaintiff's cattle left the premises. As stated by some of the witnesses: "The cattle commenced leaving just as soon as the sheep went on."

Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to give the following instruction: "It appears by the uncontradicted testimony in the case that at the time of the alleged trespass plaintiff's land was not inclosed by a lawful fence under the statutes of this state, and the jury are instructed to find the issues for the defendant." Error is also alleged because of the court's refusal to give other instructions asked for by appellant. As these additional requests involved only the same questions (presented in a different form) as are involved in the instruction above set out, we deem it unnecessary to further refer to them. The decisive question in the case is: Can an owner of live stock, in localities where there is a fence law in force, deliberately and intentionally invade the uninclosed lands of another, knowing such lands to belong to another, and pasture his stock thereon, without incurring liability for the damage caused thereby? Section 20, Rev. St. 1898, so far as material here, provides: "If any neat cattle, * * * sheep or swine shall trespass or do damage upon the premises of any person, except in cases where such premises are not inclosed by a lawful fence in counties where a fence is required by law, the party aggrieved, whether he be the owner or the occupant of such premises, may recover damages by an action at law against the owner of the trespassing animals, or by distraining and impounding said animals in the manner provided herein."

We think it is plain that the Legislature, by this statute, intended to take away all remedy by suit or impounding for damages caused by the stock of one party straying upon the uninclosed lands of another in counties where a fence law is required; and while it is true that, under the statute referred to, appellant would not have been liable for damages caused by an involuntary or inadvertent intrusion of his sheep upon the lands in question, the statute gave him no right to deliberately and intentionally drive his sheep, or to so direct their movement as to cause them to go, upon the lands in question, and keep them there against the will of the respondent. In other words, while the statute withholds from the owner of uninclosed lands, in counties where there is a fence law in force, the right to impound and hold for damages animals trespassing upon such lands, it certainly does not deprive the owner of the right to remove the trespassing animals therefrom; hence it necessarily follows that the owner may, by suit, collect damages for a willful and malicious trespass, such as the evidence conclusively shows was committed in this case. This same question was involved in the case of Lazarus v. Phelps, 152 U. S. 81, 14 Sup. Ct. 477, 38 L. Ed. 363. The court, in construing a Texas statute similar to the statute under consideration, said: "The object of the statute above cited is manifest. As there are, or were, in the state of Texas, as well as in the newer states of the West generally, vast areas of land over which, so long as the government owned them, cattle had been permitted to roam at will for pasturage, it was not thought proper, as the land was gradually taken up by individual proprietors, to change the custom of the country in that particular, and oblige cattle owners to incur the heavy expense of fencing their land, or be held as trespassers by reason of their cattle accidentally straying upon the land of others. It could never have been intended, however, to authorize cattle owners deliberately to take possession of such lands and pasture their cattle upon them without making compensation, particularly if this were done against the will of the owner, or under such circumstances as to show a deliberate intent to obtain the benefit of another's pasturage. In other words, the trespass authorized, or condoned, was an accidental trespass caused by straying cattle." In the course of the opinion the court quotes with approval the case of St. Louis Cattle Co. v. Vaught, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 388, 390, 20 S. W. 855, 856, wherein it is said: "This doctrine, however, does not authorize the owner of cattle by affirmative conduct on his part to appropriate the use of such lands to his own benefit. He will not be permitted thus to ignore the truth that every one is entitled to the exclusive enjoyment of his own property. * * * The use and enjoyment of the property under such circumstances [by the wrongdoer] imports necessarily the idea of liability." In 2 Cyc. 398, the rule is tersely, and, as we think, correctly, stated in the following language: "The owner of cattle who willfully turns them onto land of another without his consent is liable, without regard to the question of fences." The following authorities also declare the same doctrine: 12 A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1045; Harrison v. Admanson, 76 Iowa, 337, 41 N. W. 34; Delaney v. Erickson, 11 Neb. 533, 10 N. W. 451; Powers v. Kindt, 13 Kan. 74; Logan v. Gedney, 38 Cal. 579; Norton v. Young, 6 Colo. App. 187, 40 Pac. 156.

The contention that the trespasses complained of were not willful and intentional is not tenable, for the evidence shows conclusively that respondent and his employees on several occasions before the trespasses were committed notified appellant to keep his sheep off the premises in question, and that appellant in utter disregard of the notices so given him willfully and purposely drove his sheep on said premises, and kept, bedded, and pastured them there until they had eaten and destroyed much of the grass and herbage growing thereon. In fact, we think it may be fairly said that because of these willful and intentional intrusions by appellant with his sheep respondent was thereby, in effect, temporarily dispossessed of a large portion of his land. Hence it is idle for counsel to contend that the trespasses were accidental or in any sense involuntary.

Appellant cites and relies upon the case of Buford et al. v. Houtz et al., 5 Utah, 591, 18 Pac. 633; Id., 133 U. S. 820, 10 Sup. Ct. 305, 33 L. Ed. 618, in support of his contention that respondent, under the facts as disclosed by the record, is not entitled to recover, and that the judgment appealed from should be reversed. In that case the plaintiffs brought suit to enjoin the defendants from grazing their sheep on certain sections of arid land, barren, unimproved, and uninclosed, which plaintiffs had purchased from the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The Supreme Court of the United States, in its statement of facts in the case, observes: "These lands were alternate sections of odd numbers according to the congressional grant to the railroad company, and they with the other tracts mentioned in the plaintiffs' bill are said to amount to over 350,000 acres. * * * If we look at the condition of the ownership of these lands, on which the plaintiffs rely for relief, we are still more impressed with the injustice of this attempt. A calculation of the area from which it is proposed to exclude the defendants by this injunction, under the allegation that it is 40 miles in one direction and 36 in another, shows that it embraces 1,440 square miles, or 921,000 acres, all of which, as averred by the bill, is uninclosed and unoccupied, except for grazing purposes. Of this 921,000 acres of land the plaintiffs only assert title to 350,000 acres; that is to say, being the owners of one-third of this entire body of land, which ownership attaches to different sections and quarter sections scattered through the whole body of it, they propose, by excluding the defendants to obtain a monopoly of the whole tract, while two-thirds of it is public land belonging to the United States, in which the right of all parties to use it for grazing purposes, if any such right exists, is equal. The equity of this proceeding is something which we are not able to perceive. It seems to be founded upon the proposition that while they, as the owners of the 350,000 acres thus scattered through the whole area, are to be permitted for that reason to exercise the right of grazing their own cattle upon all the land embraced within these 1,440 square miles, the defendants cannot be permitted to use even the lands belonging to the United States, because in doing this their cattle will trespass upon the uninclosed lands of plaintiffs."

It will thus be observed that there is a radical difference between the facts in that case and the facts in the case at bar. The land described in the complaint in this action is in one tract, and the respondent, by excluding the sheep and cattle of other parties therefrom, does not acquire a monopoly of the use of the public lands adjacent thereto for grazing purposes; nor does he thereby deter or in any way hinder other parties from pasturing their flocks and herds upon the public domain surrounding and in the vicinity of the premises in question. Therefore this case presents an entirely different question of law from the one involved in the case of Buford et al. v. Houtz et al., supra, and hence is not governed by the rule announced in that case.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

In re BREEN. (No. 1,739.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Feb. 19, 1908.)

1. CONTEMPT — PUBLICATIONS RELATING TO COURTS—CRITICISMS OF OPINIONS.

One may criticize an opinion of a court, take issue with it on its conclusions of law, or question its conception of the facts, so long as his criticisms are made in good faith and in ordinarily respectful language, and when not designed to willfully or maliciously misrepresent the position of the court, or tend to bring it into disrepute, or lessen the respect due the authority to which a court is entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Contempt, § 14.]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—OBLIGATION OF ATTORNEYS.

It is the duty of an attorney to observe the rules of courteous demeanor in open court, and to abstain out of court from all insulting language and offensive conduct towards the judges personally for their judicial acts, and for a breach of this duty an attorney may be suspended or disbarred.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attorney and Client, §§ 59, 60.]

3. SAME—POWER OF COURTS.

Under Comp. Laws, § 2625, authorizing the removal of an attorney by the Supreme Court for misconduct in office, etc., as well as independent of the statute, the Supreme Court has control over attorneys, and may suspend or disbar them for good cause shown, and, where an attorney of the Supreme Court unwarrantedly and without legal cause maligns a court of the state, the Supreme Court on proper showing may disbar him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attorney and Client, § 49.]

4. SAME.

The language of an attorney while acting in his capacity as district judge, but not made in any judicial proceeding pending before him, that a statement in an opinion of the Supreme Court that the evidence in a homicide case showed that accused at the time he killed decedent intended to kill another was like other assertions made in an "abnormally strange document" (referring to the opinion), and was neither fair to the prosecuting attorney nor to the district court, and whether or not it was made for the purpose of bolstering up a decision which was neither founded on law nor supported by fact, and was a palpable reversal of a case which for 40 years had been the accepted law in the state, it was "highly reprehensible for its author or authors to have made it * * * reprehensible if the court knew what it was doing, pitiful if it did not," was not within the province of legitimate criticism, but was an unwarranted attack on the court, warranting the disbarment of the attorney, though he claimed that he did not intend any disrespect to the court, and though he claimed that he was not aware that the prosecuting attorney in his argument in the Supreme Court had stated that the evidence in the case showed that accused at the time of the killing of decedent intended to kill another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Attorney and Client, §§ 59, 60.]

Proceedings for the disbarment of Peter Breen, an attorney. Judgment of disbarment awarded.

R. C. Stoddard, Atty. Gen., for the State. Campbell, Metson & Brown, Campbell, Metson, Drew, Oatman & MacKenzie, W. B. Pittman, Key Pittman, Charles Lewers, and Bartlett & Thatcher, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the case of the State of Nevada v. Patrick Dwyer, 29 Nev. —, 91 Pac. 305, on appeal to this court from a conviction of murder in the first degree and sentence of death, the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial were reversed on the 12th day of August, 1907. The reversal was upon the sole ground that the trial court erred in not granting defendant's motion for a change of venue. The opinion was a lengthy one, written for the court by Norcross, J.; the full bench concurring. During the course of the opinion the following statement was made: "The theory of the state, if we understand it, was that the defendant killed Williams by mistake, thinking the latter was one O'Brien, a man with whom defendant had had trouble during the day over a prostitute." It will appear from an examination of the opinion in the case that this statement quoted was only an incidental observation of what this court understood was the fact, and was not the statement of anything in any way deemed essential to the determination of the question upon which the case was decided. The statement quoted, however, was in strict accordance with the position taken in the brief of the Attorney General and in the oral argument of A. J. Maestretti, district attorney of Lander county, upon the hearing of the appeal; it being contended in this court that certain testimony, objected to by defendant's counsel, was admissible upon this theory. The testimony itself, introduced by District Attorney Maestretti in the state's case in chief, showing the quarrel between Dwyer and O'Brien on the same day and just before the killing of Williams, and that Dwyer and O'Brien threatened to kill each other on sight, was such as to suggest the theory of mistake, even if such theory had not been argued to this court, and apparently was admissible on the state's case in chief only on this hypothesis as tending to show the motive and purpose of the shooting. The record in the Dwyer Case, however, does not show that counsel in the district court declared it to be the theory of the state that Dwyer killed Williams through mistake, and the answer of District Attorney Maestretti sets up that that was not his theory at the trial, that he offered evidence as to the trouble with O'Brien to show the state of mind of defendant at the time, although as a matter of fact he admits that the only inference to be drawn from the record is that Dwyer killed Williams by mistake, which is in accordance with his own belief. In the oral argument in this court on the appeal in the case of State v. Dwyer, following the point made by the Attorney General in his brief, District Attorney Maestretti made the following statement: "There is one point I did not intend to touch upon, but I have been requested to do so, and in examining the record the court will find, and I suppose that is the reason the objection is taken, that the feeling or intent to take life was not as to Williams, but as to O'Brien, and, that the killing of Williams, it will be discovered by this court, must have been an accident, that Dwyer meant to get O'Brien, and not Williams, and upon that point we have collected a few authorities which we wish to call to the attention of this court. Jackson v. State, 106 Ala. 12, 17 South. 333; McGehee v. State, 62 Miss. 772, 52 Am. Rep. 209; People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141; 21 Am. Encyc. of Law, 104, 105." After the time had elapsed for the filing of a petition for a rehearing, and no such petition being filed, remittitur was issued. On the 13th day of September, 1907, the defendant was brought before the trial court, and the order of this court directing a change of venue, for the purpose of a new trial, carried out. After the order for a change of venue had been made, the said A. J. Maestretti, Esq., district attorney of Lander county, made the following statement in open court: "If it pleases the court at this time, I wish to rise to the question of privilege in relation to a statement made in the disposition of this case, wherein it was reversed in the Supreme Court, and that is this: In its decision the Supreme Court has stated in substance that the theory of the prosecution in this case was that Dwyer killed Williams through mistake, while looking for a man named O'Brien, with whom the defendant had had trouble during the day over a prostitute. I wish to state at this time that that is absolutely not the fact; further, that there is nothing in the records from the first page to the last which suggests or would warrant the Supreme Court in making such a statement in its decision, and where anything is shown on that record upon which the Supreme Court renders such a decision is beyond my understanding." Upon the conclusion of the foregoing statement of A. J. Maestretti, Esq., the District Judge, respondent herein, made the following statement and order: "I heartily commend you, Mr. District Attorney, for the steps you have taken to set yourself right with the public in a matter so closely connected with your onerous official duties. The statement in the decision of the Supreme Court which you contradict I also know to be absolutely without foundation. You were alone in the case for the state, and you did not conduct its prosecution upon the theory of mistake, nor is there anything in the records to so indicate: The Supreme Court, being the tribunal under our judicial system to which has been given, so to say, the last word, that tribunal, it seems to me, should be exceptionally careful to make no statement having a tendency to unjustly reflect upon or misstate the position of any officer, witness, or person connected with the trial of a cause. So far as it appears to me by the stenographic record of the case on file, the statement in the opinion as written by Judge Norcross, to which objection has been made like some other assertions in the same, abnormally strange document, in my opinion, is neither fair to you as prosecuting officer, nor to this court, and whether or not it was made for the purpose of bolstering up a decision, which, to my mind, is neither founded on law nor supported by fact, and is a palpable reversal of the Millain Case, which for 40 years has been the accepted law in this state pertaining to a change of venue in a criminal case, it was highly reprehensible for its author, or authors, to have made it. I say reprehensible, as a modification I shall say—reprehensible if the court knew what it was doing, pitiful if it did not. Mr. Clerk, you will enter in your minutes the statement of the district attorney side by side with the remarks of the court." The statements of respondent and of A. J. Maestretti so entered in the minutes of the Third judicial district court in and for the county of Lander were published in the press of Lander county and widely copied throughout the state. The attention of this court having been directed to the published account of the proceedings had in the said district court, an order was made directing the Attorney General to investigate the matter, and, if he found the same to be as published in the press reports, to present the facts to this court in the form of an affidavit. Pursuant to such order, the Attorney General filed an affidavit setting forth all of the facts, and upon which affidavit this court ordered citations issued, and directed to respondent herein and to the said A. J. Maestretti to appear and show cause, if any they have, why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of this court and punished accordingly, and, further, that they show cause, if any they have, why they should not be adjudged guilty of conduct unbecoming members of the bar of the state and be disbarred.

Respondent appeared in response to the citation, and filed an answer to the affidavit of the Attorney General. The answer admits that respondent made the statement and order heretofore quoted. As justification therefor, he avers that he was not aware that the Attorney General and said District Attorney Maestretti had taken the position in this court that Dwyer killed Williams by mistake, thinking the latter was one O'Brien, until he was served with a copy of the affidavit of the Attorney General; that, when the district attorney made the statement in the district court copied into the minutes, respondent understood and believed that no such theory had ever been mooted by the prosecution, as none such was ever urged or adopted in said district court; that at said time respondent understood that this court in rendering its opinion and decision, and in using the language therein relative to the theory of the state, referred solely to the proceedings in the district court during the trial of the said Patrick Dwyer, and not to the proceedings in the Supreme Court; that, when said case was on trial in the said district court, respondent believed the case of State v. Millain, 3 Nev. 400, to be the leading authority in this state upon the question of change of venue in a criminal case, and an authority upon the qualification of jurors; that respondent considered his court bound by the Millain Case, and believed that this court had overruled said Millain Case without so stating; that respondent, believing that this court in its opinion "was stating matters and things that happened at the trial in said district court and criticising wrongfully and unjustly the district attorney in his conduct of said trial and the ruling of respondent therein, and being without any information whatsoever of even the word 'mistake' having been uttered in connection with the homicide in the argument before the said Supreme Court, as it had not been before the district court, respondent made the statements and caused them to be entered in the minutes of the district court of Lander county; that, had respondent known of the question of mistake having been mentioned when the remarks of respondent objected to were being made, he would have modified or omitted altogether the last paragraph of said remarks, and now stands ready to obey the order of the court in that respect, not that mistake was ever relied on at the trial in the district court, for such is not the fact, but because the reference to mistake by the Attorney General before the Supreme Court might have misled said court in its ruling; that when defendant read in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the state of Nevada the following language, to wit: "The theory of the state, if we understand it, was that the defendant killed Williams by mistake"—he, the said defendant, felt not only aggrieved, but that an unjust reflection had been cast upon his court, for the reason that under such a theory it would have been the duty of said district court to have given an instruction to the jury upon the law as to what degree of crime, if any, a homicide committed by mistake belonged to, and, as no such instruction was given or asked for, the said defendant, for the time being at least, believed certain of his rulings were not fully considered by said Supreme Court. Defendant with all possible deference claims the right at all times to differ in opinion with the Supreme Court, state, or national, or any of the judges thereof, or their opinions on matters of law, if in his judgment they are fairly the subject of comment, but he does not believe and never has in criticising unfairly any court, judge, or opinion, and will not do so, and defendant denies emphatically that in any action or word of his it was his intention to impugn the integrity, honor, or dignity of the Supreme Court of the state of Nevada or any of its honorable members, and defendant is surprised and disappointed that the affidavit of the Attorney General should contain aught tending to question the respect of defendant for said Supreme Court and the members thereof. Defendant deeply regrets the happening of the incident which has given rise to these proceedings, and regrets that his language used as aforesaid should have received the construction given it in the said affidavit of the honorable Attorney General, for such was not the intention of defendant at the time, and never has been."

The question is presented for determination whether or not the language and order of respondent in question, in view of respondent's answer, is contemptuous or constitutes a breach of the duty which respondent as a member of the bar of this court is bound to observe, and, if it does, whether the offense is sufficiently grave to warrant disbarment or other action upon the part of this court. In fact, the question is presented whether or not the language and order could, in any event, be deemed contemptuous or warrant any action upon the part of this court, upon the theory that they are but criticisms of an opinion of a court which it is the province of any one to indulge in, irrespective of whether such criticisms are just or unjust, or whether or not they are couched in respectful language. The right to criticise an opinion of a court, to take issue with it upon its conclusions as to a legal proposition, or question its conception of the facts, so long as such criticisms are made in good faith, and are in ordinarily decent and respectful language, and are not designed to willfully or maliciously misrepresent the position of the court or tend to bring it into disrepute, or lessen the respect due the authority to which a court of last resort is entitled, cannot be questioned. To attempt to declare any fixed rule marking the boundaries where free speech in reference to court proceedings shall end would be as dangerous as it would be difficult. The right of free speech is one of the greatest guaranties to liberty in a free country like this, even though that right is frequently and in many instances outrageously abused. Of scarcely less, if not of equal, importance, is the maintenance of respect for the judicial tribunals, which are the arbiters of questions involving the lives, liberties, and property of the people. The duty and power is imposed upon the courts to protect their good name against illfounded and unwarranted attack, the effect of which would be to bring the court unjustly into public contempt and ridicule, and thus impair the respect due to its authority. While it is the duty of all to protect the courts against unwarranted attack, that duty and obligation rests especially upon the members of the bar and other officers of the court. It would be foolish, as well as useless, for any one to contend that the very highest courts do not make mistakes. Courts themselves prove this by overruling previous decisions. The rules of this court, as in the case of all appellate courts, provide that after a decision is rendered the losing party has the right of petition for rehearing in order to call the court's attention to what is deemed a misconception of the case or an erroneous view of the law. This court has frequently granted rehearings, and there are several instances where the previous decision was either modified or a contrary view of the law taken in the final decision. It is appropriate here to say that, if the district attorney in the Dwyer Case believed that this court had misconceived the facts of the case or misapplied the law in any material particular, the way was open to him, and it was his duty to have sought to have the same corrected upon petition for rehearing. If the trial judge observed that a mistake had been made either in fact or law, or thought that the opinion was so framed as to put his court in a false light, a suggestion from him to counsel would doubtless cause the matter to be properly presented to the court and the same investigated, and, if error was found to have been made, it would be corrected. Neither the district judge nor the district attorney saw fit to pursue such a course. This would be, at least, a more ethical procedure than to wait until opportunity to correct an error had passed, and then abuse the court for such alleged error. Even if this court had fallen into error in the statement which it incidentally made regarding what it understood to be the state's theory of the case, we cannot see any occasion for such strictures as those contained in respondent's statement, especially as no ruling was based thereon. Even if counsel for the state had not specifically argued in this court the theory of mistake, the expression might have been made, as we have before stated, very naturally in view of the testimony in reference to the quarrel between Dwyer and O'Brien, and Dwyer searching for O'Brien just previous to the shooting; the record being silent as to any positive statement negating the theory of mistake, and no contention ever having been made either in this or the Dwyer proceeding that this evidence was admissible upon any other theory.

What respondent said with regard to the Dwyer Case being a reversal of the Millain Case, if it could be segregated from the balance of the statement, could hardly be considered objectionable from any view, although we would have to disagree with the learned judge as to the effect of the opinion in the Dwyer Case. The Millain Case was tried in Storey county at a time when the population of that county was many times greater than that of Lander county at the time of the Dwyer trial, and the courts have distinguished between communities with a meager and a large population. In the Millain Case, after the motion for change of venue was made, the court proceeded and apparently without difficulty obtained 12 competent jurors from the number who were in attendance. It seems that but a small fraction of the number in Storey county at that time were called or examined. In the Dwyer Case nearly all the jurors obtainable in Lander county had been summoned on different venires and examined before 12 were obtained, and several of these retained to try the case showed on voir dire that they had opinions bordering on disqualification. Of the numerous witnesses examined on behalf of the state and the defendant on the motion for change of venue only one stated that he believed that Dwyer could have a fair trial in that county. Threats had been made to take him from the sheriff and execute summary vengeance. Dwyer, a migrating gambler and stranger in Austin, had soon after his arrival there killed an innocent, popular, and worthy young man who had long resided in that place and was well known to all the residents, and naturally owing to this deplorable incident, a strong feeling existed there against the defendant, although it alone may not have been sufficient to warrant a change of the place of trial. In other respects the two cases are distinguishable on the facts. We quoted from the Millain Case, and had no thought of reversing it. But, however, we do not question the right of respondent to differ with us in the view he takes of the two cases. We do not question the right of respondent to take the view he did of the Millain Case. When he came to the conclusion that the Millain Case was controlling and under the interpretation which he placed upon it required that he deny the motion for a change of venue, it became his duty to decide according to his conclusion. Upon appeal the case came under the prerogative of this court, and it was our province and duty to decide the appeal as we became convinced it should be decided. There is no word of criticism in the Dwyer opinion "or unjust reflection" upon either the conduct of the district attorney or the trial judge, unless a respectful disagreement with the trial court upon a matter of law can be called a criticism, and we do not think it properly can be so called.

Respondent, considering that this court had erroneously stated as a fact something which, in his opinion, was unwarranted from the record, and which he characterized as stated possibly "for the purpose of bolstering up a decision" which, to his mind, "is neither founded on law nor supported by fact," proceeds to declare the opinion as a whole to be an "abnormally strange document," that it was unfair both to the district attorney and the trial court, and a reversal of a former decision which had been the accepted law of this state for 40 years. All of this is further characterized as "reprehensible if the court knew what it was doing, pitiful if it did not." It cannot reasonably be claimed in this case that the remarks of respondent are mere criticisms of an opinion of this court, which were inadvertently made because of misinformation as to what transpired in the presentation of the case upon appeal. It appears from the statement quoted that the assumed error upon the part of this court in reference to the theory of mistake was only made the excuse for the offensive language used in commenting upon the opinion as a whole. That respondent was in error in regard to all of his references to the opinion of this court would not have been deemed an occasion for citation, if such comments had not been expressed in language reflecting upon the honor, integrity, and dignity of this court. But respondent did not see fit to couch his criticisms in respectful language. Upon the contrary, the whole tenor of the statement and order of respondent is not only highly disrespectful, but contains covert intimations of grave misconduct upon the part of this court. To suggest that a court uses a false statement of a fact to "bolster up" an opinion characterized as an "abnormally strange document" is an intimation that the court is guilty of such conduct as would justly warrant the impeachment of every member. This intimation, however, is modified by its author, so that the conduct of the members of this court is declared to be "reprehensible" only in the event "the court knew what it was doing," otherwise the position of the court would be only "pitiful." These observations and intimations are made by an attorney and officer of this court while acting in his capacity as a district judge, though they are not made in any judicial proceeding pending before him. That they were made with the view of receiving public attention is evidenced by the fact that they are ordered spread upon the minutes of his court to remain a perpetual impeachment of this court. There can be but one effect of such language published to the world by one holding the high and responsible position which respondent holds. That effect is to destroy, in a measure at least, public confidence in the integrity of the highest tribunal in the state, and thus impair the respect due its authority. To publish such statements as those of respondent's in a community where the feeling had recently been high, and in places bordering upon mob violence, might result in the gravest wrong. If any considerable portion of a community is led to believe that, either because of gross ignorance of the law or because of a worse reason, it cannot rely upon the courts to administer justice to a person charged with crime, that portion of the community, upon some occasion, is very likely to come to the conclusion that it is better not to take any chances on the courts failing to do their duty. Then may come mob violence with all its detestable features. To say that respondent meant no disrespect for this court is contrary to the plain meaning of the language used, and the order directing that it be spread upon the minutes of the district court.

Is the making of the false and defamatory statement by respondent a violation of his duty as an attorney and officer of this court? "It is the duty of an attorney not merely to observe the rules of courteous demeanor in open court, but also to abstain out of court from all insulting language and offensive conduct towards the judges personally for their judicial acts. For a breach of this duty an attorney may be suspended or disbarred." 4 Cyc. 908, and authorities cited. Both by statute (Comp. Laws, § 2625) and inherent power, the Supreme Court is given control over attorneys who receive a license to practice through its authority to suspend or disbar them for good cause shown, and this is in no way a violation of their constitutional privilege. If any attorney of this court unwarrantedly and without just and legal cause maligns a court in this state, this court, upon proper showing, may disbar him. Any tribunal that cannot tolerate free discussion and criticism of its decisions is justly entitled to contempt, but, on the other hand, little respect is due to a court that will hesitate to check or discipline any of its attorneys or officers who are so devoid of professional ethics and ordinary courtesy as misrepresent, and vilify it in open court without any cause or semblance of reason.

In regard to respondent's claim that he did not intend any disrespect, and that he was not aware that the prosecution in the Dwyer Case had advanced anything in this court regarding the theory of killing by mistake, it may be said that with words, as with acts, it is presumed that the offender intended their plain meaning and natural and probable consequences. If the terms "reprehensible" and "pitiful" as used by respondent are not clearly disrespectful and scurrilous, it is hard to conceive of any that would be, and it is but reasonable to conclude that they were employed and spread upon the minutes by respondent in an effort to belittle and discredit this court in its opinion for the purpose of trying to sustain his own before the bar of public opinion in a community where a strong feeling existed in regard to the Dwyer Case. In re Chartz, 29 Nev. —, 85 Pac. 353, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 916, a decision filed March 1, 1906, an attorney of this court had his brief stricken out, was reprimanded and warned and charged with costs of the proceedings for stating in the brief that in his opinion the decisions favoring the power of the state to limit the hours of labor, on the ground of the police power of the state, were wrong and written by men who had never performed manual labor, or by politicians and for politics, and that they did not know what they wrote about. In that case we said: "By using the objectionable language stated respondent became guilty of contempt which no construction of the words can excuse or purge. His disclaimer of any intention of disrespect of the court may palliate, but cannot justify, a charge which under any explanation cannot be construed otherwise than as reflecting on the intelligence and motives of the court." A number of decisions regarding misconduct by attorneys are reviewed in that case. We quoted with approval language holding that, where words are offensive and insulting per se, the offender may be punished, and that the disavowal of any intention of disrespect may tend to excuse, but cannot justify, them. We there quoted with approval from Sears v. Starbird, 75 Cal. 91, 16 Pac. 531, 7 Am. St. Rep. 123, where an attorney was censured and his brief was stricken out by the Supreme Court of California because it contained reflections upon the judge of the superior court. This was equivalent to saying that we will protect the district courts of this state from the abuse of attorneys who are officers of this court, and we feel justified in extending the same protection to this tribunal. In line with other decisions cited there we quoted from the opinion of the Chief Justice, speaking for the court, in State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 334: "If it were the general habit of the community to denounce, degrade, and disregard the decisions and judgments of the courts, no man of self-respect and just pride of reputation would remain upon the bench, and such only would become the ministers of the law as were insensible to defamation and contempt. But happily, for the good order of society, men, and especially the people of this country, are generally disposed to respect and abide the decisions of the tribunals ordained by government as the common arbiters of their rights. But where isolated individuals, in violation of the better instincts of human nature, and disregarding of law and order, wantonly attempt to obstruct the course of public justice by disregarding and exciting disrespect for the decisions of its tribunals, every good citizen will point them out as proper subjects of legal animadversion. A court must naturally look first to an enlightened and conservative bar, governed by a high sense of professional ethics, and deeply sensible, as they always are, of its necessity to aid in the maintenance of public respect for its opinions."

Nor is the fact that defendant did not know that the district attorney and Attorney General had argued regarding the theory of mistake in this court any justification. As an attorney and incumbent of the high office of district judge, he knew, or certainly ought to have known, that it was not proper for him to charge this court or any tribunal or individual with any offense, however high or low, or with any shortcoming simply because he did not know. He was aware of ample that had transpired before him when the evidence was introduced by the prosecution in its case in chief of the quarrel between Dwyer and O'Brien and that Dwyer had threatened and was seeking O'Brien on the evening he killed Williams a stranger to him, to justify the statement made as an inference in the opinion of this court to which he took exception even if the district attorney and the Attorney General had not presented anything in their argument regarding the theory of mistake. It is the duty of all attorneys to be honest and honorable, to conduct themselves as gentlemen, and to show due respect and courtesy, to enlighten and assist the courts, but never to attempt to mislead or misrepresent regarding law or facts. When they fail in any of these respects, it is essential to the proper maintenance of the respect and dignity due to the court, and to the proper administration of justice, that they be brought to a realization of their duties by a reprimand, suspension, or disbarment, and some times by fine and imprisonment. Although respondent, as well as all others, was at liberty to differ from and to criticize any opinion of this court, there is a broad distinction between difference of opinion or legitimate criticism, and mere misrepresentation or vilification sought to be justified on such misrepresentation. If respondent were unable to see any material difference between the circumstances existing in the Dwyer and Millain Cases, it was his privilege to criticize the decision, and to say that in his judgment it was wrong, and a reversal of the Millain Case; but, when he went further, and made a false statement regarding what had been presented to his court and followed his misrepresentation by vilifying and contemptuous words, as an attorney he passed beyond the freedom of discussion and criticism. Also, he must have been aware that he was not acting in impeachment charges, nor in any proceedings authorized by law, and that there was no warrant or authority for him as district judge to befoul the records of his court with the misrepresentation and disrespectful remarks, and consequently it seems that he had no purpose but a malicious one in so entering them, even if they could be considered permissible criticism. If mere abuse of this tribunal by its attorneys were to be encouraged or tolerated, there would seem to be no necessity or excuse for the entry of these scurrilous remarks in the record. The fact that defendant stands so high in esteem and as an able attorney and judge tends to aggravate rather than excuse his conduct. The greater his standing and ability the more careful he should be in word and act, and the better example he should set for attorneys practicing before his own and other courts. It may be said that after the order had been entered for a change of venue the case was removed to and pending in the district court of Elko county, and liable to come here again on appeal. If it had been in some other court from the beginning and never in respondent's, that would not have been justification for him to resort to such abuse and have it recorded. The position of a court in a case like the present is always a delicate one. No person regrets more than we that there was ever occasion for the present proceeding. Unpleasant, however, as it may be, we would not be doing our duty to the court over which we have the honor and responsibility of presiding did we pass unnoticed the conduct of respondent. While attorneys have the widest latitude to differ with and to criticize the opinions of this or other courts, yet, when they resort to misrepresentation and unwarranted assaults upon the courts whose officers they are, they violate their duty and obligation. They should remember that as one of the conditions of their admission to practice they have taken an oath to support the government and Constitution of this state, under which the district and Supreme Courts were created, and to observe or perform the duties of an attorney, nor ought they forget that they are members of a profession which they should ever try to keep unsullied. The language and order of respondent, considered as a whole, is not within the province of legitimate criticism, but is of that character which is an unwarranted reflection upon the honor, integrity, and dignity of this court, the effect of which is to impair the respect due its authority, and constitutes a grave breach of professional propriety.

Because of the language and entry complained of, it is ordered that the respondent, Peter Breen, be suspended and prohibited from practicing or appearing as an attorney or counsellor at law in any of the courts of this state until the further order of this court, and, unless within 20 days from the filing of this opinion he causes the language and order which he had so entered in the minutes of the district court to be expunged from the records of that court, and thereupon presents to this court an affidavit or other satisfactory evidence that said language and order have been so expunged, a further order will be entered by this court on the first day of its next term directing that his name be struck from the roll of attorneys, and disbarring him from thereafter appearing or practicing in any of the courts of this state.

CONTEMPT—FORMER DISBARMENT OF ATTORNEY—PUNISHMENT.

Where the Supreme Court disbarred an attorney for misconduct in criticising the court, a proceeding to punish him for contempt for the same language will be dismissed, since to punish him for contempt will amount to the imposition of double punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Contempt, §§ 117-121.]

Proceedings to punish Peter Breen for contempt of court. Dismissed.

PER CURIAM. The facts upon which this proceeding was based are fully stated in the proceedings for disbarment this day determined. 93 Pac. 907. It is the opinion of the court that the purpose for which citation was issued in the contempt proceeding has been fully accomplished in the proceedings for disbarment. If the respondent were adjudged guilty of contempt for the language complained of, the punishment imposed would be in the nature of a double punishment, which the court has no disposition to impose, and, in consideration of the judgment rendered in the disbarment proceeding this day, this proceeding is dismissed.

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Feb. 19, 1908.)

DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS—MISCONDUCT—UNWARRANTED CRITICISM OF SUPREME COURT—SUSPENSION.

A prosecuting attorney in his argument before the Supreme Court in a homicide case stated that the evidence showed that accused at the time he killed decedent meant to kill another. The court in its opinion stated that the evidence showed that such was the fact. Subsequently the prosecuting attorney stated in the district court that there was nothing in the record warranting the Supreme Court in saying that accused when he killed decedent intended to kill another. He admitted that his statement was not true, and that the opinion of the Supreme Court correctly stated the facts, and attempted to justify his statement before the district court because of adverse criticism based on his conduct in the case. Held, that the prosecuting attorney was guilty of misconduct warranting his temporary suspension.

Proceedings for the disbarment of A. J. Maestretti, an attorney. Judgment of suspension awarded.

R. C. Stoddard, Atty Gen., for the State. Campbell, Metson & Brown, Campbell, Metson, Drew, Oatman & Mackenzie, W. B. Pittman, Charles Lewers, and Bartlett & Thatcher, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The facts upon which this proceeding was based are very fully set forth in the opinion rendered in the proceedings against Peter Breen for disbarment, to which opinion reference is made for a more complete understanding of this case. In response to the citation, respondent filed an answer, in which he admitted making the statement attributed to him at the time and in the manner charged in the citation. For convenience of consideration the statement of respondent in question is here repeated: "If it please the court, at this time I wish to rise to the question of privilege in relation to a statement made in the disposition of this case, wherein it was reversed in the Supreme Court, and that is this: In its decision the Supreme Court has stated in substance that the theory of the prosecution in this case was that Dwyer killed Williams through mistake while looking for a man named O'Brien with whom the defendant had had trouble during the day over a prostitute. I wish to state at this time that that is absolutely not the fact; further, that there is nothing in the records from the first page to the last which suggests, or would warrant, the Supreme Court in making such a statement in its decision, and where anything is shown on that record upon which the Supreme Court renders such a decision is beyond my understanding." The answer of respondent avers, however, that he did not know at the time he made the statement that Judge Breen was going to order it spread upon the minutes, and had nothing to do with the making of such order. He further avers that he had no intention of being contemptuous in his said remarks. From the answer of respondent we quote the following extracts: "When this decision was rendered, * * * the essential points were copied in the Austin Beveille and printed there, leaving out all of those affidavits that were cited and the testimony on the question of venue, and some parties had suggested to me: 'Was that your theory? Was that what you tried to prove in the case, that Dwyer killed Williams through mistake while hunting for O'Brien?' And, of course, it is very hard to explain to an ordinary citizen some legal matters, and that being my intent to prove that Dwyer had the intent to commit a felony, to show his state of mind, is why I made that statement in the district court in Austin. I do not deny that I made it. I believe those are the words I used. It was not made, notwithstanding the language might be contemptuous in itself. It certainly was not made with any spirit of contempt whatever. * * * During the conduct of the trial of the case, I did not want to prove mistake. They, the defense, relied solely on the defense of temporary insanity, and this was the thing that presented itself to my mind: The statute, I believe, in substance says that, where the killing is proven, the burden of justification or excuse lies on the defendant. I felt that if I proved that Dwyer killed Williams and simply proved that, and let it stand, that I might have had a conviction of some kind or other, but with that bare proof, the bare fact, without proving that he intended to commit murder, would not have given me a verdict of murder in the first degree. I believe that Dwyer killed Williams by mistake. I know that he had nothing against Williams. I think the record shows that he did not know Williams, and had not seen him before. The only inference you can draw from the record is that he killed him [Williams] by mistake. * * * I had no consultation at all with Gen. Stoddard until I came to Carson two or three days prior to the argument, and I remember that we discussed the fact that the theory of mistake had not been raised by the defense, and that it would be well to submit that to the court in the event that they considered that phase of it; that is the substance of it. We discussed the proposition whether or not mistake could be murder in the first degree, and the cases we looked up support the contention that a conviction under such circumstances could be murder in the first degree. I believe there was ample justification from the record for the court to have made the statement that it did in its opinion, because any lay person, and I presume any lawyer or judge, after reading the thing over thoroughly, would come to the conclusion that Dwyer killed Williams while looking for O'Brien. At the same time I never prosecuted directly on that theory. That question never was raised as an issue in the case. * * * At the time I made the remarks in the lower court I had read the opinion attached to the remittitur. I understood then, and do now, that the case was reversed solely upon the point of the change of venue, and that the theory of the prosecution had nothing to do with the determination of the case on appeal—that it was just an incidental matter."

Upon the oral argument in this court of the case of the State v. Patrick Dwyer, 91 Pac. 305, respondent made the following statement: "There is one point I did not intend to touch upon, but I have been requested to do so and in examining the record the court will find, and I suppose that is the reason the objection is taken, that the feeling or intent to take life was not as to Williams, but as to O'Brien, and that the killing of Williams, it will be discovered by this court, must have been an accident, that Dwyer meant to get O'Brien, and not Williams, and upon that point we have collected a few authorities which we wish to call to the attention of this court. Jackson v. State, 106 Ala. 12, 17 South. 33; McGehee v. State, 62 Miss. 772, 52 Am. Rep. 209; People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141; 21 Am. Encyc. of Law, 104, 105." It appears from the answer of respondent, from the argument made by him in this court upon the appeal in the Dwyer Case, the brief of the Attorney General, as well as from the record in the latter case itself, that the statement made by respondent in the district court at Austin was wholly unjustifiable and contrary to the facts. It was this statement apparently which prompted the trial judge to make the offensive remarks and order considered in the proceedings against Peter Breen. It may be conceded that respondent at the time he made the remarks in question did not anticipate that they would have the effect which they did. We cannot, however, overlook the fact that respondent made, to say the least, a deliberate misleading statement in open court concerning an opinion of this court, which conduct upon his part, under all the circumstances, was a breach of professional propriety. Respondent's remarks did not, however, contain any offensive or insulting language. Upon issuance of citation, and before it reached Austin for service, respondent promptly appeared and filed an answer frankly acknowledging his error, and has manifested a commendable disposition to correct the same so far as in his power lies.

Judges, juries, prosecuting attorneys and lawyers generally, in the performance of their sworn duty, are frequently obliged to place themselves in opposition to public opinion, and when such occasions arise ought to be fearless in upholding the right as they see it. The cool, deliberate, and dispassionate proceedings of courts are better calculated to reach a just judgment than is public opinion, which, whether based upon press reports or not, is necessarily largely controlled by hearsay evidence, which is often partially, and sometimes wholly, unreliable. Considering the stress under which respondent made the statement in the district court which was contrary to the argument he made, and the position he had taken in this court regarding the theory of mistake, his prompt appearance and disavowal of any intention of being contemptuous, his frank confession of error, and his manifest willingness to correct the same as far as in his power lies, we are not disposed to inflict any severe punishment; but by way of reprimand and as a warning it is the order of the court that he stand suspended from practice in all the courts of this state for the period of 30 days from the date of the filing of this opinion, this suspension not to apply to his official duties as district attorney.

(152 Cal. 765)

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES INDEPENDENT GAS CO. (L. A. 1,935.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1908.)

1. LICENSES—MUNICIPAL ORDINANCES—GAS COMPANIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

A Los Angeles ordinance requiring gas companies to pay $100 a month as a license tax is not invalid within the charter provision (St. 1889, p. 457) that, in imposing such taxes, no discrimination shall be made between persons engaged in the same business otherwise than by proportioning the tax upon any business to the amount of business done, though one gas company's property is worth, and its earnings are, much less than another's; the charter provision not forbidding the imposition of a uniform license tax upon all engaging in a particular calling.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8-13.]

2. SAME.

A $100 monthly license tax by a city upon gas companies, regardless of the business done and the earnings, does not infringe Const. art. 13, § 1, requiring all property to be taxed in proportion to its value to be ascertained as provided by law, and defining property as including franchises, etc.; occupation taxes not falling within the constitutional provision.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8-13.]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CLASS LEGISLATION.

A $100 monthly license tax by a city upon gas companies, regardless of the business done or earnings, is not unconstitutional as an unreasonable discrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8-13.]

4. LICENSES—TAXES.

A $100 monthly license tax by a city upon gas companies is an exercise of the taxing, and not the police, power; and hence the rule that penalties or fees exacted for permits issued under police regulations must bear some reasonable proportion to the expenses of regulating the business is inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8-13.]

5. SAME.

A $100 monthly license tax by a city upon gas companies is not invalid as prohibitive or unduly oppressive as to a company whose property in the city is not worth more than $100,000, and whose income is only $1,500 monthly.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8-15.]

Department. 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action to recover license taxes by the city of Los Angeles against the Los Angeles Independent Gas Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Barstow and Clara Shortridge Foltz, for appellant. Leslie R. Hewitt, Lewis R. Works, and W. B. Mathews, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a suit to recover license taxes imposed by an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles. The clause relating to defendant is as follows: "For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing, or carrying on the business of manufacturing, selling, distributing, or furnishing gas for light, heat, or power, $100 per month." The defendant claims that this clause of the ordinance is unconstitutional and void. The particular reason advanced in support of this claim is that the same sum is imposed upon every person, firm or corporation, regardless of the extent, amount, or value of the business done, or the income thereof. It is alleged in the answer that there are but two companies engaged in the business in the city; that the value of defendant's property devoted to the business in the city does not exceed $100,000; that it distributes only 50,000 cubic feet of gas each day, has only 10 miles of street mains, and receives an income of only $1,500 a month, whereas, the other company owns a plant in the city worth $3,500,000, including 300 miles of street mains, distributes 5,000,000 cubic feet of gas daily, and has a monthly income therefrom of $125,000. It is contended that this shows an unjust and unlawful discrimination against the defendant. The court below sustained a demurrer to this part of the answer, and, upon the trial, refused to allow proof of the facts therein stated. The appeal is from the judgment.

The Los Angeles charter authorizes the city to impose a license tax upon occupations, business, and trades to raise revenue for the city, qualifying the power by the following restriction: "Provided, that no discrimination shall be made between persons engaged in the same business, otherwise than by proportioning the tax upon any business to the amount of business done." St. 1889, p. 457. This provision does not require occupation taxes to be graded in all cases, according to the amount of the business done. It forbids discrimination between persons engaged in the same business; that is, the charging of a higher rate to one than to the other in any case except when it is done by grading the tax to the amount of the business. It does not forbid the imposition of a uniform license tax upon all persons who engage in a particular calling. The Constitution (article 13, § 1) declares that all property "shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law," and that the word "property" includes "money, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership." If a license tax upon the privilege or right to carry on a particular trade within the city was a tax upon property, as here defined, it would be necessary, in order to lay a valid tax of that character, to provide some mode of ascertaining the value of the right of each person to carry on his particular business, and to tax it at the same rate and in the same manner as other property is taxed. In that case it would also be necessary for the assessor to include all of this class of property in his general assessment, and the city council could not impose such a tax upon one occupation without also imposing it upon all occupations at the same rate, or percentage of value. The Constitution is not to be so construed. The distinction between a license tax of this character and a tax upon property is well understood, and it is settled that "occupation taxes are not property taxes and therefore are not subject to the restrictions imposed upon property taxation by statutes and Constitutions." 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 775. This statement in the text is fully supported by a large number of cases cited in the footnote. In People v. Naglee, 1 Cal. 252, 52 Am. Dec. 312, in an elaborate discussion of a clause of the Constitution of 1849, similar to that above quoted, the court said that it referred only to a direct tax upon property, and not to a license fee charged to persons following a particular trade or calling. The proposition that these constitutional provisions do not refer to license taxes was also stated, and approved in People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 448, High v. Shoemaker, 22 Cal. 369, and Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 559. See, also, People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 155. The tax in question is not contrary to the Constitution in this particular.

We find no decision in this state directly holding that a license tax imposing the same amount upon all engaged in the same business, regardless of business done, or the profits received therefrom, is not an unreasonable discrimination, where it may appear that different persons in the business have much more capital employed and earn much more profit than others. But such uniform rate has always been recognized as a valid exercise of the power. Many cases have been before this court wherein the tax has been declared valid, although it was subject to the same objection here made. Los Angeles v. S. P. Co., 61 Cal. 59, Id., 67 Cal. 433, 7 Pac. 819; Ex parte McNally, 73 Cal. 632, 15 Pac. 368; Merced Co. v. Helm, 102 Cal. 166, 36 Pac. 399; Ventura Co. v. Clay, 112 Cal. 67, 44 Pac. 488; Ex parte Senbe, 115 Cal. 631, 47 Pac. 596; Los Angeles v. Elkenberry, 131 Cal. 464, 63 Pac. 766; Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 584, 70 Pac. 674; Santa Monica v. Guidinger, 137 Cal. 658, 70 Pac. 732; Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 205, 74 Pac. 780. In other states the question has been directly decided. In Nebraska the Constitution and the statute required that local license taxes should be uniform. In Magneau v. Fremont, 30 Neb. 843, 47 N. W. 280, 9 L. R. A. 786, 27 Am. St. Rep. 436, in deciding this question, the court said: "The ordinance imposes a fixed sum upon each of the various avocations therein named. The fact that it does not classify each business and graduate the amount that shall be paid by the person pursuing an avocation according to the amount of the business he shall do is not a violation of the rule of uniformity prescribed by both the Constitution and statute. It is not an income tax, but a license fee or tax for the privilege of carrying on business in the city. The ordinance makes no exceptions in favor of or against any one carrying on the business taxed, but operates uniformly on the class to which it applies." The following cases are to the same effect: Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 193; St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 301; State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 525, 6 S. E. 424; In re Butin, 28 Tex. App. 304, 18 S. W. 10; Ex parte Williams, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 262, 20 S. W. 582, 21 L. R. A. 783; Banta v. Chicago, 172 Ill. 204, 50 N. E. 238, 40 L. R. A. 611; Stull v. De Mattos, 23 Wash. 71, 62 Pac. 453, 51 L. R. A. 892; Singer M. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 25 S. E. 249, 35 L. R. A. 497; Stewart v. Kehrer, 115 Ga. 184, 41 S. E. 682; Browne v. Selser, 106 La. 691, 31 South. 290.

The tax here levied is not an exercise of the police power, but of the power of taxation, and the rule that penalties or fees exacted for permits issued under police regulations must bear some reasonable proportion to the expenses of regulating the business is not applicable. The facts stated in the answer do not establish the proposition that the tax in question would be prohibitive or unduly oppressive. It would probably be fairer, where there are only a few persons engaged in a business of this character, to so graduate the tax in proportion to the amount of the business that it shall approximate a just apportionment of the burden of taxation, but we cannot say that the fact that there is a difference between the volume of business done by the respective persons engaged therein, is of itself evidence of such a discrimination in favor of the other company, or against the defendant, as to make the ordinance void. Similar differences must exist in every case, but they have never been held sufficient to invalidate the tax. The facts alleged constituted no defense, and the offer to prove them was properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

OURSLER et al. v. THACHER et al.
(L. A. 1,955.)

MINES AND MINERALS—CONTRACT OF SALE— FORFEITURE.

A contract for the sale of certain mining claims by plaintiffs to defendants provided for payment of the price in installments. Defendants also agreed to perform certain development work, the proceeds of the ore secured to be equally divided between the parties, except that, in the event of a consummation of the purchase, the portion paid to plaintiffs was to be credited on the purchase price, and that, in case of a default in the payment of any installment, the bond should be forfeited, and the sums paid treated as rent of the property. On defendant's default in payment of an installment, plaintiffs, after demand for payment, notified, defendants that they elected to terminate the contract therefor, and because of defendant's neglect to do the development work required, after which plaintiffs obtained peaceable possession of the property, and then sued defendants to quiet title as against such contract. Held, that all plaintiffs' acts after defendants' default were consistent with an election to enforce the forfeiture provided for; and hence defendants were not entitled to reimbursement of the amounts paid to plaintiffs under the contract on the theory that there had been a mutual rescission thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by A. R. Oursler and others against P. Thacher and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. P. Hatch (I. H. Preston, of counsel), for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to quiet title of plaintiffs to certain mining claims; the complaint being in the ordinary form. The defendants in their answer denied the ownership of plaintiffs on information and belief, but did not set up any claim of title or right in the property in themselves. By cross-complaint the defendant Marshpee Mining Company sought to recover from plaintiffs money paid as part of the purchase price of said claims under a contract for the sale thereof by plaintiffs to certain of the defendants, and also money expended by it in developing such claims while in possession thereof under said contract. The cause was submitted to the trial court for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment was given quieting plaintiffs' title to the claims, and denying defendant mining company any relief on its cross-complaint. This is an appeal by defendants from such judgment.

The facts agreed to, so far as material, are as follows: Plaintiffs were on November 14, 1904, and ever since have been, the owners of the mining claims. On said November 14th they executed a bond for a deed thereof to defendants Thacher and Blewett. This bond was for the execution and delivery by plaintiffs to said defendants or their assigns on or before the 5th day of December, 1905, of a deed for the claims, provided that said defendants or their assigns on or before that date paid to plaintiffs the agreed purchase price of $100,000, and performed the other conditions specified therein. The other conditions so specified were that the purchasers would pay to plaintiffs on or before December 5, 1904, the sum of $500, and the sum of $500 per month thereafter during the continuance of the bond, said payments to be credited on the purchase price in the event of consummation of the purchase in accord with the terms of the bond, and that the purchasers would begin development work on or before December 27, 1904, and prosecute the same continuously until said consummation of the purchase or the cancellation of the bond, the net proceeds of the ore taken out in said work to be divided equally between the parties, but in the event of said consummation of the purchase the portion paid to plaintiffs to be credited on the purchase price. It was expressly provided that, in case of default in the payment of any $500 monthly installment, "this bond shall immediately upon such default be forfeited and become null and void," and the sums paid treated as rental of the property for the period covered thereby, and that a breach of any condition by the purchasers would release the plaintiffs from the obligation of the bond. The defendant mining company succeeded to the rights of the vendees, and went into possession of the claims under the bond. It paid to plaintiffs and plaintiffs accepted eight monthly installments of $500 each; the last installment being that for July, 1905. It also paid on January 24, 1905, $42.50, and on April 6, 1905, $365.27, proceeds of sales of ore. It also expended in developing said claims the sum of $9,846.40. (These are the amounts sought here to be recovered by defendants.) On August 5, 1905, a monthly installment became due and payable. Demand that the same be paid was forthwith made, and on request of defendants the time for such payment was extended several times, the last extension being to August 18, 1905, at 10 o'clock a. m. At that time demand for immediate payment was again made, and defendants failed and have ever since failed to pay the same or any part thereof. On August 21, 1905, plaintiffs served on Thacher, Blewett, and the mining company a written notice in the following terms: "To Messrs P. Thacher, W. G. Blewett, and the Marshpee Mining Company. Gentlemen: You are hereby notified that the terms of the bond from A. R. Oursler and Clemente Salazar, as parties of the first part, to P. Thacher and W. G. Blewett, as parties of the second part, dated November 14, 1904, and bonding all of that certain property hereinafter more particularly described, have been violated, and that the parties thereto have failed to comply with, and keep certain of its terms and conditions, in this: First. The said parties of the second part in said bond have failed and neglected to do the development work upon said mining properties as therein provided. Second. That the said parties of the second part in said bond have failed and neglected to make the monthly payments therein provided and particularly have failed and neglected to make the monthly payments of $500 due thereunder on the 5th day of August, 1905, and the said monthly payment of $500 still remains unpaid. * * * Wherefore we, the undersigned, A. R. Oursler and Clemente Salazar, parties of the first part in said bond, do hereby declare said bond to be forfeited and all of your interest in the property therein and hereinafter described to be terminated, and we hereby demand of you that you forthwith vacate said property and deliver the possession of the same to us; and that you leave upon said property all of the improvements, machinery and fixtures which are now thereon and which, under the terms of said bond and agreement, endorsed upon said bond supplementary thereto, belong to and are the property of the undersigned. * * * Yours very truly, A. R. Oursler. Clemente Salazar." On August 28, 1905, possession of the property not having been delivered, plaintiffs' attorneys communicated by letter with said defendants, referring to the previous notice, and advising them that, unless the property was delivered by 12 m. of August 30th, suit would be commenced for the possession of the property. Thereafter plaintiffs peaceably took possession of the property, and then brought this action to quiet their title. At the time of the service of the notice, defendants had failed to live up to the obligations of the bond in the matter of doing development work, and did no such work after the service of the notice. There was no attempt by defendants in their pleadings to show any excuse for the failure to comply with the conditions of the bond. The theory of defendant mining company's claim for reimbursement of the amounts paid to plaintiffs under the contract and in doing the development work is that the contract for the sale of the property had been rescinded by mutual consent of the parties, and that, because of such mutual rescission, the mining company was entitled under our decisions to recover the money which it had paid in part performance of the contract.

We see nothing in the admitted facts warranting a conclusion that there was a rescission of the contract within the meaning of the decisions relied on. Plaintiffs had the right without abandoning or rescinding the contract to insist that, by the terms thereof, defendants by reason of their default had no further right thereunder. This is clearly established by the decision of this court in Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. That was a case where the vendee after default in the payment of amounts due under the contract, and after the time when under its terms he was entitled to pay and thereupon receive a deed, tendered all sums due and demanded a deed, and, on refusal of the vendor to accept and tender and execute the deed, brought an action for the recovery of the sums paid by him under the contract. No excuse was made by the vendee for the default. The court in bank held that this refusal of the vendor did not constitute a rescission. Justice Henshaw, in an opinion concurred in by Justices McFarland and Temple, said: "But, while it is essentially true that in case of a rescission the vendee may demand that he be restored to his original condition, it does not follow that a vendor who refuses to convey after such breach by the vendee thereby rescinds. To the contrary, in refusing to convey after the vendee's default, he is not treating the contract as at an end, but is expressly standing upon it, and basing his rights upon its terms, covenants, and conditions." Also: "But the vendor, in refusing to accept the tender and to repay the money, is neither violating his contract nor rescinding it, nor treating it as at an end. He is standing squarely upon its terms." Justice Harrison, in an opinion concurred in by Justices Garoutte and Van Fleet, after fully recognizing the doctrine that in the event of a rescission or mutual abandonment the vendee might recover money paid in part performance, said: "But it has never been held that while the contract was insisted upon by the vendor, and he had done no act by which it might be contended that he had abandoned the contract, or was in any respect in default, the vendee could recover the money paid by him in part performance of the contract. * * * The plaintiff could not maintain an action against the defendant to recover the money paid by him, unless there had been a breach of the contract by the defendant, and the defendant was not guilty of a breach of its obligation by failing to execute the conveyance, when the plaintiff was himself in default, or by refusing to comply with the demand of the plaintiff made many months after he had lost his right to the enforcement of the contract." The earlier decisions relied on by counsel for defendants were carefully examined by this court in that case because of the apparent misunderstanding as to their effect, and were fully explained in the opinion, and there is nothing in any later case that is inconsistent with the views of the court on this matter as expressed in such opinion. The stipulated facts here warrant no inference but the one that plaintiffs have done no more than to insist that, under the terms of the contract, defendants had no further rights under such contract, but had forfeited all such rights. Their notice of forfeiture and demand for possession of the mining property were strictly in line with this claim, and were in no sense a repudiation or abandonment of the contract or a consent to a rescission thereof, any more than was the refusal of the vendor to convey in Glock v. Howard, supra, an abandonment or a consent to a rescission. The bringing of the action to quiet title was an act of the same character. Practically it amounted to no more than the calling of the defaulting vendees into court to show why it should not be decreed that under the terms of the contract all their rights thereunder were at an end. In the absence of some sufficient equitable showing to excuse their failure to comply with the terms of the contract, plaintiffs, while standing on their contract, were entitled to such a decree, so as to cut off the possibility of any future claim by the vendee to equitable relief, which might embarrass or cloud his title. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 10, 11, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

There being no rescission or abandonment of the contract by the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs at all times have insisted on the contract and stood on its terms, and being in no respect in default, the vendees in default were not entitled to recover either the moneys paid by them to plaintiffs or the moneys expended in developing the property.

Other points are made by counsel for plaintiffs in support of the judgment, including one to the effect that the matters alleged in the cross-complaint do not come within the scope of matters as to which a cross-complaint is authorized by our statute in an action to quiet title. Code Civ. Proc. § 442. We have preferred to place our decision in the case upon the ground already set forth, but in so doing we do not desire to be understood as holding that this claim of plaintiffs is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re VANCE'S ESTATE. (L. A. 2,078.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PAYMENT OF CLAIM—EXERCISE OF OPTION.

An option to pay a note by delivery of corporate stock is not a mere personal right of the maker, expiring with his death, but survives to his estate.

2. SAME.

Civ. Code, § 1384, passes the property of an intestate to his heirs, subject to the control of the probate court and the possession of the administrator. Code Civ. Proc. § 1452, vests in the personal representative a right to the possession of all the property of decedent; and section 1581 requires the personal representative to take into his possession all the estate of decedent. Held that, where testator gave all his estate to his wife and son, and had reserved an option to pay a note by delivery of corporate stock, title to the stock passed to his legatees, subject to the exercise of the option by executrix.

3. SAME—PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490 et seq., 1516, 1648, committing to the probate court jurisdiction over the presentation, allowance, and payment of claims against a decedent's estate, the probate court had jurisdiction to make an order authorizing and directing that a note presented as a claim against an estate be paid by the exercise by executrix of the option therein reserved to pay by delivery of corporate stock.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

Petition by Marie H. Vance, as executrix of the will of S. A. Vance, filed after the expiration of the time for presenting claims, praying for authority to deliver stock in payment of a note presented against the estate as a claim, in accordance with an option therein reserved. The claimant, Hammond Lumber Company, opposed the petition, and from an order authorizing and directing the executrix to so pay the note, the lumber company appeals. Affirmed.

SLOSS, J. On May 26, 1903, S. A. Vance made and delivered to Hammond Lumber Company, a corporation, his promissory note reading as follows: "$65,000.00 San Francisco, Calif., May 26, 1903. On or before five years after this date, I promise to pay to the order of Hammond Lumber Company sixty-five thousand dollars, United States gold coin, with interest thereon, payable semi-annually at the rate of four per cent. per annum from date until paid. This note is secured by pledge of six hundred and fifty shares of the first preferred cumulative stock of the stock of Vance Redwood Lumber Company, and is payable, at my option, by transfer and delivery of as many of said shares as shall at the time of such transfer and delivery be the equivalent at par of the then unpaid part of this note. [Signed] S. A. Vance." Thereafter S. A. Vance died, leaving a will in which he named his wife, Marie H. Vance, as executrix, and gave all of his estate in equal shares to his said wife and a minor son. Letters testamentary having issued, notice to creditors was published, and within the time allowed the Hammond Lumber Company presented a claim, setting forth the instrument above quoted, and alleging the payments of interest and nonpayment of the principal. The claim was allowed by the executrix and approved by the court. The estate is solvent. After the expiration of the time for presenting claims, the executrix filed a petition, alleging that the 650 shares of stock referred to in the claim had been appraised at $38,750, and that it was to the best interests of the estate that the claim be paid by transfer of said 650 shares, which at par were the equivalent of the unpaid portion of the note. The prayer of the petition was for authority to deliver said stock to the claimant in full payment of its claim. In response to a citation the claimant, Hammond Lumber Company, appeared and opposed the petition. Over its objection, the court made an order authorizing and directing the executrix to transfer and deliver to Hammond Lumber Company, in full payment of the note and claim, a certificate for 650 shares of the first preferred cumulative stock of Vance Redwood Lumber Company, being the shares mentioned in the note. The order further provided that upon such transfer the claim and note "shall be fully paid and satisfied." From this order the Hammond Lumber Company has appealed.

The points made in support of the opposition in the lower court, and now urged on this appeal, are, first, that the option to pay the note by transfer and delivery of the stock was a right, personal to S. A. Vance, the maker, and expired with his death; see.

ond, that the superior court as a court of probate had no jurisdiction to make the order directing the payment of the claim by a transfer and delivery of the shares of stock.

1. We see no good reason for holding that the option to pay in stock was a mere personal right of the maker. The note is payable on or before five years after date, and is payable, at the option of the maker, in money or in stock. Two options were here reserved to the maker—the option to pay at any time prior to the expiration of the five years, and the option to pay in stock instead of money. The payee had no right to insist on payment at any time before the end of the five-year period, nor to receive payment in money, if the maker should elect to pay in stock, or vice versa. Both of the options so reserved are valuable rights. It is not suggested that the right to pay before the expiration of the five years was lost to Vance's estate by his death. The right to pay in stock rather than in money stands on no different ground. The option to pay in this manner was reserved solely for the benefit of the maker. The appraised value of the stock ($38,750) shows that this option, at the time of filing the petition, was worth $26,250, the difference between such value and $65,000. Why should the death of the maker be held to transfer this $26,250 from Vance's estate to the Hammond Lumber Company? When the claimant took the note, it contracted for and received, not an obligation to pay $65,000, but an obligation to do one of two things, i. e., to pay $65,000 or to transfer 650 shares of stock. The only right it bargained for was the right to receive the one of these two modes of performance which should prove to be to the advantage of the maker. The maker's death did not transform or enlarge this into an absolute right to receive $65,000. The option reserved was in the nature of a valuable property right, and, as such, passed to the estate of the decedent. Since it had reference to the performance of an obligation of the decedent, its exercise necessarily devolved upon the executrix, who was charged with the duty of carrying out, subject to the direction of the probate court, all binding contracts made by the testator.

The appellant lays great stress upon the proposition that upon the death of one owning property the property passes at once to his heirs, devisees, or legatees. Civ. Code, § 1384; Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 238, 68 Am. Dec. 237; Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 185; Estate of Newlove, 142 Cal. 377, 75 Pac. 1083. From this the conclusion is drawn that the 650 shares passed at once, on the death of Vance, to his widow and minor son, and that the executrix, with or without the order of court, had no power to transfer to the claimant any title to said shares. But the passing of title to the heirs, devisees, or legatees is subject to the control of the probate court and the possession of the administrator or executor for the purposes of administration. Civ. Code, § 1384; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1452, 1581. "The heirs' title is subject to the performance by the administrator of all his trusts, and they finally come into the possession and enjoyment of only such portion of the estate as may remain after the execution of them by the administrator." Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 568, 574, 42 Pac. 1086. One of those trusts is the payment of the debts of the decedent. Here the testator bound himself either to pay a sum of money or to transfer certain shares of stock. Both the money and the stock passed to his legatees charged with the burden of the performance of this obligation. One or the other was to pass from the estate, according to the exercise of the option by the executrix. Whatever title the legatees took was subject to the exercise of this option.

2. The contention that the probate court was without jurisdiction to make the order appealed from is, in a measure, answered by what has already been said. If the option reserved in the note was a right that passed to the estate and was to be exercised by the executrix, it will hardly be questioned that the exercise of that option for the purpose of satisfying an approved claim was a matter to be passed on by the probate court. "The objects of probate proceedings are to administer, settle, and distribute the estate of deceased persons." Maddock v. Russell, 109 Cal. 417, 422, 42 Pac. 139. The presentation, allowance, and payment of claims are subjects especially committed to the care of the probate court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1490 et seq., 1516, 1646. The order in question is to be regarded as an order for the payment of an allowed and approved claim. The appellant submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court by presenting its claim, and it has no ground for complaint in that the court has made an order directing that it be paid in the manner provided by the contract which is the basis of the claim.

The order is affirmed.

INSANE PERSONS—LIABILITY OF ESTATE FOR SUPPORT—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Pol. Code, § 2176, declaring that an insane person's estate, to the extent it is sufficient for the purpose, shall be liable for his support and maintenance in a state hospital, does not entitle a state hospital to any claim on an insane person's estate, where at his commitment his debts exceeded the value of his estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Insane Persons, § 106.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Final accounting in the matter of the estate of James S. Callen, an incompetent person. Two classes of claims were presented—claims of private persons accruing prior to the commitment of Callen to the State Hospital, and the claim of the State Hospital for care subsequent to his commitment. From an order directing the estate to be distributed among the creditors other than the hospital, the Southern California State Hospital and the California State Commission in Lunacy appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Stetson (Cassius Carter, of counsel), for appellants. Haines & Haines, James E. Wadham, and L. L. Boone, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. James S. Callen had been declared an incompetent, and committed to the Southern California State Hospital. A guardian was appointed of his estate. At the time of the settlement of the final account of the guardian it appeared that he had on hand $476 which could be devoted to the payment of the claims of creditors. Two kinds of claims were presented: First, the claims of private persons, aggregating $1,435, which claims had accrued prior to the commitment of the incompetent to the State Hospital; and, second, the claim of the State Hospital for $435, accrued for the support, care, and maintenance of the incompetent subsequent to his commitment. The court ordered that the moneys in the hands of the guardian be ratably distributed amongst the creditors other than the Southern California Hospital, and from this order the hospital appeals.

It contends, first, that it is an agent and mandatory of the state, and thus represents the state, and that the claim of the state as sovereign should be preferred over that of the general creditors by virtue of the common-law rule to this effect. State v. Foster, 5 Wyo. 199, 38 Pac. 926, 29 L. R. A. 226, 63 Am. St. Rep. 47. Appeal is here made to the rule enunciated in our Code and affirmed in our decisions that, where our statutes are silent, the common law of England furnishes the rule of decision. Est. of Apple, 66 Cal. 434, 6 Pac. 7. But it is sufficient on this to say that our Codes are not silent upon the matter. The state has undertaken the care of its insane and incompetents, and the liability of the estate of such an incompetent is defined by section 2176, Pol. Code. "The husband, wife, father, mother, or children of an insane person, if of sufficient ability, or the estate of such insane person to the extent it is sufficient for the purpose, shall be liable for the care, support, and maintenance of any insane person in a state hospital for the insane to which he has been or may hereafter be committed or transferred."

The first proposition to be considered, then, is whether under this section the state or the asylum has any claim at all upon the estate of the incompetent. It appears that at the time the state first took charge of him, his undisputed debts exceeded three times the value of his property. He was insolvent. Such little property as he possessed was due and owing to creditors, and equitably that property was theirs. Under such state of facts it cannot be successfully argued that the condition contemplated by section 2176 is fulfilled. The estate of the insane person was not sufficient to any extent to provide for his maintenance at the time of his commitment to the asylum. Such property as he possessed belonged to the creditors existing at the time of his commitment. The result is, therefore, that the state had no legal claim at all against the property of the incompetent. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to consider whether, if it had a valid claim and the funds of the incompetent were inadequate to pay all claims, the state should receive preferential consideration, or should share ratably with the others.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re BARCLAY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 2,138.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1908.)

1. WILLS—WORDS CREATING GIFTS—INTENTION OF TESTATOR.

No particular words are essential to create a legacy or devise, and, when the intention of the testator making a gift from the property of his estate is shown, the courts will carry it into effect, if the same can be done consistently with the rules of law applicable thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 228-233.]

2. SAME—GIFTS TO CREDITORS.

Testatrix devised specified property to designated beneficiaries, and provided that the residue of her estate, after a son had been paid what he had paid for her at various times, should go to her children. Held to constitute a legacy to the son of all the amounts paid by him for testatrix.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1698-1703.]

3. APPEAL—REVERSAL—TECHNICAL ERRORS—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

A judgment will not be reversed for failure to find on an affirmative defense, where the record does not show that evidence was introduced in support thereof, or where the evidence introduced was not sufficient to support a finding in favor thereof.

4. WILLS—GIFTS TO CREDITORS—ESTOPPEL.

Testatrix gave specified property to designated beneficiaries, and provided that the residue of her real estate, after a son had been paid what he had paid for her, should go to her children equally. The son presented a verified claim for the amounts advanced, but only a part thereof was allowed by the executors, on the ground that his claim therefor was barred, except to the extent allowed. Held that, since under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1499, the claim of the son, so far as the same was barred, could not be allowed, he was not estopped from claiming that there was a legacy to him to the amount of his advancements for testatrix.

5. SAME—CONSTRUCTION—DEATH OF BENEFICIARY.

Testatrix gave specified property to designated beneficiaries, and provided that the residue remaining, after a son had been paid what he had paid for her, should go to her children, share and share alike, and declared that "in case any one or more should die their share to be divided between the remaining children, unless they have heirs." Held, that under Civ. Code, § 1336, providing that words in a will referring to death relate to the time of testator's death, etc., the quoted provision referred only to such a death as might occur before the death of testatrix, and it did not apply to a child dying leaving a child and husband surviving.

6. SAME—CODICILS—MODIFICATION OF WILLS—EXTENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 1287, providing that the execution of a codicil referring to a previous will has the effect to republish the will, as modified by the codicil, a will controls, except as modified by a codicil, and the two instruments must be read together so as to make one consistent whole.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, § 997.]

7. SAME—ESTATES DEVISED—TRUST ESTATES.

Testatrix gave specified property to beneficiaries named, and provided that the residue should go to her sons and daughters, share and share alike. By a codicil she subjected the property given to a daughter to a trust for her benefit so long as she remained the wife of a person named. She died leaving such person her surviving husband. Held, that under Civ. Code, §§ 864, 865, providing that the author of a trust may devise property, subject to the execution of the trust, and declaring that the devisee acquires a legal estate in the property as against all persons except the trustee, the interest of the daughter when terminated by her death passed to her surviving husband, freed from the trust.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of S. C. G. Barclay, deceased. Proceedings in the nature of an action to determine heirship by H. A. Barclay, a beneficiary under the will of the deceased. From a decree determining the interests of claimants under the will of the deceased, and from a denial of a new trial, J. C. Blackinton appeals. Modified and affirmed.

M. W. Conkling, for appellant. Munson & Barclay, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by one J. C. Blackinton from a decree determining the respective interests of claimants under the will of deceased, given in a proceeding under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The deceased died testate January 3, 1895, leaving as her heirs at law five surviving children, H. A. Barclay, F. H. Barclay, D. E. Barclay, S. C. Blackinton (the wife of appellant), and Lenore Gillmore. Said S. C. Blackinton died intestate on January 29, 1896, leaving surviving her husband (appellant) and their minor son, Roswell, aged about two years. Said son Roswell died June 15, 1896, and the whole estate of S. C. Blackinton was subsequently distributed to appellant. As the successor of his deceased wife, appellant claims a portion of the estate of this deceased.

On June 18, 1894, deceased executed anolographic will. By this instrument, after directing payment of her just debts, she specifically devised certain real property, known as the "Alhambra property," and certain household goods, to her two daughters, "the coins" to H. A. Barclay and D. E. Barclay, and an oil painting to each of her five children. The will then provided as follows:

"The residue of my real estate, after my son, H. A. Barclay, has been paid what he has paid for me at various times, I will and bequeath to my children, Henry A. Barclay, Frank Herbert Barclay, Sallie C. Blackinton, David Eric Barclay, and Lenore Gillmore, share and share alike. In case any one, or more, should die, their share to be divided between the remaining children, unless they have heirs."

On August 28, 1894, she executed anolographic codicil to said will, which was as follows:

"I hereby give and bequeath unto my daughter, Mrs. Lenore Gillmore, in trust for the use of my daughter, Mrs. S. C. Blackinton, wife of J. C. Blackinton, all property and goods of all kinds named in my will to my daughter, S. C. Blackinton, said property to be held by said trustee so long as the said S. C. Blackinton remains the wife of said J. C. Blackinton: provided, however, that the rents, issues and profits thereof shall be paid by said trustee to said S. C. Blackinton, from time to time, as they are received, but in case the said property is sold, the proceeds of the interest of the said S. C. Blackinton shall be placed at interest by the said trustee and the interest thereof paid to S. C. Blackinton from time to time as the same is received, but in case the said S. C. Blackinton shall so request in writing, the proceeds of said property may, instead of being put at interest, be invested in real estate to be held by said trustee and the rents, issues and profits thereof be paid as aforesaid.

"Provided, further, that in case of the death of said J. C. Blackinton, or his divorce from said S. C. Blackinton, then and in that case the whole of the property so held in trust shall be conveyed to or delivered to S. C. Blackinton."

The controversy on this appeal is as to the effect of the codicil on the rights conferred by the will on the daughter S. C. Blackinton, and the effect of the provision in the original will regarding the payment to H. A. Barclay of such sums as he had paid out for the deceased. The latter of these questions is the question principally discussed by counsel. H. A. Barclay, who was the plaintiff in this proceeding, claimed by appropriate allegations in his complaint that he had paid out for deceased between July 8, 1889, and the time of her death, amounts aggregating $10,954.10, which he claimed should be paid to him from the property of the estate, together with interest, before any distribution to residuary legatees and devisees was made. All of these expenditures except some $325 were barred by the statute of limitations. The trial court sustained this claim of plaintiff, adjudging him to be entitled to receive from the estate before distribution of the residue to the residuary legatees and devisees the sum of $10,954.10, with interest. There is no contention on this appeal that the findings as to the payments by H. A. Barclay for deceased are not fully sustained by the evidence, or that he was not entitled to the interest awarded, if he was entitled to the principal. It is urged, first, that there was no legacy of the amounts paid by H. A. Barclay for deceased created by the will, and, second, that said Barclay has elected not to treat the same as a legacy, by proceeding as an ordinary creditor of deceased, and is now estopped to claim that there is any legacy in this regard. We have no doubt that the words of the will in this behalf should be held to constitute a legacy to H. A. Barclay of all amounts that he at various times had paid for her, payable out of the estate before any residuary legacy or devise is distributed. No particular words are essential to create a legacy or devise. The essential thing is that the intention of the testator to thereby make the gift from the property of the estate is shown. When such intention clearly appears, the courts will carry it into effect, if this can be done consistently with the rules of law applicable. While more formal and apt terms would probably have been used in this will if the same had been drawn by a lawyer, the intention of the testatrix to make this gift to H. A. Barclay, and to require its payment before any distribution is had to residuary devisees or legatees, could not have been made more clearly apparent.

The claim of appellant that H. A. Barclay elected to proceed as an ordinary creditor of deceased, and is now estopped to claim as a legatee, was made by allegations in the answer, and evidence was introduced on the trial for the purpose of supporting such allegations. The allegations were substantially that said H. A. Barclay presented a verified claim for all the amounts claimed herein; that the same was allowed by the executrix for $325 only, and rejected as to the balance; that said Barclay thereupon had the same approved by the judge for such amount, and then filed the claim as an allowed claim for $325; and that thereafter he petitioned the superior court for an order of sale of the real property of the estate for the purpose of paying all approved claims, including his own. The trial court failed to make any finding on these allegations, and its failure to do so is claimed to be error necessitating a reversal. The evidence was, however, insufficient to support a conclusion that said Barclay was so estopped, except, perhaps, as to such items as were not barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the presentation of the so-called creditor's claim, which amounts, as we have seen, aggregated not exceeding $325. Both executrix and judge were expressly prohibited by statute from allowing an item in the claim that was so barred (Code Civ. Proc. § 1499), and the rejection of the claim as to such items cannot be held to have been an adjudication as to the merits thereof. There was nothing in the language of the will which put said Barclay to the necessity of abandoning his rights as an ordinary creditor for such amounts as were not barred, if he desired to take as a legatee. The case is not at all like that of Smith v. Furnish, 70 Cal. 424, 12 Pac. 392, where a specific sum ($3,000) was bequeathed in compensation for services rendered the deceased. There the intention of the testator was clear that the party should receive that specific sum in lieu of such amount as might be lawfully due for the services, and proceedings against the estate for the enforcement of a creditor's claim might properly be held inconsistent therewith. But the provision in favor of said Barclay in the will before us was clearly intended not to take away from his rights as a creditor for such amounts as he might lawfully claim and enforce, but to give to him those amounts which the record shows he could not otherwise obtain. It is well settled that a judgment will not be reversed for failure to find upon an affirmative defense, if the record does not show that evidence was introduced in support thereof, and the same rule must obtain where the evidence introduced was not sufficient to support a finding in favor thereof if such finding had been made. The inclusion of the $325 and interest thereon in the amount ordered distributed to Barclay was practically simply an order for the payment of his allowed claim with interest.

The trial court held that by reason of the provisions of the codicil the interest of S. C. Blackinton in the estate was absolutely ended by her death, while still the wife of J. C. Blackinton, and that the property given to her went to the remaining four children, share and share alike. It, therefore, excluded J. C. Blackinton from all participation in the residue of said estate. In this the court erred. The Alhambra property, which was given by the will to S. C. Blackinton and Lenore Gillmore, share and share alike, has been lost to the estate by reason of foreclosure proceedings, and the provision in regard to its disposition in the event of the death of one of the beneficiaries is not material here. As we have seen, the will gave absolutely to said S. C. Blackinton and Lenore Gillmore certain household goods, to be divided among them as they might agree. It appears that such division has been made by the beneficiaries. It also gave them the books of deceased, and gave to said S. C. Blackinton one oil painting, and, after payment of the amounts given to H. A. Barclay, one-fifth of the residue of the real estate. The only provision in the will under which S. C. Blackinton could possibly be deprived of this property was one to the effect that, in case one or more of the children should die, their share was to be divided among the remaining children, "unless they have heirs." This provision apparently referred only to such a death as might occur before the death of the testatrix (Civ. Code, § 1336); but in any event it could not apply to S. C. Blackinton's interest, for she left a child surviving her, as well as her husband. This disposition by the will in favor of S. C. Blackinton was affected by the codicil only to the extent that a different arrangement was provided by the codicil. The will still controls except as modified by the codicil. Civ. Code, § 1287. The dispositions made by will are not to be disturbed by a codicil further than is necessary to give it effect. 1 Jarman on Wills, p. 176. The two are to be read together so as to make one consistent whole. In re Ladd, 94 Cal. 674, 30 Pac. 99; Matter of Scott, 141 Cal. 485, 75 Pac. 44. The only effect of the codicil was to subject the property so given to S. C. Blackinton to a trust (of which she was the beneficiary) so long as she remained the wife of J. C. Blackinton. The will as modified by the codicil absolutely devised this property to S. C. Blackinton, subject only to the execution of the trust. The author of a trust may devise property, subject to the execution of the trust (Civ. Code, § 864), and such a devisee acquires a legal estate in the property as against all persons except the trustee. Civ. Code, § 865. When the trust was terminated by the death of S. C. Blackinton, her interest in the property passed, freed from the trust, to her heirs, and appellant, J. C. Blackinton, is entitled to receive the same on distribution.

It follows that the decree should be modified so as to provide that the household goods and books assigned to S. C. Blackinton in the division between her and Lenore Gillmore shall be distributed to J. C. Blackinton, and that after the specific legacies are satisfied, and the amounts found due H. A. Barclay are paid, one-fifth of any residue shall be distributed to J. C. Blackinton as the successor of S. C. Blackinton, and the remaining four-fifths to the other children of deceased, or their successors, H. A. Barclay taking one-fifth as an heir of deceased and one-fifth as the successor of Lenore Gillmore, deceased, and D. E. Barclay taking one-fifth as an heir and one-fifth as the successor of F. H. Barclay.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the judgment in accord with the views we have expressed; said judgment, when so modified, to stand affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

The appellate court cannot decide contrary to the findings of the trial court, where the evidence is conflicting; the trial court, in the absence of a jury, being the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3983-3989.]

2. WILLS—PUBLICATION—REQUESTS FOR SUBSCRIBING WITNESSES.

An express declaration to the subscribing witnesses that the document executed was testatrix's will, or an express request that they attest it as witnesses, is not required; it being sufficient if testatrix, at the time, by words or conduct, conveyed to the witnesses the information that the instrument was her will, and that she desired their attestation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 305-317.]

3. SAME—EXECUTION—EVIDENCE.

A will was drawn at testatrix's request by her attorney, and was executed in his office, under the direction of his law partner. Testatrix said to him that she wanted him to call witnesses to "this will of hers," the persons who signed as witnesses being then in the room. The attorney thereupon asked them to witness the document, whereupon testatrix and the witnesses immediately signed the instrument in the presence of each other, there being written after her signature and above theirs the usual attestation clause reciting that they signed at her request and in her presence, and that she declared the instrument to be her last will in their presence. Held, to warrant a finding that the will was duly executed, though some of the witnesses could not recall what occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 700-723.]

4. SAME—DESTRUCTION—REVOCATION—EVIDENCE.

On an application for probate of a will, evidence held to warrant a finding that the will, properly executed, was in existence after testatrix's death, and that the will was not revoked prior to such event.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 732, 733.]

5. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—PARTY'S OWN WITNESS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, requiring proponents in a proceeding to establish a lost will to prove that it was in existence at testatrix's death, where B. and contestant, so far as proponent knew, were the only persons who had seen the will after testatrix's death, so that proponent was practically compelled to produce B. as a witness, and she testified that she did not remember seeing any handwriting on the paper at all, the paper being typewritten, proponent was entitled to show that B. had previously told proponent's attorney that the will was signed by testatrix and two witnesses, for the purpose of explaining the action of proponent's attorneys in calling B., and to show that they were surprised by her testimony.

6. APPEAL—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR—CONSENT.

Proponent in a will contest, having been compelled to produce a witness whose testimony was adverse, sought to introduce testimony of contradictory statements made by the witness, for the sole purpose of explaining his action in calling the witness, and to show that he was surprised by her testimony, to which contestant's counsel replied that he understood that proponent's counsel wanted the testimony explained as far as that was concerned, and that it was all right. Held, that contestant consented to the admission of the evidence, and could not object, on appeal, that it was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3591-3616.]

7. WILLS—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—PRELIMINARY PROOF—PRESUMPTIONS.

When proponent of a will, on a petition for probate, opens the proceedings by preliminary proof, as required by statute, he may rely on a presumption that the testator was of sound mind when the will was executed, as evidence in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 101-110.]

8. SAME—EVIDENCE—ATTENDING CIRCUMSTANCES.

Circumstances attending the execution of a will and the conduct of the testator at the time are admissible on the issue of testamentary capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 111-136.]

9. SAME—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

The presumption of sanity on the part of a testatrix, and evidence that she acted in a rational manner at the time the will was executed, was sufficient to establish a prima facie case of testamentary capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 103-137, 138.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

Application for probate of the will of Sarah Johnson, deceased, to which Della Sherbourne filed objections. From orders admitting the will to probate and denying contestant's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Davison, J. R. Wilder, and L. L. Miller, for appellant. T. M. Stewart and Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The contestant appeals from an order of the superior court admitting a will to probate, and from an order refusing her motion for a new trial. Sarah Johnson died on May 19, 1905. The petition for probate of her will alleged that the will was in writing, was signed by her in her lifetime, and was duly attested by two subscribing witnesses, and that after her death it was willfully destroyed by Della Sherbourne, the contestant. The written grounds of opposition filed by the contestant denied that the alleged will had been signed by the deceased, or had been by her declared to be her will in the presence of the witnesses, or at all, or that it had been signed by any witnesses, or that the deceased, at the time of the alleged execution thereof, was of sound and disposing mind and memory. The contest was tried before the court, without a jury, and the findings of the court were in favor of the proponent upon all the grounds of opposition.

It is earnestly contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings in regard to the execution of the will, the testamentary capacity of the deceased at the time, and the contents of the document found to have been executed as the will. It is sufficient to say with regard to these facts in dispute that the case comes within the rule that this court cannot decide contrary to the findings of the court below, where there is conflicting evidence, and there is substantial evidence tending to prove the facts found, and the additional rule that the trial court is the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses testifying before it. There was no very satisfactory evidence that at the time of its execution the deceased made an express declaration to the subscribing witnesses that the document executed was her will, or expressly requested them to attest it. But an express declaration and request are not absolutely necessary. It is sufficient if, at the time, she did, by words or conduct, convey to them the information that the instrument was her will, and that she desired them to attest it as witnesses. There was evidence to the effect that the will was drawn at her request by her attorney; that it was executed in his office, and under the direction of his partner, who was also an attorney accustomed to such matters and familiar with the requirements of the law regarding such execution; that she said to him that she wanted him to call witnesses to this will of hers; that the two persons who signed as witnesses were then in the room; that he thereupon asked them to witness the execution of the document; and that immediately she and they signed the document in the presence of each other, she as testator and they as attesting witnesses, there being written after her signature and above theirs the usual attestation clause reciting the facts that they signed at her request and in her presence, and that she declared that it was her last will in their presence. This was sufficient to justify the court in finding a due execution of the will. The fact that some of the witnesses to the transaction could not recollect what occurred is not sufficient to require us to overthrow the findings, where there are enough circumstances and testimony, aside from theirs, to justify the inference that the will was properly executed, as is the case here. In re Tyler's Estate, 121 Cal. 409, 53 Pac. 928; Rugg v. Rugg, 83 N. Y. 592; Patton v. Hope, 37 N. J. Eq. 527; Cilley v. Cilley, 34 Me. 164; Barnes v. Barnes, 66 Me. 286; Allison v. Allison, 46 Ill. 61, 92 Am. Dec. 237.

It is claimed that there is no evidence that the will was in existence after the death of the deceased. It may be conceded that the evidence that there were signatures to the document found in her trunk after her death, and claimed to be the will, is not very strong. But we cannot say that it was insufficient. It was shown that the contents of the will were first dictated to a stenographer, who took down the dictation in shorthand, and that but one longhand draft was made thereof by the stenographer, and that this draft was typewritten. From this the inference follows that this draft was the identical paper which was signed by the testator and the witnesses. It was also shown by the contestant's testimony, and also by another witness, that after the death of the testator a typewritten document was found in her trunk, which was in all respects identical with the typewritten draft of the will made by the stenographer before its execution; but the contestant testified that it had no signatures appended, and the other witness claimed that she could not remember that it did. Their testimony on this point was somewhat hesitating, and, indeed, the contestant, in one of her answers, when testifying, said: "I just looked at the signatures." There was other testimony that the will was in the possession of the testator two days before her death, and was then produced by her and examined by one of her attorneys, who saw the signatures appended; that the testator declared that it was just as she wanted it; that it was then put back in her trunk and locked up; that between that time and her death she was unable to leave her room; and that a nurse was constantly in attendance upon her, who would have known, if any such transaction as the destruction of the will had taken place, and that she had no knowledge of any such occurrence. From these facts the court might properly have concluded that the will was not revoked or destroyed prior to her death, and that the testimony that the typewritten document bore no signatures was false.

Mrs. Beard was called by the proponents, and interrogated concerning the destruction of the will by the contestant after the death of the testator. It was she who, in connection with the contestant, testified to the finding of an unsigned copy of the will in the testator's trunk after her death. Her testimony as to the absence of signatures was very evasive, and generally negative, as, for example, that she did not remember seeing any signatures. She testified that she had a glance at the inside of the will. In further examination the following occurred: "Q. You didn't see any handwriting or pen writing on the paper at all? A. No, sir; I don't remember of any." This testimony by a friend of the only heir as to what she saw on the occasion of the finding of a paper in the form of a will in the testator's effects was some evidence tending to show that the paper was not signed. Her testimony indicated that she could have seen the signatures if there had been any, and, so far as it went, it was unfavorable to the proponents on the point. Over the objection of the contestant, and solely for the purpose of explaining to the court the reason for calling her as their witness, the proponent, after laying the proper foundation therefor, was permitted to prove that prior to the trial she had told proponent's attorney that on the occasion in question she had read the will; that it gave Della Sherbourne only one dollar, and gave the balance to the testator's brother and sisters, and made Mr. Hester her executor; and that it was signed by Mrs. Johnson and two witnesses. It is conceded that, where a witness is called to testify for a party as to a fact, and gives only negative testimony, as that he has no knowledge on the subject, or no recollection as to the existence or non-existence of the fact, and his testimony cannot be said to be injurious to the party calling him, such party cannot be allowed to introduce evidence by way of impeachment to show that he made statements out of court to the party or his attorney, inconsistent with his testimony, and showing knowledge and recollection of the fact. People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 75 Pac. 101; In re Kennedy's Estate, 104 Cal. 429, 38 Pac. 93.

In case of a lost will proof of its existence at the death of the testator must be made by the proponent. Code Civ. Proc. § 1339. This witness and the contestant, so far as the proponent knew, were the only persons who had seen the will after the testator's death. The proponent was practically compelled to produce the witness. The impeaching evidence was offered, and was received by the court for the sole purpose of explaining the action of proponent's attorneys in calling the witness, and that they were surprised by her testimony. This was clearly stated at the close of the impeaching testimony, and was apparently understood and consented to by the contestant, for her attorney then responded: "Yes, sir; I understand that Mr. Stewart wants the testimony explained as far as that is concerned. That is all right." Under these circumstances the rule that, when a witness called by a party has no knowledge or recollection of the fact inquired of, and gives substantially no adverse testimony on the subject, explanatory testimony is inadmissible, is not strictly applicable. The testimony was evidently considered by the court and counsel as adverse and injurious to the proponent. We also think the contestant consented to the explanation, and cannot now complain, even if it were conceded to be inadmissible. The trial was had without a jury, and doubtless counsel were satisfied that the court could disregard the testimony so far as it tended to prove that there were no signatures.

When a proponent of a will, upon the trial, opens the proceedings by preliminary proof, as required by the statute, he may rely on the presumption that the testator was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the will. Such presumption is evidence in his favor. The circumstances attending such execution, and the conduct of the testator at the time, may also be considered on that point. In the present case the sanity of the testator was sufficiently established by this presumption and by the circumstances indicating that she was at the time acting in a rational manner. This evidence may have been slight; but it was sufficient to make out a prima facie case, and it fully warranted the denial of the motion for a nonsuit, or dismissal of the cause, made by the contestant at the close of the proponent's preliminary proof.

The absence of one of the subscribing witnesses was sufficiently explained. The persons who were believed to be the subscribing witnesses were called to testify. One of them had no recollection whatever of the matter. The other testified to the execution of the will, and the attestation by himself and the other person as witnesses. The attestation of a will is not a matter of great importance to the witness, and a failure by such persons to remember the occurrence is not so unusual as to justify the refusal of probate on that account, if there is other satisfactory evidence of the due execution.

With respect to the insufficiency of the proof of the destruction of the will, we may add that, if the court believed from the facts we have mentioned that the will was in existence after the death of the testator, and that it was locked in her trunk a day or two before her death and while she was in her last sickness, it may have believed the testimony of the two witnesses, Della Sherbourne and Mrs. Beard, to the fact of the destruction of the paper found in the said trunk, and have refused to believe their statements that it was unsigned. This was a matter addressed to the conscience of the trial judge, and we cannot interfere with his decision on the subject.

The judgment admitting the will to probate and the order refusing a new trial are affirmed.

CRANDALL v. PARKS. (L. A. 1,923.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—SCOPE AND EXTENT—TIME OF APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 1, an exception to a judgment, because not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed, where appeal from the judgment is not taken within 60 days after its rendition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 1888.]

2. PLEADING—ANSWER—ADMISSIONS BY FAILURE TO DENY.

In an action to rescind an exchange, a denial that a representation was made at all did not make an issue on the allegation of the complaint that defendant knew, when making the representation, that it was untrue, and hence under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 462, it was admitted that the representation, if made, was made with knowledge that it was untrue.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 1228.]

3. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—ACTION TO RESCIND—TRIAL—FINDINGS OF FACT—SUFFICIENCY—ADMISSIONS IN PLEADINGS.

In an action to rescind an exchange, a finding that defendant knew that a representation was untrue, or that, if he believed it true, the representation was not warranted by the information he had, Civ. Code, § 1572, was unnecessary, where it was admitted that he knew the representation was untrue, under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 462, by a failure to deny that allegation of the complaint.

4. FRAUD—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—MATTERS OF FACT OR OF OPINION.

A representation that one had owned land for about 15 years, had lived thereon, and was well acquainted with its quality and value, and that the actual value thereof was a specified amount an acre, was a representation of fact, within the rule that, where a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion as a fact, so that the other party may reasonably so treat it, then the statement is not of opinion, but a representation of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fraud, §§ 12, 13.]

5. SAME—RELIANCE ON REPRESENTATIONS.

On an exchange of property, one party may rely on the representation of the other as to the value of land remotely situated in another state, which he has never seen, and cannot personally examine.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fraud, § 20.]

6. SAME.

On an exchange of property, one party may rely on the representation of the other as to the ownership of personal property.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by H. J. Crandall against R. N. Parks. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Francis and Dadmun & Belieu, for appellant. F. P. Willard, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Defendant appealed from a judgment rescinding a contract for the exchange of property, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The appeal from the order denying a new trial has been dismissed. The appeal from the judgment was not taken within 60 days after its rendition and entry, and therefore the exceptions to the decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 1.

It is claimed that the findings are not sufficient to support the judgment. They show substantially the following facts: Plaintiff was the owner and in possession of certain land in San Diego county, in this state, of the value of $2,500, and certain personal property thereon of the value of $214. Defendant, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to exchange the same for 80 acres of land in the state of Oregon owned by him, and a restaurant outfit in the city of San Diego in this state, claimed to be worth $400, and found not to exceed $225 in value, represented to plaintiff that he had owned the Oregon land for about 15 years, had lived thereon, and was well acquainted with its quality, character, and value, and that the reasonable and actual value thereof was $40 per acre, and also that he was the owner of the restaurant outfit, including a hot water tank and an ice chest or refrigerator of the value of $40. The value of the Oregon land did not in fact exceed the sum of $500, or $6.25 per acre. Neither the hot water tank nor refrigerator belonged to defendant. Plaintiff never saw the Oregon land, and had no knowledge as to its value, nature, or quality, except the statements of defendant in regard thereto, and he had no information as to the ownership of the restaurant outfit, except that given him by defendant. Defendant knew this. An exchange of the properties was effected, plaintiff being induced to make the same solely by reason of such representations as to value and ownership, upon which he wholly relied. Defendant well knew the plaintiff in making the exchange relied and acted solely upon these representations.

There was no finding that defendant knew or believed at the time he made the representation as to the value of the Oregon land that the same was untrue, or that, if he believed it true, the representation was not warranted by the information he then had, and defendant urges that, in the absence of such element, there was no fraud on his part. Civ. Code, § 1572. There was, however, no necessity for such a finding in view of the state of the pleadings. The complaint alleged, in terms, that defendant knew at the time he made said representation to plaintiff that it was false and untrue. This allegation was not denied by the answer, the defendant resting upon a denial that he made the representation at all. This denial did not make an issue upon the question of defendant's knowledge as to the falsity of the representation, if made. The only issue was as to whether the representation was made. If made, it was admitted by the failure to deny in the answer that it was made with knowledge that it was not true. The allegation of the complaint in this behalf, not being controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. A finding is not necessary as to a fact admitted by the pleadings, as where a fact is alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer. First Nat. Bank v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 366, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64. It is therefore unnecessary to consider further defendant's contention on this point. What we have said in regard to the representations as to the Oregon land is equally applicable to the representation as to the ownership of the articles of personal property of which defendant was not the owner.

It is claimed that the representation as to the value of the Oregon land was nothing more than a mere expression of his own opinion as to the value on the part of the defendant, and therefore that an action will not lie on account thereof. This, however, is not the effect of a fair construction of the findings. A statement as to the value of property is not always made as a mere expression of opinion upon which the other party has no right to rely. It may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made. When it is such, it is like any other representation of fact, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation warranting rescission. The rule in regard to this matter is stated by Mr. Pomeroy as follows: "Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion, and does not state it as the mere expression of his own opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to the transaction, so that the other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, then the statement clearly becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule, and may be a fraudulent misrepresentation." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878. He further says that the statements which most frequently come within this branch of the rule are those concerning value. There is nothing in the opinion in Norris v. Crandall, 133 Cal. xix, 65 Pac. 568, in conflict with this view. The court was there discussing the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that there was no fraudulent misrepresentation of fact, and, in affirming that conclusion, said, in effect, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conclusion that the expression as to value was made and understood as a mere expression of opinion only. The court there said, in accord with the rule we have stated, that there would be force in the appellant's contention, "if the evidence compelled the conclusion that the exchange of properties was brought about by a false statement of value by defendants, made as a substantive fact on which plaintiffs relied as a fact, and not as defendant's opinion as to the fact." The findings sufficiently bring the case within the operation of this rule.

That plaintiff never made or commenced any investigation for himself as to the value of the Oregon land or the ownership of the personal property, that he believed and relied solely on the statements and representations of defendant in regard thereto, and that he was induced to make the exchange solely by reason thereof, are all fully established by the findings, which are conclusive upon this appeal. We know of no reason why defendant should be allowed to maintain that plaintiff was not entitled to rely, without investigation on his part, upon a representation as to the value of land so remotely situated, which he had never seen and could not personally examine—a representation, "to the truth of which the party has deliberately pledged his faith." See Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 681 to 684, 58 Pac. 272 to 274. He was clearly entitled also to rely upon the representation as to the ownership of the personal property. Oppenheimer v. Clunle, 142 Cal. 313, 75 Pac. 899, is not in point. There the party had not relied on the representation made at all, but had investigated for himself as to the truth thereof, and was charged with all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end with diligence and completeness.

Complaint is made that the trial court erred in admitting the evidence of three witnesses as to the value of the Oregon land, the objection being that they were not sufficiently shown to be qualified to testify as experts concerning such value. No such specific objection appears to have been made in the lower court, the only objection there made being the general objection that the proposed testimony was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. This was hardly sufficient to bring to the attention of the trial court the objection now made. However this may be, the evidence in the record was sufficient to warrant a ruling that the witnesses were qualified to testify on the subject.

There is no other point made by defendant that is available to him on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

STEELE v. SAN LUIS OBISPO COUNTY.
(L. A. 1,998.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1908.)

TAXATION—RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID—IRREGULARITIES.

Pol. Code, § 3682, requires the clerk of the board of supervisors, when delivering the assessment book after equalization by the board to the county auditor, to make his affidavit that as clerk he has kept correct minutes of all the acts of the board, and that all alterations in assessments directed have been made and entered, and that no alterations have been made therein, except those authorized. Section 3732 requires the auditor, after computing the taxes, to deliver the corrected assessment book to the tax collector, with his affidavit attached thereto that he received the assessment book from the clerk of the board of supervisors, with his affidavit affixed thereto, and that he has corrected it to conform to the requirements of the state board of equalization, etc. Section 38¹¹ provides for the recovery of taxes paid on void assessments. The affidavit required by section 3682 did not accompany the assessment book for a certain year, and was not made until two days before the day noticed for the sale for delinquent taxes. The affidavit of the auditor was never made. No change or alteration of any kind had been made by the board of supervisors, and the county auditor had complied with the law as to the computing of the taxes, and delivered the book at the appointed time. Held, that an owner of property who paid taxes on his property on the day of the sale for delinquent taxes, under protest to prevent such sale, cannot recover the amount so paid, because of the failure of the clerk and auditor to attach their affidavits to the assessment book.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by T. J. Steele against county of San Luis Obispo. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McD. R. Venable, Albert Nelson, and Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. Charles A. Palmer and W. H. Spencer, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to recover certain state and county taxes for the fiscal year 1904-05, with penalties and costs, paid by plaintiff and his assignors under protest. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from such judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The payments were made by the taxpayers on the day noticed by the tax collector for the sale of the property for delinquent taxes, and were made for the purpose of preventing such sale and the issuance of certificates of sale thereon. The basis of plaintiff's claim was the failure of the clerk of the board of supervisors, when delivering the assessment book after equalization by the board to the county auditor, to accompany the same with his affidavit, as required by section 3682 of the Political Code, and the failure of the auditor to make or attach to the assessment book the affidavit required by section 3732 of the Political Code. Section 3682 requires the clerk to accompany the book with his affidavit to the effect that as clerk of the board he has kept correct minutes of all the acts of the board touching alterations in the assessment book, and that all alterations agreed to or directed to be made have been made and entered in the book, and that no changes or alterations have been made therein except those authorized. No such affidavit was made by the clerk when he delivered the book, or until after publication of the delinquent list and notice of sale. Two days before the day noticed for sale he did make, subscribe, and attach to the book an affidavit in the form prescribed by the section of the Code. Section 3732 requires the auditor, after computing the taxes on the various assessments, to deliver the corrected assessment book on or before the second Monday in October to the tax collector, with an affidavit attached thereto, and by him subscribed, stating that he received the assessment book of the taxable property from the clerk of the board of supervisors, with his affidavit thereto affixed, and that he has corrected it and made it to conform to the requirements of the state board of equalization, and that he has reckoned the respective sums due on taxes, and has added up the columns of valuation, taxes, and acreage, as required by law. This affidavit was never made. As a matter of fact, no change or alteration of any kind had been made by the board of supervisors or clerk in said assessment book, and the county auditor had complied with all requirements of the law as to the computing of the taxes fully and completely, and delivered the book with the taxes so computed thereon to the tax collector at the appointed time. The various assessments were in all respects valid save for the omission of such affidavits, and the amounts designated as taxes opposite the respective assessments were the amounts of taxes due from the various taxpayers for state and county taxes for the fiscal year 1904-05.

We are satisfied that under such circumstances the plaintiff should not be allowed to recover the taxes paid by him and his assignors. It may be conceded, in accord with the decision of this court in Miller v. County of Kern, 137 Cal. 521, 70 Pac. 549, that without such affidavits annexed to the assessment book the assessments were defective and not legally enforceable by the tax collector. They were defective and nonenforceable, however, solely because they were not properly authenticated by affidavits of the clerk and auditor showing certain requisites to have been complied with. When it was made to appear in this action that all such requisites had in fact been complied with by these officers, there was presented simply a case of taxpayers who have paid only their fair and just proportion of the taxes levied for the year, seeking to recover the same upon what has been made to appear is, under the facts, a most technical defect in no degree affecting any substantial right. Such a case is clearly subject to the doctrine enunciated in Couts v. Cornell, 147 Cal. 560, 82 Pac. 194, 109 Am. St. Rep. 168. That action, it is true, was one in equity, the plaintiff seeking a decree declaring certain assessments and the sales and certificates thereunder invalid because of a technical defect in the description of property in the assessment, and enjoining the issuance of any deed in pursuance of such certificates. But the rules based upon the maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity are applicable in suits to recover taxes paid. The idea upon which such a suit is predicated is that the county or municipality has received that which in justice it ought not to retain, and therefore, when the proceedings have been simply irregular, the action will not lie. There must be something further. The tax must be void, a mere nullity. Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 419. Section 3819, Pol. Code, providing for the recovery of taxes paid on void assessments, was not intended to lay down any different rule. In accord with the views expressed in Couts v. Cornell, supra, plaintiff and his assignors, under the facts here appearing, justly owed the several amounts of taxes charged against them on the assessment book. There was a valid existing obligation upon them to pay such taxes. Assuming that payment thereof could not have been enforced in the absence of the affidavits required by statute, and that a sale by the tax collector under those conditions would not have passed the title, that case establishes that they could not, without paying or offering to pay the taxes due, have obtained a decree relieving their property from the cloud created by the assessment or preventing the execution of a deed purporting to convey that property for delinquent taxes. Instead of asking this well-recognized equitable relief, they have discharged their obligations by paying the amount thereof, and now claim to be entitled to recover the amounts they owed and paid, not on the ground that they did not justly owe the same, but solely because of what has been shown to be a technical omission in the assessment book by the clerk and auditor. The answer to their claim must be the same as was the answer to the claim of plaintiff in Couts v. Cornell, supra.

No special claim has been made in regard to such portion of the amount as was paid for penalties and costs, and we have therefore not felt called upon to consider whether a recovery should be had therefor, even though the taxes themselves are not recoverable. Plaintiff and his assignors are entitled to no particular consideration in this regard, as it must have been apparent to them that they were relying upon a pure technicality to save them from paying the taxes they justly owed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, J. VERDUGO CANON WATER CO. et al. v.
VERDUGO et al. (L. A. 1,797.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. WATERS—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

Where land in one common ownership is riparian to a stream, the waters thereof, including not only the surface stream, but also the underground flow constituting a part of the stream, are not merely appurtenant to the land as a right acquired by prescription or appropriation, but are a part of the land itself as parcel thereof.

2. PARTITION—DECREE—CONSTRUCTION.

A decree which partitioned land riparian to streams, and which apportioned the waters thereof to separate tracts, did not change the character of the rights of the respective parties to the waters of the streams; but the rights assigned to each tract was a riparian right.

3. WATERS—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—DIVISION.

A party will not be permitted to decrease underground waters essential to the existence and preservation of surface water, to the depletion of the surface water, to the injury of those to whom the surface water has been assigned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 113.]

4. PARTITION—DECREE—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a decree which partitions lands riparian to streams apportions the waters thereof, without specifically disposing of the underground waters, the underground waters essential for the preservation of the surface streams undiminished cannot be diverted; but the surplus belongs to the riparian lands to be used by the owners in accordance with the law of riparian rights, except that the partition cuts off from this right all lands except those tracts which extend to some portion of the underground flow.

5. WATERS—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—WELL-DEFINED CHANNEL.

Lands riparian to a stream, divided in part of its course into distinct channels, was partitioned, and the waters of the stream were apportioned among the various tracts, without specifically disposing of the underground flow. Practically all the lands were alike riparian to the whole of the stream constituted by the underground flow. Held that, in determining the right to use the underground flow, it must be treated as one stream, and each parcel of land is entitled to its share thereof, whether it comes from the underflow supporting the particular surface stream set apart for it by the partition, or from some other part of the underflow, except that no owner may diminish the surface stream to the injury of any party entitled to it; the riparian rights below including the right to prevent undue interference with the underflow above.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 109.]

6. SAME.

Necessity is not the sole measure of right to unappropriated underground water, and in a suit to restrain one from appropriating for irrigation purposes underground water a finding that he has never taken or used more water than reasonably necessary for the proper irrigation of his land is insufficient, since his right is limited to a proper proportion of the underground water as compared with the rights of others.

7. SAME.

In a suit to restrain defendant from taking underground waters to the depletion of a surface stream, evidence held to require the court to ascertain whether the taking has depleted the surface stream, and to determine the amount of the decrease of the surface water resulting from the taking, and to enjoin defendant from decreasing the surface flow, unless plaintiff was estopped from asserting his rights.

8. SAME.

To establish the right to an injunction to restrain the taking of water, it is not necessary that plaintiff should be able to prove the extent of his injury with absolute precision, and where the taking of water by defendant is a wrongful taking of that which belongs to plaintiff, and is of substantial quantity, and causes him substantial injury, the court is not excused from making any finding on the subject by the fact that the evidence is indefinite as to the exact quantity taken or the exact amount of the injury.

9. SAME.

One whose water supply has ceased is not on that account entitled to use the supply of another, and the fact of the failure of his own water supply has no bearing on the question, except to show that he was acting from necessity, and not from a wanton desire to appropriate to himself the property of others.

10. SAME.

Where one sunk a well on his land, and pumped underground water for his private use, and thereby interfered with the rights of another, the latter is not limited to an action for damages; but in a proper case he may obtain an injunction to restrain the continuance of the wrongful act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 117.]

11. SAME.

Defendant sunk a well on his land, and pumped underground water for his own use, and thereby interfered with the water rights of plaintiff. It did not appear that defendant was induced to sink his well by any act or word of plaintiff, or that he relied on the silence of plaintiff as evidence of his own right or of plaintiff's consent; nor did it appear that plaintiff intended that defendant should act in reliance on his silence, or expected that he would do so. It was not shown that plaintiff was under any duty toward defendant to disclose any claim he might have to the water, nor that defendant did not know, as well as plaintiff, that the pumping of the well would decrease plaintiff's water. Held, that plaintiff was not estopped from maintaining a suit to restrain defendant from continuing to take water.

12. ESTOPPEL — NATURE — PERMITTING IMPROVEMENTS.

A party, to be estopped, must intend, or must be so situated that he should be held to have expected, that the other party shall act, and the other party must, by words, conduct, or silence of the first party, be induced to do what he would not otherwise do; but the mere fact that the latter expended money in improvements on his own land with the knowledge of another and without objection from him creates no estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, §§ 264-267.]

13. SAME.

A mere passive acquiescence, where one is under no duty to speak, does not raise an estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, §§ 285-287.]

14. EQUITY—"LACHES."

The defense of laches does not rest entirely on lapse of time; but to constitute laches there must be something more than mere delay by plaintiff, accompanied by an expenditure of money or effort on the part of defendant, and it must also appear that it will be inequitable to enforce plaintiff's claim.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 212, 213.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 3970, 3971; vol. 8, p. 7700.]

15. WATERS—IRRIGATION—DETERMINATION OF RIGHTS—LACHES.

Plaintiffs and defendant being tenants in common of the rights in an underground water flow, defendant sank a well on his own land, and erected a pump and a distributing system to irrigate his own land. Held, in proceedings to determine the several rights in the water, that defendant could not urge that plaintiffs were guilty of laches in permitting his expenditure without complaint, since there was nothing in the mere erection of the water plant which would invade plaintiffs' rights and call for protest from plaintiffs; such invasion being committed only by the pumping of an excessive amount of water, and since after the commencement of the pumping plaintiffs had done nothing to induce defendant to believe plaintiffs assented to defendant's act.

16. ESTOPPEL—NATURE—ACTS CONSTITUTING ESTOPPEL.

One embarking with others in a common enterprise to use common property for the common benefit at a common expense owes to the others the duty, where he proposes to reserve a part of the benefit to himself exclusively, to inform the others fully in regard to it; and where he does not he is estopped from asserting his claim after the others have incurred the expense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, §§ 285–287.]

17. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Circumstances held not to show that one was estopped from taking by means of pumps his reasonable share of underground waters for use on his land for irrigation.

18. SAME—NATURE OF ESTOPPEL.

No estoppel can exist, unless the party invoking it was led to place himself in the prejudicial position in part, at least, by his own ignorance of the rights of the other party, or his own lack of knowledge of the true state of the title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, § 138.]

19. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that defendant is estopped to take by means of pumps underground water above a dam erected by him and plaintiff for their common benefit and at their common expense, and use the same on lands below the dam, so far as the same will decrease the amount that will flow to and be intercepted by the dam.

20. WATERS—APPORTIONMENT.

Land riparian to a stream was partitioned, and the waters of the stream were apportioned among various tracts, without specifically disposing of the underground flow. Some of the owners of the land entitled to a certain proportion of the stream erected a dam at their joint expense for the purpose of intercepting underground waters. Held, that no person above or below the dam should be allowed to take by means of pumps more than his reasonable part of the available surplus waters of the underground waters, where such taking affected the surface stream or prevented another person from obtaining his reasonable share, and no person of those entitled to use the water collected by the dam could pump water above the dam for use on his lands below, where such pumping decreased the flow at the dam; and the rights in the surplus of the underground waters must be adjusted by ascertaining the total average amount available and the amount required by each party when used economically, and on that basis apportioning to each his share.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Verdugo Cañon Water Company and others against Teodoro Verdugo and others to quiet title to water rights. From a judgment quieting title, plaintiffs and defendant E. M. Ross appeal. Reversed.

Appel, for respondent Verdugo. John S. Chapman, Hunsaker & Britt, Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, Robert E. Ross, and Catesby E. Thom, for respondent Thom.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs herein appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The defendant E. M. Ross appeals from certain parts of the judgment. All the appeals are presented upon the same record.

The action is by the Verdugo Cañon Water Company and some 300 other persons, who are its stockholders, to determine and quiet title to certain water rights claimed by them in a stream of water flowing in the Verdugo Cañon, and to enjoin the defendants from taking the water alleged to belong to the plaintiffs. It is alleged that the plaintiffs other than the corporation are the owners of lands bordering on the stream; that as such land-owners they have the right to take three-fourths of its waters, flowing above and below the surface of the ground, for use on their lands, in proportion to the area of the respective holdings; that the corporation was organized for the purpose of diverting said waters from said stream and distributing them to the plaintiffs and other persons entitled thereto; that it has constructed works, pipes, and ditches for that purpose, and is now engaged in said diversion and distribution; and that the defendants claim adversely the waters to which the plaintiffs are entitled, and without right are taking and using said waters, to the plaintiffs' injury.

The lands comprising the La Canada Ranch and the San Rafael Ranch in Los Angeles county were, prior to 1871, held in common ownership by a number of persons. The two ranches adjoined; La Canada lying north of San Rafael. In that year, in an action between them for that purpose, a partition of the two ranches was made by judicial decree. Verdugo Cañon begins near the base of Sister Elsie Mountain in La Canada Ranch, and extends from thence southerly across the line between the two ranches and for several miles into the San Rafael Ranch, where, after passing through a rather narrow gorge, it opens or expands into a wide plain, forming part of what is usually known as the "San Fernando Valley." The floor of the cañon is comparatively level, and varies in width from about 700 feet to something over 1,800 feet, with high hills or mountains on each side. In these mountains are a number of side cañons in which small rills flow; the water sinking in the ground either before or immediately after reaching the floor of the cañon. During times of heavy rain, and for a few days afterward, a stream of water flows down the cañon, through all the lands in controversy, and into the Los Angeles river, some distance below. This is of infrequent occurrence, and, as it has no particular bearing upon the questions presented, no further consideration need be given to it.

At the time the partition decree was made, three streams arose in the cañon, within the San Rafael Ranch, and flowed for some distance separately, and then united and flowed for some distance on the surface down the cañon, finally sinking in the sand and gravel. These streams oozed out of the loose material composing the bed of the cañon at three places nearly of the same level or altitude, almost on the same line extending laterally across the cañon, and near the northerly line of the "cañon tract" hereinafter mentioned. One arose near the east side and somewhat further up the cañon than the other two. It is called the "east side stream." The other two arose nearer the western side, and united in a single stream before joining with the east side stream. The stream composed of these two is called the "west side stream." In partitioning the ranches the waters of these streams were apportioned among and set apart to certain of the lands assigned in severalty. A tract of 2,629.01 acres, much of it unfit for irrigation, was set off to the defendant Teodoro Verdugo. It embraces the entire cañon from the narrows for several miles toward the north and includes the places whereon the aforesaid streams arose to the surface. It will here be designated as the "cañon tract." The east side stream, so far as required, was set apart to the cañon tract for irrigation and other uses thereon. The combined west side stream, and any surplus of the east side stream remaining after the cañon tract was supplied therefrom, were set off to a large body of land situated on the plain below the narrows, for irrigation and other uses thereon. These lower lands covered an area of about 3,333 acres, and were generally fit for irrigation. They were divided and set off in severalty in tracts of various areas to 21 different owners. For convenience of designation the west side stream was divided into 10,000 parts. It was apportioned to the land at the ratio of three ten-thousandths of the water to each acre of the land. A large part of this 3,333 acres was afterward subdivided and sold in smaller tracts, each having its proportionate share of the waters, originally assigned. The plaintiffs are the owners of about three-fourths of the land to which this water was assigned, and the defendants C. E. Thom and E. M. Ross, respectively, each own about one-eighth thereof. The land of the plaintiffs, collectively, is entitled to three-fourths of this water, and that of Thom and Ross, respectively, to one-eighth thereof. The Verdugo Cañon Water Company diverts this water for all the interested parties, including Thom and Ross, by means of dams and diverting works to the expense of which Thom and Ross contributed one-eighth each. Their shares of the water are delivered to their respective pipes near the diverting works. The defendant E. M. Ross has also become the owner of several hundred acres of land of the cañon tract, and has an orchard of about 100 acres thereon, upon which he uses water from the east side stream for irrigation.

In 1871, and for years thereafter, there appears to have been sufficient water in the streams for all the uses to which it was then applied by the persons entitled thereto. As years passed, the area of land set out to orchards, vineyards, and other fruits by the plaintiffs and defendants was very much increased, and the orchards of citrous fruits also required more and more water as they grew older, so that about the year 1891 the water began to be insufficient. In the year 1893 a series of dry years began, and they continued until 1902, when the present action was begun. From the increased demand and the decreased supply the result has been that during and after 1893 the water naturally flowing on the surface was not enough to keep alive and properly nourish the trees and plants on the land entitled to share in it. From time to time the parties, or some of them, increased their individual supply of water by sinking wells deep in the strata of sand and gravel underlying the bed of the cañon and the plain below, and pumping water therefrom. For a like purpose in 1894 the Verdugo Cañon Water Company and the defendants C. E. Thom and E. M. Ross jointly purchased about 8 acres of land, part of the cañon tract, situated at the head of the narrows, and extending across the cañon from the west wall towards, but not quite reaching, the east wall thereof. Upon this tract, at joint expense, in the proportion of three-fourths to the company and one-eighth each to Thom and Ross, they have constructed what is called a submerged dam, part of its length consisting of a cement wall and part of wooden cribs, by which the water flowing underground in the sand and gravel of the cañon is collected and diverted, and this water has ever since then been distributed to the respective parties along with the surface flow of the west side stream, and in the same proportion. This dam, so far as it has been constructed, is about 500 feet long, including the cribs. Further construction thereof ceased in 1896. For many years past all the waters of the east side stream have been used on the cañon tract, and there has been no surplus therefrom to add to the waters of the west side stream.

In 1898 E. M. Ross sunk a well in the cañon at a point about 1,000 feet above the submerged dam, and near the east side of the cañon, in lands constituting a part of the cañon tract. The well was completed in March, 1899, and in May, 1899, he began pumping, and has ever since then, during the irrigating seasons, pumped therefrom a stream of water averaging a flow of 18 miners' inches flowing under 4-inch pressure. He has used this water on land in the cañon tract, and also on other lands, and he claims the absolute right to use it on any other land, as he pleases, without regard to the effect on the amount of water collected by the dam, or flowing in the west side stream. In 1897 Teodoro Verdugo sunk a well in the cañon and placed a pump therein some 2 miles above the dam and near the point where the streams formerly rose to the surface, which he began to pump in the spring of 1898, and from which he has ever since, during the irrigating seasons, pumped a stream of about 35 miners' inches of water, which he has used to irrigate lands in the cañon tract, claiming the right to do so. The defendant C. E. Thom also has three wells near, but above, the Verdugo well, from the easterly one of which he claims the right to pump water for irrigation of his land below the dam, or upon any other land; but no water has been pumped therefrom. Thom and Ross have each put down wells in the cañon, at a point about 1,500 feet below the dam, from which they each pump water to irrigate land of the San Rafael Ranch below the dam and entitled to water from the west side stream under the decree, and each claims the right to continue to do so. These several diversions of underground water by the defendants for their exclusive use, and these claims of right to do so, occasioned this suit.

1. The partition decree did not change the character of the rights of the respective parties to the waters of the cañon. It created no new rights or estate therein, but merely divided and apportioned the pre-existing rights and estates. Prior thereto the lands were in one common ownership, and the part of the San Rafael Ranch here involved was all riparian to that stream. Its waters were therefore not merely appurtenant thereto, as a right acquired by prescription or appropriation would be, but were a part of the land itself, as parcel thereof. This was the case with respect to each of the three surface streams then flowing, and also with respect to all the underground flow which constituted a part of said streams. In making the partition of these waters the right to the use of the surface streams, which previously attached to the entire ranch, was completely severed from the other parts thereof and transferred to the lands to which water was assigned. The right thus assigned to each tract by the partition was a riparian right, and it continues to possess that character, with all its attributes, since the partition as fully as before. With respect to the two surface streams, known as the "east side stream" and the "west side stream," respectively, the partition effected a complete separation of the waters; the east side stream being given so far as necessary, and for many years past this has meant all of it, to the cañon tract exclusively, and the west side stream exclusively to the lands below the mouth of the cañon. The water of this west side stream was not actually separated among the owners of the several tracts. It was merely apportioned between them, giving to each in common a certain number of undivided shares of the whole. It is obvious that the continued presence in the soil, sand, and gravel composing the bed of the cañon of a sufficient quantity of water to supply and support these surface streams in their natural state is essential to their existence and preservation, and that the parties have as clear a right to have this quantity remain underground for that purpose as they have to the stream upon the surface. Neither party should be permitted to decrease this necessary quantity of underground water, to the depletion of the surface stream and the injury of those to whom it has been assigned. This much is clear from the previous decisions of this court. Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 621, 57 Pac. 585; McClintock v. Hudson, 141 Cal. 280, 74 Pac. 849; Cohen v. La Canada Co., 142 Cal. 439, 76 Pac. 47. And it is conceded by all the parties, except the defendant Verdugo.

The partition did not specifically deal with or dispose of the underground waters. The only right concerning them which is affected by it at all was the right to have them remain undisturbed for the preservation of the surface streams undiminished, and this is a mere incident arising from the necessity of keeping the disposition of the surface flow effectual. There may possibly be a quantity of this underground water which could be taken without affecting the surface streams, even if taken above the point where the surface water is diverted into flumes or ditches. The defendants claim that there is a large amount thus available for use. All of the underflow, whether necessary to preserve the surface flow above or not, becomes available for such taking as soon as it passes below such points of diversion. The right to make use of all such surplus still belongs to the lands riparian thereto in the same manner as before the partition. The partition cut off from this right all lands of the ranch set off to the different parties in severalty, except those tracts which extended to some portion of the underground flow; but otherwise the right to the surplus was not affected by the decree. The underground water thus undisposed of is not to be distinguished, so far as legal rights thereto are concerned, from a similar surplus remaining in a surface stream after a partition had been made allotting certain parts thereof, less than the whole, to the use of the riparian owners. For illustration, suppose that, in a partition of lands riparian to a surface stream of 1,000 miners' inches, the amount of 500 inches is allotted to the several tracts in fixed proportions. The right to the use of the 500 inches not so apportioned would in such a case, as between those parties, still remain attached to the riparian lands as a riparian right, unaffected by the provisions of the decree fixing the proportions in which the parties are entitled to use the water expressly set apart to them. So in the present case the underground water was not set apart, and the available surplus thereof belongs as before to the riparian lands, to be used by the owners in accordance with the law of riparian rights. The relative rights of the parties in this surplus are to be determined by that law, without aid from the partition decree. The fact that the stream above, at some point in its course, is divided into distinct channels, does not affect the right of the lands below to share in the use of both or all of them. All of the lands concerned in this action, or practically all of them, are, it appears, alike riparian to the whole of the stream constituted by this underflow. For the determination of present rights to its use, it must be treated as constituting but one stream. Each parcel of land, therefore, is entitled to its proper share of the entire underflow, without regard to the question whether it comes from the underflow supporting the particular surface stream set apart for it by the partition, or from some other part of the underflow, always, of course, saving the proposition that no owner may, by extracting the underflow, diminish either surface stream to the injury of any party entitled to it.

It is to be noted that the plaintiffs are not entitled by the decree to three-fourths of all of the surface flow of the cañon, but only to three-fourths of the west side stream and of the surplus of the east side stream, when there is any. The court below appears to have adopted the view that the separation of the right to the surface streams by the partition accomplished a like separation of the right to all of the underground waters, both of the parts thereof necessary to sustain the surface flow and of the surplus. It made a finding attempting to designate on the surface of the ground a boundary line separating these two supposed underground streams, and declaring that the waters thereof, respectively, and the right to pump and use the same, belonged to the parties entitled under the partition to the respective surface streams. This declaration of right was not expressly stated in the decree; but some of the provisions thereof, as will presently appear, are obviously based upon it. In this theory the court was in error, and for this and other errors, to be presently discussed, the judgment and order must be reversed. Other points are presented in the record which may again be involved upon a new trial. We now proceed to the consideration of these propositions.

2. The finding is that the underground flow in the cañon is in two separate and distinct streams; one giving rise to the east side surface stream, and the other to the two streams composing the west side surface stream. The boundary line between them was declared to be the easterly line of a certain "inclosed field" mentioned in the partition decree. The evidence shows that the general course of this line is north and south, that it is located about midway of the bed of the cañon, and that it has many sharp angles, so acute, indeed, that it would be extremely remarkable, if not impossible, that there could be any natural impervious barrier having such a course. There is no evidence to indicate that there is any difference in the material of the bed of the cañon corresponding to this line, or anything therein that could thus divide or separate the underflow. The finding as to this line of separation was purely arbitrary and entirely without support. The fact that the streams arose in different places, and the circumstance that, as the dry years continued and the places where they arose receded further and further down the cañon, the line of these places followed the previous course of the respective streams, constitute some evidence that the density or permeability of the material of the parts of the cañon bed, corresponding to the previous courses of the streams, is different from the adjacent parts thereof, and that the space between them is less porous than the lines of these streams. There is no finding, however, and no evidence, that the separation is so complete that the pumping of water from one of them will not affect the flow, above or below the surface, in the other; and this is the vital point in the case. It is unlikely that it is so, since, wherever there have been explorations in the cañon beneath the surface, the material has been found to be practically homogeneous and equally permeable throughout. But as the right to the use of the surplus underflow remains undivided, and the riparian rights of the lands below include the right to prevent undue interference with either branch of the underflow above, supposing that there are two or more branches, and as the cañon tract extends to all of them, the question of the separation of the underground flow is of no consequence in the present stage of the case.

3. Driven by the necessity arising from the increased acreage irrigated and the scant supply of water after the year 1892, many of the plaintiffs have been compelled to obtain water for their lands from wells sunk thereon. This water lies in the sands and gravels at a considerable depth beneath the surface, and for the most part appears to come from the underground flow of the cañon, which goes under the dam and spreads under the surface of the plain below. Some of it, of course, comes from rainfall below the dam, and some, it is claimed, comes from the Los Angeles river; but the water from these last-named sources is not material to the case, except, possibly, as it may affect the necessities of the particular party and thus assist in determining the amount he may be allowed to take of the waters of the cañon proper. The court did not specifically find whether or not the amount of water pumped by each party was the proportion of the underground flow to which the particular party was entitled; nor did it determine whether or not any of that pumped above the dam constituted a part of the water which, as above stated, remains unpartitioned. It finds that none of the parties has ever taken or used more water than was reasonably necessary for the proper irrigation of his land, and that none has had enough for that purpose; but necessity is not the sole measure of right in such cases.

The decree does not attempt to declare the comparative rights of each party, nor to go into that question at all. It does not mention the rights of the several plaintiffs to pump below the dam, nor in any manner fix the amounts they may take by that method. It is directed entirely to the rights of the defendants. It declares that the defendants Thom and Ross may each continue to pump and use the water from his wells below the dam as heretofore; that E. M. Ross may use, upon his 100-acre orchard in the cañon tract, enough water from his upper well to make up, when added to his part of the surface flow of the east side stream, a total flow of 22½ miners' inches, but may not use a greater amount thereof on the cañon tract under present conditions, and that he may use all the waters of said upper well, "and of said east side stream, both surface and subterranean," upon any of his lands within the cañon tract; that Verdugo may, as heretofore, pump 35 inches from his well; that C. E. Thom may pump from his east well, near the Verdugo well, and use the water upon his land in the cañon tract, but not on other land; and that the waters, surface and subterranean, intercepted and diverted by the dam, are to be used upon the lands below the cañon tract, three-fourths by the plaintiffs and one-eighth each by defendants Thom and Ross. These provisions of the decree are manifestly based on the theory that the entire flow of what the court calls the "east side stream," both above and below the surface, east of the arbitrary division line established in the findings between the underflow of that and the west side stream, belongs absolutely to the cañon tract by virtue of the partition, if necessary for its irrigation. In view of what has been said, the decree is erroneous as to the surplus of the underflow, if any, in that it does not limit the right of each to his proper proportion as compared to the rights of the other owners.

4. The well of the defendant Verdugo is not situated over what the court finds to be the east side stream, but is well within the territory which it finds contains the underground waters of the west side stream. With respect to the effect of the pumping of 35 miners' inches from this well, upon the west side stream and upon the underflow intercepted by the dam, the finding is that "the court is unable to discover from the evidence in this case that the flow of the waters at the said point of diversion and at the submerged dam is affected by the pumping of said well." If this was intended as a finding that the flow of the water is not affected by the pumping from the well, the evidence does not support it. If intended as a declaration that a finding is excused by the want of evidence on the subject, it is unwarranted. From other findings it appears that this west side stream has its source in the mountains above, is fed by water from that watershed, and flows underground in the upper part of the cañon down to the places where it appears on the surface; that it first appeared on the surface in the said "inclosed field," at a point less than 1,000 feet below the Verdugo well, and that during the last 10 or 12 years preceding the trial, which was in December, 1903, its place of appearance on the surface had gradually dropped farther and farther down the cañon a total distance of over a mile and a half, and that its flow had constantly decreased in quantity, so that it became insufficient for the needs of those to whom it was allotted. The evidence indicates that the total natural flow of the cañon, above and below the surface, is less than 200 miners' inches. This well is about 116 feet deep, the bottom being in coarse gravel containing an abundance of water, and after reaching a depth of 27 feet it passes through similar water-bearing material all the way to the bottom. It would scarcely require the evidence of experts to prove that a well sunk in the sand and gravel of an underground stream of this character, 1,000 feet or less above the point where the stream originally issued upon the surface, and pumping a constant flow of 35 miners' inches, would to some extent reduce the flow of the surface stream. Especially would this effect follow where the surface stream and the underground flow is as small as in the present case. Hydraulic engineers of admitted qualifications did testify, however, in effect, that the pumping of that quantity from the well would materially reduce the surface stream, and that, taking the underground and surface flow as a whole, its amount would ultimately be reduced by an amount equal to the quantity pumped from the well, if none of it were returned to such stream. This, in the absence of extraordinary circumstances not proven, and not to be presumed, is self-evident. There were other circumstances also tending to prove that the pumping of Verdugo's well affected the flow of water below. There is no evidence at all indicating that it would not or did not materially reduce the flow. It is true that when the pumping began it did not at once have a perceptible effect on the surface stream; but this delay was to be expected. It also appears that from 1892 to 1903 there was a scant rainfall, and that the flow of the stream was greatly diminished by the drought. But neither this natural decrease, nor the fact that the effect of the pumping upon the flow must necessarily have been gradual, makes it any the less inevitable that the taking of the water from the stream by the well above will eventually reduce the amount that would otherwise flow in the stream below to the extent that the water so taken therefrom is not returned thereto. This is the necessary effect of any diversion from a stream, whether flowing on the surface or beneath, whether in an unobstructed channel or in the gravel and sand which partly fills the rocky gorge of its original course. From the evidence the court should have found whether it did reduce the surface stream, and, if there was a reduction, it should have ascertained, as nearly as it could from the evidence before it, the amount of such decrease. The defendant Verdugo should have been enjoined from decreasing the surface flow of the west side stream and from taking more than his share of the surplus underflow, unless, as Verdugo claimed, there was an estoppel against the plaintiffs which prevents them from asserting their rights in that respect. The court found that there was such estoppel. This proposition, and also the claim that plaintiffs are estopped as to the upper well of E. M. Ross, and that they are barred by laches as to both of these defendants, will be presently considered.

5. The court finds that the amount of water diverted by the submerged dam is greatly diminished, and that this decrease "is largely, if not wholly, due to the many years of continuous drought." It further finds "that the fluctuations in the quantity of water flowing at the submerged dam into the common works has been considerable for several years past; but the court cannot determine from the evidence in this case that such fluctuations have been due to any extent, or, if any, to what extent, by reason of the pumping of the water from the upper well of Judge Ross." Another finding states that "it is impossible to determine" to what extent, if at all, the decrease aforesaid has been caused by the pumping of the upper well of E. M. Ross. These findings, and those to the same effect concerning the Verdugo well, are the only findings in response to the issue made upon the allegation of the complaint that the defendants have put down wells and have taken out water from the stream that belongs to the plaintiffs. It may be conceded that it would be impossible to determine accurately the exact amount of the water pumped from this well that, if not so pumped, would have reached the pipes at the submerged dam. But it is not necessary, in order to establish the right to an injunction, that the plaintiff should be able to prove the extent of his injury with absolute precision. If the taking of the water by the defendants is a wrongful taking of that which belongs to the plaintiffs, and is of a substantial quantity and causes them substantial injury, the court is not excused from making any finding on the subject by the fact that the evidence is indefinite as to the exact quantity taken, or the exact amount of the injury. The evidence was that there had been continuous pumping from this well of a stream of water varying from 16 to 28 miners' inches. The well penetrated, to the depth of 100 feet, into the strata of water-bearing sand and gravel of which the bed of the cañon is composed.

It was situated about 1,000 feet above the dam. That the strata of sand and gravel pierced by the well, and from which the water was pumped, extended from the well, down the cañon, to the dam, was fairly established, and there is nothing in contradiction. The evidence referred to, and stated in the discussion of the effect of the pumping of the Verdugo well upon the underground and surface flow, is equally applicable here. It was shown that all the underground water of the cañon, which did not rise to the surface, flowed slowly down the cañon underground, and had no outlet other than the narrow gorge across which the dam was constructed. The fact that there were fluctuations in the quantity flowing, before as well as after the pumping began, and the fact that dry seasons diminished the flow at the dam, do not disprove the fact that the taking out of water above also diminished it. From the evidence it is practically certain that the pumping of this well, as stated, would materially reduce the underflow at the dam. The court should have made a definite finding upon this issue.

6. Upon the subject of these estoppels, the findings as to Verdugo state that his well was sunk in 1897, less than five years before this action was begun, and from thence hitherto has been pumped during the irrigating seasons and the water used by Verdugo upon the cañon tract to the extent of 35 miners' inches, he claiming the right so to take and use the water; "that the said well was sunk, a pump constructed, and pipes and other conduits constructed for the use of the water therefrom" at the expense of "more than $1,000, and that the same was done with the full knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs; and that no objection was made thereto by any person until a short time prior to the commencement of this action, except the general claim that he was not entitled to any of the waters of the west side stream," and the claim that the pumping of the well affected the flow of the waters at the submerged dam, and also at the points of diversion of the west side stream, and the objection shown by the action of Glassell et al. v. Verdugo, the particulars of which appear only in the evidence. It is further found that the court was unable to discover that the flow was affected as claimed; that owing to light rainfall the flow of the stream had so diminished that it was "impossible to obtain sufficient of the waters of the east side stream, by diversions from the surface, for the irrigation of the said cañon tract," or of Verdugo's part thereof; and that on account of this diminution and lack of surface flow, and "in view of the fact that the said well was sunk, and the pumps and other appliances erected and constructed, for the purposes aforesaid, by the said Verdugo, at great expense, and with the knowledge of the plaintiffs in this action, and without objection, except as above found, the court finds that the said defendant Teodoro Verdugo is entitled to use the waters of the said well in manner as aforesaid, and is entitled to continue the use of the said water of the said well, and to pump the same for said use upon his said premises." There is another finding in which the above facts, claimed to create an estoppel in favor of Verdugo, are in substance repeated, with the additional statement that "the amount of water taken by him by means of the said pump is no more than the amount to which he would have been entitled." This we must presume to mean that the amount was no more than he would have been entitled to take from the east side stream, as against the other persons to whom he had sold parts of the cañon tract; otherwise, upon the theory adopted by the court below that all the underflow had been partitioned, it would be inconsistent with the findings that the decree in partition had excluded him from a share of the west side stream, and the underflow thereof. The evidence shows that in April, 1893, in the action of Glassell v. Verdugo, the plaintiffs obtained judgment against Verdugo in the superior court enjoining him from diverting or using any of the waters rising within the "Inclosed field" mentioned in the partition suit, or from maintaining any dam or other artificial obstruction to the free flow of the waters thereof in the natural channels, and declaring plaintiffs to be the owners of all said waters, under the former decree of partition. From this judgment he appealed to the Supreme Court, and the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court and became final on August 9, 1895. Glassell v. Verdugo, 108 Cal. 503, 41 Pac. 403. The findings in the case show that what is here known as the "west side stream" were the waters referred to, and that the suit was to enjoin him from diverting the same by means of ditches or cuts made in the soil or sand at the places where they rose to the surface.

The upper well of E. M. Ross was completed in March, 1899, and it has been pumped, during irrigating seasons, ever since May, 1899. This action was begun on February 20, 1902, less than three years thereafter. There is no finding that the plaintiffs acquiesced in the pumping of this well. It was put down and the pump erected therein by Judge Ross with full knowledge that the plaintiffs claimed three-fourths of all the underflow that might be intercepted by the submerged dam. Otherwise, the facts are substantially the same with respect to this well as in the case of the Verdugo well. So far as the finding of an estoppel in favor of Verdugo was based upon the fact that the supply of Verdugo from the surface flow of the east side stream had failed, if based upon that fact at all, it was, upon the theory which the court had adopted, that there were separate rights to the underground flow, clearly erroneous. One whose water supply has ceased is not, on that account, entitled to seize the supply of another person. The fact of such failure has no bearing upon the question, further than to show that Verdugo was acting from dire necessity, and not from a wanton desire to appropriate to himself the property of others. The use of the defendants was not a public use, and therefore the rule established in Fresno, etc., Co. v. S. P. Co., 135 Cal. 202, 67 Pac. 773, and Southern C. R. R. Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 342, 71 Pac. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 53, limiting the owner's right, after the public use is begun, to an action for damages, has no application.

The facts stated are not sufficient to create estoppels against the plaintiffs. It does not appear that either Verdugo or Ross was induced to put down his well by any act, word, or tacit encouragement of the plaintiffs, or either of them, or relied upon their silence as evidence of his own right or of their consent. Nor does it appear that plaintiffs intended that either should act in reliance upon their silence, or expected that either would do so. It is not shown that plaintiffs were under any duty toward either to disclose any claim they might have to the water, nor that said defendants did not know, at least as well as the plaintiffs knew, that the pumping of the respective wells would decrease the west side stream and the underflow at the dam. The party estopped must always intend, or at least must be so situated that he should be held to have expected, that the other party shall act, and the other party must, by the words, conduct, or silence of the first party, be induced or led to do what he would not otherwise do. Carp v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 Pac. 695; Swain v. Seaman, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 274, 19 L. Ed. 554; Dickerson v. Colegrove, 100 U. S. 580, 25 L. Ed. 618. The mere fact that the defendants expended money in sinking the wells and putting in the pumps each upon his own land, with the knowledge of the plaintiffs and without objection by them, creates no estoppel. Kelly v. Taylor, 23 Cal. 15; Maye v. Yappen, 23 Cal. 308; Stockman v. Riverside L. & I. Co., 64 Cal. 59, 28 Pac. 116; Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 542, 28 Pac. 1099. If the finding that the Verdugo well was sunk and the money expended with their "acquiescence" means more than a passive acquiescence or failure to object, it would be contrary to the evidence. A mere passive acquiescence where one is under no duty to speak does not raise an estoppel. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 270, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Rochdale Co. v. King, 2 Sim. N. S. 89.

It is suggested that, although the facts found may come short of creating an estoppel, they are sufficient to show that the plaintiffs are barred by their laches. It is well-established doctrine that the defense of laches does not rest entirely upon lapse of time, nor require any specific period of delay, as does the statute of limitations. But, in order to constitute laches, there must be something more than mere delay by the plaintiff, accompanied by an expenditure of money or effort on the part of the defendant. It must also appear that it will be inequitable to enforce the claim. "The reason upon which the rule is based is not alone the lapse of time during which the neglect to enforce the right has existed, but the changes of condition which may have arisen during the period in which there has been neglect." Penn. M. L. I. Co. v. Austin, 168 U. S. 698, 18 Sup. Ct. 228, 42 L. Ed. 628. It is said that the cases on the subject "proceed on the assumption that the party to whom laches is imputed has knowledge of his rights and an ample opportunity to establish them in the proper forum; that by reason of his delay the adverse party has good reason to believe that the alleged rights are worthless or have been abandoned; and that, because of the change in conditions during this period of delay, it would be an injustice to the latter to permit the" claimant now to assert his rights. Galliber v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 372, 12 Sup. Ct. 874, 36 L. Ed. 738. "The acquiescence which will bar a complainant from the exercise in his favor of the discretionary jurisdiction by injunction must be such as proves his assent to the acts of the defendant, and to the injuries to himself which have flowed, or can reasonably be anticipated to flow, from those acts." Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 271, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. The same case quotes approvingly this passage from Rochdale, etc., Co. v. King, 2 Simon (N. S.) 89: "Where one invades the right of another, that other does not in general deprive himself of the right of seeking redress merely because he remains passive, unless, indeed, he continues inactive so long as to bring the case within the purview of the statute of limitations." The evidence shows that the acquiescence of the plaintiffs in the sinking of these wells and the pumping thereof was nothing more than a mere failure to actively interfere. The consent of plaintiffs was not asked; nor were they informed by either defendant of the intention to sink the wells, expend the money, or pump the water. There was nothing in the circumstances to put upon the plaintiffs any duty or obligation to inform either defendant that the pumping of the water would be, or was, a violation of plaintiffs' rights. Verdugo well knew, from the former action against him, that plaintiffs did object to any diminution of, or interference with, the west side stream. The court finds that the plaintiffs, during the time the Verdugo well was being pumped, claimed that it was depleting their own supply; but it does not find that they for a moment assented to the injury thus caused. The evidence shows that there was no such assent. While these defendants were sinking the wells, erecting the pumps, and laying the pipes, the plaintiffs had no information from them, or, so far as appears, from any other source, as to the amount of water they proposed to pump. During that period they were certainly not required, by any rule of law or equity, to inform him that he incurred the expense at his peril if the subsequent pumping should invade their rights. Each defendant was conducting his operations upon his own land. The expense was complete when the pump was erected and the pipes laid. That expense was not incurred in reliance upon any word or act, nor upon the silence, delay, or tacit encouragement, of plaintiffs. Up to the point of the completion of the works there could be no laches. After that completion there was no change of conditions, or at all events none that would make it unjust for plaintiffs to assert their rights. The subsequent events consisted wholly of the continuous pumping of the wells, to the depletion of plaintiffs' source of supply, and to the profit and advantage of the defendants, respectively. They were not induced to pump the water by the delay of plaintiffs to prevent them, nor was either of them thereby induced to believe that plaintiffs had no right in the water he was pumping, or that, if they had such right, they had abandoned it. As presented by the evidence, the case is simply this: That each of said defendants was urged solely by his own extreme necessity, not relying on the act, omission, or word of any one, and that, while he doubtless hoped that plaintiffs would not interfere, he proposed to continue, regardless of the effect upon their supply, until they did prevent him. Each may have believed that plaintiffs had no such right; but such belief sprang from no act, word, silence, or delay on their part. The necessary elements are wholly wanting, and therefore the defense of laches is not established.

7. It is claimed on behalf of the defendant E. M. Ross that the pumping of his upper well takes water only from the underflow of the east side stream, and does not affect the water of the west side stream, nor the underflow thereof, and hence that it is within his legal rights. Under the partition decree he is entitled to the use of the east side stream upon his land in the cañon tract; but as to the underflow thereof his right under that decree, as we have heretofore stated, does not extend to its use, but only to have it remain to preserve the surface flow. As to the use of the unpartitioned surplus underflow for irrigation he is entitled only to his proportionate share with the other parties, including the plaintiffs. It is declared by the judgment in the case at bar that the plaintiffs and the defendants C. E. Thom and E. M. Ross are entitled, as tenants in common, in the proportions heretofore stated, to all the waters of the west side stream and all the waters intercepted by the submerged dam, which, of course, includes, in part at least, the underflow of both the east side and west side streams. Nevertheless E. M. Ross is given the right to pump his upper well and to thereby decrease the underflow from the east side stream at the dam. It is contended by the plaintiffs that he is estopped and cannot be allowed to pump water to the extent that it will affect such underflow, even if he uses no more than his reasonable share. This estoppel, it is claimed, arises out of certain transactions between him and the plaintiffs, which it becomes necessary to state.

About the year 1893, when the water began to run short, the plaintiffs and the defendants Thom and Ross, being jointly interested in the west side stream, began to look about for means by which the common supply could be increased. Up to about May, 1894, the talk had been confined to proposals to make a more perfect dam to catch the surface stream. It was believed by all of them that there was a considerable amount of water flowing underground down the cañon through the narrow gorge, below the places where the surface streams were then diverted, and that by constructing a dam across this gorge to the solid ground on each side, and extending it below the surface to bed rock, all of this underflow could be intercepted and added to their common supply for their lands below. On May 14, 1894, which was about the time of the first mention of the project to construct a submerged dam, E. M. Ross wrote to the secretary of the plaintiff company, referring to the previous suggestions of a dam for surface water, and saying: "I was told yesterday and the day before that your company is now talking of putting down a submerged dam somewhere in the cañon. That, of course, is an altogether different thing, and involves the development of water not rising in the old field of the partition decree, and not of the surplus of the Teodoro Verdugo water. If it is desired to develop water on my land, perhaps terms may be agreed upon; but otherwise not." The water of the "old field" means the west side stream, and the "surplus of the Teodoro Verdugo water" the surplus of the east side stream. On May 25, 1894, the plaintiffs wrote a letter to E. M. Ross, saying that it was their desire "to obtain the co-operation of yourself and Capt. Thom in the construction of such works as are deemed advisable on the land owned in common by the owners of the waters flowing from Verdugo Cañon, for collecting all such waters, flowing below as well as on the surface, and conducting the same to our common use." This evidently referred to lands to be thereafter purchased in common, for at that time there was no land "owned in common." It is clear, from this and other evidence, that the plan in contemplation during the subsequent negotiations was the plan above stated, or some similar plan to accomplish a similar result. Soon after this negotiations began with Teodoro Verdugo, the owner of the land considered best for a site for the proposed dam, looking to the purchase of a tract of 9.39 acres, for $4,000; but the price proved to be too high for the means of the company, and that purchase was abandoned. In all the negotiations and transactions concerning this submerged dam, it was understood that it was to be a common enterprise; that the property necessary therefor should be held, the expense thereof contributed, and the benefits thereof shared in the same proportions—that is, in the proportion of three-fourths to the plaintiffs and one-eighth each to Thom and Ross. Shortly after the 9.39-acre purchase was dropped, E. M. Ross obtained a contract from Verdugo to buy on his own account a tract of 58.87 acres, including part of the 9.39 acres, and, in connection therewith, an option from Verdugo for the purchase of a tract of 7.81 acres, being the westerly and remaining part of the 9.39 acres, at the price of $2,500. He asked the plaintiffs and Thom to join with him in buying this 7.81 acres at that price as a site for the dam previously proposed. This tract did not extend entirely across the cañon to the east side, or to solid ground, but only to the easterly bank of the wash. The plaintiffs objected on this account, and wanted to have the tract extended easterly to the railroad track, to which the defendant refused to accede. Thereupon a meeting was arranged at which all the interested parties were present or represented. At this meeting it was agreed that the 7.81-acre tract should be purchased, and that E. M. Ross should give a right of way from the easterly line of the tract through his 58.87-acre tract to solid ground on the east side of the cañon, as a part of the site for the dam. Opposite the lower part of the 7.81-acre tract a small side cañon from the east joined the main cañon, and at the junction there were evidences of water. This the defendant Ross wanted to hold for his own use, and for that reason he stipulated that the dam should be placed not more than 100 feet south of the north line of the 58.87-acre tract. The agreement was carried out, and the grant of the right of way executed on September 5, 1894.

The court finds that at this meeting "it was feared that there might be some difficulty in the development of water on this 7.81-acre tract alone, by reason of the fact that the construction of a dam, submerged, might have the effect of turning the waters around the east side of the dam, and thereby escape without being brought to the surface." The dam was a considerable distance below the junction of all the surface streams, and no separation of the underflow into parts corresponding to the respective surface streams was then suggested. All present must have understood that a dam across the cañon to solid ground on each side would bring to the surface all the underflow in both tracts of land—that through which the right of way extended, as well as the 7.81 acres. Nothing was said about any division of these waters, so as to give to the common owners the water from their tract and to E. M. Ross that from the right of way. He did not at that time, nor until long after, say or suggest that, when the dam was extended upon the right of way, he would own, or would claim, the water coming directly from the right of way for his exclusive use. It was not suggested by any one that any part of the water to be obtained by the common works, when completed, should be devoted to any other than common use, or be other than common property. It is quite clear, however, from all the evidence, that the plaintiffs understood that all the water obtained was to be owned and used in common, and that Judge Ross, on the other hand, understood or believed that the water coming to the dam through his 58.87-acre tract would belong exclusively to him, and that all other water obtained would be common water. It is also manifest that none of the parties was aware of the understanding of the other on this point, that each supposed that all understood it as he understood it, and that each was acting in perfect good faith, without intent to deceive, defraud, or mislead the other party to the arrangement.

The work on the dam was begun in 1895 and was vigorously prosecuted during that season. On September 30, 1895, the excavation had reached the land of Ross, and had disclosed considerable underflow coming from his land. He then stated to the plaintiffs that it would be necessary to "guard against taking any water that might be developed" on his land. Several thousand dollars had then been expended in the work. About the 1st of August, 1896, he made a definite claim that the water "developed on his land," as he expressed it, belonged to him exclusively, and not to the common owners, regardless of its amount. The plaintiff company, according to the arrangement between the parties, was in charge of the work. Immediately upon this claim being made, the work was stopped in order to come to a settlement of the matter. At that time the dam was completed for a distance of 210 feet at the west end, and the excavation had been made from the east end of the completed part, easterly across the 7.81-acre tract, and some 60 feet into the land of E. M. Ross, and of a depth varying from 30 to 45 feet. After considerable negotiation, on August 3, 1896, he made a written waiver of any claim he might lawfully have to the exclusive use of this water, and agreed to claim only a one-eighth of the whole thereof, in common with the others. The work was then resumed, and a substantial amount of expenditure was made upon it after this waiver. It was never completed, but it has the effect of intercepting from 30 to 40 miners' inches of water in addition to the surface flow. From the inception of the work upon it until the beginning of this action the defendant Ross has regularly received one-eighth of the water obtained thereby and has paid one-eighth of the expense of maintaining the dam and operating the common works.

Shortly before the trial of the case in the court below, in December, 1903, he discovered that, at the time he made the written waiver of August 3, 1896, giving up any right he might have to the exclusive use of the water, he had forgotten the fact that on August 14, 1894, a day or two before he began to negotiate with Verdugo for the purchase of the 7.81-acre tract for common use, the plaintiffs had written to him a letter stating that they could not raise the money to pay their share of the price of the 9.39-acre tract previously proposed, the negotiations for which had been left in his hands, and that they had abandoned the intention of joining in the purchase. The waiver was made upon the receipt of a written statement of the plaintiffs, purporting to be a history of the negotiations from May, 1894, up to the execution of the right of way, in September; but this letter was omitted, and, although it had been all the time in his own possession, he had completely forgotten it, until, in looking over his correspondence preparatory to the trial, he found it. His testimony was that, having forgotten that the plaintiffs had abandoned the proposed joint acquisition of a dam site, the history made it to appear to him that, while he was intrusted with the negotiations for the 9.39-acre tract, he had taken a smaller tract instead, and thereby obtained an advantage for himself, and that, not wishing to appear to occupy such a position, he waived his rights, but that if he had then remembered the letter of the plaintiffs abandoning the enterprise, or the fact that they had abandoned it before he took up the negotiation on his own account, he would not have made the waiver. The court found that he was not estopped by the giving of the right of way in 1894, nor by the waiver of 1896, from pumping water from his upper well and thereby depleting the supply at the dam. The conclusion that he was not estopped by the waiver of August 3, 1896, alone, was clearly correct. It had been given under a mistake of fact, and but for that mistake it would have been withheld. His failure to recall the fact of plaintiffs' withdrawal from the scheme was not that degree of neglect that would bind him to stand by the waiver, notwithstanding the mistake by which it was induced.

The question whether or not he is estopped by the execution of the right of way, the circumstances upon which it was given, and the subsequent action of the plaintiffs on the faith of it, presents greater difficulty. He had the right to take out water by wells or otherwise of the surplus underflow of the cañon, to the extent of his reasonable proportion thereof, for use upon his lands in the cañon tract, provided he did not thereby injuriously affect the surface flow of the west side stream. The plaintiffs were fully aware of this right. His offer of an interest in the 7.81 acres with the right of way was practically an offer from him to them. It was substantially an opportunity to carry out the original plan at less cost, and it was so understood. The plaintiffs were thereby induced to accept and pay for a three-fourths interest in the site and to pay three-fourths of the cost of the works constructed thereon. The whole object, so far as the plaintiffs knew, and he stated nothing to the contrary, was to add the water of the underflow to be collected by the dam, including the underflow of the east side stream, to the waters of the west side stream set apart for use on the lands below. He was a tenant in common with them in the west side stream. If, under all these circumstances, it was a part of his design to induce them to aid, to the extent of three-fourths of the cost, in the erection of a dam to intercept all the underflow, in which, as it was then flowing at that place, all were entitled to share, in order that, by means of that dam, he could obtain for his own exclusive use all that part of the water that might flow out of the land through which he was to grant the right of way; if he proposed to secure this advantage from their efforts and expenditure in the common work—the principles of equity and justice, and the relations existing between them, demanded of him a full and frank disclosure of his purposes and claims. He had no right to remain silent in the belief that they understood the matter as he did. One who is embarking with others in a common enterprise, to use common property for the common benefit at common expense, owes to the others the duty, if he proposes or intends to reserve a part of the benefit to himself exclusively, to inform the others fully in regard to it. If he does not, he will be estopped to assert his claim after the others have incurred the expense. This seems to have been the view of the court below with regard to all the underflow that actually reached the dam; for it declared all those waters to be subject to the common ownership, in the proportions stated, for use on the lands below. We are of the opinion that the estoppel does not apply to the claim that he has the right to take, by means of pumps in the cañon above, his reasonable share of the underflow, for use on his lands in the cañon tract.

In Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 279, 368, the essentials of an estoppel were said to be these: The party estopped must have known the true state of his own title; he must have intended to deceive, or have acted with such culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; the other party must have been without knowledge, or the means of acquiring knowledge, of the true state of the title; he must have relied directly upon the conduct upon which the estoppel rests; and it must appear that he will be injured if the estoppel is not enforced. Other authorities, more favorable to plaintiffs' contention, hold that all these elements, and especially that of deceit or fraud, are not always necessary. In 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 818, other well-established instances of estoppel are thus described: "Acquiescence consisting of mere silence may also operate as a true estoppel in equity to preclude a party from asserting legal title and rights of property, real or personal, or rights of contract. A fraudulent intention to deceive or mislead is not essential. All instances of this class in equity rest upon the principle: If one maintain silence when in conscience he ought to speak, equity will debar him from speaking when in conscience he ought to remain silent. Mich., etc., Co. v. Parcell, 38 Mich. 480, per Cooley, J. A most important application includes all cases where an owner of property, A., stands by and permits another person, B., to deal with the property as though it were his, or as though he were rightfully dealing with it, without interposing any objections, as by expending money upon it, making improvements, erecting buildings, and the like. Of course, it is essential that B. should be acting in ignorance of the real condition of the title, and in the supposition that he was rightful in his own dealing." In Thompson v. Simpson, 128 N. Y. 280, 28 N. E. 632, the court says: "An estoppel may arise, although there was no designed fraud on the part of the person sought to be estopped. The cases of Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 166, 10 Am. Dec. 316, and Continental Bk. v. Nat. Bk. of Com., 50 N. Y. 576, were cases where there was no intent to mislead, but where what was said was intended to influence the action of the other party, and did influence it, and a duty rested upon the party giving the information, or making the statement, if he spoke at all, to have ascertained the actual facts, so as not to have misled the other party to his prejudice. An estoppel may arise also from silence as well as words. But this is only where there is a duty to speak, and the party upon whom the duty rests has an opportunity to speak, and, knowing the circumstances require him to speak, keeps silent." And upon the subject of duty it is further said: "It is not necessary that the duty to speak should arise out of any agreement, or rest upon any legal obligation in the ordinary sense. Courts of equity apply to the case the principles of natural justice, and whenever these require disclosure they raise the duty and bind the conscience, and base upon the omission an equitable forfeiture to the extent necessary to the protection of the innocent party." 128 N. Y. 291, 28 N. E. 633.

All these authorities agree that no estoppel can exist unless the party invoking it was led to place himself in the prejudicial position, in part, at least, by his own ignorance of the rights of the other party or his own lack of knowledge of the true state of the title. This element is entirely wanting in the present instance. The plaintiffs knew that E. M. Ross owned land in the cañon tract, that he had a large orchard thereon above the proposed dam which required water, and that he had the right to use thereon a due proportion of the underflow of the cañon. They may have supposed and believed that he did not intend to exercise that right, but they were not led to that belief by any act or word of his. His conduct in entering into the work with them to obtain the underflow at the dam for use on his lower lands, which were entitled to a share thereof, was not inconsistent with his right to take, from the same flow above, the share of the water to which his upper land was reasonably entitled. He could not obtain the water from the dam for use on the upper land, and he said nothing to indicate that he would not obtain it by other means, if the upper land required it in the future. As the plaintiffs acted with full knowledge of his right and without any promise or representation by him that he would not exercise it if occasion arose, he is not estopped to pump water from his upper well, for use on his part of the cañon tract, to the full extent of the share due to that land.

8. The appeal of the defendant E. M. Ross is from that part of the judgment fixing his right to pump water from his "upper well" which limits the amount he can pump to 22½ miners' inches and forbids him from using it elsewhere than on the cañon tract. What has been said sufficiently disposes of the questions presented by this appeal. Under the partition he is given only the right to the surface flow of the east side stream. With regard to the available unpartitioned underflow, he is entitled, as a riparian owner, to his reasonable share thereof, and may use it upon any of his riparian land in the cañon tract. In regard to his right to take the underflow, by means of a pump, from his land above the dam, for use upon his lands below, his riparian rights are modified by the estoppel existing against him by reason of the facts referred to in the preceding subdivision of this opinion. As we have said, the dam was built to intercept all this underflow and devote it to use on the lower lands; and he, no more than the other parties interested, should be permitted to take out water from the underflow above the dam for use on the lower lands to a sufficient extent to decrease the amount thereof that will flow to and be intercepted by the dam. If any can be taken out without producing that effect, he and the other owners of riparian lands below are each entitled to a reasonable share thereof.

9. In conclusion, it is necessary to give some directions relating to a new trial. If pumping is allowed without check above the points of diversion of the surface streams, it is practically certain that those streams will cease to flow. It is by no means certain that the pumping now going on below those points does not exceed the average normal flow of the underground stream; that it is not in fact a process of exhaustion, so that in a few years of use at the same rate, even that supply will fail. No party above or below the dam should be allowed to take by such process more than his reasonable part of the available surplus, if such taking affects the surface streams, or prevents another party from obtaining his reasonable share; and no party, of those entitled to use the water collected by the submerged dam, has the right to pump water above the dam for use on his lands below, if such pumping decreases the flow at the dam. The only just method of adjusting the rights in this surplus of the underflow is to ascertain, as near as may be, the total average amount thereof available for this use, and the amount required by each party when used as economically and sparingly as may be reasonably possible, and upon this basis apportion to each his due share. In this calculation the amount of underflow collected by the dam should be included as a part of the whole available surplus underflow, and the portions of that water delivered to those interested in the dam, not including the surface flow there distributed, are to be charged to said parties, respectively, against their share of such underflow; also, those who are now pumping water of the underground stream above or below the dam must be charged therewith as part of their shares and the amount pumped computed as part of the whole supply to be apportioned. It is certain that there will be no surplus, and it may turn out that some are pumping or receiving more than their share. It appears that in some instances several persons use a common pump. There can be no objection to this, if all of them are entitled to receive some amount and reserve only their due. In the case of the division of a surface stream, the portions allotted to the respective parties and the whole flow of the stream can be readily measured, and a fair division of such waters may easily be made self-executing by the mere device of giving to each a fixed proportion of the whole, instead of a certain quantity of water, so that, although the total quantity in the stream may vary, the rule of division will remain constant. But this cannot well be done where different persons, each upon his own land and by means of his own pump, is taking a proportion of an underground stream. In such a case the parties would not be able to agree upon the total amount available of the underground supply, and there would be no means of accurate measurement to settle their differences, as in the case of common shares of a surface stream. A decree merely fixing the proportion of the underground supply to which each was entitled would be of no benefit, for it would not enable either party to know the amount which he could pump. The total supply can only be determined by the court after a consideration of such evidence as it can obtain on the question. It will be necessary for the court to determine from the evidence the total amount of the underflow available for a division and to determine the share of each, by fixing a positive quantity which each may take as his proper proportion of the whole.

The judgment and order are reversed, with costs of appeal in favor of plaintiffs.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; McFARLAND, J.; SLOSS, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment and generally in the opinion of Justice SHAW. I share his conviction that there is but one subsurface stream within the cañon, but in my opinion it is not very material whether there is one or two. In either case I think that all the owners of the cañon tract and of the lower tract have a right in common to pump from the subsurface stream each his just proportion of the subsurface flow, irrespective of its effect upon the surface flow. That just proportion was originally equivalent to the proportion of the irrigable area of each subdivision to the irrigable area of the whole—modified, perhaps, by the greater or less need of particular tracts in respect to artificial irrigation. By convention, by prescription, and possibly by other means, the rights of particular subdivisions may of course have been enlarged or diminished. There is nothing in any of our previous decisions which conflicts with the right of the owner of land overlying an underground stream to pump a reasonable share of the underground flow to the surface and apply it to the surface for irrigation, even though it may diminish the surface flow of a stream breaking out below. In doing so he is merely exercising his riparian right in the matter of irrigation. In this view Verdugo, Ross, and Thom have a right to pump above the submerged dam each his reasonable share of the subsurface flow for the irrigation of so much of his cultivated land as lies within the cañon tract. If upon fuller and more specific findings as to the total subsurface flow and the area of the particular tracts it shall be found that either is pumping or threatening to pump more than his share, he should be enjoined as to the excess; otherwise, not.

On the questions of estoppel I concur in the main opinion.

SNIPSIC CO. v. SMITH. (Civ. 285.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Dec. 19, 1907.)

PLEADING — SEPARATE DEFENSES — GENERAL DEMURRER.

Since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 441, providing that defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses as he has, a defendant may plead as many defenses as he has, though they are inconsistent with each other, an answer pleading separately two defenses, one specifically denying every allegation of the complaint, and one setting up affirmative matter, is not subject to a general demurrer; the denials of the first defense presenting a perfect answer to the cause of action, not destroyed by admissions in the second defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the Snipsic Company against Joseph Smith. From a judgment against defendant for failure to further plead after sustaining a demurrer to his answer, he appeals. Reversed.

J. E. McElroy and James G. Quinn, for appellant. Howard K. James, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from judgment rendered against defendant for failure to further plead after demurrer sustained to his answer.

The complaint states a cause of action for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff's assignor to defendant, and is unverified. The answer set up two defenses. The first specifically denies every allegation of the complaint, including the allegation of nonpayment and of the assignment to plaintiff. As a separate defense defendant set up as affirmative matter that he was fraudulently induced to sign the writing referred to in the complaint. The demurrer to the answer was a general demurrer to the entire answer, and not a demurrer to each separate defense.

As the first defense was separately pleaded, ending with a demand for judgment, it is difficult to see upon what theory the demurrer was sustained. The denials of the first defense present a perfect answer to the cause of action, and any admissions, if we assume that there are any, in the second and separate defense, cannot be regarded as destroying the effect of such denials. Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935; Nudd & Lord v. Thompson et al., 34 Cal. 39; Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753; McDonald v. Southern Ry. Co., 101 Cal. 206, 35 Pac. 643, 646. In several of the above-cited cases the question arose upon a motion by plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings; but such a motion presents for determination the same questions of law as are presented by a general demurrer to the answer. The defendant had the right to plead as many defenses as he had (Code Civ. Proc. § 441), even though they were inconsistent with each other. Banta v. Siller, supra.

The court erred in sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's answer, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

1. HABEAS CORPUS—JUDGMENT—FORM—SUFFICIENCY.

A judgment sentencing one to imprisonment, and reciting that accused had been convicted of a felony, without designating the offense, is sufficient in form to withstand an attack on habeas corpus for the discharge of accused.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

A judgment must be reduced to writing, and can only be proved by the record of its entry or by parol after proof of the destruction or loss of the record.

3. SAME—MODIFYING JUDGMENT—AUTHORITY OF COURT.

A judgment in no way reduced to writing or entered in the minutes of the clerk may be revised by the court.

4. HABEAS CORPUS—JUDGMENT—DISCHARGING ONE CONFINED IN STATE'S PRISON—SUFFICIENCY.

The court on habeas corpus announced in open court that the petitioner was illegally imprisoned in the state's prison, and ordered his discharge. No written order for the discharge was made or signed by the judge, and no entry of the order was made in the minutes of the court, or in any manner, except that the clerk made a memorandum thereof in a book kept by him as a personal memorandum to aid his memory in subsequently making entries in the minutes of the court. Subsequently the court made and signed in open court a written order vacating and setting aside the previous order. Held, that the first order was not a final adjudication by the court that petitioner should be discharged; the order, not having been entered in the minutes of the court, being subject to be vacated by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 101.]

Petition on habeas corpus by Simon L. Monckros Von Vetsera for his discharge from imprisonment in the state's prison. Petitioner remanded.

Jas. W. Keys, for petitioner. Thos. B. Boyd, and Walter Burpee, for respondent.

HALL, J. Petitioner is in the custody of the warden of the state prison at San Quentin. From the return to the writ it appears that he was delivered into the custody of the warden of said state prison in execution of two judgments rendered by the superior court of the county of Alameda, May 31, 1900, the term of imprisonment prescribed in each judgment being 14 years, and the term in the second one to commence upon the expiration of the term of the first, it being recited that defendant had been convicted upon both charges before judgment was rendered upon either. The only possible criticism of the form of the judgments is that it is recited in each that defendant was convicted of a "felony," the particular felony not being designated. That this form of judgment is sufficient to withstand an attack upon habeas corpus does not admit of discussion. Ex parte Gibson, 31 Cal. 620, 91 Am. Dec. 546; Ex parte Murray, 43 Cal. 455; People v. Kelly, 120 Cal. 271, 52 Pac. 587. It results that the prisoner must be remanded, unless he is now entitled to be discharged by virtue of certain proceedings had in and before the superior court of Marin county.

It appears that the petitioner made application, by petition addressed to and filed in said superior court, for a writ of habeas corpus. The court ordered the writ to issue, and in obedience to such writ the warden produced the prisoner before the court on the 4th day of October, 1907, with his return to the writ, setting up that he held him by virtue of the two judgments hereinbefore referred to. The hearing was continued by said court to October 15, 1907, and the presence of the prisoner waived. On the 15th day of October, 1907, the court heard the matter, and the judge of the court, in open court, announced that the petitioner was illegally detained by said warden, and ordered that he be discharged from the custody of said warden. No written order for his discharge was made or signed by the judge, and no entry of such order was made in the minutes of the court, or in any manner, save that the clerk made a memorandum thereof in pencil in a book, manifestly kept by him as a personal memorandum book in aid of his memory in subsequently making entries in the minutes of the court. The book bore no title, label, or other indicia of official character. The entry concerning the order announced by the judge of the court is in pencil, several words are represented by abbreviations, and the whole is manifestly a personal memorandum of the clerk to be used to aid his memory when he should enter the order in the minutes of the court. Subsequently, on October 17, 1907, the court, in the absence of the prisoner, made and signed in open court a written order, reciting that the previous order had never been entered in the minutes of the court, and vacating and setting aside the same, and, in effect, reserving the matter of the prisoner's application for further action.

Petitioner now insists that the order made on October 15th was a final adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction that petitioner should be discharged, and that said court thereby lost jurisdiction to subsequently enter any different order. We cannot agree with this contention. Until the judgment had been entered in the minutes of the court, or had been in some authentic manner reduced to writing, as by the judge signing a written order, it must be held that the judgment lay in the breast of the judge, and that the court had plenary power thereover. We have been cited to no case precisely in point, but in jurisdictions where terms of court exist it has always been held that the court had such power during the term. "A court has plenary control of its judgments, orders, and decrees during the term at which they are rendered, and may amend, correct, modify, or supplement them for cause shown, or may, to promote justice, revise, supersede, revoke, or vacate them as may in its discretion seem necessary." 23 Cyc. 860. See, also, De Castro v. Richardson, 25 Cal. 49. "This power is inherent in all courts of general jurisdiction, and is not dependent upon, nor derived from, the statute." 23 Cyc. 902; 1 Black on Judgments, § 305. The right to revise the judgment during the term is based upon the fiction that the judgment was not entered or the roll made up until the close of the term. The actual want of the entry of the judgment, surely, is a stronger basis for the existence of the right to change the judgment than the fiction that it has not been entered or the roll made up. "A judgment must be reduced to writing, and cannot exist in the memory of the officers of the court." 11 Ency. of Pl. & Prac. 925; Davidson v. Murphy, 13 Conn. 213; Jones v. Walker, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 427; Balm v. Nunn, 63 Iowa, 641, 19 N. W. 810; Young v. People, 171 Ill. 209, 49 N. E. 503. A judgment can only be proved by the record of its entry, or by parol after proof of the destruction or loss of the record. Young v. People, supra; Case v. Plato, 54 Iowa, 64, 6 N. W. 128. It has been held that the oral announcement of the court's decision is not sufficient basis for the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc. Boyd v. Schott, 152 Ind. 161, 52 N. E. 752; Young v. Young, 165 Mo. 624, 65 S. W. 1016, 88 Am. St. Rep. 440.

We have been cited to no case that holds that an order or judgment in no way reduced to writing, or entered in the minutes of the clerk, may not be revised by the court making the order or judgment. On the contrary, it has been held that at any time before "final judgment signed" it was proper for the court to amend its judgment. People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 239. So, too, the court may change its conclusions of law at any time before judgment is entered. Condee v. Barton, 62 Cal. 1; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52. In Niles v. Edwards, 95 Cal. 47,¹ relied on by petitioner to support the proposition that an order or judgment, to be effectual, need not be entered in the minutes, the court had under consideration an order modifying a department judgment of the Supreme Court that was not entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court until after the expiration of the time for granting a rehearing, but the order had been reduced to writing and signed by four justices. So, too, Von Schmidt v. Widber, 99 Cal. 511, 34 Pac. 109, cited by petitioner, is really authority against him. It is there said: "It is essential, however, that the action of the court be made a matter of record in order that there may be no uncertainty as to what its action had been, and for this purpose it is customary, as well as expedient, to have its acts entered in the minutes kept by the clerk; but if the order is formally prepared and signed by the judge, and made a matter of record by filing with the clerk, the same end is attained as if it were spread at length upon the minutes of its daily transactions."

In the case at bar the order relied on by petitioner for his discharge, never having been entered in the minutes of the court, was subject to be vacated and revised by the court, and, having been thus vacated, affords no warrant for his release from the imprisonment under which he is held by virtue of the judgments of the superior court of Alameda county.

Petitioner is therefore remanded.

PEOPLE v. CAIN. (Cr. 68.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 20, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 17, 1908.)

1. LARCENY—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—LARCENY BY GENERAL OWNER—"PERSONAL PROPERTY OF ANOTHER."

Pen. Code, § 484, defines larceny as the felonious stealing, etc., of personal property of another. Held, that the phrase "personal property of another," as so used, means property in the possession of another who is entitled, as bailee or otherwise to retain possession for some benefit or profit to himself to the exclusion of all others, and not absolute ownership as defined by Civ. Code, § 670, so that a taking of a heifer by the general owner thereof from the possession of an agister entitled to hold the same under a lien for pasturage, with the intent to deprive the latter thereof, constituted larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, §§ 11-21.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 3991-4003; vol. 8, p. 7701.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

An instruction in a criminal case must be read in connection with other portions of the charge; it being unnecessary in dealing with each particular phase of the case for the court to repeat all the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire charge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1990-1995.]

3. SAME—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where the court charged that the law presumes every man innocent until his guilt is established to a moral certainty, and beyond all reasonable doubt, and that such presumption attaches to every fact essential to a conviction, an instruction that, while every fact essential to prove defendant's guilt to a moral certainty must be fully proven, the law permits this to be done by circumstantial evidence, and where the evidence is circumstantial, but proves every fact essential, to sustain the hypothesis of guilt, and to exclude the hypothesis of innocence, and is inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that of guilt, it is the jury's duty to convict, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1990-1995.]

4. SAME—APPEAL—PREJUDICE.

On appeal from a conviction, the burden is on accused not only to disclose wherein an instruction objected to constituted error, but also to affirmatively show that it tended to mislead the jury to the possible prejudice of his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3090-3099.]

5. LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS.

B. agreed to pasture a heifer for defendant at a certain price per month, and during the season sold possession of the pasture to C., who continued the pasturage until the animal became lost, and, being later discovered in a pasture where it was claimed defendant had placed her, he was charged with stealing her from C. Held, that an instruction that a person who takes in cattle to pasture for compensation, and who has the possession thereof, has a lien for pasturing them, and may be deemed the owner thereof within the law of larceny, was not objectionable as justifying a construction that, if defendant took the animal, he was guilty of stealing her as against B.

6. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—CONVICTION—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the conviction will not be set aside on appeal as contrary to the evidence, the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of their testimony in the first instance being for the jury, and then for the trial judge on a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3074-3083.]

7. LARCENY—EVIDENCE—INTENT.

B., having taken defendant's heifer to pasture, sold the possession of the pasture to C., who continued the pasturage until the heifer was lost, whereupon defendant stated that he would hold both B. and C. responsible. The heifer having been subsequently found in an adjoining pasture, where it was claimed she was taken by defendant, B. and C. returned her to the latter's pasture, whereupon they were arrested for stealing her, and, after this prosecution was dismissed, defendant was arrested for stealing her from C. Held, that evidence that B. and C. were arrested for stealing the heifer and the proceedings in such prosecution were admissible as bearing on defendant's intent in taking the heifer from C.'s pasture.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Samuel Cain was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Daggett, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny upon an information wherein it was charged that he did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take, steal, lead, and drive away a certain young cow, to wit, a heifer, then and there of the age of about 2½ years and then and there the personal property of one T. D. Cheney. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial, and in support thereof presents his bill of exceptions.

The subject of the larceny charged was a cow which belonged to defendant. When it was about one year old defendant placed it in a pasture owned by one Blades, agreeing to pay Blades a certain sum per month for its pasturage. A year later, April, 1906, Blades sold and transferred possession of the pasture to T. D. Cheney, who, through Blades, informed defendant that, if the animal remained there, he (Cheney) would charge defendant $1 per month for its pasturage. In September following the defendant called upon Cheney to pay the pasturage bill, and get the cow, but, owing to a dispute as to the amount due for pasturage and defendant's refusal to pay the sum claimed by Cheney as due himself and Blades, he did not get her. In November, 1906, the cow disappeared from the pasture, and, upon defendant being informed of her disappearance, he stated that he would hold Blades and Cheney responsible for her value. Several months later a cow claimed and shown by the prosecution to be the one in dispute was found in a neighboring pasture, where, it was charged, she had been placed by defendant, and from which she was taken by Blades and Cheney to the latter's pasture. Defendant caused the arrest of both Blades and Cheney for taking this cow, claiming that she was not the one in dispute, but another which defendant owned. The charge against Blades and Cheney was dismissed upon the hearing; whereupon defendant was charged with the larceny of the animal as above stated.

1. It is insisted that the court erred in instructing the jury, in substance, that the law recognized a general and special ownership in personal property, and that it might be stolen from one whose ownership was either general or special; that one who had actual possession of cattle received by him for pasture for compensation has a lien thereon for such compensation, and is a special owner thereof and may be deemed the owner thereof within the law of larceny, and an information may properly allege him to be the owner thereof; and, in connection therewith, giving the following instruction: "From these principles it follows that a person having the general ownership of personal property may be guilty of stealing his own property from another who has a special ownership therein; and, if a man willfully and feloniously takes his own personal property away from the possession of a special owner thereof, with intent to charge such special owner therewith when such special owner has the right as against him to retain it for some benefit to himself, he is guilty of larceny of such property." Section 484 of the Penal Code defines larceny as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. It being admitted that the animal was the personal property of the defendant, appellant strenuously contends that one of the essential elements necessary to constitute the crime, namely, that the subject of the larceny shall be the "personal property of another," is lacking. This position is not tenable. The law is well settled that the taking of personal property by the general owner with felonious intent from one in possession by virtue of some special right or interest therein constitutes larceny. "It is larceny to steal cattle from an agister who takes them from the owner to pasture, and the property may be alleged in the information to be the property of the agister." People v. Buelna, 81 Cal. 135, 22 Pac. 396; People v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 671; People v. Long, 50 Mich. 249, 15 N. W. 105; 12 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 965; Palmer v. People, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 166, 25 Am. Dec. 551; State v. McCoy, 89 N. C. 466; State v. Stephens, 32 Tex. 156. By virtue of the law (Civ. Code, § 3051) Cheney not only had an interest in the heifer to the extent of his lien thereon, but sustained to defendant as the general owner a relation which might render him legally chargeable for the value of the cow; and this lien, the enforcement of which depended upon possession, as well as the liability for her value, if imposed, constituted property in the animal which might be feloniously taken from him by the general owner. There is nothing in the Code provisions to which appellant directs attention contrary to the general rule. The phrase, "personal property of another," as used in section 484 of the Penal Code, correctly interpreted, means property in the possession of another who is entitled as bailee, or otherwise, to retain possession thereof for some benefit or profit to himself to the exclusion of all others, rather than the absolute ownership defined by section 679 of the Civil Code. Our conclusion is that the taking of property by the general owner thereof from the possession of one who rightfully holds it as bailee or otherwise for benefit to himself, with the intent to charge such bailee with the value thereof, or deprive him of such benefit, constitutes larceny.

2. There was no error in the instruction given to the jury in relation to the scope, effect, and consideration to be given to circumstantial evidence, as follows: "While every fact essential to prove the guilt of the defendant to a moral certainty must be fully proven, the law permits this to be done by circumstantial evidence, and where the evidence is circumstantial, but proves every fact essential to sustain the hypothesis of guilt, and to exclude the hypothesis of innocence, and is inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that of the guilt of the defendant, the law makes it the duty of the jury to convict the defendant." The instruction upon this subject must be read in connection with other portions of the charge. (People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. 102; People v. Neber, 125 Cal. 560, 58 Pac. 133); and, when so read and considered, the instruction is substantially identical with that upon the same subject sanctioned in the case of People v. Dick, 32 Cal. 215, cited by appellant. The court had theretofore charged the jury that "the law presumes every man innocent until his guilt is established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and this presumption attaches * * * to every fact essential to a conviction." In charging the jury it is not necessary in dealing with each particular phase of the case to repeat all the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire text. People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85; People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 77; People v. Clark, 84 Cal. 573, 24 Pac. 313.

3. The court at the request of the prosecution instructed the jury in the language of section 485 of the Penal Code relating to the finding of lost property. Appellant insists that the action of the court in giving this instruction was erroneous, for the reason that such instruction was not applicable to any theory in support of which evidence was offered. Conceding appellant's position to be correct, it does not follow that it constitutes reversible error. "The giving of an instruction not supported by the evidence is sufficient ground for reversal where it appears that such instruction misled, or might have misled, the jury to the prejudice of the party complaining." Blashfield on Instructions to Juries, § 91; People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378; People v. Roberts, 1 Cal. App. 447, 82 Pac. 624. In the case last cited the court says: "While we recognize that it is not every case of giving an instruction not pertinent to the evidence that will result in the reversal of a judgment, we are of the opinion that the giving of the instruction under discussion, under the circumstances of this case, was prejudicial." A careful examination of the record fails to disclose any manner in which the alleged error could have prejudiced the substantial rights of the defendant (Pen. Code, § 1404), and counsel does not attempt to point out wherein such rights might have been affected. At the hearing on an appeal prosecuted by one convicted of a crime, the burden rests upon him, not only to disclose wherein the giving of an instruction constituted error, but also to show affirmatively that it tends in some degree to mislead or confuse the minds of the jury to the possible prejudice of his rights; and, unless this is made to appear, the alleged error must be regarded as harmless.

4. The court instructed the jury as follows: "A person who takes in cattle to pasture for compensation, and who has the care and possession of such cattle, has a lien thereon for his compensation for pasturing the same, and is a special owner thereof, and may be deemed to be the owner thereof within the law of larceny, and an information charging the larceny of such cattle may properly allege that he is the owner thereof." Appellant contends that the giving of this instruction constituted error, for the reason that it conveyed to the jury the idea that if defendant took the animal away he was guilty of stealing her as against Blades. The defendant was not charged with stealing the property of Blades, but was charged with stealing the personal property of one T. D. Cheney. The instruction clearly shows that, in order to justify a verdict of guilty, the jury must be satisfied that the helper was at the time of the taking in the possession of Cheney.

5. It is next contended that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. In reply to this it may be said that an examination of the voluminous record shows abundant testimony to justify the conclusion reached by the jury. No good purpose could be subserved by reviewing it. The evidence is conflicting, and, while some of the witnesses may have sworn falsely, as claimed by appellant, still the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony are matters, in the first instance, for the consideration of the jury, and, in the second, for the trial judge upon hearing the motion for new trial.

6. The witness Blades was asked the following question by the prosecution: "Were you and Mr. Cheney placed under arrest for stealing this calf, you have been referring to, that you took into town at that time?" The court overruled defendant's objection to the same, and this ruling is assigned as error. The question was proper as tending to elicit evidence of the intent of defendant in taking the helper from the pasture of Cheney. It was necessary, under the theory of the prosecution, to prove that he took her with the intent to charge Cheney with her value. He had stated that he would hold Blades and Cheney responsible for her loss. This question, and the admission of the evidence in the proceedings had before the justice of the peace wherein Blades and Cheney had been arrested for taking the helper from the pasture wherein it was claimed defendant had placed her, were proper and legitimate for the purpose of showing the wrongful intent with which defendant deprived Cheney of the possession of her. The evidence was admissible upon the same ground that evidence of a civil suit instituted by defendant against them for her value would be admissible.

We are unable to find any prejudicial error in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Where after the execution of a contract for the sale of land it was modified by an escrow agreement providing that, unless a certificate showing an unincumbered title should be signed by an abstract company within a specified time, the transaction was at an end, and the vendee refused to accept the title as shown by the certificate, whereupon the abstract company surrendered to each of the parties the papers and Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Suit by E. C. Webster against Anna N. Gibson and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Kemp & Collier, for appellant. Munson & Barclay, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. Action for specific performance. Judgment for defendants. Appeal from judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The material facts involved, as found by the court, were: That on March 21, 1905, defendant Anna Gibson was the owner of certain real property. That on said date she signed a receipt for $100, acknowledging the same as part payment on account of a sale by her to plaintiff of said property. That the total consideration price was $4,900. Of this sum $2,900 was to be paid on production of a certificate of title and delivery of a deed, and the balance to be secured by mortgage, drawing 6 per cent. interest, on a part of the premises sold. No time was specified in this agreement within which the same should be performed.

The court found the signature of Mrs. Gibson to have been procured by misrepresentation in relation to certain material facts involved in the transaction. Subsequent to the execution of the instrument Mrs. Gibson acknowledged the deed conveying said premises to plaintiff, and left the same with a notary, without instructions, intending, however, that the same should be by some person delivered to the purchaser in performance of her agreement. Subsequently, on April 14, 1905, the husband, without instructions from the wife, obtained possession of the deed, and on said date he and the plaintiff executed to an abstract company certain written escrow instructions relative to its delivery, among which instructions it is stated that, if the abstract company could, within 15 days, write an unlimited certificate showing the title to be free of incumbrance, except taxes for the current year, it should deliver the deed to plaintiff and pay to defendant Anna Gibson the $2,900 purchase money, and deliver to her the mortgage. It was further stipulated that, unless such abstract company could write such certificate within 15 days, it should return the money and mortgage to plaintiff. It appears that the title was in such condition, by reason of certain building restrictions theretofore imposed upon the premises, that the abstract company could not write such certificate, and the title was not free and unincumbered in defendant; that on May 3d notice of the condition of the title was communicated to all parties, and plaintiff was notified that unless he was willing, within 24 hours, to accept the title in its then condition the deed would be returned to the defendant; that plaintiff did not agree to accept such title within the time specified, and thereupon, on May 5th the deed was returned to the defendants, and the money and mortgage restored to plaintiff; that on the day following the defendant tendered to plaintiff the $100 received under the original receipt, which he refused to accept; that no subsequent tender of the money or mortgage was ever made by plaintiff to said Anna Gibson, and she is not able to transfer a good and sufficient title to plaintiff; that the terms of said original agreement were not just and equitable; that the sum of $4,900 was not the full value of the premises at the date of the execution of the said agreement.

There is testimony in the record tending to support each and every finding above mentioned, and such findings support the judgment. Viewing the case presented by the record from any point, the judgment should be affirmed. Assuming the correctness of plaintiff's position—that certain findings have no support from the evidence, and therefore it is but just to say that the husband was the authorized agent of the wife, and that all of his acts were by her authority—it still appears that the written agreement of the wife, as subsequently modified by the escrow agreement, signed by the husband alone, all of which instruments, if considered at all, should be read together, is an agreement that, unless a certificate showing an unincumbered title should be signed by the abstract company within 15 days from April 15th, the transaction was at an end. There is evidence in the record that plaintiff refused to accept the title as shown by the certificate, and thereupon the abstract company holding the papers and money in escrow, acting under the instructions given by the parties, surrendered to each the papers and money to which they were respectively entitled. We believe, however, that the court was warranted from the evidence in finding that the original transaction was tainted with fraud, practiced by plaintiff, and that the husband was in no respect the agent of his wife, and that the price agreed to be paid was not the full value of the said premises, and that defendant was not able to convey a good and sufficient title—all of which being true, no judgment other than that rendered would be warranted.

We have examined the specifications of error alleged to have occurred at the trial, and find nothing prejudicial therein.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

JOYCE v. NEWMARK & EDWARDS et al.
(Civ. 439.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Dec. 20, 1907.)

COURTS—STARE DECISIS—RULE OF PROPERTY.

The rule that, where a contract for public improvement and the resolution of intention and the intermediate proceedings to the final award of the contract are based upon specifications providing that all loss or damages arising from the nature of the work to be done shall be sustained by the contractor, the bonds issued pursuant to such contract and the property assessments are void, is a rule of property, which the court must follow.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Suit by T. F. Joyce against Newmark & Edwards and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jones & Drake, for appellants. Bernard & Potter, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Action to obtain a decree annulling certain assessments and bonds issued pursuant thereto, and to quiet title to certain premises involved. Judgment for plaintiff, from which judgment and a subsequent order denying a new trial defendants appeal.

The ownership of plaintiff in the premises is not questioned. The only claim of defendants thereto grows out of the issuance of certain bonds issued on account of the improvement of Workman street in the city of Los Angeles. The record shows that the contract for the work of such improvement was awarded to one Groat; that such contract, and the resolution of intention to improve the street, and all proceedings intermediate the adoption of the resolution to improve and the final award of the contract, were based upon provisions contained in the specifications; "that all loss or damages arising from the nature of the work to be done * * * shall be sustained by the contractor." The effect of such provision in the specifications has been determined by the Supreme Court of this state in many cases, and finally in Woollacott v. Meekin (Cal. App.) 91 Pac. 612, wherein such specifications are said to be unauthorized and impose conditions tending to increase the cost of the work, and therefore render void the bonds issued pursuant to such contract. In that case it is further determined by a majority of the court that the like decisions in previous cases involving a similar question, were permissible and com-stitute a rule of property, and the duty of the courts was to adhere thereto. Under this mandate, we are permitted only to say that this claim of defendants, being a claim of lien based upon a void assessment and void bonds, was properly annulled, and, under such last-named decision, the decree quieting title properly entered.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss any other questions involved in the appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (Cr. 111.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Dec. 16, 1907.)

1. FORGERY — INFORMATION — MANNER OF FRAUD.

Where an instrument alleged to have been forged appears to be one the forgery of which is prohibited by statute, and to be one that may work a fraud on the person intended to be defrauded, it is not necessary that the information allege the manner in which the person could be defrauded by such instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forgery, § 78.]

2. SAME.

An information for forgery charged that J. did willfully, etc., and with intent to defraud the United Railroads of San Francisco, make, alter, forge, and counterfeit a certain writing set out, which purported to be a receipt by one Francis A. for services rendered to such railroads, and further charged that defendant uttered the same to the assistant treasurer of the United Railroads with intent to defraud them, etc. Held, that the instrument being a proper subject of forgery under Pen. Code, § 470, prohibiting the forging of receipts, the information sufficiently showed that it was susceptible of being used to defraud.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forgery, § 78.]

3. SAME — INFORMATION — EVIDENCE — VARI-ANCE.

Where an information charged defendant with forging a receipt but the proof showed that the receipt was signed by defendant in his own name as his receipt, and, at most, tended to show forgery of an instrument in the aspect of an order for the payment of money, there was a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forgery, § 93.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Thomas Johnson was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Reversed.

Brennan & Lane, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and appealed to this court from the judgment, the order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial. No demurrer was filed to the information, but defendant, on his motion for an arrest of judgment, attacked, and now attacks, the information upon the ground that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense. Pen. Code, § 1012.

The information charges that the defendant, Thomas Johnson, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and with intent to prejudice, damage and defraud the United Railroads of San Francisco, a corporation, make, alter, forge and counterfeit a certain instrument in writing in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Date190.....Page 0330, No. 4517.

"Name: Francis A.

"Received of the United Railroads of San Francisco $11.25, in full for services to Jan. 12, 1907.

"Francis A. [Signature]."

—and further charges in the usual form that he then and there uttered the same to one Ivor Jones, then and there the assistant treasurer of said United Railroads of San Francisco, with intent to defraud said United Railroads, knowing the same to be altered, forged and counterfeit.

The point urged against the information is that it does not appear that the United Railroads could have been injured by the instrument set forth; it being upon its face a receipt, evidencing payment of money by the United Railroads to the signer of the receipt. Where it does not appear from the face of the instrument that the instrument forged could work an injury to the person alleged to have been intended to be defrauded, extrinsic facts must be alleged sufficient to show that such party could have been defrauded thereby. On the contrary, if the instrument appears on its face to be one prohibited to be forged by the statute, and appears on its face to be one that may work a fraud on the person intended to be defrauded, it is not necessary to allege how such person could be defrauded. "The instrument being set out, and purporting on its face to be the thing prohibited to be forged, * * * there is no need of further allegations to show how it was the thing, or how it could be used as an instrument of fraud, or that it was so used in fact." Commonwealth v. White, 145 Mass. 392, 14 N. E. 611. It is sufficient that the forged instrument might be used to perpetrate a fraud, and it is not necessary to set out in detail how the fraud could be effected. Commonwealth v. Costello, 120 Mass. 358; Travis v. State, 83 Ga. 372, 9 S. E. 1063; People v. Van Alstine, 57 Mich. 74, 23 N. W. 594; People v. Ah Woo, 28 Cal. 212; Ex parte Finley, 46 Cal. 262, 5 Pac. 222; People v. Bibby, 91 Cal. 470, 27 Pac. 781; People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 72 Pac. 600; West v. State, 22 N. J. Law, 212; Snell v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 347. In People v. Munroe, 100 Cal. 664, 35 Pac. 326, 24 L. R. A. 33, 38 Am. St. Rep. 323, it is said that the essential ingredients of forgery are "(1) A false making of some instrument; (2) a fraudulent intent; (3) if genuine, the writing might injure another." The court further said that "the third element stated is expressly recognized by this court to be the true test as to the nature of the writing"—citing People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 514; People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 506; Ex parte Finley, 66 Cal. 263, 5 Pac. 222.

Turning, now, to the instrument set forth in the indictment, and alleged to have been forged by defendant Johnson with intent to defraud the United Railroads, it purports on its face to be a receipt of one Francis A., who, for the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the information, must be assumed to be a different person from the defendant. Receipts are in terms mentioned in the statute in the list of instruments that may be the subject of forgery. Pen. Code, § 470. If the defendant forged this receipt, and then presented it to the United Railroads as the genuine receipt of Francis A., and thereby procured any money from said United Railroads that it may have owed Francis A., it is perfectly clear that the corporation would have been defrauded thereby. Or, again, if Johnson were a disbursing officer of such corporation, and forged said receipt, and gave it to the corporation as a voucher for money falsely claimed to have been paid out by him for said corporation to Francis A., the corporation could and would have been prejudiced and defrauded thereby. We thus see that the instrument might, if accepted as true and genuine, work a fraud on the United Railroads, and the information meets the requirements of the law in this regard. It appears on its face that it might be used to work a fraud on the person or corporation intended to be defrauded. The only case cited by appellant which we think sustains his contention is Clarke v. State, 8 Ohio St. 630, where it was held that a receipt could not be forged with intent to defraud the payor therein. But this case was not argued by the Attorney General, but he confessed error, and the court, without citing any authorities, held that the receipt could not work a fraud on the payor. We believe the court came to a wrong conclusion in that case, even under the rule announced in general terms by itself in that case. The information in the case at bar is sufficient. We have thus far been considering the information only; but when we come to an examination of the evidence the case bears a different aspect.

It appears that Thomas Johnson and Francis A. are one and the same person, and, when the defendant signed the name Francis A. to the receipt, he signed it as his own name. It was the name under which he was known, and under which he was working for the United Railroads. It seems to have been the practice with the United Railroads to issue to laborers, such as was the defendant, brass tags numbered to correspond with numbers written against the names of the laborers in the weekly pay roll. In order to facilitate paying the men, blank receipts would be filled out by clerks in the office of the company for the amount due the men. Upon each blank receipt thus filled out would be written the name of the man and his number. These receipts were thereupon, by an employé of the company, delivered to the men holding the corresponding brass tags, and the tags taken up. The men were required to sign these receipts upon being paid their wages. In accordance with this custom, defendant was given the receipt set forth in the information, save that the amount written thereon was $4.25, and the same had not then been signed by anybody. Defendant subsequently presented the same to the assistant treasurer of the company for the purpose of getting his wages, signed by himself, but with the amount thereof changed to $11.25. Treated as a receipt, the instrument was clearly the instrument of the defendant. He had a perfect right to sign his name thereto, and it is difficult to see why he had not the right to change the amount thereof before executing it; that is, before delivering it to the company. It was an instrument intended to be signed and executed by himself alone. While as a matter of convenience the instrument had been prepared by the clerk of the United Railroads, it did not on its face purport to be an instrument executed or to be executed by the company.

It is claimed by the respondent that the instrument, when delivered to defendant, was in effect, under the methods adopted by the company for the payment of its laborers, a request or order for the payment of money. But on its face it certainly did not so appear, and no facts are charged in the information to give it such effect. The instrument charged to have been forged appears in the information to be a receipt, shown in the evidence to have been signed by defendant in his own name as his receipt. If it be conceded for purposes of argument that, notwithstanding that the instrument set forth is, on its face, unambiguous and plainly a receipt, facts might have been alleged to give it the force and effect of a request or order for the payment of money, an information so framed would charge a different offense than the one charged in the information. Defendant is charged with forging a receipt. True, it is not called a receipt in the information, but it is set out in full, and clearly appears to be a receipt. The evidence, however, at the best, only tends to show a forgery of the instrument in the aspect of an order for the payment of money. No such case is made by the information, but an entirely different offense is charged. Defendant raised the question of variance several times during the trial. For the reasons above set forth, the evidence does not support the verdict, and the court should have granted a new trial. In the case of People v. Peacock, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 72, cited by the respondent, although defendant signed his own name, he signed it as the name of another person who bore the same name, and for whom the goods were intended, as the defendant well knew. The case simply enunciates the same rule as laid down in People v. Rushing, 130 Cal. 449, 62 Pac. 742, 80 Am. St. Rep. 141, but in its facts bears no resemblance to the case at bar.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

LYNCH v. McGHAN. (Civ. 327.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION—DAMAGES—USE OF PROPERTY.

Civ. Code, § 3333, provides that, for breach of a noncontract obligation, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided, is the amount that will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not. Section 3336 provides that the detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest, or, where action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest at the option of the injured party, and a fair compensation for time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property. Held, that plaintiff in an action for conversion of certain horses could not recover for the use of the horses under section 3333, but was limited to the damages specified in section 3336.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 47, Trover and Conversion, §§ 253-255.]

2. NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DISCRETION.

The granting a motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, § 201.]

3. SAME—NATURE OF ORDER.

Where an order granting a new trial did not specify the ground on which it was granted, it would be upheld on appeal if justified on any ground contained in the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3772-3776.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by L. A. Lynch against Charles McGhan. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Jacobs & Flack, for respondent. Miller & Clark, for intervenor.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover damages for the conversion of six horses and some other personal property. The court found that "plaintiff has been damaged by such unlawful conversion in the following specific amounts, namely: The sum of $252.60 cash taken from plaintiff; the sum of $160, the value of the aforesaid six horses; the sum of $17. the amount of time and money spent by plaintiff in the pursuit of the aforesaid property; the sum of $140 on account of the loss of use of the aforesaid six horses from the time of their conversion, and the sum of $22.60, which is the interest on the value of the aforesaid money and horses from the time of their conversion by defendant at the rate of seven per cent per annum, which makes the total amount of plaintiff's damages sustained in the premises the sum of $592.20." It is obvious that this finding is erroneous, at least as to the $140 for the use of the horses.

The rule as to damages for the conversion of personal property is prescribed in section 3336 of the Civil Code as follows: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: (1) The value of the property at the time of the conversion, with the interest from that time, or where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict without interest at the option of the injured party; and (2) a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." The interest on the value of the property is the allowance provided by the statute in lieu of the value of the use of the property and not in addition thereto. The question has been more or less considered in the following cases: Douglas v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562; Hamer v. Hathaway, 33 Cal. 117; Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 2 Am. Rep. 462; Barrante v. Garratt, 50 Cal. 112; McCray v. Burr, 125 Cal. 686, 58 Pac. 203; Yukon River, etc., Co. v. Gratto, 136 Cal. 541, 69 Pac. 252.

Appellant claims that interest was allowed under said section 3336 and damages for the use of the stock under section 3333 of the Civil Code, and that these are concurrent sections. In support of the contention the following cases are cited: Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 103, 87 Am. Dec. 107; Fairbanks v. Williams, 58 Cal. 242; Livestock, etc., Co. v. Union Co., 114 Cal. 447, 46 Pac. 286. The language employed by the Legislature precludes such construction, and the cases cited are not in point. Said section 3333 lays down a general rule of damages, and especially excepts the instances "where otherwise expressly provided by this Code." As we have seen, for the case at bar there is an express provision in said section 3336. The Stevenson Case, supra, was not in conversion, but was for the recovery of the possession of a mare and damages for her detention. It was properly held by the court that special damages must be pleaded. The question involved in the Fairbanks Case, supra, was as to the expense incurred in the pursuit of the property. In the Livestock, etc., Case the action was for the recovery of the possession of the property with damages for its detention or its value in case delivery could not be had

What is said by the court as to damages for the detention of the property must be considered in view of the nature of the action.

Again, one of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was based is "newly discovered evidence material for the defendant which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial." Certain affidavits were introduced containing important statements bearing upon the issue as to the ownership of the property. Much must be conceded to the discretion of the trial court in the determination of the sufficiency of the newly discovered evidence to justify a new trial. This is true whether said evidence be cumulative or otherwise. Admitting that it is cumulative, if the court had denied the motion on that ground, it would be a sufficient reason for affirmance; but the contrary is not true that the order granting the motion should be reversed because the additional evidence is merely cumulative, because, as said in Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 692, 62 Pac. 254: "For, in either case, it is for the trial judge to determine whether the evidence is of character probably to affect the result on a new trial; and, unless the evidence be of such a character as to make it manifest and certain to this court that in the one case it would, or in the other that it would not, result differently on a retrial, the order will not be disturbed." So here the newly discovered evidence is such that, if the motion for a new trial had been either granted or denied on that ground, it could not be said that the trial court was not justified in its action. It does not appear upon what specific ground the motion was granted, as the order is in the following form: "And the court, being fully advised thereupon, grants said motion for a new trial to the defendant, Charles McGhan."

There can be no question, therefore, that, if justified on any ground contained in the motion, the order must be upheld.

The order granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Dec. 20, 1907.)

DEEDS—RESERVATIONS.

The owner of land granted an easement for a bicycle road on condition that, unless it should be used within a specified time, the right of way should revert to him. After his death his executors sold a portion of the premises over which the easement extended. The sale was confirmed by the superior court, and, in the order of confirmation and in the appraisalment filed by the executors, the property was described as "being part of Tp. 1 S., Rg. 12 W., 1⁸²/₁₀₀ acres, * * * (except 2⁴/₁₀₀ of an acre in a cycleway) of lot 4, Sec. 6." The deed executed by the executors described the property so as to include all of lot 4, which general description was followed by a statement that the property was described in the inventory in the manner following, and then followed a description as in the order of confirmation. Held, that the deed, order, and inventory could only be read as to include all of the ground included in the easement, subject to whatever rights existed under the grant thereof, and there was nothing to show a reservation of the fee in the ground over which the easement extended.

ALLEN, P. J. Action to quiet title and to have certain easements declared forfeited. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The first point made on appeal is that plaintiffs did not show title to the property across which the easements were originally granted. We think there is nothing in this point. All parties claim under Andrew Glassell, deceased. Glassell granted the easements upon the express stipulation that, unless the contemplated bicycle road and the viaduct referred to should be completed and used within five years from and after the date of the deed, said right of way should revert to the grantor, and, if at any time the grantees or their assigns should cease to use the same for the purposes specified for a continuous period of three years, a reverter should result. After the death of Glassell his executors sold to one Rogers a portion of the premises over which the easements extended. Plaintiffs deraign title through Rogers. The sale to Rogers was confirmed by the superior court, and in such order of confirmation and in the appraisalment filed by the executors the property under consideration was described as "7²⁰/₁₀₀ acres, being (exc. of 2⁵/₁₀₀ acres in Cycleway & R. R. R. W.) S. 7⁵⁰/₁₀₀ acres of lot 3," etc. The second tract is described as: "Being part of Tp. 1 S., Rg. 12 W., 1⁸²/₁₀₀ acres, being all S. of R. R. R. W. (except 2⁴/₁₀₀ of an acre in a cycleway) of lot 4, Sec. 6." The deed executed by the executors to Rogers described the property so as to include all of lots 1 and 4 hereinbefore mentioned. This general description was followed by a statement that the said real property was described in the inventory in the manner following. Then follows, so far as affects the property in litigation, a description as in the order of confirmation.

We are of opinion that a fair construction of the deed, order, and inventory can only be to read the same as including all of said ground included in the easements, but subject to whatever rights existed under the deeds granting the same; and this intention is evident from the manner of description, and nothing therein can be said to amount to a reservation of the fee in the ground over which the easements extended. There is satisfactory evidence in the record supporting the finding that no part of this cycleway over the premises in question had been completed; nor had the same ever been used in the manner stipulated in the deed.

The judgment of forfeiture and decree quieting title to the premises were warranted.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

UNITED STATES NAT. BANK OF PORTLAND v. WADDINGHAM. (Civ. 438.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 20, 1907.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST.

Civ. Code, § 1651, provides that the written parts of an instrument shall control the printed ones, and section 1654 declares that an uncertainty in the language of a contract is to be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. A blank form of note contained a provision that the maker would pay, "with interest, payable monthly, at the rate of — per cent. per — until paid," and a further provision that, should the note not be paid at maturity, it should thereafter bear interest at a specified per cent. per month. The maker struck out the first provision as to payment of interest, except the words "until paid," and wrote in place of such provision "without interest." Held, that the maker was required to pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent. from the maturity of the note.

2. INTEREST—INTEREST ON FINDINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1035, provides that the clerk must include in the judgment entered up by him any interest on the verdict or decision of the court from the time it was rendered or made. Held that, where, in an action on a note calling for 2 per cent. interest after maturity, the decision was in favor of the holder, the judgment entered by the clerk should have been the aggregate amount of principal and interest due at the rate called for by the note at the time the decision was rendered, and a judgment apparently entitling the holder to the rate called for by the note until execution on the judgment was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by the United States National Bank of Portland against J. H. Waddingham. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Theo. Martin and Grant Jackson, for appellant. Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action on promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Defendant, on August 1, 1905, executed to plaintiff's assignor a promissory note for $2,000, using for that purpose a blank form as follows:

"$. Los Angeles, Cal.,, 190..

"On. 190.., at three o'clock p. m. of that day (no grace) for value received, I promise to pay to the order of. dollars, at the Los Angeles National Bank, with interest payable monthly, at the rate of per cent. per. until paid. [If said interest be not paid when due, it shall be added to the principal, and bear interest at the same rate as the principal, and the whole amount of principal and interest shall thereafter be due and payable at the option of the payee.] Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States; and should this note not be paid at maturity it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of two per cent. per month." (The italics and brackets are inserted for purpose of reference.)

The amount ($2,000), date (August 1, 1905), day when due (November 1, 1905), and the name of the payee (Caples Bros., Portland, Or.), were inserted in the proper blanks in the form. The words italicized were erased by running a pen through them, and there was written immediately above them the words, "without interest." It is conceded that the portion of the note included in the brackets has no bearing upon the question to be considered upon this appeal, which is: Was it the intention of the parties to said note that the principal should bear interest as provided in the last clause of the note?

The agreement that the principal shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month after maturity is irreconcilable with the promise, "without interest until paid." The words "until paid," are a part of the original form, and the words "without interest" are the only written part of the instrument to be considered in applying the rule of section 1651, Civ. Code, that the written parts control the printed parts. In seeking to ascertain the intention of the parties from the writing, it will be observed, first, that the maker of the note selected from the various current blank forms of promissory notes one containing a penal clause. If instead of erasing the reference to per cent. and interest the maker had inserted some rate of interest, say 6 per cent., the note would then have read: "With interest payable monthly, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid." It would not, we think, or at least could not legally be said, that the maker intended by the use of the word "paid" to render ineffective the penal clause in the note increasing the interest to 2 per cent. after maturity. If the expression "with interest until paid" should be construed so as to render the penal clause effective, the same rule would render such a construction proper where the expression used was "without interest until paid." Giving effect thus to every part of the contract, so far as possible, the last interest clause was evidently intended to modify the first, if payment were not made prior to the maturity of the note, that is, on or before November 1, 1905. This construction is also supported by the rule of section 1654 of the Civil Code that an uncertainty in the language of a contract is to be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist, the promisor being presumed to be such party.

The conclusion of the court that plaintiff was entitled to recover judgment for $2,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 2 per cent. per month from November 1, 1905, was correct, but would have been better expressed had the computation of interest been made and the whole amount of the principal and interest due at the date of the finding stated therein. The judgment as framed apparently entitles the plaintiff to continue to enjoy the benefit of the 2 per cent. per month interest clause until execution on the judgment. This is improper.

The statute provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 1035), "the clerk must include in the judgment entered up by him any interest on the verdict or decision of the court from the time it was rendered or made." The interest after verdict or decision must be computed at the legal rate upon the aggregate amount of principal and interest due at the contract rate at the time the decision or verdict was rendered. Murdock v. Clarke, 88 Cal. 394, 26 Pac. 601. The theory of the law is not that the party recover the particular note or chose in action, but that he recover a fixed and definite sum as damages for the nonperformance of the contract, and in cases of failure to pay money due the true measure of damage is the amount of money owing and the interest that was agreed upon. The amount of the judgment being ascertained, the statute steps in and regulates the rate at which it shall bear interest. Guy v. Franklin, 5 Cal. 417. The rule is not affected by the judgment being formulated by the court instead of the clerk. Barnhart v. Edwards, 128 Cal. 575, 61 Pac. 176.

That there may be no uncertainty in this respect, the judgment should be modified so as to state the total sum of principal and interest due at the date of the rendition of the decision (findings) in accordance with the foregoing opinion, which appears from the record to have been on July 20, 1906. Eight months and 19 days interest at 2 per cent. per month on $2,000 would be $345.33. The amount of the judgment, then, should be $2,345.33, entered as of July 20, 1906. The statute provides the rate of interest thereon.

It is therefore ordered that the superior court modify said judgment by striking out the words and figures "two thousand (2,000) dollars, together with interest thereon from November 1, 1905, at the rate of two (2) per cent. a month," and inserting in lieu thereof the words and figures "two thousand three hundred and forty-five and $\frac{33}{100}$ (\$2,345.33) dollars"; and, when said judgment is so modified, it is affirmed.

In re McCARTHY'S ESTATE. (Civ. 423.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
December 24, 1907. Rehearing denied by Supreme Court Feb. 20, 1908.)

HOMESTEAD — SURVIVING WIFE — VALUE — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Community property of a husband and wife, of the value of $2,000 at the time it is set apart as a homestead, which at the time of the death of the husband has increased in value to an amount in excess of the homestead exemption, cannot be reached by creditors of the estate, since by the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, title to the homestead vests absolutely in the survivor, and the fact that Civ. Code, § 1265, provides that the title shall vest subject to no other liability than such as exists or has been created under the provisions of the title "Homestead," and the latter part of Civ. Code, § 1474, provides that in either case it is not subject to the payment of any debt or liability except as provided in the Civil Code, does not affect the rule, where the creditors' claims do not come within the liabilities to which the sections refer, as fixed by Civ. Code, tit. "Homesteads," § 1241.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Petition by the administratrix of the estate of Charles Patrick McCarthy, deceased, to set apart a homestead to her as his widow. From an order setting apart the homestead, a creditor appeals. Affirmed.

See 82 Pac. 635.

Wyckoff & Gardner, for appellant. James A. Hall, for respondent.

COOPER J. Appeal from order setting apart a homestead. The facts necessary to a decision of the question in this case are as follows: In November, 1883, Charles Patrick McCarthy duly executed and recorded a declaration of homestead upon the premises described in the petition. At the time of such recording the premises were community property of the said McCarthy and his wife, Ellen, and they resided thereon with their children. The value at that time was $2,000. The premises continued to be the home of McCarthy and his family until his death in January, 1903. In February, 1903, Ellen McCarthy, the widow, was duly appointed administratrix, took the oath, qualified, and ever since has been such administratrix. The estate is insolvent, and certain creditors have proven their claims, which have been duly allowed by the superior court, and are on file. An inventory and appraisement has been duly made and filed, in which the said premises are appraised at the sum of $5,000. In June, 1903, the administratrix duly filed her petition, praying for an order setting apart the premises to her as the surviving widow of deceased. This petition was opposed by Mary Burke, a creditor of the estate, whose claim has been duly allowed and filed. Upon the trial the court found that the homestead was, at the time of the death of McCarthy and at the time of the hearing, of the value of $8,000,

This finding may be regarded as immaterial, if the homestead is, under the law, the property of the widow and exempt from execution or other process by the creditors of the estate. If the homestead was exempt from execution, it was the duty of the court to set it apart to the widow. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465. The question for decision, as stated by appellant's counsel, is: "As against a protesting creditor of the estate, may the court set apart to the surviving wife the whole of a homestead selected by the husband during his lifetime from the community property; the said homestead having been of the value of $2,000 at the time of selection, and of the value of $8,000 at the time of the death and ever since, and the estate being otherwise insolvent?"

Section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor." This case comes within the language of the above-quoted section. It has been held in such case that the title vests by operation of law in the survivor immediately upon the death of the other spouse, without any order setting apart the homestead (Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 339, 25 Pac. 489, 1067; Fisher v. Bartholomew [Cal. App.] 88 Pac. 608, and cases cited), and the title to such homestead could not be affected by a subsequent order of the court (Fisher v. Bartholomew, supra; Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 612, 64 Pac. 995).

It is contended by appellant that, notwithstanding the language of the section quoted, the survivor gets title to the homestead subject to the provisions of the Civil Code as to reaching any excess in value beyond $5,000 by process in behalf of creditors of the deceased. In other words, it is claimed that to "vest absolutely in the survivor" does not mean to "vest absolutely," but to vest subject to the right of the creditors of the deceased to reach any excess of $5,000 in value. Such, in our opinion, is not the meaning of the section. We must read the sections of the Codes together for the purpose of arriving at the intent and purpose of any particular provision. It is provided in the Civil Code, under the title relating to homesteads (section 1265), as follows: "From and after the time the declaration is filed for record, the premises therein described constitute a homestead. If the selection was made by a married person from the community property, the land, on the death of either of the spouses, vests in the survivor, subject to no other liability than such as exists or has been created under the provisions of this title; in other cases, upon the death of the person whose property was selected as a homestead, it shall go to his heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign the same for a limited period to the family of the decedent; but in no case shall it be held liable for the debts of the owner, except as provided in this title." This section adds the provision "subject to no other liability than such as exists, or has been created under this title," and again emphasizes the intention of the Legislature by adding, "but in no case shall it be held liable for the debts of the owner, except as provided in this title." These provisions must be read into section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure.

We must, then, look to the liabilities created by the title on homesteads (Civ. Code, § 1241), and we there find the following: "The homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained: (1) Before the declaration of homestead was filed for record and which constitute liens upon the premises. (2) On debts secured by mechanics, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, builders, laborers of every class, material men's or vendors' liens upon the premises. (3) On debts secured by mortgages of the premises, executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, or by an unmarried claimant. (4) On debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." The creditors' claim in this case does not come within the class enumerated in said section, and therefore the homestead is not subject to this liability.

It is claimed that the latter part of section 1474, Code Civ. Proc., which provides: "In either case it is not subject to the payment of any debt, or liability contracted by or existing against the husband and wife, or either of them, previous to or at the time of the death of such husband and wife, except as provided in the Civil Code"—is sufficient to show that the intention was to allow general creditors to reach the excess in value over $5,000. In our opinion such is not the proper construction of the statute. It evidently means the provisions of section 1241 of the Civil Code hereinbefore quoted. The particular provision of the Code herein quoted, with reference to homesteads upon the death of the husband or wife, is the particular provision of the Civil Code that governs. It is a special provision relating to the very question as to where the title to the homestead vests in case of the death of the husband or wife.

Section 1476 of the Code of Civil Procedure seems to contemplate that, if the homestead exceeded in value the sum of $5,000 at the time it was selected and recorded, the excess over $5,000 may be reached. This is evidently upon the theory that a homestead could not be valid upon premises which exceeded $5,000 in value at the time of the selection. It is not necessary to decide the question in this case, for the reason that it is not pretended that the premises were of the value of $5,000 at the time of the selection of the homestead. It is true that under the construction herein given the creditors of a deceased person would not have the right to reach the value of the homestead in excess of $5,000, which they could have reached during his lifetime, and are thus placed in a worse position by his death; but for this reason we cannot change the statute. A creditor is presumed to know the law, and its provisions in relation to homesteads and exemptions. The homestead being of record, and the Code making provision as to where it should vest on the death of deceased, the debts were contracted with reference to the law and to the right of the widow to take the homestead free from such debts. The homestead was free from liability to general creditors at the time it became such. It continued so during the lifetime of deceased, unless it became of greater value than $5,000. It vested in the survivor entirely free from such liability, no matter what its value at the time of the death. The wife held in the nature of a joint tenant, with the right of survivorship.

The order is affirmed.

ZIPPERLEN et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Civ. 380.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 24, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 20, 1908.)

1. TRIAL—WITNESSES—CREDIBILITY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where inconsistency or apparent inconsistency in testimony is developed through cross-examination, it is for the jury to determine whether the witness is unworthy of belief.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 334-335.]

2. RAILROADS—STREET CROSSING ACCIDENT—LIABILITY.

If plaintiff before undertaking to cross railroad tracks at a street crossing exercised reasonable and ordinary care, and if, after the engineer or fireman on an approaching engine applied steam to the engine, the horse plaintiff was driving became frightened and stood upon the track on which the engine was moving, and plaintiff attempted to urge the horse forward, but could not do so, the company's employees were bound to keep a lookout and to ascertain whether the crossing was clear, and if they failed to do so, and plaintiff was injured in consequence without any fault on her part, the company is liable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 988.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVE-NESS.

A verdict on a substantial conflict of evidence will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

4. RAILROADS—STREET CROSSING ACCIDENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action against a railway company for injury to one driving across tracks at a street crossing and struck by an engine, held sufficient to sustain a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1138-1150.]

5. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—WHEN PROPER.

The rule authorizing the contradiction of one's own witness is, in its application, like the rule as to impeachment, attended by more or less danger of producing injustice, and hence should never be exercised except where the exigencies of the situation clearly warrant it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1268.]

6. SAME—EFFECT OF TESTIMONY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, prohibits a party to impeach his own witness by evidence of bad character, but provides that he may contradict him by other evidence, and may also show that he has made inconsistent statements with his present testimony, as provided in section 2052. Section 2052 provides that a witness may be impeached by evidence of inconsistent statements, but that he must be first given a chance to refresh his memory by having his attention called to the circumstances of times, places, and persons present when such statements were made. Held, that though the effect of admitting testimony to contradict one's own witness may be practically the same as if offered for impeachment, the only purpose for which the testimony may be given is merely to explain the manifestly awkward position in which a party has been placed through unexpected testimony of his own witness; section 2049 not authorizing the "impeachment" of one's own witness in the true legal sense of that term, the reference to section 2052 merely meaning that, before being permitted to prove that his witness has made inconsistent statements, the party must lay the foundation as provided by section 2052.

7. SAME.

The rule under the express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, that one may contradict his own witness or show that he has made inconsistent statements is subject to the qualification that the witness must give testimony damaging to the party calling him, and that it must appear that such party has been misled and taken by surprise and had reason to believe that the witness would give favorable testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1268.]

8. SAME.

A party will not be permitted under guise of the rule that one may contradict his own witness or show that he has made inconsistent statements to present to the jury mere hearsay declarations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1268.]

9. SAME.

If, in an action against a railway company for injury to one struck by an engine at a street crossing, it was plaintiff's theory that the engineer was negligent in failing to keep a lookout, the engineer's testimony, as her witness, that he saw her approaching the crossing was adverse to plaintiff as affecting her right to show that he had made an inconsistent statement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 1268.]

10. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

If, in an action against a railway company for injury to one struck by an engine at a street crossing, plaintiff relied on the last clear chance theory, the admission of testimony for plaintiff rebutting the engineer's testimony, as her witness, that he saw her approaching the crossing was harmless to the company; it appearing that if the jury found on that theory the verdict was based largely upon the engineer's testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4175.]

11. TRIAL—PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS OF FACT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION.

Whether a party whose witness has given unfavorable testimony was surprised as affecting his right to show inconsistent statements by the witness is a question for the court.

12. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION.

Though in determining whether a party has been surprised by unfavorable testimony of his own witness, as affecting his right to show an inconsistent statement of the witness, the better practice is to receive evidence through sworn witnesses, much is left to the trial court's discretion, and there was no abuse of discretion in accepting as a basis for evidence of an inconsistent statement unsworn statements of the party's counsel that the unfavorable testimony was different from that which the party's attorneys understood it would be.

13. RAILROADS—STREET CROSSING ACCIDENT—LIABILITY.

If an engineer did not see one crossing the track until she was in a position of danger, and then could have avoided injuring her, he was negligent in not doing so, though she was primarily negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1096-1099.]

14. EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In an action against a railway company for injury to one struck by an engine while crossing a track, evidence that, in the injured person's presence and immediately following the accident, the engineer asked the fireman "Why didn't you tell me to stop?" was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 351-368.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Personal injury action by Minnie Zipperlen and another against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory, for appellant. G. W. Cartwright and Edgar S. Van Meter, for respondents.

HART, J. Action for damages for personal injuries. The verdict of the jury was in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $4,125, and, agreeably to said verdict, judgment was entered in their favor for that sum. The appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is from said judgment.

The defendant corporation, at the time plaintiff, Mrs. Zipperlen, received the injuries for which reparation in damages is sought through this action, operated a steam railway through and over certain public streets in the city of Fresno. On the 13th day of February, 1900, said plaintiff was traveling in a conveyance, drawn by a single horse, along Tuolumne street, in said city. The complaint alleges that said street was "a regularly laid out, open, and traveled public highway in the said city of Fresno from the west part of said city to the east part thereof," and that said street crosses the railroad tracks of defendant at a point between G and H streets in said city. While the plaintiff was attempting to cross said tracks on said Tuolumne street, the vehicle in which she was riding was struck by a locomotive or "yard engine," used by defendant for "switching purposes," with the result that she was thrown with great violence to the ground, sustaining a fracture of the thigh, or, technically, the femur bone, and other less serious injuries. The plaintiff alleges that the injuries suffered by her were due to the negligence of the defendant. The claims of the plaintiffs are resisted by the defendant upon the ground of contributory negligence. A reversal of the judgment is insisted upon for the following reasons: (1) "That the evidence discloses, without substantial conflict, that the accident was occasioned by the contributory negligence and want of care of the plaintiff;" (2) "the court erred in allowing in evidence, as against this defendant, a certain conversation of the engineer of the defendant long after the accident occurred;" (3) "errors of the court in allowing, and refusing to give, certain instructions to the jury."

From the nature of the instructions submitted to the jury by the court, it is evident that the case was tried upon two distinct and diametrically opposite theories, viz.: (1) Knowledge on the part of the engineer of the perilous position of Mrs. Zipperlen and his failure to exercise the care imposed upon him under such circumstances to prevent the accident resulting in the damage. (2) Want of knowledge on the part of the engineer that any one at all was attempting to make the crossing, due to his gross carelessness and negligence in not looking, before and while the engine was moving toward the crossing, to ascertain whether or not it was clear. The first-stated proposition, it will be noted, involves what is known as the doctrine of the "last clear opportunity"—that is, that the engineer, having discovered Mrs. Zipperlen's perilous situation before damage was done, failed to exercise ordinary care to prevent the accident. Bennichsen v. Market St. Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 22, 84 Pac. 420. The second proposition involves the contention that the engineer moved his engine toward the crossing without exercising any care whatever, or in total disregard of the duty as to care imposed upon him—that is, without looking down the track on which his engine was moving to learn whether the crossing was clear or in use by some traveler. In order that a clear understanding may be conceived of two of the points urged against the validity of the judgment—insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of which the judgment is predicated, and errors in the giving of certain instructions—it will be necessary to review the evidence to some extent.

The testimony of the engineer Mosier (introduced as a witness by the plaintiff) is to the effect that, just previous to the accident, his engine was standing, according to his best judgment, about 2,000 feet north of the Tuolumne street crossing; that he was sitting on the right hand side of the cab at the time; that, after he started the engine, and was going in the direction of and approaching said street, he was looking toward the crossing. He proceeded: "I was keeping a close lookout upon the track in the direction in which the engine was moving to see that the crossing was clear. My fireman was on the left hand side of the engine, and at that time was ringing the bell. * * * I came down the Collis main line from the roundhouse. It is the first track west of the main line, which would be the third line coming from the west. * * * In crossing the railroad from G street upon Tuolumne street I think a cart would cross the two tracks before reaching the track I was on. I should judge I was backing up about four or five miles an hour. There were automatic brakes and reverse upon this engine. I ought to stop it in five or six feet, or eight feet, anyway, at the rate I was then going. I cannot say just when was the first time I saw the horse and cart of Mrs. Zipperlen, it was quite a distance when I saw her coming. She was then coming down from G street and was traveling east. In order to see her I would not have to look across where the fireman was sitting on that engine. I could sit up there and look on both sides, as it had a low tender. I could see the whole front all the time and the whole situation. I could see the track back of the tender. I would say I could see the track back of the tender as far as across this courtroom here. I could see a horse or buggy crossing the track as far away as across this courtroom by looking over the tender. I could look over the tender and could see Mrs. Zipperlen coming in the cart. There was no time after I first saw her that it would have been impossible for me to see her before the accident, and I watched her, and I watched her during the whole time. When I first saw her she was going east coming down Tuolumne street." The witness Stoner, who was driving toward Tuolumne street, and was some 30 or 40 feet back of Mrs. Zipperlen when the latter started across the tracks, testified that "when she got to the crossing she looked up and down to see if there were any cars, and saw a clear track and started to go across. The engine was then about 50 yards from the crossing on Tuolumne street, and was standing. I saw the fireman when it started to back down on the track. The fireman was sitting in his seat looking east. I did not watch the engine continuously until it arrived at the crossing. The rear end of the tender was about six or eight feet from the buggy when I saw it next. I should judge the engine was going about three miles an hour. Mrs. Zipperlen did not stop traveling or check up her horse to see whether the track was clear, and did not stop at any time after until the accident. She could not have stopped without my observing it. There was no time while Mrs. Zipperlen was driving along upon that track that she crossed entirely over the track upon which the engine and tender were backing, prior to the accident. She could not have done that without my seeing her. I did not observe her horse backing into the engine, * * * I did not see the engine slack speed before the collision. * * * The fireman was not looking in Mrs. Zipperlen's direction, that I saw. He was not ringing the bell, and no bell was rung. I am positive no bell was rung. I could see the engineer's head sticking up over the cab. I might if I looked, but I do not think it would have been possible for the engineer to sit on that side without my observing him. I have acted as a fireman on the railroad. At the time of the collision the cart had just come on the first rail; the horse's ears were about past the tender. I am sure of that. Just as the collision took place the engineer started the engine the other way." Mrs. Zipperlen testified that she had been familiar with the crossing at Tuolumne street for about eight years, and that when she reached the crossing and before starting to pass over it she "paused to see that the track was clear"; that she observed that the engineer was standing on one of the tracks, about 75 or 100 feet from the crossing, and then started across. "I was perhaps 12 feet, or something like that, from the track that the engine was standing on. When I saw the engine standing still I started to cross. I was traveling at a slow, little trot. As I started to cross the engine started to back up, and then the engine struck the cart. I tried to back—back her off—but of course the engine frightened the horse and I could not do anything with her. She was badly frightened. I was not driving with a whip, and had no whip in my hand, and I heard no bell ringing. When I first saw the engine I saw the fireman. He was then on the west side of the cab. I did not see the engineer. I think I could have seen the engineer if he had been in the cab and high enough to have seen me over the tender. I do not think the fireman saw me. I observed the engine as it came on down. I did not notice the fireman looking in my direction as long as I looked. Of course, after the horse became unmanageable, I had all I could do to watch her. I do not think at any time I crossed entirely over the crossing upon which the engine was backing. I did not see the engineer or the engineer's face at any time. I did not hear the whistle blow. I do not think the engine was coming back very fast. After the engine struck the cart and I was thrown out upon the ground, I was lying right along side of the engine, or along side of the track rather. I could not see exactly how far the engine was from me when I saw it moving towards me. Possibly it was the length of this room, maybe not quite so far. When the engine struck the cart the horse reared up to one side—toward the right. The tender did not strike me. When the engine struck the wheel, it threw me out. I rather think I fell backwards. The engine, tender, and wheels, just at the moment I struck the ground, were beside me. I was lying pretty close to the track, as close as I could possibly be without being injured by the wheels. The engine then ran on ahead, and I think the engineer sent the fireman to get it. I first saw the engineer when he stooped to pick me up about a couple of minutes afterwards." Mosier, the engineer, testifying for the defense, repeated that he saw "Mrs. Zipperlen at all times from the time she started to cross until she got across"; that he "could see the whole rig until I got as close as the width of this room to it—about 30 feet." He stated that Mrs. Zipperlen had crossed the track the engine was on, when her horse became frightened and began to "buck and back," and backed onto the track on which the engine was moving. He declared that when the engine was six or eight feet from the cart, and the moment the horse began backing toward the track the engine was on, he stopped the engine as soon as he could, "put on the brakes and reversed the engine." The horse kept on backing, he continued, until it struck the engine, causing Mrs. Zipperlen to be thrown to the ground. E. F. Phillips testified for the defendant that he saw the engine backing down the track toward the crossing over which Mrs. Zipperlen attempted to pass. He said that "the best of my recollection is that the locomotive was backing down, without any stop whatever from the roundhouse, and I heard its bell ringing as it was backing down. The locomotive came on down, and when the engineer saw her crossing the tracks it slowed up very perceptibly. I cannot say now whether it made a full stop or not, but I think it did. I think it kept on coming very nearly to a stop. Then her horse crossed the track that the locomotive was approaching on, and got the cart wheels, as far as I could see from where I was, between the rails of the track beyond the track that the locomotive was approaching on; then her horse got unmanageable. She had no whip to strike him with. She did all she could with the lines to urge him on, and, instead of his going forward as she wished he would, he commenced backing, and backed in a quarter circle until the wheel of the cart was struck by the approaching locomotive, with just enough force to upturn the cart onto the other wheel and threw her from the vehicle."

The foregoing constitutes the substance of the testimony given on direct examination of the principal witnesses introduced by both sides. The cross-examination of the witnesses, particularly that of Mrs. Zipperlen, revealed some discrepancies and inconsistencies which were of a character to make them peculiarly a matter for the jury to settle to its own satisfaction. A written statement, obtained from Mrs. Zipperlen a few hours after the accident happened, by Dr. Maupin, the defendant's local surgeon, and to which statement the husband of Mrs. Zipperlen signed the name of his wife, contained a declaration that the horse she was driving was wholly to blame for the accident. This writing was shown to Mrs. Zipperlen, and she was asked, on cross-examination, if she made the statement. Her reply was that, while she was able to recall that Dr. Maupin had called to interview her on the day of the accident, she had no recollection of making the declarations which the written statement indicated she had made. But, as before declared, whatever inconsistency or apparent inconsistency might have been developed in her testimony through her cross-examination, it was, after all, for the jury, and not for this court, to determine whether her evidence had been thus shaken or shown to be unworthy of belief.

It is, however, plain to be seen from the evidence, of which we think we have given a fair conspectus, that either of the two theories upon which the case was tried in the court below is supportable by the proofs. From the testimony of Stoner, a strong inference may be drawn that neither the engineer nor his fireman saw Mrs. Zipperlen at any time, and knew nothing of her presence upon the crossing until the engine had collided with the cart. The jury would have been warranted from the engineer's testimony, and from the circumstance that the engine proceeded to move down the track toward the crossing after she started over the crossing, and from the probability that, had the engineer seen Mrs. Zipperlen in the act of passing over the crossing when he claimed that he did, he would have stopped his engine long before he reached the crossing, and remained at a standstill until she got beyond any possibility of danger, in adopting the view that the negligence of the defendant consisted in the failure of the engineer to look for the purpose of determining whether the crossing was clear. Upon this theory, the following instruction, of which particular complaint is made, contains a clear declaration of the law, and was, therefore, proper and pertinent: "If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff Minnie Zipperlen before undertaking to cross the railroad, at said time, exercised reasonable and ordinary care, and if you believe that, after the engineer or fireman gave steam to their engine, the horse which the said Minnie Zipperlen was driving became frightened and stood up on the track on which the engine and tender were so moving towards her, and that plaintiff Minnie Zipperlen endeavored to urge the horse forward, but could not do so, then the court charges you that the law imposed upon the servants of the defendant the duty of keeping a lookout and to observe and ascertain whether the crossing was clear, and if they failed to do so, and the said Minnie Zipperlen was injured in consequence of their failure so to do, without any fault on her part, your verdict should be for the plaintiff, and you should assess such damages as you may deem just under all the circumstances, not exceeding the amount prayed for."

There is nothing in the case of Bennichsen v. Market Street Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 18, 84 Pac. 420, in conflict with the views herein expressed. The instruction given to the jury in that case was upon the assumption that there was evidence showing that the motorman saw the plaintiff in a situation of danger, and declared that she was entitled to recover "if the defendant's employes could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care." The Supreme Court reversed the case, because there was no evidence disclosed by the record "that the motorman 'had an opportunity' to avoid injuring the plaintiff, or that he discovered her in a perilous situation." If the record in that case had contained evidence justifying it, the instruction would not, of course, have been subject to criticism. There is no claim that the instruction challenged here does not contain a correct statement of the law, and if, as we have suggested is the case, there is evidence to which it was applicable, then no valid objection can be urged against it.

Upon the theory of the "last clear opportunity"—that is, that the engineer saw and realized Mrs. Zipperlen's perilous situation, and had ample opportunity to have avoided the accident by the exercise of reasonable caution and care—the evidence presents, we think, a substantial conflict, so that with the verdict, even if we could say that that was the theory adopted by the jury, we are powerless to interfere. The engineer, we have seen, testified that he saw Mrs. Zipperlen all the time—from the moment she started to cross the tracks; that she had passed over the track over which the engine was backing just before the engine reached the crossing. The latter statement was designed to furnish the inference that the accident would not have occurred but for the fact that the horse became frightened and unmanageable and backed upon the track in use by the engine, and backed into the engine, thereby causing the accident. But Stoner says that "there was no time while Mrs. Zipperlen was driving along upon that track that she crossed entirely over the track upon which the engine and tender were backing, prior to the accident." From this testimony it was within the province of the jury to conclude that Mrs. Zipperlen had not crossed over the track occupied by the engine, and, from all the circumstances, find that the engineer knew such to be the fact. We are not concerned, it is true, with the reasoning of the jury upon the evidence by which it reached its verdict, but we may call attention to the testimony for the purpose of illustrating how it might have reached its conclusion and have been justified under the evidence in so doing. We think the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

It is claimed that the court erred in permitting the plaintiffs to introduce evidence for the purpose of showing that one of their own witnesses had, prior to the trial, made a statement with reference to the accident inconsistent with his testimony at the trial. The witness Mosier, having been called as a witness by the plaintiffs, testified to the facts to which we have already adverted with some particularity, and was then asked if he did not, addressing the husband of Mrs. Zipperlen, on the evening of the day of the accident, and alluding to the accident, say: "Ben, don't blame me for that. I was not to blame. I didn't see that horse until its ears projected past the end of the tender." To this question he replied in the negative. In rebuttal, and over the objection of the defendant, Bernhard Zipperlen was allowed to testify that Mosier made the statement embodied in the question. The court below, as well as counsel for respondents, appear to have assumed that the testimony was admissible for the purpose of impeachment; but we are of the opinion that, while its effect may practically be the same as if offered for impeachment, the only reason for which such testimony may be given is merely to explain the manifestly awkward position in which a party has been placed by reason of statements made by a witness, produced by himself, contrary to what he expected to prove by said witness, and which are calculated to operate against the interests of his cause. It must be conceded that the rule authorizing the contradiction of one's own witness is, in its application, like the rule as to impeachment, attended with more or less danger of producing injustice, and, therefore, should never be invoked or allowed to be exercised by the court except where the exigencies of the situation and the circumstances of the alleged betrayal clearly warrant it. When enforced on appropriate occasions in a proper way, it undoubtedly produces a wholesome and just result.

The authority by which a party in this state is allowed to contradict his own witness, or show that he has made, at other times, statements "inconsistent with his present testimony," is found in section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section also provides that "the party producing a witness is not allowed to impeach his credit by evidence of bad character." And, as seen, we think that the section was not intended as authority for the impeachment by any means of one's own witness, in the true legal sense of that term. The reference in that section to section 2052 of the same Code merely means, we think, that, before being permitted to prove that his witness has made previous inconsistent statements, the party must lay the foundation as provided by the last-mentioned section—that is, must give the witness a chance to refresh his memory by calling his attention to the "circumstances of times, places, and persons present," when and before whom such alleged inconsistent statement is claimed to have been made.

There are, however, certain qualifications to the rule established by section 2049, supra, and which it is indispensably necessary should be strictly observed, lest some other important rule of evidence be violated. First, the witness must give testimony damaging to the party producing him. Secondly, it must appear that the party by whom the witness has been produced has been misled and taken by surprise, and that he had reason to believe that the witness would give testimony favorably to his side. A party producing a witness virtually stands as an indorser of the character of such a witness, and by the act of calling him to testify in his behalf in effect declares to the court and jury that the testimony of said witness will strengthen and support his contention; so, when the witness gives evidence which tends to destroy, rather than build up, the cause of the party who has presented him to the court and jury as a person possessing information valuable and material to his side of the controversy, the law steps in, and says that no litigant should thus be placed at the mercy of such treachery, and authorizes the party to explain why he called him as a witness, and thereby acquit himself of the otherwise disadvantageous imputation of contributing toward making out a case against himself. But a party, under the guise of the rule in question, will not be suffered to present to the jury mere hearsay declarations—declarations admissible neither under the rule of res gestæ nor as having been made in the presence and hearing of the party against whom they are offered. The statement, the admission of which under the indicated circumstances is here claimed to have been prejudicially erroneous, could not, it is obvious, have gone into the record either as part of the res gestæ or as a declaration in the presence and hearing of the opposite party. If it was not admissible for the purpose of "contradicting the witness," or of showing that he at another time made statements "inconsistent with his present testimony," to the end that the party might explain why he introduced him as a witness, then it was incompetent for any purpose, because, if admitted, though a mere naked hearsay declaration, it would erroneously go before the jury as independent evidence. We are aware that some early cases were disposed to hold that such testimony was admissible under no circumstances. We have not taken the trouble to ascertain whether, at the time of the filing of the opinions to which we refer, section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it now reads, was a part of our law of evidence; but we would be unable to reconcile the intimation in those cases with the language of the section as it now exists. There is no reason upon principle why a party should not be allowed to contradict his own witness if the latter has betrayed such party, and by his unexpected testimony placed the party producing and standing sponsor for him in a false light before the court or jury. There is every reason in principle why such a practice should be upheld, where it is clear that it has not been abused. Moreover, the Legislature has recognized the soundness of the principle.

The questions, then, determinative of the admissibility of the testimony here are: Did the witness give testimony adversely to the plaintiffs, for whom he was called to testify? If so, does it reasonably appear that the plaintiffs were taken by surprise because of the nature of the testimony given by said witness? The plaintiffs undoubtedly sought to prove by Mosler that he did not see Mrs. Zipperlen until the accident occurred, and that, therefore, he was not, when moving his engine toward the crossing, exercising the care and caution with which he was charged by the law. But the engineer declared he did see her all the time, the effect of such declaration being that he was approaching the crossing in a careful, prudent, and cautious manner. It was then that counsel for plaintiffs asked him if he did not state to Bernhard Zipperlen that he did not see his wife until about the time the collision occurred. We doubt not that the sole theory of the plaintiffs, up to the time Mosler was called by them and testified as their witness, was that the engineer's negligence, if there was negligence, was due to his total failure to look down the track toward the crossing to learn whether it was clear or being used by some traveler. In this view and upon this theory his testimony was certainly adverse and damaging to plaintiffs. But, assuming that the evidence shows the other theory to be the correct one, the theory for which the testimony of Mosler given as a witness for plaintiffs was undoubtedly the inspiration—that is, the last clear opportunity theory—and that the jury adopted that view, then the testimony of Bernhard Zipperlen rebutting the statements of Mosler was, it is manifest, altogether immaterial and harmless, for if the jury found in accordance with the last-suggested theory it no doubt based its verdict largely upon the evidence of the engineer himself, said evidence tending more to establish that theory than the other.

The solution of the second question determinative of the competency of the testimony appears to be fraught with greater difficulty than the first, yet it seems to us, as the first part of this sentence implies, that the difficulty is more apparent than real. Were the plaintiffs surprised by the character of the testimony given by Mosler? There is nothing in the record showing that the court received evidence upon which to found its determination of this preliminary question. The question is one addressed solely to the judgment of the court, for it is a question of law with which the jury is not concerned. The record does show, however, that Mr. Cartwright, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, stated to the court, when objection was made to questions to Mosier for the purpose of laying the foundation for Bernhard's testimony, that the statement of Mosier "is entirely different from what we had expected," and when it was sought to show the alleged contradictory statements through said Bernhard, Mr. Van Meter, for the plaintiffs, declared to the court that Mosier's testimony "was different from that which the plaintiffs' attorneys understood that it would be," and requested the court to instruct the jury that "this question is asked solely for the purpose of impeaching" Mosier, and "not for the purpose of showing any affirmative fact other than the impeachment." The statute does not expressly point out the procedure to be adopted in such a case, nor has our attention been directed to any appellate court opinion in which any suggestion as to the proper procedure is ventured. It is obviously true that the court must be put in possession of facts from which it can say whether testimony contradicting one's own witness may be introduced, and we think that there can be no doubt that the better practice would be to present evidence through sworn witnesses upon the question. But in any event much should be left to the sound discretion of the trial court. In the case at bar the course suggested was not pursued, the court evidently being satisfied with the unsworn statements of counsel that Mosier's testimony was "different from that which the plaintiffs' attorneys understood that it would be." We cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in allowing the evidence upon the statements of counsel. To assume that counsel were not acting in good faith with the court—that they knew that Mosier would testify as he did, and that they called him as a witness for no other purpose than to furnish a mere pretext for introducing evidence otherwise absolutely incompetent and inadmissible—would be tantamount to accusing counsel of resorting to the veriest pettifoggery. The judge of the court below is presumably well acquainted with plaintiffs' counsel, and without apparent hesitation exercised for the court a discretion favorable to their contention, and, as before suggested, we cannot say abused it.

We have reviewed the record before us in extenso because the case, like nearly all cases of personal injury, presents important questions. The state of the evidence is such (as we believe and have held) as to make it a case peculiarly for the jury, with whose function under the law there would be, we think, unwarranted interference were we to hold that the evidence is insufficient to justify its conclusion. There is evidence, as will be perceived by an examination of the record, showing that Mrs. Zipperlen, before proceeding to start over the crossing, stopped for an instant and looked to see if the track was clear, and that when she started to cross the tracks the engine was at a standstill. If the engineer, as he declared was the fact, saw her all the time, there appears no reason why he should not have exercised a greater degree of care and caution than the evidence discloses. If he did not see her until she was in a position of danger, and then had the opportunity of avoiding the accident, as the jury was justified in finding, he was at fault in not doing so, even if it should be admitted that she herself was primarily negligent.

There are other assignments of alleged error which are, we think, undeserving of special or extended notice.

The question addressed to the fireman by the engineer, in the presence of Mrs. Zipperlen, immediately following the accident, "Why didn't you tell me to stop?" was asked so near the time the accident occurred as to make it a part of the transaction, and therefore admissible under the rule of res gestæ. The mere fact that the accident preceded the question does not, necessarily, take it out of that rule. Heckle v. S. P. Co., 123 Cal. 442, 56 Pac. 57—the opinion by McFarland, J., giving a clear exposition of the rule.

We are unable to discover any just reason for disturbing the judgment, and, for the reasons herein discussed, it is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The question of residence or domicile is a mixed one of law and fact, and the determination thereof by the trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on review.

2. DOMICILE—EVIDENCE.

Neither voting nor registration as a voter is conclusive on the question of domicile.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by John J. Quinn against William A. Nevills. From an order denying defendant's motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carter & Ricketts and McClellan & McClellan, for appellant. Albert M. Johnson and Hiram W. Johnson, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Tuolumne. The demand and motion were upon the ground that defendant resided in Tuolumne county at the time of the commencement of the action. In opposition to the motion, plaintiff filed and read his affidavit, which set forth facts tending strongly to support the view that defendant resided and had resided in the city and county of San Francisco continuously for several years immediately preceding the commencement of the action. The affidavit sets forth in detail that during the years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903 defendant resided and had his dwelling place in a private family dwelling owned and occupied by him at No. 2224 Washington street in said city and county. That during the entire year 1904 (the action was commenced November 9, 1904) defendant maintained and kept his actual residence at the Palace Hotel in said city and county, and that he continuously and permanently occupied a suite of rooms there, furnished in part with the personal effects, paraphernalia, bric-a-brac, house furnishings, and family portraits of himself and wife. The affidavit set forth other details tending to show that defendant resided and had continuously resided in San Francisco as his home for several years, and that his visits to Tuolumne county were for business purposes only. On the other hand, defendant, by his own affidavit and others, presented evidence tending to show that his legal residence was in Tuolumne county. Especial stress is laid on the evidence that he always claimed Tuolumne county as his place of residence, and was there registered as a voter, and in fact voted there the day before the action was commenced.

The case is a typical one of a conflict of evidence, and of inferences to be drawn from the facts, and we cannot disturb the order of the trial court. The question of residence or domicile is a mixed question of law and fact, and the determination of the trial court upon conflicting evidence is conclusive upon this court. 14 Cyc. 865, and cases there cited; Estate of Weed, 120 Cal. 634, 53 Pac. 30.

Appellant has cited Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How. (U. S.) 185, 12 L. Ed. 387, as authority for the contention that the fact of registration and voting in a given county is conclusive evidence of domicile. An examination of the case discloses that it cannot be held to be an authority on this point. Shelton was sued in the United States Circuit Court in Louisiana by a citizen of another state, and pleaded want of jurisdiction in that he was not a citizen of Louisiana, but was a citizen of Virginia. The evidence showed that he had formerly resided in Virginia, but for two years had resided on and cultivated a plantation in Louisiana, but had not voted there. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that he was a citizen of Louisiana. The court did say that the exercise of the right of suffrage was conclusive on the question of intention, but as Shelton had not exercised such right, and no such fact was in the case, what the court said was clearly obiter.

Neither voting nor registration as a voter is conclusive on the question of domicile. Easterly v. Goodwin, 35 Conn. 235, 95 Am. Dec. 237; *Enfield v. St. 1901, p. 3428], as amended by Act Feb. 5, 1903, c. 487, § 5, 32 Stat. 798 [U. S. Comp. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by A. J. Young against W. F. Clark and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Franklin P. Nutting, for appellants. Heller & Powers, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The complaint alleges that at the time of the transactions set forth defendants were commission merchants, and were in the employ of La Sociedad Anonima de Hilados y Tejidos de Cantel, Lda, a corporation (plaintiff's assignor), as its agents; that plaintiff's assignor deposited with its said agents certain moneys, to be paid out on its order; that said agents expended a portion of these funds on said assignor's account; and that the money claimed by plaintiff is a balance remaining in the agents' hands after such expenditures had been made, which balance plaintiff alleges the defendants refuse to pay over. Upon the issues framed by the pleadings, judgment was entered for plaintiff, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

1. Appellant claims that there is no finding on the issue of the assignment of the claim to the plaintiff. There is no special finding on the subject, but it is covered by the following general finding: "That all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and answer to the affirmative allegations of defendants' answer and cross-complaint are true." The part of this finding relating to the allegations of the answer is open to criticism for uncertainty; but the finding is definite and certain—and therefore sufficient—wherein it states "that all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint * * * are true." Gale v. Bradbury, 116 Cal. 40, 47 Pac. 778.

2. Appellants' special demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and that ruling is now assigned as error. We think there is enough uncertainty in the complaint to have warranted the court in sustaining the demurrer on that ground; but the action of the court in this regard is not of sufficient importance to demand a reversal of the judgment. Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 536, 38 Pac. 410.

3. During the trial defendants were permitted to amend their answer by pleading in bar of the action their adjudication in bankruptcy in the United States District Court; Whereupon plaintiff amended his pleadings by alleging that his cause of action was to recover moneys held in trust by defendants for plaintiff's assignor, which would not be released by a discharge in bankruptcy, and that said district court had granted permission to plaintiff to continue the prosecution of this action. The court found these allegations to be true, and a judgment was accordingly entered. Appellants contend that the trial court reached an erroneous conclusion in holding that respondent's claim was of such a trust character that it would not be released by defendants' discharge in bankruptcy. We agree with this contention. Section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 550 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428], as amended by Act Feb. 5, 1903, c. 487, § 5, 32 Stat. 798 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 1026], prescribes what debts are exempt from the operation of the bankrupt's discharge. The only part of that section applicable to this case reads: "Sec. 17. A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as * * * (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity." It has been often held that the term "fiduciary capacity" as used in this subdivision of section 17 applies only to technical trusts, such as those arising from the relation of attorney, executor, or guardian, and not to debts due by a bankrupt in the character of an agent, factor, commission merchant, and the like. In Re Basch (D. C.) 97 Fed. 761, it was held that a debt due by a bankrupt who, being a commission merchant, has received goods for sale upon a contract to return the same or the proceeds thereof, is not one of those described in section 17 (subdivision 4). In Knott v. Putnam (D. C.) 107 Fed. 907, a broker having, upon a customer's order, bought and then sold cotton, it was held that the obligation to pay over the proceeds of such sale is a debt from which the bankrupt will be freed by his discharge.

The United States Supreme Court, in speaking of a factor who had wrongfully retained the money of his principal, says: "If the act embraces such a debt, it will be difficult to limit its application. It must include all debts arising from agencies, and indeed all cases in which the law implies an obligation from the trust reposed in the debtor. Such a construction would have left but few debts on which the law could operate. In almost all the commercial transactions of the country, confidence is reposed in the punctuality and integrity of the debtor, and a violation of these is, in a commercial sense, a disregard of the trust. But his is not the relation spoken of in the first section of the act. The cases enumerated, 'defalcation of a public officer,' 'executor,' 'administrator,' 'guardian,' or 'trustee,' are not cases of implied, but special, trusts, and the 'other fiduciary capacity' mentioned must mean the same class of trusts. The act speaks of technical trusts, and not those which the law implies from the contract. A factor is not, therefore, within the act." Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. (U. S.) 202, 11 L. Ed. 236.

In Palmer v. Hussey, 119 U. S. 96, 7 Sup. Ct. 158, 30 L. Ed. 362, where the bankrupt had received certain bonds "as the agent and broker" of the plaintiff, and had converted them to his own use, the same court held that there was no such fraud in the creation of the debt, and no such trust in respect to the possession of the bonds by the defendant, as to bar the operation of the discharge.

In Upsbur v. Briscoe, 138 U. S. 365, 11 Sup. Ct. 313, 34 L. Ed. 931, it was held by the same court that an instrument appointing a person as attorney to receive moneys for the benefit of another, and to pay the interest annually to such other, and at her death to pay the principal sum to her legal issue, or in default of such issue the said sum to revert to the maker of the instrument, did not create between the attorney and the beneficiary a trust in its technical sense, nor a debt of a "fiduciary character" within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, although the obligation was called a "trust," and the attorney a "trustee," in the instrument. The court says (page 377 of 138 U. S., page 317 of 11 Sup. Ct. [34 L. Ed. 931]) that, within the meaning of the exception in the bankruptcy act, the debt is not created by a person while acting in a fiduciary character, merely because it is created under circumstances in which trust or confidence is reposed in the debtor, in the popular sense of these terms.

In the case of Noble v. Hammond, 129 U. S. 65, 9 Sup. Ct. 235, 32 L. Ed. 621, the record showed that the defendant was a produce dealer, and had been requested by certain parties to collect money for them, and to keep it until it should be called for. After collecting the money, he deposited it in bank in his own name, and before he paid it over was forced into bankruptcy. The court held that the parties' claim against him was not created by the fraud of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation while acting in any fiduciary character within the meaning of the bankruptcy act; and that, even if the agreement might be construed as creating a trust in some sense, it was not such a trust as comes within the provisions of the bankruptcy law.

Most of the above decisions arose under former bankruptcy acts, but section 17 of the act of 1898 is practically identical with the corresponding provisions of the earlier acts, and has received the same construction in such cases as have arisen since its enactment. In re Basch (D. C.) 97 Fed. 761.

In Bracken v. Milner (C. C.) 104 Fed. 522, decided under the act of 1898, where defendant had received money from another to be loaned for that other's account, and was authorized to receive payments of the interest or principal of such loans, and remit the same to the owner, and afterward became bankrupt without having paid over the moneys, it was held by the Circuit Court that the defendant had not received the money in a fiduciary capacity within the meaning of the statute, but merely as an agent; and that the plaintiff's claim for the money was one from which the defendant was released by a discharge in bankruptcy.

The judgment is, therefore, modified by striking therefrom the following: From paragraph 1 thereof the words, "and plaintiff's assignor's claim therefor was not such a claim as would be released by a discharge of defendants in bankruptcy," the words "in trust" occurring in the phrase "to be held in trust by defendants," and the word "trust" occurring in the phrase "entitled to the return of said trust moneys." And from paragraph 2 thereof the following: "And since said assignment said defendants have been and now are holding said sum and interest thereon in trust for this plaintiff, and plaintiff's claim therefor is not such a claim as would be released by a discharge of defendants in bankruptcy."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 21, 1907.)

1. DEPOSITS IN COURT—APPLICATION FOR ORDER—CORPORATIONS—DISSOLUTION—FUNDS.

Plaintiff alleged that the directors of a corporation, desiring to wind up its affairs, authorized him to pay its debts and distribute its assets, and alleged that defendants owed certain sums on stock subscriptions, to which defendants by cross-complaint alleged that plaintiff, as an officer of the corporation, had a certain sum which he held as funds of the company, and asked that he be required to deposit the amount in court. Plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint admitted having received such sum, but set up a claim for disbursements and expenses and for compensation for services. Held, that these allegations were deemed denied under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, and therefore plaintiff's title to that part of the fund which he claimed constituted an issue to be tried in the ordinary manner, and it was error to order him to pay the same into court under section 572, authorizing an order for such payment when it is admitted by the pleading or shown that a party has in his possession any property, the subject of litigation, held by him as trustee for another party or which belongs to another party.

2. PROHIBITION—JURISDICTION.

Where the pleadings did not disclose the requisite facts necessary to confer jurisdiction on the superior court to make an order requiring a party to pay money into court under Code Civ. Proc. § 572, such an order was void, and, the court having no jurisdiction to entertain subsequent proceedings for contempt based thereon, the writ of prohibition would issue.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Prohibition, §§ 37-56.]

Application by Edmund Burke for writ of prohibition against the superior court of the county of Los Angeles and Hon. Frederick W. Houser, Judge. Writ granted.

Edmund Burke, in pro. per. Henry J. Stevens and O'Melveney, Stevens & Millikin, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Soto Heights Land & Improvement Company is a corporation of which the petitioner is the secretary, as well as a member of the board of directors. A complaint was filed by plaintiff, wherein it is alleged that the board of directors of the corporation determined to abandon the prosecution of the business for which it was incorporated, and authorized petitioner to take such steps as might be deemed necessary to obtain an accounting and wind up its affairs, pay its debts, and distribute the remaining assets to the stockholders in proportion to their respective rights. A number of persons alleged to have subscribed for stock, upon whose subscriptions a balance was due, were made party defendants, against whom judgments were asked for such sums as might be found due the corporation, and praying that an order be made directing payment of the amount which might be found due to plaintiff and other creditors of the corporation; it being alleged that said corporation was indebted to plaintiff and others for services, money advanced, salary, disbursements, office rent and legal expenses, as well as for other purposes. In answer to this complaint, the defendants California Cornice Works, Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company, and Arletta F. Davenport, alleged in the complaint to be indebted to said corporation for moneys due on their subscriptions to stock, filed cross-complaints wherein, among other things, they alleged that plaintiff, as an officer of the corporation, had in his hands as such officer the sum of $2,050, which he held as funds of the company and for its use and benefit, and asked for judgment that said plaintiff be required to deposit said sum of $2,050 in court. In his answer to these cross-complaints plaintiff admits that he did receive of the funds of said corporation the sum of $2,050, and that prior to the commencement of the action said cross-complainants and the other defendants authorized him, as trustee, in his and their behalf, to take such steps as he deemed proper to wind up the affairs of the said corporation, and to that end collect amounts due, pay its obligations, and divide the residue among those found to be entitled to the same; that pursuant to such authorization he, among other things, instituted this action, and is maintaining the same for said purpose. It is then alleged that said corporation is indebted to plaintiff in various sums, for advancements and disbursements actually made for and on its behalf, amounting in the aggregate to several hundred dollars, as well as for salary as secretary of the corporation since the date of its incorporation at $150 per month; and alleging, further, that he claims the right to deduct from the funds in his possession the amount due him from said corporation, and asks that the rights of all parties to said action be adjudicated therein. Upon these pleadings the cross-complainants, upon notice duly given, moved the court for an order requiring plaintiff to deposit in court the sum of $2,050, the ground therefor being that he had in his possession such sum of money belonging to said corporation; whereupon the court granted said motion and ordered plaintiff forthwith to pay into court the sum of $2,050. Thereafter a motion was made by plaintiff to vacate and annul said order, or modify the same to the extent of crediting plaintiff with the amount of cash expended for and in behalf of said corporation as its secretary, which motion the court denied, and on June 21, 1907, the court made an order requiring petitioner to appear before it on June 28, 1907, then to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for disobeying said order requiring him to pay into court said sum of $2,050, and why he should not be punished for such disobedience.

The order requiring petitioner to deposit this $2,050 in court was made under and by virtue of section 572 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows: "When it is admitted by the pleading, or shown upon examination of a party, that he has in his possession, or under his control, any money or other thing capable of delivery, which, being the subject of litigation, is held by him as trustee for another party, or which belongs or is due to another party, the court may order the same, upon motion, to be deposited in court or delivered to such party, upon such conditions as may be just, subject to the further direction of the court."

The court's jurisdiction to make the order requiring petitioner to deposit in court the sum of $2,050 was, under the provisions of said section, dependent upon whether or not petitioner by his pleading admitted having in his possession said sum of money belonging to the corporation. If he did not make such admission, then it would seem clear that the court was without jurisdiction to make such order. Petitioner in his answers to the cross-complaints admits having received funds of the corporation to the amount of $2,050, but as against this he sets up a claim for several hundred dollars on account of disbursements made and expenses incurred by him for and on behalf of the corporation, and also claims compensation for services rendered since the incorporation of the company as secretary thereof. These allegations, under the provisions of section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are deemed to be denied; and therefore petitioner's title to that part of the fund which he claimed by way of compensation for services rendered as secretary, and on account of disbursements made for the corporation, constituted an issue to be tried, not in this summary manner, but in the usual and ordinary action wherein a verdict of the jury or finding of the court could be had thereon. His answer showed that petitioner claimed the right to part of the fund in his possession, and the court was without jurisdiction to compel him to surrender to another what he claimed to be his property, until there had been a judicial determination, upon the hearing of all the facts, that he had no right to it. To justify the making of the order, the admission in the pleadings of having money in possession belonging to another must be free from any claim thereto. "If money is ordered to be brought in which is not clearly due, very gross injustice may be done, as the defendant may be put to great inconvenience, and afterwards be told that his view of the case was correct." Hagall v. Currie, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 449.

Furthermore, the fund must, under the provisions of said section, be the "subject of the litigation." "If the money in the possession of the party is not the subject of the litigation, but its payment is an incident thereto, dependent upon the judgment to be rendered in the action, as in the case of an action for * * * accounting * * * the provisions of this section do not authorize such order." Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 Pac. 234. The pleadings clearly show the action to be one having for its purpose the procuring of an accounting between the corporation and its stockholders, and to determine the amount of money in the possession of any of the parties to the action belonging to the corporation, with a view of having it paid into court and winding up the corporate affairs.

In our judgment the pleadings do not disclose the requisite facts necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the order requiring a deposit of the money in court. The order is therefore void, and, being void, it follows that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain any subsequent proceedings based thereon and instituted for the purpose of having the petitioner adjudged guilty of contempt for disobedience of such order.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to pass upon other alleged points affecting the validity of the order.

The alternative writ of prohibition heretofore granted is made peremptory.

CAMPBELL v. FREE. (Civ. 440.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 19, 1907.)

1. ELECTIONS—CONTEST—VOTES FOR INELIGIBLE CANDIDATE—"PLURALITY."

Under Const. art. 20, § 13, providing that a plurality of the votes given at an election shall constitute a choice, and Pol. Code, § 1066, providing that the person receiving at any election the highest number of votes for any office to be filled at such election is elected thereto, a candidate not receiving a plurality of votes given at an election was not entitled, in order to secure his own election, to have disregarded the votes cast for an ineligible candidate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 207-215.]

2. SAME—COSTS.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1125, where an election is annulled and set aside, judgment for costs must be rendered against the party whose election was contested in favor of the party contesting the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Proceeding by James H. Campbell against Arthur M. Free to contest an election. From a judgment declaring void the election of Free, but refusing to declare contestant elected, contestant appeals. Modified as directed in opinion, and, as modified, affirmed.

John E. Richards, C. C. Coolidge, and Jas. P. Sex (H. S. Bridges, of counsel), for appellant. Rogers, Bloomington & Free, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This proceeding was brought by plaintiff as contestant to determine the question as to who, if any one, was elected to the office of district attorney of the county of Santa Clara at the general election held in November, 1906, and to have it declared that the election of respondent be annulled and set aside. The trial court, upon its findings, ordered judgment, annulling and setting aside the declaration of the official board of canvassers and declaring void the alleged election of respondent, but refused to declare the appellant elected to said office. This appeal is from the judgment so entered.

Respondent does not question the judgment annulling the election as to him. Appellant contends that it should have been further adjudged that he was duly elected to the said office. The record contains many questions as to rulings on ballots, and as to whether or not certain ballots were properly rejected or counted. It is, however, to the credit of counsel, conceded that, if the ruling of the court was correct on the main question, the ballots concerning which the rulings are questioned, however counted, would not change the result. All other questions are therefore eliminated, except the single one as to whether or not the appellant was elected to the office of district attorney at the said election.

The facts material to the question, as found by the court, are as follows: Respondent received at said election 5,840 legal votes, and appellant 5,748. The respondent at the time of said election held the office of postmaster at Mountain View, with a compensation exceeding $500 per annum, and was therefore ineligible to the office. The Constitution provides (article 20, § 13) that a plurality of the votes given at an election shall constitute a choice; and the Political Code (section 1066) states that "the person receiving at any election the highest number of votes for any office to be filled at such election is elected thereto." The appellant did not receive the plurality of the votes given at the election. He contends that the votes cast for respondent should not be considered in any manner in the count, for the reason that the respondent was ineligible; that the case should be determined in the same manner as if the votes respondent received had been cast for the King of England or the Man in the Moon. To such doctrine we cannot accede. The respondent was a citizen of the state, a resident and elector of the county, and it does not appear that he even knew of his own ineligibility. The law contemplates that the electors shall decide the question as to who shall be elected to an office, and that it is necessary to a choice that some one legally qualified shall receive a plurality of the "votes given at the election." The appellant did not receive such plurality. The votes cast for respondent were votes given at the election. It is not necessary to discuss the question as to the effect of votes given for a name in mythology, or to some one whose name has come down in history, as Julius Caesar, or Mohammed. In such case the elector would clearly appear not to have intended to express his choice as to who should hold the office. The electors usually take a pride and an interest in casting their votes for the person or candidate of their choice, not as an idle act, but with a view of giving the office, with its honors and emoluments to such person or candidate. If the person for whom such votes are cast is ineligible, the votes are not to be counted for the next highest candidate on the list. If a majority of the voters, either by mistake of law or of fact, happen to cast their ballots for an ineligible candidate, it does not follow that the next highest on the list would receive the office. The votes, if given in good faith for a person who is a candidate for the office, and who afterwards is found to be ineligible, are notwithstanding legal votes. It sometimes happens, notwithstanding all care, that a political convention nominates a person to an office who is afterwards found to be ineligible, and that such fact was not only unknown to the convention which nominated him and to the voters, but also unknown to himself. In such case it is consistent with the theory of our institutions, and the right of the people to have officers of their own choosing, to consider the election void, because it is not an expression of the will of the people by a plurality of the votes cast. Any other rule might result in giving an office to a very incompetent or dishonest man who received only a few votes. In the case at bar one Brandt received 407 votes out of about 12,000 cast for the office of district attorney. Suppose the appellant was also ineligible to that office, if his views are correct the courts would have to declare Brandt the duly elected district attorney.

The views we have expressed are supported by decisions in our own state. Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 145; Crawford v. Dunbar, 52 Cal. 36; People v. Rodgers, 118 Cal. 373, 46 Pac. 740, 50 Pac. 668. In the latter case it is said: "The election of appellant was declared void, and was annulled by reason of his ineligibility to the office; but inasmuch as he received a majority of the votes cast at the election, the court was not authorized to declare that any other person was elected." The same rule prevails in Pennsylvania. Commonwealth v. Cluley, 58 Pa. 270, 94 Am. Dec. 75. It is there said: "Even in England it has been held that votes for a disqualified person are not lost or thrown away, so as to justify the presiding officers in returning as elected another candidate having a less number of votes, and, if they do so, a quo warranto information will be granted against the person so declared to be elected on his accepting office. Under Constitutions such as ours there are even greater reasons for holding that a minority candidate is not entitled to the office, if he who received the highest number of votes is disqualified." And in New York (People v. Clute), 50 N. Y. 451, 10 Am. Rep. 508; and in Michigan (Crawford v. Moliter), 23 Mich. 341; and in Kentucky (Howes v. Perry), 92 Ky. 290, 17 S. W. 575, 36 Am. St. Rep. 591; and in West Virginia (Dryden v. Swinburne), 20 W. Va. 89; and in Arkansas (Sweptson v. Barton), 39 Ark. 549; and in Missouri (State v. Walsh), 7 Mo. App. 142; State v. Vail, 53 Mo. 97. In Indiana the rule appears to be to the contrary, but we do not approve of the doctrine as laid down in the cases from that state.

In the judgment, after annulling and setting aside the election of respondent, the court directed "that each party pay their own costs." This is not in accord with the plain mandate of the statute in regard to election contests (Code Civ. Proc. § 1125), which provided at the time of this contest that, "if the election is annulled and set aside, judgment for costs must be rendered against the party whose election was contested in favor of the party contesting the same."

The trial court is directed to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the portion quoted, and inserting in lieu thereof "and the contestant is entitled to judgment for costs against respondent"; and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

2. SAME—VACANCY.

Under Pol. Code, § 996, providing that "an office becomes vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term: (1) The death of the incumbent. * * * (10) The decision by a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment"—an office became vacant on the decision of the court declaring void an election on the ground that the person elected, but who had not taken possession of the office, and who failed to qualify and take his official oath, was ineligible to take the office at the time of the election, in proceedings to contest the election under Code Civ. Proc. § 1111, providing that the right of any person declared elected may be contested when he was not at the time of the election eligible to the office, and section 1122, providing that, after hearing the proofs and allegations of the parties, the court must pronounce judgment either confirming or annulling and setting aside such election.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by James H. Campbell against the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Clara and others to enjoin defendants from declaring a vacancy in the office of district attorney of said county and then filling such office by appointment, and also to enjoin the county clerk from issuing a certificate of appointment to any person appointed by the board to such office. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rogers, Bloomingdale & Free, for appellants. James H. Campbell (John E. Richards, of counsel), for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to enjoin the board of supervisors of Santa Clara county and the several members thereof from declaring a vacancy in the office of district attorney of said county and then filling such office by appointment, and also to enjoin the county clerk of said county from issuing a certificate of appointment to any person who might be appointed district attorney of said county by said board of supervisors. Judgment was entered for plaintiff as prayed for, and this appeal is from the judgment.

At the general election held in November, 1902, plaintiff was duly elected district attorney of said county for the term of four years, his term to commence on the first Monday of January, 1903. He duly qualified, entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, and ever since has continued in possession of said office and in the discharge of the duties thereof. At the general election held in November, 1906, the plaintiff and one Arthur M. Free were each candidates for the said office of district attorney. Free received a plurality of the votes cast at such election, and was declared by the board of supervisors duly elected to such office. He declined and refused to file his official bond and take the oath of office. After the declaration by the board of supervisors to the effect that Free had been duly elected, the plaintiff instituted proceedings in the superior court of said county to contest the election of said Free, which resulted in a judgment declaring that at the time of the election Free was ineligible to the office by reason of the fact that he held a lucrative office under the United States government, the compensation of which exceeded $500 per year, and annulling his election for this reason. The judgment, besides declaring that at the time of his election Free was ineligible to the said office, in effect adjudged that plaintiff was not elected to said office. This judgment has this day been affirmed here. Campbell v. Free (No. 440) 93 Pac. 1060. The question therefore resolves itself into whether or not there is a vacancy in the office of district attorney of said county, which the board of supervisors are authorized to fill by appointment.

It is provided in the Code of Civil Procedure (section 1111) that the right of any person declared elected may be contested when the person was not at the time of the election eligible to the office. The Code evidently contemplates that cases may arise in which the person declared elected, and who receives the highest number of legal votes, was at the time of his election ineligible to the office. In many cases the evidence as to the ineligibility of a candidate is conflicting, and it requires a careful weighing and analysis of the evidence by the trial court to determine the ultimate fact. The Code in such case provides for a contest as to the right of a person declared elected to an office, although he be at the time of the election ineligible. It provides (section 1122) that after hearing the "proofs and allegations of the parties the court must pronounce judgment in the premises, either confirming or annulling and setting aside such election." We must then look to the Political Code as to when an office becomes vacant. It is there provided (section 996): "An office becomes vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term: (1) The death of the incumbent. * * * (10) The decision by a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment."

The court declared void the election of Free before the expiration of his term, and the question therefore narrows itself to the one as to whether or not he was the incumbent. It has been held, and is the rule in this state, that one who has been elected to an office, but who fails to qualify by filing the bond, is in the sense of the statute the incumbent, although he never was in possession of nor performed any duty in connection with the office. The office in such case has been held to become vacant by his refusal to file his official oath or bond within the time prescribed. People v. Taylor, 57 Cal. 620. The court in that case, after a careful consideration of section 996 of the Political Code, said: "This provision of the Code regards the person duly elected to an office as the incumbent of that office from the time of the commencement of the term for which he was elected until the expiration thereof, whether he qualifies or not." The difference between that case and the one at bar is that there the person elected neglected and failed to qualify after his election, and here he neglected to qualify by making himself ineligible before election. There the person elected was ineligible at the time his term began because he did not comply with the statutory mandate as to qualifying; here he was ineligible because at the time he was elected he had neglected to resign his office of postmaster. In the one case the person elected did not do that which the law declared that he must do after his election in order to be qualified to get title to the office; in the other he neglected to do that which the law required that he should do in order to be a person qualified to be elected to the office. In both cases the officer was elected. In neither was he entitled to the office when the term commenced. In the case cited the court held that the person elected was not eligible to take the office at the time the term began; in the case at bar the court held that the person elected was not eligible to take the office at the time of the election. We think that it would be a distinction without a substantial difference to hold that in the case cited the party elected was the incumbent, and that in this case he was not. We therefore conclude that the office became vacant upon the decision of the court declaring void the election of Free.

The decision in People v. Rodgers, 118 Cal. 393, 46 Pac. 740, 50 Pac. 668, supports the conclusion we have reached in this. In that case Rodgers was elected chief of police of the city of Sacramento, and received his certificate of election. He was ineligible at the time of his election, but at the commencement of his term he, without the consent of Drew, his predecessor in office, intruded into and obtained possession of the office. After Rodgers had so taken possession of the office, a proceeding was instituted by an elector of the city, contesting his right to hold the office, which resulted in a judgment duly made, setting aside his election by reason of his ineligibility at the time of such election. After the judgment so made, the board of supervisors appointed Rodgers to the office. It will thus be seen that the only difference between the two cases is that in that case the party declared elected, but who was ineligible, had taken possession of the office, and in this case the predecessor is still holding. The court, after a statement of the facts, and a reference to subdivision 10, § 996, of the Political Code, said: "There was thus presented the precise circumstances contemplated by the above provision of the Political Code. The election of the defendant had been contested on the ground that he was ineligible to the office, and a competent tribunal had decided that the election was void. * * * An election to fill the office, regular in all respects, had been held, and the electors of the city had at that election chosen the defendant by a majority of their votes to be the successor of the relator, and he had qualified for the office and entered upon its duties. By reason of certain extrinsic facts he was held not to be entitled to retain the office, but he had nevertheless been elected as the successor of the relator, and had qualified for the office and entered upon its duties."

In the case at bar Free did not qualify nor enter upon the duties of the office; but we cannot see any reason for holding that an office becomes vacant in a case where an ineligible officer, who has been elected, enters into possession of it, and a judgment is afterwards entered, declaring his election void, that would not apply with equal force to a case where, under like circumstances, the ineligible officer has not taken possession of the office. The question as to who is in the actual possession of the office is not made a factor by the provisions of the Code. Nor would the fact that Free failed to qualify and take the oath of office make any difference. In Adams v. Doyle, 139 Cal. 678, 73 Pac. 582, the question was as to whether or not there was a vacancy in the office of sheriff of Tuolumne county at the time the board of supervisors appointed Adams to that office. Adams had been a candidate for the office at the preceding election, had received the highest number of votes, and had received his certificate of election. He did not file his bond and take the oath as prescribed by law. His predecessor in office continued to be the incumbent after the term of Adams had begun and before the board of supervisors appointed him to the office. Adams had not only failed to qualify after his election, but had not taken possession of the office. The board of supervisors declared the office vacant, and appointed Adams to the very office to which he had been elected, and for which he had failed to qualify. He qualified under the appointment so made, and the court held that there was a vacancy, and that his title under the appointment was valid. The court there said: "The incumbent, in the sense of the statute, is the person declared elected to hold the term, who holds title to it, subject to forfeiture by failing to qualify, although it is not yet begun. The fact that the prior incumbent, in order that the public business may be done, is allowed and directed to continue to discharge the duties in the meantime, and until some person is lawfully invested with title to the term, does not affect the question of there being a vacancy in the sense intended. The vacancy is in the term of four years just beginning. The prior incumbent does not claim title to this term, and he has none, but is a mere locum tenens, holding for public convenience until the vacancy in the term is filled."

The conclusion we have reached does not injure the plaintiff. He has enjoyed the full benefit of the term for which he was elected. He was not elected for the term he is seeking to hold. The question involved is one of public concern. The office having become vacant, the ordinary machinery of the law cannot be enjoined from filling such vacancy by appointment.

The judgment is reversed.

MAHLER v. DRUMMER BOY GOLD MIN. COMPANY et al. (Civ. 412.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Dec. 21, 1907.)

VENUE—CHANGE—AFFIDAVITS.

On a motion for change of venue, plaintiff filed a counter affidavit stating that at the commencement of the action against defendant corporation and E., its secretary, the residence of said E. was unknown to plaintiff; that E. had given his address as San Francisco, and had written from that place, and also from other places, but that letters sent by plaintiff to such address had received no answers or had been returned; that plaintiff had no other means of finding out the residence of said E.; that he was informed by employees of the corporation located where the action was brought that they could get no answers to letters written to E.; that plaintiff was informed and believed that the B. Company could not find said E. at such address in order to serve summons on him, and that, being unable to learn the address of said E. and his residence being unknown, plaintiff designated the county where the mine was as the county in which to bring action. Held, that the affidavit was insufficient to permit plaintiff to name a county in which to sue, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, requiring the action to be tried in the county in which defendants reside, but providing that, if defendants' residence is unknown to plaintiff, the same may be tried in any county which plaintiff may designate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Mahler against the Drummer Boy Gold Mining Company and another. From an order refusing a motion for change of venue, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Coburn & Collier and Charles G. Nagle, for appellants. J. H. Magoffey and Taylor & Tebbe, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Motion to change the place of trial. Plaintiff commenced the action in Siskiyou county to recover from defendants for services as superintendent of certain quartz mines in said county. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff was employed by defendants on August 1, 1905; that he commenced work on October 20, 1905, and "continued to work for defendants as superintendent until the 5th day of March, 1906." The complaint was filed April 13, 1906. Plaintiff "prays judgment against defendants and each of them." Defendants moved the court to change the place of trial from Siskiyou county to the city and county of San Francisco, on the ground that at the commencement of the action the latter place was and ever since has been their place of residence. At the hearing of the motion it appeared from the uncontradicted affidavit of defendant Emmons that defendant corporation at the commencement of the action was a corporation organized under the laws of this state, with its principal place of business at the city and county of San Francisco, which was then and is now its residence and its principal place of business. Affiant also deposed that he was at the commencement of the action and ever since has been and now is a resident of said city and county; that he was at all times the secretary of said corporation; that each of said defendants has fully and fairly stated the case in said action to his and its attorney, and after such statement each of said defendants was advised by said attorney and verily believes "that they and each of them have a good and substantial defense to said cause on its merits." A general demurrer to the complaint was filed, with the demand by both defendants for a change of the place of trial. Plaintiff in the action filed a counter affidavit, in which he stated "that at the time of the commencement of the action the residence of said defendant Emmons was unknown to plaintiff"; that at the time of employing plaintiff as superintendent of said mines Emmons "gave this plaintiff his address as San Francisco; that thereafter he wrote this plaintiff from San Francisco, and also from Portland, Or.; that for the period of several months before the commencement of this action this plaintiff addressed letters to said Emmons at his last-named address in San Francisco; that he received no answers to several of said letters, and then one or two letters were returned to him by the Post Office Department as undelivered letters; that thereupon this plaintiff sent a registered letter to said Emmons, and that said registered letter was returned by the postal department to this plaintiff as undelivered; that this plaintiff had no other means of finding out the residence of said Emmons." Affiant then states that he was informed by the men working at the mine that "they could get no letters from said Emmons in answer to their letters sent to him at his last address"; that affiant was "informed and from such information believes that the Bee Hive Company, of Yreka, could not find said Emmons at such address in order to serve summons upon him"; that being "unable to learn the residence of said Emmons, and his residence being unknown, plaintiff designated the county of Siskiyou as the county in which to bring said action, said county being the county in which the cause of action accrued." There is no brief on file by respondent.

Under section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure all the defendants must join in the motion to change the place of trial (McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 480, 36 Pac. 8; Quint v. Dimond, 135 Cal. 574, 67 Pac. 1034); and the section has been complied with in the present case. But plaintiff seeks to retain the case in the court where it was commenced, under the provisions of said section which read as follows: " * * * The action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them reside at the commencement of the action; or, if none of the defendants reside in the state, or if residing in this state, and the county in which they reside is unknown to the plaintiff, the same may be tried in any county which the plaintiff may designate in his complaint. * * * " We presume that at the hearing of the motion plaintiff was successful in convincing the court that his affidavit was sufficient to show that the residence of defendant Emmons was unknown to plaintiff, and hence he had the right to designate the county in which to bring the action. The right to thus designate the place of trial is not an arbitrary right, or optional with plaintiff, upon a mere statement that the residence of defendant is unknown to him. He must state facts sufficient to show that he has resorted to such means to ascertain the defendant's residence as would be expected of a reasonable man seeking in good faith to make the discovery. The practice act, as amended in 1858 (St. 1858, p. 82, c. 103), contained a provision similar to that in section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was said in Loehr v. Latham, 15 Cal. 418: "But this provision must receive a reasonable construction. A willful or careless ignorance of the residence of the defendant does not put it in the power of the plaintiff to sue him in any county of the state, however remote from his residence; for, if this were so, the effect of the rule would be practically to repeal this provision requiring suit to be brought in the county of the residence of defendant. It would be putting it in the power of the plaintiff, by keeping ignorant of the facts, or feigning ignorance, to sue where he pleased, and thus fraud would be encouraged and oppression practiced. To resist the application of the defendant, the plaintiff should have shown that he used proper diligence to ascertain the residence of defendant before suit, and failed." In Thurber v. Thurber, 113 Cal. 607, 45 Pac. 852, speaking of the opinion in Loehr v. Latham, supra, the court said: "This decision has not been overruled or questioned, so far as we are informed. The reasons for enforcing the rule enunciated by Mr. Justice Baldwin are aptly put and cogent, and the practice indicated should be upheld and enforced."

Tested by these rules the affidavit of plaintiff was insufficient. At the time the action was commenced Emmons was a resident of San Francisco, as shown by his undisputed affidavit; and this was but a few weeks after plaintiff quit work. Emmons was known to plaintiff to be the secretary of the defendant company, and yet plaintiff made no inquiry of any of its officers or at its place of business in San Francisco; nor is any explanation given why he made no such inquiry, or that, if made, it would not have availed anything; nor is it shown that the address of the company's place of business was unknown to plaintiff. The letters alleged to have been sent to San Francisco were not sent to any street address, nor does affiant state that such address was unknown to plaintiff. In stating that he sent letters to Emmons' last-known address, plaintiff fails to state where that was; nor is the time stated when these letters were sent. The registered letters, as in the case of the others, were doubtless addressed to the general delivery. As superintendent of a mine being operated by the defendant corporation, and serving in that capacity under its direction and employment, there should have been no difficulty in finding the address of the secretary by inquiring of the officers of the company or at its place of business; and if, for any reason, the information by these obvious means could not be had the affidavit should have so shown. Plaintiff makes like indefinite statement that he was informed by the Bee Hive Company, of Yreka, that that company could not find Emmons. But when he made inquiry, or from what persons connected with that company, or why they should know anything about Emmons, does not appear. The men working in the mine under plaintiff as superintendent, of whom plaintiff made inquiries, cannot be supposed to have known more than plaintiff of Emmons' whereabouts, and the failure of the men to impart information in no wise strengthens the affidavit. The affidavit fails to show that diligence which the law very properly demands before plaintiff will be permitted to select his own forum in which to try his case.

The order is reversed, with directions to grant the motion.

HOLLY ST. LAND CO. v. BEYER.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. TRUSTS—RESULTING TRUSTS—ESTABLISHMENT BY PAROL.

Where defendant was in possession of land, holding and claiming it adversely to F., and, on an attempt to oust her, M. intervened and agreed to settle the adverse claim of F. for and in behalf of defendant, and did so by paying the demand of F., and taking a quitclaim in his own name, merely as a matter of convenience and because of difficulties between defendant and her husband, the trust in favor of defendant may be shown by parol; title being acquired by M. in such way that equity will not permit him or those claiming under him to assert it against defendant, for whose benefit it was acquired.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 47, Trusts, §§ 130-133.]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE OR COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Where a deed is acquired either in exchange for separate property or as a gift, the interest of the grantee is his separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 893, 900-902.]

3. TRUSTS—DEED TO HUSBAND AS TRUSTEE—RECONVEYANCE.

Where one acquires title to property as a naked trustee, and so acquires no beneficial interest, joinder of his wife in a reconveyance is unnecessary.

4. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—TIME FOR OBJECTION.

Objection that there was no sufficient proof of the loss of a deed to authorize parol evidence of its contents, not having been made when the parol evidence was offered, is waived, and cannot be raised for the first time in a request for instructions, or on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 183-190.]

5. DEEDS—EXECUTION AND CONTENTS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence, in an action for land of the execution, contents, and delivery of a deed, held sufficient to go to the jury.

6. MONEY PAID—RIGHTS ARISING.

No claim or cause of action can accrue in favor of one because of a payment which he makes on behalf of another, either as a gift to or in satisfaction of some obligation legal or moral which he deems he owes the other.

7. APPEAL—CLAIMS NOT MADE BELOW.

Though an unsuccessful plaintiff in an action for land was entitled to a lien for taxes paid on the property, such claim, not having been made below before or at time of rendition of judgment, cannot be made on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Whatcom County; Jeremiah Neterer, Judge.

Action by the Holly Street Land Company against Pauline Beyer. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Healy & Slentz and Fairchild & Bruce, for appellant. Rose & Craven, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. The defendant in this action acquired title to the property in controversy on the 13th day of June, 1890. On the 12th day of December, 1891, judgment of foreclosure was entered against the property in the superior court of Whatcom county in a certain action wherein the Fairhaven Land Company was plaintiff and the defendant herein and her husband were defendants. The property was sold on execution pursuant to this judgment on the 30th day of January, 1892, and bid in by the execution plaintiff, the Fairhaven Land Company. The sale was thereafter confirmed, and a sheriff's deed issued to the purchaser on the 20th day of October, 1893. On the 15th day of March, 1897, a writ of assistance was awarded to place the purchaser in possession. While this writ was in the hands of the sheriff for execution, and on the 17th day of February, 1898, one R. E. Meyer settled and compromised the matter with the Fairhaven Land Company by conveying to that company certain lands owned by him; the deed of conveyance reciting that the property so conveyed was his separate property. The Fairhaven Land Company, in turn, on the same day, quitclaimed and released the property in controversy to Meyer. On the 5th day of September, 1899, Meyer conveyed this property, together with other property, to his brother Fred Meyer, and the plaintiff in this action claims title by mesne conveyance under him. The defendant, on the other hand, claims title (1) by adverse possession for more than 10 years; (2) by deed from R. E. Meyer of an earlier date than the deed under which the plaintiff claims; and (3) upon the ground that the title acquired by Meyer from the Fairhaven Land Company was taken in trust for the defendant. The case was tried before a jury, and, from a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff has appealed.

The first and principal assignment of error is the refusal of the court to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury and direct judgment in favor of the appellant. This assignment is very general, and numerous questions have been discussed under it. It is contended that a trust in real property cannot be proved by parol; that the title acquired by Meyer from the Fairhaven Land Company was community property, and could not be conveyed by him without his wife joining in the conveyance; and that there was no sufficient evidence of the loss of the deed from Meyer to the respondent or of its execution, contents, or delivery. While it is true as a general rule that a trust in real property cannot be proved by parol, we think this case falls within a well-established exception to that rule. The respondent was in possession of the property, holding and claiming adversely to the Fairhaven Land Company, whether rightfully or wrongfully we need not inquire. When an effort was made to oust her, Meyer intervened, and agreed to settle the adverse claim to the property for her and in her behalf. He did so by paying the amount demanded by the adverse claimant, and took a quitclaim deed in his own name merely as a matter of convenience, and because of certain difficulties then existing between the respondent and her husband. When a party acquires title to property in such a way a court of equity will not permit him or those claiming under him to assert the title so acquired against the person in whose behalf and for whose benefit it was acquired. Borrow v. Borrow, 34 Wash. 684, 76 Pac. 305; Peterson v. Hicks, 43 Wash. 412, 86 Pac. 634, and cases there cited. The claim that the title acquired by Meyer under the quitclaim deed from the Fairhaven Land Company became community property of himself and wife is not borne out by the record. The property conveyed by Meyer in settlement and satisfaction of the claim of the Fairhaven Land Company was his separate property, or at least the conveyance so recited. If it was community property, he conveyed nothing in exchange. The quitclaim deed was therefore acquired either in exchange for separate property or by gift, and, in either event, the interest acquired would be separate property. Furthermore, if Meyer acquired title to the property in controversy as a naked trustee, he acquired no beneficial interest, and a joinder of his wife in a reconveyance was unnecessary. It is quite apparent from the record that there was no sufficient evidence of the loss of the deed from Meyer to the respondent to warrant the admission of parol testimony of its contents. But an objection of this kind cannot be raised for the first time in a request for instructions, or in this court. If not made when the parol testimony is offered, it is deemed waived. Wheeler, Osgood & Co. v. Ralph, 4 Wash. 625, 30 Pac. 709; Price v. Scott, 13 Wash. 577, 43 Pac. 634.

Considering the fact that the respondent remained in possession of the property in controversy, claiming the same as her own, until the death of Meyer some four years after he acquired the quitclaim deed, and considering, further, the declarations of the grantor, the relationship of the parties, and all the surrounding circumstances, we think there was ample testimony of the execution, contents, and delivery of the deed to warrant the submission of the question to the jury. Some objections are urged against the charge of the court, but these present no questions that we have not already considered.

The appellant suggests that it is at least entitled to a lien against the property for the amount paid by Meyer, and for the amount of the taxes paid. The action was not prosecuted for the purpose of enforcing a lien for moneys advanced by Meyer; and, furthermore, it appears that the advancement was made as a gift or in satisfaction of some obligation legal or moral which Meyer deemed he owed to the respondent, and from such a payment no claim or cause of action could accrue. The appellant was doubtless entitled to a lien for taxes paid on the property, but such claim should have been presented to the court below at or prior to the rendition of judgment. It cannot be asserted here for the first time.

This disposes of all the questions presented by the appeal, and, finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

COLUMBIA VALLEY R. CO. v. PORTLAND & S. RY. CO.

PUBLIC LANDS—GRANTS IN AID OF RAILROADS—FORFEITURES.

Acts Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 152, 18 Stat. pp. 482, 483, §§ 1, 4 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1568, 1569], provide that any railroad which files its articles with the Secretary of the Interior and proof of its existence, and after the completion of 20 miles of road files a copy of its profile, etc., shall be entitled to public lands for a right of way and stations, with a proviso that, on noncompletion of the road for five years, the rights of the road would be forfeited as to such uncompleted parts. Held, that Act Cong. June 26, 1906, c. 3550, 34 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 553], providing that any grant to a railroad which had failed to complete its road in accordance with the provisions of the above act shall be declared forfeited to the United States as to the uncompleted parts, and that the forfeiture declared shall, without further assurance or conveyance, inure to the benefit of any owners of land heretofore conveyed by the United States, etc., is effective and complete without any judicial or other or further proceedings on the part of the government, and that the questions of fact upon which the forfeiture depends may be inquired into and determined in any judicial proceedings in which rights claimed under the original grants are involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Klickitat County; W. W. McCredie, Judge.

Suit by the Columbia Valley Railroad Company against the Portland & Seattle Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Cotton, Covert & Stapleton, and Ralph E. Moody, for appellant. James B. Kerr and George T. Reid, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. This was a controversy between two railway companies over a right of way through certain public lands of the United States, or, more properly speaking, through what were public lands of the United States at the time the rights of the plaintiff company attached. The first and fourth sections of Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 152, 18 Stat. 482 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1568], are as follows:

"Section 1. That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any state or territory, except the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of said road; also the right to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road."

"Sec. 4. That any railroad company desiring to secure the benefits of this act, shall, within twelve months after the location of any section of twenty miles of its road. If the same be upon surveyed lands, and, if upon unsurveyed lands, within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a profile of its road; and upon approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office; and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way: Provided, That if any section of said road shall not be completed within five years after the location of said section, the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to any such uncompleted section of said road." 18 Stat. 483.

The plaintiff company complied with the requirements of these two sections during the year 1899 by filing with the Secretary of the Interior copies of its articles of incorporation, proofs of its due organization, and profiles of its road as located, but failed to complete the road or any section thereof within five years after location as required by the proviso to section 4. On the 26th day of June, 1906, an act to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, was approved by the President. 34 Stat. 482, c. 3550 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 553]. This act provides as follows: "That each and every grant of right of way and station grounds heretofore made to any railroad corporation under the act of Congress approved March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-five, entitled 'an act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States,' where such railroad has not been constructed and the period of five years next following the location of said road, or any section thereof, has now expired, shall be, and hereby is, declared forfeited to the United States, to the extent of any portion of such located line now remaining unconstructed, and the United States hereby resumes the full title to the lands covered thereby freed and discharged from such easement, and the forfeiture hereby declared shall, without need of further assurance or conveyance, inure to the benefit of any owner or owners of land heretofore conveyed by the United States subject to any such grant of right of way or station grounds: Provided, that in any case under this act where construction of the railroad is progressing in good faith at the date of the approval of this act the forfeiture declared in this act shall not take effect as to such line of railroad." The court below found that the plaintiff company had not constructed its road within the five years next following the location thereof, and that the construction was not progressing in good faith at the date of the approval of said last-mentioned act, and concluded as a matter of law that all rights acquired by the plaintiff company under the act of March 1875 were forfeited by the act of June 26, 1906. From a judgment entered in accordance with these findings and conclusions, the present appeal is prosecuted.

The contention of the appellant is briefly this: (1) That the grant made by the first section of the act of March 3, 1875, is a grant in present. (2) That the title vested in the appellant as soon as it filed proofs of its organization and a profile of its road with the Secretary of the Interior. (3) That the rights thus acquired could only be divested or forfeited by act of Congress, or by some judicial proceeding instituted by the United States in the nature of the inquest of office at common law. (4) That the act of June 26, 1906, is not sufficiently specific to work a forfeiture, because by its terms it only extends to cases where the road has not been constructed within five years from date of location or where construction was not progressing in good faith at the date of the approval of the act, and these questions of fact can only be determined in some judicial proceeding instituted by the United States. In so far as the rights of the appellant rest on the act of 1875, we will concede for the purposes of this appeal that its claims under that act are well founded. We cannot agree, however, that any form of judicial proceeding is requisite or necessary to enforce the forfeiture declared by the act of 1906. The nature of these grants and the manner in which a forfeiture for breach of condition subsequent may be declared and enforced have often been considered by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Schulenburg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 44, 22 L. Ed. 551, the court said: "In what manner the reserved right of the grantor for breach of the condition must be asserted so as to restore the estate depends upon the character of the grant. If it be a private grant, that right must be asserted by entry or its equivalent. If the grant be a public one, it must be asserted by judicial proceedings authorized by law, the equivalent of an inquest of office at common law, finding the fact of forfeiture and adjudging the restoration of the estate on that ground, or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the property for breach of condition, such as an act directing the possession and appropriation of the property, or that it be offered for sale or settlement. At common law the sovereign could not make an entry in person, and therefore an office found was necessary to determine the estate; but, as said by this court in a late case (United States v. Repentigny, 5 Wall. [U. S.] 236, 18 L. Ed. 627), 'the mode of ascertaining or of assuming the forfeited grant is subject to the legislative authority of the government. It may be after judicial investigation, or by taking possession directly under the authority of the government without these preliminary proceedings." In United States v. Northern Pacific Railroad Co., 177 U. S. 435, 20 Sup. Ct. 706, 44 L. Ed. 536, the court said: "In July, 1866, Congress granted unto the California & Oregon Railroad Company a right of way over the public lands. In a subsequent suit between the railroad company and one Bybee, a holder of a mining claim, it was claimed that the railroad company had forfeited and lost its right under the grant by its failure to complete its road within the time limited in the act; that such failure operated ipso facto as a termination of all right to acquire any further interest in any lands not then patented. But it was held by this court, in the words of Mr. Justice Brown: 'That in all cases in which the question has been passed upon by this court the failure to complete the road within the time limited is treated as a condition subsequent, not operating ipso facto as a revocation of the grant, but as authorizing the government itself to take advantage of it and forfeit the grant by judicial proceedings, or by an act of Congress, resuming title to the land.'" In Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Co. v. Mingus, 165 U. S. 413, 17 Sup. Ct. 348, 41 L. Ed. 770, the court said: "But, while we think the practice of forfeiting by legislative act is too well settled to be now disturbed, we do not wish to be understood as saying that this power may be arbitrarily exercised, or that the grantee may not set up in defense any facts which he might lay before a jury in a judicial inquiry. It would comport neither with the dignity of the government, nor with the constitutional rights of the grantee to hold that the government by an arbitrary act might divest the latter of his title when there had been no breach of the conditions subsequent, or when the government itself had been manifestly in default in the performance of its stipulations. The inquiry in each case is a judicial one, whether there has been, upon either side, a failure to perform, and it makes but little practical difference whether such inquiry precedes or follows the re-entry or act of forfeiture." In Farnsworth v. Minn. & Pacific Railroad Co., 92 U. S. 49, 23 L. Ed. 530, the court said: "A forfeiture by the state of an interest in lands and connected franchises, granted for the construction of a public work, may be declared for non-compliance with the conditions annexed to their grant, or to their possession, when the forfeiture is provided by statute, without judicial proceedings to ascertain and determine the failure of the grantee to perform the conditions. Such mode of ascertainment and determination—that is, by judicial proceedings—is attended with many conveniences and advantages over any other mode, as it establishes as matter of record, importing ver-ty against the grantee, the facts upon which the forfeiture depends, and thus avoids uncertainty in titles, and consequent litigation. But that mode is not essential to the divestiture of the interest where the grant is for the accomplishment of an object in which the public is concerned, and is made by a law which expressly provides for the forfeiture when that object is not accomplished. Where land and franchises are thus held, any public assertion by legislative act of the ownership of the state, after default of the grantee—such as an act resuming control of them and appropriating them to particular uses, or granting them to others to carry out the original object—will be equally effectual and operative. It was so decided in United States v. Repentigny, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 211, 18 L. Ed. 627, and in Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 44, 22 L. Ed. 551, with respect to real property held upon conditions subsequent. * * * The only inconvenience resulting from any mode other than by judicial proceedings is that the forfeiture is thus left open to legal contestation, when the property is claimed under it, as in this case, against the original holders." See, also, Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. Miller, 20 Wash. 21, 54 Pac. 603.

From these decisions, it appears manifest to us that the forfeiture declared by the act of 1906 is effective and complete, without other or further proceedings on the part of the government, and that the questions of fact upon which the forfeiture depends may be inquired into and determined in any judicial proceeding in which rights claimed under the original grant are involved.

For these reasons, the judgment of the court below is free from error, and stands affirmed.

WAIGHT v. LAKE WASHINGTON MILL CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 7, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where plaintiff was permitted, over defendant's objection, to prove what he had alleged in his reply, he cannot object to the court's action in striking that matter from the reply.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where, in an action for injuries sustained by the breaking of a belt in defendant mill, plaintiff contended that the use of an idler pulley for tightening the belt so as to set a saw in motion was the cause of the accident, and the only allegation of negligence upon which a recovery could be based was that the belt was too short and that by the application of the idler pulley an additional strain was placed upon it which caused the belt to break, the trial court properly refused to permit plaintiff to show that he had complained to the foreman that because the belt was too short it sometimes set the saw running without the use of the idler and he might get his hand cut, and that because of the foreman's promise to fix it he was induced to remain.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 861-876.]

3. SAME.

Where, in an action for injuries sustained in defendant mill, plaintiff alleged the causes of his injury to have been because the machine at which he worked was out of plumb and the belt was too short, and neither of these allegations was supported by any definite proof whatever, the trial court was justified in sustaining defendant's motion for nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Arthur E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by C. H. Waight against the Lake Washington Mill Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reynolds, Ballinger & Hutson, for appellant. Roberts & Hulbert, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This is an action brought by appellant for the recovery from respondent of damages for alleged personal injuries. The complaint alleges: That the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to operate a rip-saw in the defendant's sawmill. That plaintiff was inexperienced in the operating of the machinery, and so informed the defendant at the time of his employment, but was assured that there was no danger in the operation of the rip-saw. That the rip-saw was operated by the use of steam power applied as follows: A belt runs around two pulleys, one of which pulleys is attached to said machine, the other around the main line shaft. The belt is so arranged that the machine remains at rest except when the belt is tightened by the pressing against it of another pulley. That it was the duty of the plaintiff to start and stop said machine by the use of said pulley. That the defendant carelessly and negligently permitted said machine to be and to become out of plumb, and that said machine was out of plumb on the date on which the plaintiff received the injuries complained of. That the belt was too short, as defendant well knew, and that said machine being out of plumb, it was dangerous for a person to operate said machine. That defendant well knew of the dangerous condition of the machine, and negligently and carelessly permitted it to remain in that condition. That plaintiff was inexperienced in the matter of operating the machinery, and relied wholly upon the assurance and representations of the defendant as to the safety of the place in which he was required to work. That on the afternoon of the 12th day of December, 1906, plaintiff was in his accustomed place and operating said machine in the usual way. That at the same time plaintiff, in order to start the machine in the usual manner, permitted the pulley to be pressed against the belt of said machine, so negligently and carelessly provided and arranged by said defendant, and that said belt broke, striking plaintiff on the head and knocking him to the floor, where he remained for a long time unconscious, by reason of which he received the injuries complained of. The answer denied negligence on the part of the defendant, and averred that the accident and injury to plaintiff, if any was received, was caused wholly by his own fault, carelessness, and negligence, and by reason of the dangers incident to his employment and assumed by him. To this affirmative defense plaintiff replied with the allegation, in substance, that he had told the foreman that the upright belt was too tight; that it was so tight that sometimes when the idler pulley or tightener was not brought to bear it would start the machinery, thereby placing the plaintiff in peril by reason of the fact that he was liable to get his hand sawed; that the defendant had agreed to repair the machinery; and that by reason of said agreement the plaintiff continued to work. To this affirmative matter defendant interposed a demurrer, which was overruled. Thereafter defendant moved to strike said affirmative matter, which motion the court sustained. It was shown on the trial that the machine on which plaintiff worked was operated by a belt running from the main shaft to a pulley attached to the machine. The belt ran vertically, and was intended to be at rest except when tightened by being pressed upon by the large weight or tightener, which consisted of a very heavy pulley, the carriage of which was hinged in such a manner that, when it was desired to tighten the belt to start the machine into operation, the pulley could be lowered upon the belt, and its weight binding the belt would thereby have the effect to tighten the belt and cause it to put the machine in motion. It is the contention of the plaintiff that this belt was too short when the tightener was not pressing upon it, and that it would occasionally revolve the machinery, as before indicated. Upon the close of plaintiff's testimony, a motion for nonsuit was made by the defendant, which motion was sustained by the court. The cause was dismissed, and from judgment of dismissal this appeal is taken.

It is alleged that the court erred (1) in sustaining respondent's motion to strike the affirmative matter from the reply; (2) in refusing to permit appellant to show a promise of respondent's foreman to repair the defects which caused the injury; (3) in sustaining respondent's motion for nonsuit; (4) in refusing to overrule respondent's motion for nonsuit; (5) in rendering judgment dismissing the action. It was the theory of the court that the affirmative matter which was stricken should have been stated in the complaint, as it was a part of the appellant's cause of action, the appellant contending, however, that, inasmuch as assumption of risk and contributory negligence are matters of defense, he had a right to set up the promise to repair in his reply. But it is not necessary to pass upon the question of technical pleading, the appellant having been allowed, over respondent's objection, to prove exactly what he asked to be allowed to allege in his reply. If we should consider the case with the pleadings before us, as contended for by the appellant, there is no testimony which could sustain a judgment for appellant in this case; for, if it be conceded that he was induced to remain by reason of the foreman's promise to repair, there is no showing here whatever as to the cause of the injury. The matter complained of by the appellant to the foreman simply was that, by reason of the machine running without the use of the idler, he might get his hand cut. But there is no proof, and indeed no claim, that the accident occurred by reason of the machine running without the use of the idler. On the contrary, it is the appellant's contention that it was the use of the idler which caused the accident. So that, if there is any allegation of negligence here upon which a recovery could be based, it is the allegation that the upright belt was too short, and that by the application of the idler an additional strain was placed upon it which caused the belt to break.

It is the contention of the appellant, although the testimony is not definite in that regard, that he was struck on the head by the belt when it broke. We are not satisfied from an examination of the model which was brought up that the fact that the belt was too short would cause any more strain to be placed upon it by the application of the idler; for, while it is true as a principle of mechanics that the weight, which carries the belt out of perpendicular would tend to shorten it thereby bringing an additional strain upon it, it is equally true that the longer the belt was and the more slack it had the more obliquely the idler would rest against it, thereby causing a greater weight to rest upon the belt than if the belt were tighter and the idler were held in more perpendicular position with reference to the belt. But, however this may be, the testimony which is very brief absolutely fails to show that the breaking of the belt was caused by its being too short; and, although there is an allegation that the machine was out of plumb, the proof in this respect entirely fails to sustain the allegation. Under all the testimony in this case, nothing more than a guess could be hazarded as to what was the cause of the breaking of the belt. Conceding that there was sufficient proof that it did break, and further conceding that there was proof that the breaking of the belt was the cause of the injury, and there being but the two causes alleged, viz., the machinery being out of plumb and the belt being too short, and neither of these being supported by any definite proof whatever, the court was justified in sustaining the motion for nonsuit.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LUND et al. v. IDAHO & W. N. R. R.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS BONDS—INJUNCTION.

In the absence of statutory provisions, a trial court will not be required, by the mandate of an appellate court, to fix a bond superseding a prohibitory injunction.

2. SAME—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where a decree is entered partially suspending the granting of a prohibitory injunction pending appeal, and the record shows that the appeal is being prosecuted in good faith and that plaintiff would not be deprived of ultimate relief should the decree be affirmed, the appellate court will, in the exercise of its discretion, suspend the operation of the decree altogether pending the determination of the appeal on the giving of a supersedeas bond by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stevens County; D. H. Carey, Judge.

Suit by H. M. Lund and others against the Idaho & Washington Northern Railroad to enjoin the construction of a railroad. From a decree granting the injunction, defendant appeals. Petition in appellate court to suspend injunction pending appeal. Granted.

E. H. Belden, for appellant. E. J. Cannon, for respondents.

CROW, J. The Idaho & Washington Northern Railroad, a corporation, acquired from the city of Newport, in Stevens county, Wash., a franchise over certain of its streets, and proceeded to construct a steam railroad across Fourth street immediately in front of certain lots belonging to the plaintiffs H. M. Lund and L. M. Lund, his wife. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced this equitable action, in which, on final hearing, a decree was entered enjoining the defendant corporation from constructing or operating its railroad in front of their premises until it shall have paid to them the damages caused to their property. The defendant has appealed.

The decree provides that, if an appeal shall be diligently prosecuted, the injunction shall be suspended pending such appeal, so as to permit the running of construction trains, but that otherwise it shall be in full force and effect from and after its entry. The appellant has petitioned this court to enter an order suspending the injunctive relief granted until the final determination of its appeal. A show-cause order having issued, the respondents have appeared and resisted appellant's application, which is now before us for consideration.

It appears that appellant's franchise from the city of Newport permits it to construct a railroad across Fourth street; that its railroad does not touch respondents' lots, being located about 29 feet therefrom; and that as constructed it is neither above nor below the street grade. Respondents predicate their right to an injunction upon their contention that appellant has, in violation of section 16, art. 1, of the state Constitution, damaged their private property without just compensation having been first made or paid into court. The appellant contends that it has neither taken nor damaged their property, that it is entitled to enter upon and occupy the street under its franchise granted by the city, and that it is not interfering with any private property rights which it can be required to condemn or which it has any authority to condemn. These contentions present the issue to be determined upon the final hearing of the appeal. It appears that appellant's road has been constructed and is now being operated for a distance of 45 miles or more; that in such operation it passes near respondents' lots on Fourth street; that appellant is prosecuting the business of a common carrier, but that it entered upon Fourth street without respondents' knowledge, consent, or acquiescence. The appellant strenuously contends that, if it is not permitted to continue its business as a common carrier over Fourth street pending this appeal, it will suffer great and irreparable loss, and that, if a suspension of the injunction is not granted, it will be compelled to settle with respondents upon their own terms, without regard to the validity of their alleged claims, and that it will thus be deprived of the fruits of its appeal, which it is now prosecuting diligently and in good faith.

The injunction is prohibitory, and cannot be superseded as a matter of right under any statute of this state. We have repeatedly held that a trial court will not, by the mandate of this court, be required to fix a bond superseding a prohibitory injunction. State ex rel. v. Stallcup, 15 Wash. 263, 46 Pac. 251; State ex rel. Byers v. Superior Court, 28 Wash. 403, 68 Pac. 865; State ex rel. Gibson v. Superior Court, 39 Wash. 115, 80 Pac. 1108, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 554, 109 Am. St. Rep. 862. In State ex rel. Burrows v. Superior Court, 43 Wash. 225, 86 Pac. 632, it was held that the superior courts of this state, in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction, having all the powers of the English chancery court, may in their discretion suspend the operation of injunctive decrees pending appeals to this court. In the case at bar the trial court did partially suspend the operation of its decree by permitting the appellant to run its construction trains. This concession, however, does not seem to have been entirely satisfactory to the appellant. The question now before us is whether, after the appeal has been perfected, we may, upon appellant's petition, grant a further or complete suspension. This court has held that to maintain the existing status and to preserve the fruits of litigation to an appellant it has, in aid of its appellate jurisdiction, and in the exercise of its discretion, authority to grant a supersedeas pending the determination of an appeal, and that it may do so although the appellant is not, as a matter of right, entitled to a supersedeas under any existing statute. State ex rel. Barnard v. Board of Education, 19 Wash. 8, 52 Pac. 317, 40 L. R. A. 317, 67

Am. St. Rep. 706. "The court of last resort has jurisdiction to issue an order of supersedeas to preserve the status quo of the parties to an appeal pending a determination upon its merits, when, for want of such an order, the appeal may be rendered of no value to the party appealing, and the judgment of the court of last resort rendered ineffective, and if it can do so without depriving the adverse party of a substantial right; and it will exercise its power only upon the terms which the statute requires for perfecting a stay in the lower court, such as that the party applying enter into a sufficient undertaking." 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1237, 1238; Norris v. Tripp, 111 Iowa, 115, 82 N. W. 610; Carson v. Jansen, 65 Neb. 423, 91 N. W. 398; In re Epley et al., 10 Okl. 631, 64 Pac. 18; *Eno v. N. Y. Elevated R. R. Such a supersedeas, however, should not be granted if it will result in preventing the respondents from ultimately securing the equitable relief to which they will be entitled in the event of an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court. We have examined the record to ascertain (1) whether the appeal is being prosecuted in good faith; (2) whether a suspension of the injunction can be granted without depriving respondents of ultimate relief should the decree be affirmed; and (3) whether we should, in the exercise of our discretion, grant the suspension or supersedeas. We conclude that all of these questions should be answered in the affirmative. We cannot at this time enter upon an investigation or discussion of the merits of the appeal, nor do we indicate our views thereon. We are satisfied that a suspension of the injunction should be ordered pending the appeal.

It is ordered that the petition of the appellant be granted, and that the injunction be suspended during the pendency of this appeal, and until the further order of this court; upon condition, however, that the appellant shall execute and file herein an undertaking to the respondents, to be approved by the clerk of this court, in the sum of $5,000, conditioned that the appellant will pay all damages sustained by the respondents by reason of the suspension of such injunction during the pendency of the appeal.

WRIGHT v. LAKE.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 13, 1908.)

1. WORK AND LABOR—EVIDENCE.

Testimony of plaintiff that he performed certain services for defendant, that he rendered a bill therefor to defendant for a certain amount, and that defendant stated the bill was satisfactory, warrants submission to the jury of right to recover, either on contract or quantum meruit.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—DISCHARGE—NEGLECT.

Discharge for negligence, of one employed to manage a dairy business, is warranted; he having left a wild colt attached to a wagon, unhitched and unattended, within a few feet of the railroad, which was frightened by a passing train, causing it to run away, and it appearing that, though the train was not on schedule time, he was paying little heed to the team or train, and that a few days later he suffered the same team to run away under circumstances no more favorable to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by E. Wright against E. J. Lake. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Voorhees & Voorhees and Cullen & Dudley, for appellant. A. E. Barnes and Willis H. Merriam, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. On the 26th day of September, 1905, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract whereby the plaintiff agreed to give his entire time and attention to the management of a dairy business conducted by the defendant for a term of four years from and after October 1, 1905, at a salary of $100 per month. The plaintiff entered upon the discharge of his duties under this contract on the 1st day of October, and continued in the employ of the defendant until the evening of December 12, 1905, at which time he was discharged. This action was thereafter instituted to recover the following items of damage: (1) The sum of $4.70 for services performed by the plaintiff at the special instance and request of the defendant before entering upon the performance of the written contract; (2) wages earned under the written contract prior to the discharge; (3) an item for board furnished a hired man under the written contract; and (4) damages for a wrongful discharge. A trial was had, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $279.69. The court below remitted the sum of $3.33 from the verdict, and rendered judgment for the residue. From this judgment, the defendant has appealed.

The second cause of action in the complaint was based on the $4.70 item above referred to. The complaint alleged that the respondent performed two days' labor at the special instance and request of the appellant, "at the agreed and reasonable wages" of $1.50 per day, and paid out $1.70 car fare in going to and from the place of work. On his direct examination the respondent was asked the reasonable value of these services, but an objection to the question was sustained on the ground that the complaint alleged an express contract. At the close of the respondent's case a motion for a nonsuit was interposed as to this cause of action on the ground that the contract was not proved as alleged. The court allowed an amendment to the complaint to conform to the proofs, and denied the motion for nonsuit. The appellant still contends that the proof offered does not sustain a recovery either on contract or on a quantum meruit. The respondent testified that he performed the services, that he rendered a bill to the appellant for the amount claimed, and that the appellant stated that the bill was satisfactory. This testimony, in our opinion, fully warranted the submission of the question to the jury under either the original or amended complaint. It may seem that we have given undue importance to this small item, but several pages of the appellant's brief are devoted to a discussion of it. Doubtless some question of costs in the court below hinged upon its allowance. There seems to be no conflict in the testimony as to the second and third items. The respondent entered the employ of the appellant on the 1st day of October, and was discharged on the 12th day of December. The wages for this period at $100 per month would aggregate $240, $97.13 of which is admitted to have been paid. Board was furnished to a hired man from October 9th to December 12th at the agreed price of $10 per month. This item would amount to $22.12.

The only remaining question is the claim for damages for the wrongful discharge. The appellant contends that the discharge was justified for incompetency, for disobedience of orders, and for negligence in the performance of duty. While the testimony shows that the respondent had rather a superficial knowledge of the instrumentalities usually employed in the business in which the master was engaged, we are not prepared to say that the discharge was justified on this ground alone. The uncontradicted testimony also shows that the respondent disobeyed the lawful commands of the master in some minor matters, and we think some of the instructions of the court were too favorable to the respondent as to his duties in this regard, but for reasons hereafter stated this question is not material. We are of opinion, however, that the negligence of the respondent in the performance of his duty was such as to warrant the master in discharging him. It appears that he suffered a team under his control to run away on two different occasions during the short time he was in the appellant's employ. On the first occasion he left a wild colt attached to a wagon, unhitched and unattended, within a few feet of a railroad track. A train passed by, and the team became frightened and ran away. He attempted to justify his conduct by stating that it was not train time, and that the train was a day and a half late; but it seems to us that he placed too much reliance on train schedules, and all the surrounding circumstances show conclusively that he was paying little heed to the team or the passing train. On a second occasion, a few days later, he suffered the same team to again run away under circumstances no more favorable to him. By these acts, which were manifestly negligent, he endangered, not only the property of the master, but the lives and property of others as well. Had injury resulted to third persons by reason of his negligence, the master would clearly be liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior, and we do not think that the law requires the master to incur such risks or keep such a servant in his employ. We arrive at this conclusion without hesitation from the testimony of the respondent himself.

The court should therefore have withdrawn this item of damage from the consideration of the jury, and for its error in that regard the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the respondent for the sum of $169.69, with interest from date of commencement of action.

Action by Louis Hendelman against Bernhard Kahan and others. From an order dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robertson & Rosenhaupt, for appellant. Belt & Powell, for respondents.

ROOT, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court dissolving an attachment. The writ issued upon an affidavit setting forth that defendants were about to convert their property, or a part thereof, into money for the purpose of defrauding their creditors. Upon the motion to dissolve the attachment, several affidavits were filed by each party. From these the trial court found the writ to have been improperly or irregularly issued, and made an order dissolving the same. Such an order will not be disturbed by an appellate court, unless clearly erroneous.

Bingham v. Keylor, 25 Wash. 156, 64 Pac. 942; Gehres v. Orlowski, 36 Wash. 156, 75 Pac. 792; Bender v. Rinker, 21 Wash. 633, 59 Pac. 503. We think the action of the trial court in dissolving the attachment was justified.

Appellant requested that court to incorporate in the order of dissolution a recital that there was reasonable ground for suing out the attachment. The court having refused to so do, its refusal is assigned as error. The question of reasonable cause might be material in a suit upon the attachment bond; but it is not so in this action.

No error appearing, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 14, 1908.)

HOMESTEAD—ABANDONMENT.

After defendants had removed from their land, and to another state, after secretly selling part of their household goods and removing the rest, the land was attached by a creditor, pursuant to Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5254, providing that the exemption law shall not apply to "property, real or personal, of nonresidents, or a person who left, or is about to leave, the state, with intent to defraud his creditors." Held, that the fact that defendants, after the attachment, returned to the land, filed a declaration of homestead thereon, placed household goods in the house, and remained there a month, but did not attempt to set aside the attachment, is not sufficient to defeat the sale of the land under judgment on the attachment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Snohomish County; W. W. Black, Judge.

Action by Alfred G. Gullickson against Thomas L. Fenlon and another. From an order confirming the sale of land, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hathaway & Alston, for appellants. John W. Miller and Robert McMurchie, for respondent.

ROOT, J. This is an appeal from an order confirming the sale of certain real property. Appellants purchased these premises about May, 1904, and lived thereupon until September, 1905, when they removed therefrom, and subsequently, in November, 1905, left the state. While they were absent this action was commenced on February 6, 1906, an attachment in the action being levied the same day upon these premises. Judgment was obtained, and the property sold under an execution issued thereupon, the sale occurring on the 7th day of July, 1906. In the month of April, 1906, appellants returned to the state of Washington, and on the 26th of May, 1906, filed a declaration of homestead upon these premises, and, on that day, rented and placed in the building thereon certain household goods, and resided in said building until the 22d of June, 1906. It is contended by respondent that the appellants left the state of Washington in November, 1905, with the intention of establishing their residence in the state of Oregon, and that they did so establish their residence; that they so left the state of Washington, with intent to defraud their creditors, having secretly sold the greater portion of their household goods and effects, and shipped the remainder to Portland, Or. The trial court made findings to this effect. Appellants contend that these findings are not justified by the evidence. We think they are.

No effort was ever made to set aside the attachment, and the same merged with the lien of the judgment when the latter was entered in the case. Section 5254, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. among other things, says: "That nothing in this chapter shall be construed to exempt from attachment or execution the property, real or personal, of nonresidents, or a person who has left, or is about to leave, the state with intent to defraud his creditors." The trial court moreover found that the appellants' action in going upon the premises in May, 1906, and remaining there for only a month, was not in good faith, with the intention of making said premises their home, but merely as a subterfuge to defeat the sale of the premises in satisfaction of respondent's judgment. Considering all of the facts in the light of the statute above quoted, we do not think the lien of the attachment and judgment was defeated by the attempt made by appellants to claim this property as a homestead exemption.

The judgment of the superior court is therefore affirmed.

2. SAME—DEFENSE—ORAL APPOINTMENT.

Although an appointment in writing is necessary to constitute one an agent for the sale of real estate, one who sells real estate as the owner's agent would not be justified in retaining the difference between the amount that he represented to his principal he received for the property and the amount he actually received, because his appointment was not in writing.

Action by James A. Merriman and wife against S. W. Thompson and Floyd Swan, doing business under the name of S. W. Thompson & Co. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edgar M. Swan and A. L. Miller, for appellants. E. M. Green, for respondents.

ROOT, J. This is an action by plaintiffs to recover a balance of $475 collected by defendants on the sale of a 40-acre tract of land. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, this appeal is taken by defendants.

Respondents, in writing, appointed appellants their agents to sell the land referred to, the latter doing business as real estate agents in Vancouver, Wash. The time within which they were authorized to make the sale expired. Subsequently they gave appellants no written authority to sell, but told them orally that, if they could get a purchaser for $2,500, they would pay them 5 per cent. commission. Afterwards they, by letter, authorized appellants to sell it for $2,250. Some time after this appellants sent to respondent James A. Merriman this message: "Will give $1,900 for your claim if accepted now. Wire answer." In response to this telegram respondent Merriman called appellants over the long-distance telephone from Seattle, and talked with appellant Swan. There is a conflict as to what was said over the 'phone. Merriman testified that he was led to believe that they were selling the property as his agents to some other person, and that the price mentioned was the highest amount that could be obtained on a sale, and that he consented thereto under these circumstances. Appellants drafted a warranty deed, wherein the consideration was mentioned as $2,000, and wherein one Gregory was named as grantee. This deed was sent to respondents to be executed, and was returned by them after execution to a bank in Vancouver, to be delivered upon payment of the purchase price. In the meantime appellants had sold the property to one Gregory; in fact, had negotiated with him for a sale for $2,500 prior to the time of sending the telegram to respondents.

It is contended by respondents that appellants were their agents, and that they relied upon the representations of such agents in executing and delivering the deed; that as such agents they were holden to make a full disclosure to respondents of all the facts concerning the contemplated sale. Appellants urge that they were not the agents of respondents; that under the statutes of this state they could not be such agents except under a written appointment, which they did not have, the time covered by the former appointment having expired. Mr. Gregory testified that respondents, in selling the property to him, told him that it belonged to Mr. Merriman, and that he understood that Merriman was asking $2,500. Respondent Merriman says that, in the telephone conversation, he asked respondent Swan if the amount mentioned in the telegram was the best he could do, and Swan said that it was, and said: "We have a contract lying on the table for $2,000. That is all the man will give." If the facts were as stated by Merriman, it would seem very clear that appellant Swan was talking as an agent to Merriman, and that the basis of their negotiations was the relationship of principal and agent. The testimony of Gregory, as well as certain admissions on the part of the appellants, tends to corroborate and strongly support the theory of respondents. The jury hearing the evidence, and having the parties and witnesses before it, accepted respondents' theory, and the record is not such as to justify us in disturbing its conclusion. The fact that there was not, in writing, an employment of appellants as agents for respondents, might have a bearing upon the question of their commission. But we do not think the lack thereof would justify appellants, after selling this property for $2,500, in retaining the difference between that and $2,000, which was the amount they represented to respondents as being the highest sum they could get for the property, and for which they had sold, or were about to sell, the same. Stearns v. Hochbrunn, 24 Wash. 206, 64 Pac. 165.

HAPEMAN et ux. v. McNEAL et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 24, 1908.)

REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS—MISTAKE IN DESCRIPTION OF DEED—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action to reform a deed held insufficient to warrant a finding that it incorrectly described the lines intended at the time of its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Skagit County; Geo. A. Joiner, Judge.

Action by M. W. Hapeman and wife against Thomas D. McNeal and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Millon, Houser & Shrauger, for appellants. Smith & Brawley, for respondents.

MOUNT, J. This action was brought by the appellants to reform a description in a deed for a tract of land owned by appellants in the town of Mt. Vernon. After issues were made up, a trial was had, and the court found that there was no mistake in the deed, and dismissed the action. The plaintiffs appeal.

The tract of land in question is about midway between Myrtle street to the north and Kincaid street to the south. It fronts on Second street on the west. Kincaid street runs east and west. Second street runs northward 20 degrees east. Myrtle street extends eastward from Second street 70 degrees south. So that Kincaid and Myrtle streets are not parallel with each other, but converge toward the east. The line on the north of the parcel of land in question is concededly parallel with Kincaid street. It runs east and west. The line on the south is the one in dispute. The deed describes this line as parallel with Kincaid street, while appellant M. W. Hapeman contends that it was his intention and the intention of the grantor that this line should be parallel with Myrtle street, so that his lot, instead of being 50 feet wide at each end, should be 50 feet wide in front and 73 feet wide in the rear or east end. There is some evidence to the effect that a fence was built upon the south line of the lot by the grantor soon after the deed was executed, and that this fence, if on the line intended, places the south line of appellant's lot as contended for by him. But the evidence also shows that at about the time the deed was drawn the appellant and his grantor and two other persons, for the purpose of describing the lot, measured the front line of the lot on Second street 50 feet; that they also measured the north line and the east line; that the line on the east, which line runs due north and south, was measured the same length as the west line, viz., 50 feet. This shows, of course, that the lot was a strip of land 50 feet in width, and that the lines on the north and south were intended to be parallel as they are described in the deed. It is true that the south line as described in the deed runs through one corner of the building located upon the lot, and the grantor testified that he intended to sell to the appellant sufficient land to clear the building, and, if the land described in the deed does not do so, there was a mistake. But this mistake, of course, was not in the description of the land actually sold and conveyed by the deed, but was a mistake in the quantity of land sold and purchased. From a consideration of all the evidence in the case we are not free from doubt that the deed incorrectly describes the lines intended at the time of its execution. "The authorities all require that the parol evidence of the mistake and of the alleged modification must be clear and convincing—in the language of some judges, 'the strongest possible'—or else the mistake must be admitted by the opposite party. The resulting proof must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. Courts of equity do not grant the high remedy of reformation upon a probability, nor even upon a mere preponderance of evidence, but only upon a certainty of the error." 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 859.

The evidence is not, in our opinion, sufficient to warrant a reversal of the case. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

PETERSEN et al. v. UNION IRON WORKS.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 17, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—LIABILITY FOR INJURY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in an action to recover for the death of an employé held insufficient to take the case to the jury on the question whether such accident was due to the master's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1000-1050.]

2. SAME—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover for the death of an employé killed while operating a rip saw, there was no one present when he was killed, and no direct evidence as to the accident causing his death. Held, that evidence of an alleged defect in the saw table was inadmissible, as too remote.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by Emma Petersen and others against the Union Iron Works. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. E. Barnes, Geo. A. Latimer, and B. M. Branford, for appellants. Post, Avery & Higgins, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. The defendant is a manufacturing corporation, having its principal place of business in the city of Spokane. At the time hereinafter mentioned it had installed in its establishment a rip saw used by its employes in the manufacture of flasks used in moulding. The saw was 12 inches in diameter, and was situated upon, or attached to, a table about 3 feet in width and 5 feet in length, so that about 4 inches of the saw blade extended above the surface or plane of the table. It is customary to equip or guard saws such as this with a device known as a "splitter." The splitter consists of a piece of iron or steel about the thickness of the saw blade, placed in an upright position, 4 inches back of the saw, the top of the splitter extending nearly to the top of the saw. The object of the splitter seems to be two-fold: First, to keep the board from pinching after it passes through the saw; and, second, to prevent splinters and other material from catching on the saw at the rear, or dropping upon the saw, and being hurled against the operator. The saw in question was not equipped with a device of this kind. On the 25th day of August, 1905, one Nels Petersen was in the employ of the defendant, and was engaged in operating this saw. While thus engaged, he received an injury which resulted in his death some four or five days later. At the time the accident happened the deceased was alone in the carpenter shop, and no living witness saw the accident, or could explain how it happened. Indeed, it is only by inference that we can say that the saw was in motion, or that the deceased was engaged in operating it at the time of receiving his fatal injury. An examination of the person of the deceased after the injury disclosed the fact that he had been struck in the abdomen by some blunt instrument which left a mark about 4 inches in length and one inch wide. A piece of a board about 1 by 4 inches and 4 feet in length, used in the manufacture of the flasks, was found after the accident in close proximity to where the operator would ordinarily stand in the discharge of his duties. This board had some indentations upon it, indicating that it might have been caught by the teeth of the saw and hurled against the deceased. These were the only facts or circumstances tending in the remotest way to show the cause of the accident, or how it happened. The theory of the plaintiffs was that the piece of board above described dropped or caught on the teeth of the revolving saw, and was hurled against the deceased, and that the accident would not have happened had the saw been properly equipped and guarded. They contended, and now contend, that the jury might properly infer this from the testimony. The court below ruled otherwise, and granted a nonsuit, and from the judgment of nonsuit the present appeal is prosecuted.

In their brief the appellants make the following concessions: "The evidence in this case showed that the deceased was alone in said carpenter room at the time of the accident; hence there is no living witness who saw the accident and can explain from his observation of same how it happened." Again: "So in this case there may have been a dozen or more different ways in which a similar piece of board might have come in contact with this saw and would have caused the same to be hurled back against the operator. A board might, for example, be dropped from his hand directly on top of the saw, either crosswise or otherwise, and be turned back against him, even though there had been a splitter behind the saw, and one can imagine various other reasonable ways that an accident might happen, even though a saw had been equipped with a splitter." Yet, in the face of these concessions, which are manifestly in accordance with the facts, the appellants earnestly insist that the jury might have adopted their theory of the accident, and that the inference to be drawn from the facts was exclusively for that body. With this contention we cannot agree. In Patton v. Texas & Pacific Ry. Co., 179 U. S. 658, 21 Sup. Ct. 275, 45 L. Ed. 361, the court said: "The fact of the accident carries with it no presumption of negligence on the part of the employer, and it is an affirmative fact for the injured employé to establish that the employer had been guilty of negligence. * * * In the latter case it is not sufficient for the employé to show that the employer may have been guilty of negligence—the evidence must point to the fact that he was. And, when the testimony leaves the matter uncertain, and shows that any of half a dozen things may have brought about the injury, for some of which the employer is responsible, and for some of which he is not, it is not for the jury to guess between these half a dozen causes, and find that the negligence of the employer was the real cause, where there is no satisfactory foundation in the testimony for that conclusion. If the employé is unable to adduce sufficient evidence to show negligence on the part of the employer, it is only one of the many cases in which the plaintiff falls in his testimony, and no mere sympathy for the unfortunate victim of an accident justifies any departure from settled rules of proof resting upon all plaintiffs." This rule has frequently been applied in this court. Hansen v. Seattle Lumber Company, 31 Wash. 604, 72 Pac. 457; Armstrong v. Cosmopolis, 32 Wash. 110, 72 Pac. 1038; Reldhead v. Skagit County, 33 Wash. 174, 73 Pac. 1118; Stratton v. Nichols Lumber Company, 39 Wash. 323, 81 Pac. 831, 109 Am. St. Rep. 881.

The court rejected testimony tending to show an alleged defect in the saw table, but the inference that the injury was caused by any such defect is even more remote than the inference we have been discussing. In view of the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the case, we will not consider or discuss the appellants' right to maintain this action under the factory act.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(48 Wash. 493)

O'CONNOR v. SLATTER.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 14, 1908.)

1. WITNESSES — COMPETENCY — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED PERSONS.

In an action against a widow, as administratrix of her deceased husband, on a note indorsed by him, plaintiff cannot, under the statute relating to the competency of persons to testify in an action where a party sues or defends as administrator, testify as to transactions had by him with the decedent or as to statements made to him by decedent, and cannot testify as to whether the note has been changed since he received it from decedent, though the widow testified as to what took place between decedent and plaintiff in her presence at the time the indorsement was made, but plaintiff may testify that she was not present at that time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 604.]

2. APPEAL—ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—CORRECTION BY ADMISSION OF OTHER EVIDENCE.

Error in excluding the testimony of a witness that a certain person was not present at a particular transaction, as testified to by such person, is not cured by permitting him to give the names of the persons present at that time, which did not include the name of such person.

3. BILLS AND NOTES—TRANSFERS—INDORSEMENTS.

Under Laws 1899, p. 349, c. 149, § 49, providing that, where the holder of an instrument payable to his order transfers it for value without indorsing it, the transfer vests in the transferee such title as the holder had therein, etc., and independent of the statute, a promissory note may be transferred without indorsement, though the rights of the parties under the transfer without indorsement are different from the rights of the parties under a transfer with indorsement.

4. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against a widow, as administratrix of her deceased husband, on a note indorsed by him, the question of the liability of an indorser was not involved, an instruction that, to transfer the title to a note, it was necessary that the person holding it shall place his name on the back of it and deliver it to the purchaser, was not prejudicial to plaintiff, and, if he desired more specific instruction on the question of the purpose of an indorsement, he should have requested it.

5. PLEADING—COUNTERCLAIM IN ANSWER.

In an action against a widow, as administratrix of her deceased husband, on a written contract of guaranty indorsed on a note, an answer admitting that decedent indorsed the note in blank and delivered it to plaintiff, and denying that the contract of guaranty was on the note at the time he indorsed it, and alleging, as an affirmative defense, without demanding affirmative relief, fraud on the part of plaintiff, not connected with the contract in suit, sets forth but one defense, since the affirmative matter does not add anything to the previous denials, and it is erroneous to submit to the jury the issue of fraud raised by the affirmative defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by John O'Connor against Bessie Slatter, administratrix of John Slatter, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Merrill, Oswald & Merrill, for appellant. Roche & Onstine, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. This case was before this court on a former appeal, where a full statement of the issues will be found. 89 Pac. 885. A retrial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, from which the present appeal is prosecuted.

The principal errors assigned on this, as on the former appeal, relate to the rulings of the court on the admission of testimony. On the former appeal it was contended that the surviving wife was not a competent witness to testify to a transaction between a third person and her deceased husband in an action brought by such third person against the surviving wife as executrix of the deceased husband's estate. This contention we refused to sustain. It is now contended that, by testifying fully to such transaction, the surviving wife waived her right to object to the competency of the adverse party to testify to the same transaction. This proposition, thus broadly stated, we likewise refuse to sustain. Cases have been cited from other jurisdictions sustaining the contention of the appellant in this regard, but they are all based on statutes differing materially from the statute of this state. As said by us on the former appeal: "No statute exactly like ours has been called to our attention by the parties to this appeal, and, upon independent investigation, we have been unable to find any using the same language in the same order as ours. The authorities in other states upon similar statutes shed but very little light upon the question presented here." Doubtless one of the objects of the statutes is "to prevent interested parties from testifying to transactions and statements made by a deceased person when there might be no person to rebut such testimony," as declared in the former opinion, but manifestly the operation of the statute does not depend upon whether there are or are not others who may testify to the transaction or statement. Death has sealed the lips of one of the parties, and the statute imposes the same silence upon the other. The prohibition of the statute is absolute and unconditional. It admits of no qualification or exception, and it is not the province of this court to add to it or take from it. We are satisfied, therefore, that the court below correctly ruled that the appellant was not competent to testify to any transaction had with or statement made by the deceased, regardless of the testimony that may have been given by other witnesses. The prohibition of the statute, however, extends only to transactions had by the appellant with the deceased, or to statements made to the appellant by the deceased. It does not extend to all facts to which the deceased might testify if living, and we are satisfied that the court below extended the prohibition too far. The respondent testified that she was present at the appellant's bank when the notes in suit were indorsed, and testified fully to all that transpired there. The appellant was called as a witness in his own behalf, and was asked the following question: "I will ask you to state whether or not this defendant was present at the time the notes in suit were indorsed by John Slatter." To this question an objection was interposed and sustained, on the ground that it related to a transaction with a deceased person. This ruling was plainly erroneous. The testimony was important, as it tended directly to contradict the testimony of the respondent previously given, and by no possible rule of construction can it be held that the testimony offered related to a statement made by or transaction had with the deceased. Nor was the error cured by the following testimony admitted before the respondent had testified: "Q. I will ask you who was present at the time John Slatter signed his name on these notes. A. Myself, John Slatter, Charles Graves, and James O'Connor." By a process of elimination the jury might determine from this answer that the respondent was not present, but the testimony did not have the force or effect of a direct denial that she was present after she had testified in her own behalf. The appellant was further asked whether the notes had been changed since he received them from the deceased. This in our opinion was an indirect way of asking what their condition was when received from the hands of the deceased, and was a palpable attempt to evade the statute. The objection was therefore properly sustained.

It is contended that other testimony was excluded tending to show statements made by the respondent and transactions had with her and not with the deceased, but what we have said will be a sufficient guide for the court on a retrial.

The court charged the jury as follows: "In order to complete the title—to transfer the title—it was necessary that the person holding the note must place his name upon the back of it and deliver it to the purchaser." The giving of this instruction is assigned as error. The instruction is at least ambiguous. No doubt a promissory note may be transferred without indorsement, the same as any other article of personal property, either under our statute (Laws 1899, § 49, p. 349, c. 149) or independent of statute. At the same time there is or may be a vast difference between the rights of the parties under a transfer made with or without indorsement. The question of the liability of an indorser was not involved in this case, however, and we are unable to say that the instruction was prejudicial. If the appellant desired a more specific instruction on the question of the necessity for or purpose of an indorsement, he should have requested it.

The appellant finally contends that inconsistent defenses were interposed. The issues in the case are well summarized in the respondent's brief as follows: "Appellant sued the respondent as the administratrix of an estate upon a written contract of guaranty, wherein he alleges that the deceased in his lifetime guaranteed in writing the payment of certain promissory notes, which he sets out in full by signing a written guaranty indorsed on the back of said notes. The respondent answers, admitting the execution of the notes and that he indorsed them in blank and delivered them to the appellant, but denies that the contract of guaranty was upon the notes at the time he indorsed them. Respondent then alleges fraud as an affirmative defense, by setting forth the following facts: That the deceased in his lifetime was the owner of a sum of money which he delivered to the appellant as his agent, and that appellant, as such agent, agreed to loan said money for deceased, upon good real estate security and take properly executed notes and mortgages therefor so that deceased's money would be well secured; that the deceased was a man of no education and experience with business methods, especially loaning money; that appellant was a banker and shrewd business man, and agreed with the deceased that he would loan his money for him upon good real estate security, and that deceased fully trusted the appellant and relied implicitly upon the honor and ability of the said appellant in all their transactions; that appellant, shortly after he had received the decedent's money to loan, gave to decedent the promissory notes mentioned in appellant's complaint, which were made payable to decedent, and then and there informed him that said notes were well secured by real estate mortgages upon farm lands in Lincoln county, and that said decedent, believing the statements of appellant to be true and relying upon them, accepted said notes from appellant; that after said notes had been delivered to said decedent said appellant sold to said decedent certain real estate, and as a part payment therefor decedent indorsed in blank and delivered to appellant all of said notes except the note mentioned in appellant's first cause of action, and that, at the time decedent indorsed said notes in blank and delivered them to appellant, appellant informed decedent that, by indorsing his name in blank on said notes, he was merely transferring his interest in said notes to appellant, and was incurring no liability thereon; that, at the time decedent indorsed said notes, he believed that said notes were secured by good real estate mortgages, and that the indorsement of decedent upon said notes was procured by appellant with a fraudulent design of holding decedent responsible therefor; that decedent never knew during his lifetime that said notes were not secured by good real estate mortgages; that, in truth and fact, none of said promissory notes were secured by mortgages of any kind, and that said appellant did not, in fact, loan said decedent's money, but that appellant, who was then booming the town of Downs, contracted to sell the makers of said notes certain real estate in Downs for exorbitant and unreasonable prices, taking a small cash payment, which he put in his pocket, and then accepted these notes in lieu of the balance of said purchase price, which notes he turned over to decedent in lieu of decedent's money which he had agreed to loan as aforesaid for decedent, the appellant at all times holding the title to said real estate which he had agreed to sell as aforesaid in his own name, and said contracts of sale being oral contracts entered into by appellant and the makers of said notes, and that appellant thereby appropriated decedent's money to his own use; that some time after said notes had been delivered to appellant and indorsed in blank by decedent the appellant by means of a stamp placed a printed guaranty above the name of the decedent; that the promissory note mentioned in appellant's first cause of action was delivered to appellant for collection, appellant informing said decedent at the time he received said note for collection that it was necessary for decedent to indorse his name on the back thereof in order that he could collect the same for decedent; and that thereafter appellant wrongfully placed the stamp of guaranty above his signature and claimed to be the owner thereof."

We cannot say that these defenses are inconsistent, but it seems to us that the affirmative matter adds nothing to the previous denials. The action was brought on a written guaranty, and, if there was no such guaranty, the action must fail. The affirmative matter was not set forth as a basis for affirmative relief, and the fact that the appellant obtained a blank indorsement from the deceased by fraudulent means, or the fact that the appellant had perpetrated some previous fraud on the deceased, would seem utterly immaterial. In other words, if the guaranty set forth in the complaint was never executed, any different transaction between the parties as a matter of pleadings was irrelevant. The fraud alleged was not connected with the contract in suit. Puget Sound Nav. Co. v. Worthington, 2 Wash. T. 472. 7 Pac. 882, 886; Trumbull v. Jackman, 9 Wash. 524, 37 Pac. 680; Williams v. Ninemire, 23 Wash. 400, 63 Pac. 534; Peterson v. Seattle Traction Co., 23 Wash. 615, 63 Pac. 539, 65 Pac. 543, 58 L. R. A. 586.

For the error in excluding testimony and submitting the affirmative defense to the jury, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

W. P. FULLER & CO. v. HARRIS et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 21, 1908.)

1. SALES — ACTION FOR PRICE — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the price of shellac, defendants claimed damages for breach of warranty of quality, and claimed that they did not know of the inferior quality until after they had used the shellac on furniture; and plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that a sample of the shellac taken immediately before shipment had shown it to be first-class. Held, that there was no error in permitting plaintiff to show that he had sold to defendants an inferior grade of glue, and that, if used in preparing the furniture for finish, such glue would have produced the conditions of which defendants complained and which they attributed to the inferior quality of the shellac.

2. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

The court instructed that if the jury believed that defendants delayed asserting any claim against plaintiff until after plaintiff had commenced suit, and defendants had knowledge of the defect in the shellac for a long time prior thereto, they might regard defendants' failure to assert their claim as a circumstance against the good faith thereof. Another instruction was to the effect that the purchaser of an article purchased under a warranty is under no obligation to return the same on discovery of breach of the warranty, but that he may affirm the contract, retain the goods, and recover his damages in an action brought by the seller. Held, that the first instruction was not prejudicial error, on the theory that it advised the jury that delay by defendants in asserting their claim would necessarily deprive them of the right to claim damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 703-718.]

3. SALES—ACTION FOR PRICE—COUNTERCLAIM FOR BREACH OF WARRANTY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where purchasers obtained a credit on the account for the goods sold, and obtained an extension of time for payment, and presented no claim for breach of warranty of quality until they filed their answer in an action for the price, such facts should be considered by the jury on the question as to defendants' good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Boyd J. Tallman, Judge.

Action by W. P. Fuller & Co. against Emmet Harris and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles P. Harris and Bamford A. Robb, for appellants. Gray & Stern and Jas. A. Snoddy, for respondent.

CROW, J. This action was brought by W. P. Fuller & Co., a corporation, to recover $240.98 from the defendants, Emmet Harris and T. P. Keeney, copartners as Harris-Keeney Company, for certain goods sold and delivered, including one barrel of powdered white shellac, of the alleged value of $180.08. The defendants admitted the purchase, but for an affirmative defense alleged that the shellac was impure, adulterated, and worthless; that it was purchased by them with plaintiff's knowledge; that it was intended for use in finishing furniture; that plaintiff warranted it as fit for such use; that defendants could obtain no other shellac at Hongkong, China, where their furniture factory was located; that before they discovered the worthlessness of the shellac they had used about one-half of it in finishing large quantities of furniture, which appeared to be in good and merchantable condition when finished; that after the furniture had been shipped to defendants' customers the shellac finish flaked and fell off; that their customers refused to receive the consignments; and that the defendants were thereby damaged in the total sum of $3,000, for which they asked judgment. The only issue was as to the quality of the shellac and the alleged damages. It appears from undisputed evidence that no claim for damages was presented to the plaintiff until the answer was served herein. The goods were sold August 9, 1904; this action was commenced November 28, 1905; and the defendants answered on February 28, 1906. The original agreed purchase price for the goods sold was $251.58; but the plaintiff alleged that the defendants became entitled to an allowance of $10.60 on account, which was made on January 25, 1905. The undisputed evidence shows that this allowance was made at the time alleged in settlement of some claim for a reduction presented by the defendants, but that no damages were then mentioned. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that, when the $10.60 credit was allowed, the defendants asked for an extension of time on the remainder of the account, which was granted. On a jury trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon this appeal has been taken.

The appellants, in presenting their defense, offered evidence showing that it was their custom, before applying the shellac finish, to treat the furniture with a preparation made with glue. They also introduced the depositions of their customers to whom furniture had been shipped, showing the inferior quality of finish. There is much doubt whether any of this evidence indicated that the defective finish resulted from the use of inferior or adulterated shellac. After this evidence had been admitted, the respondent introduced a witness, who over appellants' objection was permitted to testify that he had, at appellants' request, sold for respondent and delivered to them an inferior quality of glue, which, if used in preparing the furniture for finish, would produce the conditions to which appellants' customers had testified. The trial court afterwards denied appellants' motion to strike this evidence, and refused to instruct the jury to disregard the same. Appellants now claim that prejudicial error was thereby committed. Appellants introduced no direct evidence showing that the shellac shipped by respondent was of an inferior or worthless quality. In fact, they excuse themselves for using it in finishing a large amount of furniture by claiming they did not then know it to be worthless, but supposed it to be as warranted. The principal facts upon which they now predicate their claim that it was worthless are that they used it in finishing and that the finish afterwards flaked and fell off. Respondent's witnesses positively testified that a sample of the shellac taken from the barrel immediately before shipment had been examined and found to be first-class in every respect. Under the issues, and these circumstances, we fail to understand how any prejudicial error was committed by permitting respondent to show the sale of the inferior glue shipped to appellants at their request, as it tended to show that appellants had an opportunity to use it in preparing the furniture, and it was contended that such use was improper. There was no witness corroborating the evidence of one of the defendants, who was the only person testifying to the method of using the glue and shellac in finishing. His credibility was for the jury, and in passing thereon and in weighing his evidence it was proper for the jury to know and understand all the attendant circumstances.

The appellants further contend that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants delayed asserting any claim against the plaintiffs until after the plaintiffs had commenced suit, and that defendants had knowledge of the defect in the shellac for a long time prior, then you may regard defendants' failure to assert such claim as a circumstance against the good faith of defendants' claim." This instruction as worded is perhaps not entitled to an unqualified approval. There is no doubt but that an unreasonable delay in presenting appellants' claim for damages, when, as here contended, they had obtained an item of credit and asked further time for payment, should be considered by the jury in passing upon their good faith or lack of good faith. The language used by the court, in the absence of any further instructions, might have possibly misled the jury into understanding that such unexplained delay amounted to a waiver of appellants' right to recover damages; and the question now before us is whether the instruction, in view of the entire record, constituted prejudicial error. In Elliott v. Puget Sound, etc., S. S. Co., 22 Wash. 220, 60 Pac. 410, cited by the appellants, it was in substance held that a vendee's failure to make a claim for damages on account of the defective condition of goods sold until after the dates of all items of the account, and after payments had been made thereon, was not such a showing of lack of good faith as to necessarily deprive the vendee of his right to afterwards plead, prove, and recover damages in an action for the purchase price. "If a warranty has been proved, keeping the goods, delaying to give notice of the defect, etc., may furnish a strong presumption against an alleged breach of warranty, but cannot bar the buyer from suing for or recouping his damages for such breach, if proved." Abbott's Trial Evidence (2d Ed.) c. 16, § 84. The instruction above set forth does not in this case go to the extent of advising the jury that appellants would by such delay necessarily deprive themselves of the right to claim damages. It is not shown that they requested any instruction on this subject, or that they asked the court to modify or explain the instruction given. The evidence that such delay did occur, and that the damages were first claimed in the answer, was undisputed. Yet the court further instructed as follows: "The purchaser of an article purchased under a warranty is under no obligation to return the same on discovery of breach of a warranty but may affirm the contract, retain the goods, and recover his damages arising from the breach of warranty in an action brought by the seller for the purchase price, if any such damages he has sustained." On this record we fail to see how the jury could have been misled, or that any prejudicial error was committed.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPOKANE INTERURBAN RY. CO. v. CONNELLY.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 19, 1908.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—NOTICE—SERVICE.

In condemnation proceedings the validity of the service of notice depends upon whether personal service was actually made by a qualified person, and not upon the filing of an affidavit making proof thereof, in strict compliance with the statute.

2. SAME — SUPPLEMENTARY PROOF OF SERVICE.

In condemnation proceedings, where the record contained an affidavit of proof of personal service of the notice and copy of petition on defendant, which affidavit was defective, because it did not aver that the person making the service was at the time over 21 years of age, the court could in its discretion permit plaintiff to file a supplemental affidavit remedying the defect after the entry of judgments decreeing a public use, awarding damages, and appropriating the land.

3. SAME—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5638, providing that in condemnation proceedings due proof of service shall be filed with the clerk of the superior court before or at the time of the presentation of the petition, is directory only, and the failure to comply therewith does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, where legal service has actually been made by a competent person, since the court's jurisdiction depends upon actual service made, and not upon the act of filing proof of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Proceedings by the Spokane Interurban Railway Company against Edward Connelly to condemn a right of way. After the entry of judgments decreeing a public use, awarding damages, etc., defendant's motion to quash the notice and set aside the judgments because no proper service had been made, was overruled, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. F. Quinn, for appellant. Hamblen, Lund & Gilbert, for respondent.

CROW, J. The Spokane Interurban Railway Company, a corporation, commenced this action to condemn a right of way over land of the defendant, Edward Connelly. After the entry of judgments decreeing a public use, awarding damages, and appropriating the land, the defendant appeared specially, and moved the court to quash the notice and set aside the judgments, for the reason that no proper service had been made, that no proof thereof had been filed, and that the court had not obtained jurisdiction. Thereupon the plaintiff moved for leave to file an amended or supplemental affidavit showing legal service on the defendant. The trial court overruled the defendant's motion to quash, but granted plaintiff's motion for filing a supplemental affidavit. The defendant has appealed.

It is not contended by the appellant that he had not been actually served with a copy of the original notice which was properly filed, although no proof of service was attached thereto. The decree adjudging a public use, which was entered on December 24, 1906, recited that personal service of the notice and a copy of the petition had been made on the appellant in Spokane county, as required by law, and on January 19, 1907, the final decree of appropriation was entered. The appellant's motion to quash was made February 9, 1907, and on February 14, 1907, the following proof of service was filed: "R. H. Macartney, being first duly sworn upon oath, deposes and says that he is a citizen of the United States, over the age of 21 years, competent to be a witness in the above-entitled action, and is not interested therein; that on the 14th day of December, 1906, he served the petition and notice in the above-entitled action upon Edward Connelly, the above-named defendant, by delivering to and leaving with the said defendant in Spokane county, Wash., a true and correct copy of the original petition and notice in said cause." This affidavit was made December 16, 1906, and fixes the date of service as December 14, 1906.

Appellant now contends the service was void, citing French v. Ajax Oil & Development Company, 44 Wash. 305, 87 Pac. 359. In that case we said: "It is the contention of the appellant that due service was not made in this case, for the reason that it does not appear from the affidavit of Allen that he was 21 years old at the time the service was made, the affidavit going only to the extent that he was 21 years old at the time he made his affidavit, viz., on the 27th day of December, 1905, the service having been made on December 2, 1905. Technical as this may appear, this objection is sustained by authority, and literally, there is no proof or showing that the summons was served by a person who was competent under the law to serve it." The objection certainly is a technical one. The vital question is whether personal service was actually made by a qualified person, and not whether an affidavit was filed making proof thereof in strict compliance with the statute. The respondent in this case supplemented the record with an affidavit showing that Mr. Macartney was over 21 years of age when he made the service, and the trial court properly exercised its discretion in permitting respondent to file such supplemental proof. In State ex rel. Thomas v. Superior Court, 42 Wash. 521, 85 Pac. 256, a condemnation proceeding, this court, in passing on a similar objection, interposed to a proof of service, said: "There are two affidavits making proof of service. In the first it affirmatively appears that copies of the petition and summons were left with each of said relators. The second affidavit was made to show that the party who made the service was qualified. These two affidavits are sufficient proof of a valid service, none of their statements being denied by the relators."

Substantially the same conditions are now before us, and we hold the service and amended proof thereof sufficient. The appellant cites section 5638, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. (section 5103, Pierce's Code), and contends that the trial court had no jurisdiction of his person or the subject-matter of the action when the several orders and decrees were made and entered, as no proper affidavit or proof of service had then been filed. Although the section cited provides that due proof of service shall be filed with the clerk of the superior court before or at the time of the presentation of the petition, we hold that failure to make such prior filing will not deprive the court of jurisdiction where legal service has actually been made by a competent and qualified person; the provision above mentioned being directory rather than mandatory. We reach this conclusion from the language immediately following, to wit: "Want of service of such notice shall render the subsequent proceedings void as to the person not served; but all persons or parties having been served with notice as herein provided, either by publication or otherwise, shall be bound by the subsequent proceedings." This language clearly indicates that jurisdiction to enter valid orders and decrees depends upon actual service made, and not upon the act of filing proof of the same. If appellant had attempted to show that he had not been served, or if the respondent had thereafter failed to supplement its proof by showing that the party who made the service was qualified, there might be some merit in appellant's contentions.

The record before us shows that the trial court had jurisdiction, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

PORTLAND & S. RY. CO. v. CLARKE COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 18, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE — MAPS.

Where, in a proceeding to condemn land for a railroad right of way, there is no dispute in the evidence as to the exact location of the railroad line on the ground, or of the amount of land sought to be appropriated, maps shown to be an accurate description of the location of the road as laid out on the land are admissible as illustrative of the testimony of the witnesses, though not made by the persons who made the surveys on the ground.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 1500-1508.]

2. HIGHWAYS—ESTABLISHMENT BY USE.

Where there is no dispute as to the existence of a road, it is immaterial whether its establishment was by dedication or by user, or that in certain places changes have been made by necessity; the road sometimes becoming flooded or filled by debris.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Highways, §§ 17-20, 222-225.]

8. TRIAL—CONSISTENCY OF INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Instructions must all be construed together, and, if consistent when so construed, error cannot be based on their inconsistency.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Trial, §§ 703-718.]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN — DAMAGES — INSTRUCTIONS.

In proceedings to condemn a railroad right of way across the premises of a stone quarry, where defendant claimed that damage would result from the operation of the railroad because blasting would be interfered with and greater care required to prevent injury to trains, and it appeared that a highway existed between the proposed railroad and the quarry, an instruction that there is no evidence that the highway affected or depreciated the value of defendant's land was properly refused.

5. SAME—ADEQUACY OF DAMAGES—REVIEW.

The question of damages on condemning land being one for the jury, a judgment will not be reversed as inadequate where the verdict was based on all the evidence, a view of the premises, and proper instructions, a new trial was denied by the judge who heard the case, and substantial justice seems to have been done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, §§ 681-685.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. W. McCredie, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Portland & Seattle Railway Company against Clarke county, the Columbia Contract Company, and another. From the judgment rendered, the Columbia Contract Company appeals. Affirmed.

Teal & Minor and Donald McMaster, for appellant. A. L. Miller and James B. Kerr, for respondent.

MOUNT, J. This appeal is from an award of damages in condemnation. The respondent condemned a right of way for railway purposes across certain lands of the appellant. The question of damages was tried to the court and a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of the appellant for $15,000. The strip of land taken lies along the north bank of the Columbia river, between the river and a steep bluff. The appellant for several years last past has operated a stone quarry along the face of the bluff. The stone was carried from the bluff to the river by means of tramways. The right of way of the railway company lies between the bluff and the river. A public road passes over the appellant's premises between the bluff and the river, crossing the right of way near the west end of the premises and paralleling the right of way on the side next to the bluff, until near the east end, where the road comes in contact with the right of way, and from there on is included within the right of way. The tramways above mentioned cross the right of way and the wagon road on trestles built sufficiently high so as not to interfere with either the roadway or the operation of the railway trains. Appellant alleges that the court erred in receiving in evidence certain maps similar to those in the case of Portland & Seattle Railway Company v. Ladd (Wash.) 91 Pac. 573. The point made in this case is identical with the one made there. For the reasons there stated, it was not error for the court to receive these maps in evidence.

At the request of the respondent, the court instructed the jury as follows: "A public road may be established in this state by user. It is the law of this state that any road or highway which has been continuously, openly, notoriously, and adversely used as a public road or highway by the general public under a claim of right for 10 years, where the same has been worked and kept up at the expense of the public, is a lawful road or highway, and the public has a right to pass to and from thereon. If you find from the evidence that a public road exists below the quarries referred to in the evidence, you are entitled to take that fact into consideration in determining the damages which will be sustained by the claimants by the taking of a strip of land which is necessary for the railroad right of way. No owner of land adjoining a public highway has a right to interfere with public travel upon such highway. If, therefore, you find that a public highway exists below the quarries in question, you may consider whether the taking of a right of way by the railroad company will interfere with the manner in which the claimant is now entitled to operate its stone quarries. Where a public road or highway exists, and slight changes have been made in portions thereof, the remainder of such road still continues to be a public road or highway and the rights are the same therein as if such changes had not been made, provided, of course, the travel is substantially the same as before the making of such changes. You are instructed that when a public road or highway has been established, either by user or otherwise, it remains such public road until vacated according to law, or until abandoned for the time fixed by the statute, and no person has a right to change such road unless such change is directed or consented to by the authorities having charge of such road." At the request of the appellant, the court charged the jury as follows: "If you find that a highway or county road has been established over the claimant's lands, the claimants as the owners of said lands have, notwithstanding the establishment of the highway or county road, the exclusive right to the soil, subject only to the easement of the right of passage in the public and the incidental right of properly fitting the highway or county road for public use. Subject only to the easement or right of passage, and the incidental right of properly fitting the highway or county road for use, which is vested in the public, the proprietor of the soil, the claimants in this case, has all the usual rights and remedies of the owner of the freehold. The owner of lands abutting upon a highway or county road, such as the claimant in this proceeding has the right to sink drains and put in subways, carry pipes, and use the soil of such highway or county road for any lawful purpose, so long as he shall maintain the surface so that it may be safe and convenient for the passage of the public. The owner of lands abutting on a highway or county road, such as the claimants in this proceeding, may also build overhead crossings, tramways, and bridges over the highway or county road, and maintain and use the same for any lawful purpose so long as the same do not render the passage of the public on such highway or county road unsafe or inconvenient. The owner of lands abutting on a highway or county road such as the claimants in this proceeding may use the highway or county road for the purpose of loading and unloading goods, merchandise, and other things bought for use or for sale on his lands, and for the purpose of loading the produce of his lands, or bullding or other materials thereon, or of taking the same therefrom, so long as he does not use the highway or county road for such purposes for an unreasonable time, and so long as such use is temporary, and he does not obstruct the highway or county road for an unreasonable period. He may even temporarily encroach upon the highway or county road for such purpose, and the use of the highway or county road by the public for travel may be temporarily interfered with by him in this way, but such use must be temporary and reasonable. The owner of lands abutting on a highway or county road, such as the claimants in this proceeding, may blast stone and other substances on his lands in close proximity to such highway or county road, or fell timber on his said lands, even though some stone or material may be thrown upon the highway or county road; but he must restore the highway or county road with reasonable dispatch, and remove the stone or material thrown thereon, and not permit the public travel to be unreasonably interfered with thereby. If you find from the evidence that the public has traveled over the land described in the petition for years, I charge you that such use in law establishes a highway or county road over said lands, even though there has been no dedication or appropriation of the lands for this purpose, but the public's right to a highway or county road established by user in this way and for such period, the width of the highway and the extent of the servitude or public right to use the same, is limited to the ground so used and the character of the user." The appellant also requested the court to charge the jury upon this subject as follows: "I charge you that there is no evidence in this case from which you may find that any of the lands of the claimants described in the petition have been dedicated to or appropriated by the public for use as a public highway or county road. I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that there has been no evidence introduced in this cause tending to show that the wagon road over the lands of claimant does in any way affect or depreciate the value of the property in question, whether said road is or is not a county road or public highway." It is argued, first, that the court should have told the jury that whatever rights the public have in the highway are based wholly upon user and not dedication by the owner, for the reason that the evidence clearly shows that fact. We are inclined to agree that the evidence shows clearly the establishment of a highway by user for nearly 50 years; the only difference among the witnesses being that in certain places changes have been made by reason of necessity, the road sometimes becoming flooded or filled by debris or rock placed in the road by the operation of the stone quarry by the agents of the appellant. There seems to have been no dispute that the wagon road was there. Whether it was established by user or by dedication could therefore make no difference. "The fact of the existence of a public highway may be established by any competent evidence, and there is no distinction in the validity of either method of the establishment of a public highway in this state." State v. Horlacher, 16 Wash. 325, 47 Pac. 748. Appellant also argues that the instructions given are inconsistent with each other. It is true the court told the jury that "no owner of land adjoining a public highway has a right to interfere with public travel upon such highway," and thereafter that "the owner of lands abutting upon a highway * * * may use the highway * * * for the purpose of loading and unloading goods * * * so long as such use is temporary, * * * but such use must be temporary and reasonable," etc. These instructions must all be construed together, and, so construed, we think they are not subject to the criticism that they are inconsistent. If any error is shown, it is not error prejudicial to the appellant.

It is next argued that the court should have instructed the jury that there was no evidence that the wagon road over the appellant's lands affected or depreciated the value of the lands. We think it was not error to refuse this instruction, because the appellant claimed at the trial that great damage would result by the construction of the railway, for the reason that blasting operations would be largely interfered with, and much greater care would be required to prevent stone from injuring trains and the railway. The wagon road which lies between the railway and the quarry would, of course, necessitate some care to prevent injury to travelers, and would tend for that reason to lessen the value of the property as a quarry. The jury certainly had a right to consider this fact so as not to charge against the railway the whole expense of extraordinary care in the operation of blasting or in the operation of the stone quarry. There were other reasons of a like nature, but the one just stated justified the court in refusing the requested instruction.

Appellant next argues that the verdict was too small. There was great diversity of opinion among the many witnesses as to the amount of damages caused by the taking of the right of way and the construction of the railway. The question was properly one for the jury. The jury heard all the evidence, viewed the premises, and was properly instructed as to the measure of damages. The trial judge accompanied the jury upon the view, heard all the evidence, and was familiar with all the facts in the case, and, after verdict, denied a motion for new trial. After reading the record, we are satisfied that the verdict returned is not too small, but that it does substantial justice between the parties.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

WHITEHOUSE v. COWLES et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 26, 1908.)

1. LIBEL—COMPLAINT.

A complaint against C. and a company alleged that, in a paper published by them, they published of plaintiff an article to the effect that he secured a license for marriage to R., but that he does not know where she is, that mysterious circumstances have intervened to prevent the marriage, that he refuses to explain, that efforts to locate her to obtain her version were unsuccessful, that he tried to prevent publication of the license, and that he said he did not know who R. was. There was no direct allegation that any of the statements were untrue, and nothing to show that defendant C. had anything to do personally with, or any knowledge of, the publication of the article. Held that, the article not being libelous per se, and there being no inducement, colloquium, or innuendo pleaded, a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, §§ 181-197.]

2. SAME—NOTICE TO PUBLISHER BEFORE ACTION—EVIDENCE.

Laws 1899, p. 101, c. 59, providing that, before an action for libel, the aggrieved party shall serve notice on the publisher or publishers, specifying the statements alleged to be false and defamatory, is not shown to have been complied with, though before the action against C. and the Review Publishing Company, the alleged publishers, such a notice was served on C.: the only evidence to show that he was a publisher or agent of a publisher July 19, 1904, the date of the publication, being two checks, dated December 10, 1904, and March 21, 1905, and a contract, dated May 19, 1904, the checks being signed "R. Pub. Co., C., Publisher," and the contract being signed "R. Pub. Co., C., Publisher, by Y., Business Manager," they, in view of their remoteness in time, and the rule against proving agency by declarations of the agent, being incompetent as primary evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Geo. A. Joiner, Judge.

Action by M. H. Whitehouse against W. H. Cowles and the Review Publishing Company. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals Affirmed.

Willis H. Merriam and A. G. Gray, for appellant. H. M. Stephens, for respondents.

ROOT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages alleged to have been occasioned by certain matters published in the Spokesman Review, of which defendants are alleged to have been the publishers. From a judgment of dismissal, this appeal is prosecuted.

Two causes of action were set forth in the amended complaint. The first cause of action was based upon the following article published in said newspaper:

"That on the 14th day of July, 1904, at Spokane, county of Spokane, and state of Washington, the defendants published a newspaper called the Spokesman Review; that on said 14th day of July, 1904, the defendants published in said newspaper the following words of and concerning the plaintiff:

"Secured License but No Bride. Matrimonial Plans of Well-Known Spokane Pioneer Fall of Realization. M. H. Whitehouse—Clara Reed. Fifty-Year Old Would-Be Benedict does Not Know Where Prospective Bride is.

"Mysterious unforeseen circumstances have intervened to prevent the contemplated marriage of M. H. Whitehouse, a well-known pioneer citizen of Spokane, to Clara S. Reed. What the circumstances are Mr. Whitehouse declines to explain and diligent efforts to locate the prospective bride in order to ascertain her version of the story have proven unavailing.

"Mr. Whitehouse secured the license at the office of the county auditor last Saturday. He appeared at the office about the hour of closing and by arrangement with Auditor Stewart, planned to have the license issued to him, recorded after the office had been closed and kept from the public and the press until Monday morning. Mr. Stewart signed the application for the license as witness identifying the prospective bridegroom and certifying that the prospective bride is of marriageable age. Monday Mr. Whitehouse appeared at the county auditor's office again to ascertain whether the fact that the license had been issued could not be withheld from the public and upon ascertaining that it could not be arranged with the auditor's office again set out in search of the reporters with a view of urging them to withhold the publication.

"Whatever the reason the marriage has not occurred. Mr. Whitehouse when seen last night at his place of business at 1025 Sprague Ave., said: "I am not married and there appears no immediate prospect that I shall be. Further than this I have nothing to say."

"Who is Clara E. Reed, the woman in the case?" he was asked. "I do not know who she is, nor where she is. In fact I know nothing about her. I have nothing to report. When there is anything to report, I will let you know." In the application for the marriage license Mr. Whitehouse gave his age as 50 years and that of his prospective bride 37. Mr. Whitehouse has lived in Spokane for a number of years and makes his home at E. 2103 Fourth Ave. He is engaged in the millinery business on Sprague Ave. near Lincoln street."

There is no direct allegation that any one of these statements is untrue, and only by inference or implication does it appear that any portion is untrue. There is nothing to show that respondent Cowles had any knowledge of the publication of the article, or had anything to do personally therewith. A demurrer to this cause of action was sustained by the trial court. We do not think that the language of the published article constitutes a libel per se, and there is no inducement, colloquium, or innuendo pleaded. The ruling of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the first cause of action must be sustained.

The defendants interposed an answer to the second cause of action. A motion to strike a portion of this answer was made by plaintiff, and denied by the trial court. Plaintiff then demurred to the answer, but his demurrer was overruled. These rulings are assigned as error; but it is unnecessary for us to pass upon them by reason of our conclusion relative to another question in the case. The statute (Laws 1899, p. 101, c. 59) provides that, before any action for libel shall be brought, the aggrieved party shall serve notice on the publisher or publishers of the newspaper specifying the statements in said article which such party alleges to be false and defamatory. Such a notice was served upon Cowles: but at the trial there was no competent evidence to prove that he was the publisher of the paper on the 19th of July, 1904, the date when the offending article appeared. The proof offered to establish this fact consisted of two checks, dated, respectively, December 10, 1904, and March 21, 1905, and a contract, dated May 19, 1904; the checks being signed, "The Review Publishing Company, W. H. Cowles, Publisher," and the contract being signed, "The Review Publishing Company, W. H. Cowles, Publisher, by J. F. Young, Business Manager." It will be noticed that the dates of these instruments are considerably removed from that upon which the article in question was published, that none of them bears the signature of the respondent company, and that in the contract the name of Cowles appears to have been signed by another. In the light of these facts, and the rule of law against proving agency by the declarations of an alleged agent, it must readily appear that the proffered documents were, as primary evidence, incompetent. This was the view of the trial judge, who directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, and upon which the judgment of dismissal was entered.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

McCLELLAN v. GERRICK et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 24, 1908.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where plaintiff was employed by the owner of a building under construction to inspect the steel work as it was completed by the subcontractor, and, on being advised of the completion of a portion thereof, went on the building and was injured by reason of one of the beams not being riveted, which was fairly obvious on inspection, he may not recover against the subcontractor, since he was employed to detect defects in the work, and assumed the risk of the employment.

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover for injuries received while inspecting a building by falling from a beam which was not riveted, evidence examined, and held to show that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe that the beam was not riveted before going on it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 274-276.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; A. W. Frater, Judge.

Action by Alexander McClellan against John Gerrick and Joseph Gerrick, copartners. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter S. Fulton, for appellant. Kerr & McCord, for respondent.

MOUNT, J. This appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for personal injuries. At the time of appellant's injuries Herman Chapin was erecting a large building in the city of Seattle. Matthew Dow had the contract for the work. The respondents Gerrick & Gerrick were subcontractors, having to erect the steel construction work of the building; the material therefor being furnished by the owner ready to put in place. The appellant was in the employ of the owner and the principal contractor. His duties were to inspect the work of Gerrick & Gerrick, to see that all of the material was properly placed and securely riveted and the structure plumb, and that the work, when completed, was in accordance with the plans and specifications. On August 14, 1906, appellant noticed that the gang of riveters employed by Gerrick & Gerrick had been sent away, and, on inquiry, was informed by John Gerrick, one of the respondents, that the reason therefor was that all of the steel work was in place, and that the riveting was all finished excepting a portion under the derick, and that the work was in condition to be inspected. Two days later the appellant went upon the building for the purpose of making an inspection. When going from one part to another, he attempted to walk across an I-beam, 6 inches deep, about $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide on top, and about 12 feet long. This beam was not riveted. A temporary bolt was in one end and the other end lay loose upon a lug. It was not fastened either by bolt or rivet. When appellant walked to about the center of the beam, it dropped down at the unfastened end, and let the appellant fall a distance of about 35 feet. He was severely injured. The respondents Gerrick & Gerrick knew of the condition of this beam, but did not inform the appellant thereof. The appellant's evidence shows that it was the duty of respondents Gerrick & Gerrick, immediately after the work was riveted, to paint the steel work, and this beam was not painted; that appellant's first duty upon inspection was to plumb the work, and to do this it was necessary for him to cross over from one part of the structure to another on these I-beams; that he relied upon the statement of respondent that the work was completed, and did not notice the condition of this particular beam before he went upon it. Upon substantially these facts the trial court granted the defendants' motion for a nonsuit. The action was thereupon dismissed. Matthew Dow and Herman Chapin, who were originally made parties defendant, were dismissed upon motion of the plaintiff before the trial began.

It is contended by the respondents that the appellant was not in their employ, and that, therefore, they owed him no duty. We shall not pass upon this question, because we are clearly of the opinion that the appellant assumed the risk, and was also guilty of contributory negligence, even though respondents Gerrick & Gerrick had employed him. The appellant himself testified that he was employed as an inspector of the building; that it was his duty to carefully and critically examine every part of the work, and to see that every piece of material was in place and properly riveted; that this was his sole duty; and that he was constantly on the building for that purpose. It was therefore his duty to discover this defect which caused his injury. He was employed and was there for that purpose. The defect was not a hidden one. It was obvious and apparent to a casual inspection. Upon this subject he testified: "The heads of the rivets were one inch wide. * * * If I had stopped and looked down, I could have seen whether there were any rivets or not. * * * I was not looking for rivets. * * * If I had looked, I would have seen the work was not complete, and would then have examined it carefully." This conclusively shows that, if the appellant had used ordinary diligence, he would have avoided the injury. He seeks to excuse his neglect by saying that he was required to plumb the work before he examined for defects in riveting; that he had been notified that the work was completed, except a certain specified portion. Assuming these facts to be true, they do not excuse the carelessness of appellant, because ordinary prudence dictates that, before a man should attempt to walk across a beam $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide—no wider than his shoe sole—12 feet long, and which was 35 feet from the ground, he should at least look and see that the beam is fastened in place. He could have seen the beam was insecure by simply looking. This he failed to do. His failure to use his senses was therefore the proximate cause of his injury. When, in addition to this, it is conceded that he was employed to inspect and discover defects of this kind, it is plainly evident that respondents are not liable.

The trial court therefore properly granted the motion, and the judgment must be affirmed.

WARING v. LOOMIS et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 26, 1908.)

PUBLIC LANDS—SURVEY AND DISPOSAL—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS—PRESUMPTION OF LEGALITY.

Where plaintiff and defendant's grantor, joint occupants of unsurveyed government land, contracted that the latter should occupy the land and pay plaintiff a certain proportion of the annual product, etc., and obtain a patent thereto when it was in the market, for the benefit of plaintiff to the extent of his interest therein, it will not be presumed, in the absence of convincing proof, that the contract contemplated obtaining the patent unlawfully, under the homestead laws, when title could be, and was subsequently obtained lawfully, under the mining laws.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Action by Guy Waring against J. A. Loomis and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for decree as directed.

Graves, Kizer & Graves, for appellant. Merrill, Oswald & Merrill, for respondents.

ROOT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to establish ownership to an undivided one-half interest in certain realty in Okanogan county. From a judgment dismissing the action, he appeals.

In 1888 plaintiff, while in possession of the premises as unsurveyed government land, sold to one J. A. Loomis (since deceased) an undivided one-half interest in and to the improvements upon and rights in the land, and at the same time entered into a copartnership with said Loomis for the purpose of carrying on a general merchandise business. Subsequently the partnership was dissolved, and appellant removed from the land, leaving Loomis in possession under the contract hereinafter set forth. In 1891 Loomis located the land as quartz claims under the United States mineral land laws. In 1896 patents for such land were taken in the name of one Bogart, a brother-in-law of Loomis; he knowing of the contract between appellant and Loomis, and taking the patents as a convenience to the latter. Subsequently the lands were conveyed to respondent Calhoun, who took title with notice of appellant's rights. Appellant and Loomis, knowing or believing that any agreement between them as to the conveyance by one to the other of an interest in land held and to be acquired as a homestead by one of them would be illegal, consulted an attorney as to what they could do in order to make an equitable division of the property, or adjust matters so that Loomis could keep the property and appellant get the value of his equitable interest therein. Upon the advice of the attorney, appellant and Loomis entered into the following agreement, to wit: "Be it known by these presents, that we, J. A. Loomis, of Sinlahekin ranch, near Sinlahekin creek, in the county of Okanogan and territory of Washington, party of the first part, and Guy Waring, late of the same place, party of the second part, being the undivided one-half owners of one hundred and sixty acres of land (subject to the paramount title of the United States), located upon Sinlahekin creek in said county of Okanogan, and known as the Sinlahekin ranch, together with the improvements thereon, and having heretofore been in the joint occupancy thereof, and the said Waring being about to remove therefrom and to leave said Loomis in the sole use, occupation and possession of the same, have agreed and concluded concerning said land and ranch and improvements thereon as follows, viz.: (1) Loomis is to pay Waring in cash money upon the signing of this agreement the sum of two hundred and fourteen ($214.00) dollars, as his part of the expense of erecting the dwelling house lately occupied by said Waring and his family on said ranch. (2) Loomis is to have the sole use, occupation, and possession of said land, ranch and improvements thereon, upon the following terms, viz.: (a) He shall keep all boundary posts in position and in every lawful manner protect the exclusive possession thereof, and prevent said land from being jumped as unoccupied lands of the United States, and when the same are in market will apply for and obtain patent thereto if he can. (b) Loomis is to pay to Waring one-fifth in quantity and quality of hay raised on the ranch each year, delivered on said ranch, and shall have the privilege of buying the same from Waring for cash at any time before the end of the year in which the same was grown at the current price for hay of similar class and quality on December 1st, of such year, and in any event, said Loomis shall take said one-fifth of the hay at the end of the year in which it is grown, and pay Waring therefor in cash money the current price of hay of similar class and quality in that vicinity at the end of such year in which the same is grown. (c) Loomis is hereby authorized at any time to make a bona fide sale of said ranch or any part thereof for the mutual and equal benefit of both parties hereto, and to execute in Waring's name any and all necessary conveyances thereof, and pay the proceeds of such sale, one-half to himself and one-half, less 5 per cent. commission, to Waring forthwith, provided, that if Waring furnishes a purchaser for said ranch, Loomis shall not be entitled to retain any percentage as commission, but in all other respects this paragraph remains the same. (d) Loomis shall have no right to sublet or lease said land or any part thereof to any third person. (e) Loomis hereby acknowledges a trust in favor of said Waring for an undivided one-half interest in the whole of said land, and in the event of his obtaining the paramount title of the United States to said land in his own name he hereby acknowledges an express trust to the extent of one undivided one-half thereof in favor of Guy Waring for the faithful administration of which said express trust he hereby binds his heirs, executors and administrators to the same extent as himself. (f) Waring hereby warrants Loomis in the quiet and peaceable possession of said premises against his own acts and against any and all persons claiming by, through or under him. Witness our hands and seals this 28th day of May, 1888, in duplicate. J. A. Loomis. [Seal.] Guy Waring. [Seal.] In presence of: Thomas C. Griffiths. A. Waltman." To the amended complaint setting forth this contract a demurrer was interposed by defendants and sustained by the trial court. Upon appeal this ruling of said court was reversed. Waring v. Loomis, 35 Wash. 85, 76 Pac. 510. The main contention was that the contract was void because it contemplated obtaining title to government land unlawfully. This court, declining to uphold this contention, said: "There are various ways by which title can be acquired to the public land of the United States, even though it be agricultural in character, only some of which are inconsistent with a contract of this kind. This being the case, it will not be presumed that the parties intended to violate the law. On the contrary, it is a rule of interpretation that, when a contract is open to two constructions by one of which it would be lawful and the other unlawful, the former must be adopted."

It is now urged that the purpose of the parties to this agreement at the time of its making was to acquire the property as a homestead by Loomis, which would necessarily involve fraud and perjury. It is conceded, however, that the title was afterwards obtained from the government honestly and according to law. It is evident that the ultimate purpose of the parties to the contract was to so arrange the matter that each should eventually receive a half interest in the land, or that Loomis should acquire the title thereto to be held subject to appellant's right to a half interest therein. This purpose could be attained by either of two methods—one lawful, the other unlawful. In the light of the agreement, Loomis could not "prove up" upon the land as a homestead without committing perjury. But he could acquire title to the land, or cause it to be acquired, from the government under the "mining laws," and do so legitimately. He did the latter, and no question is made as to the legality of this acquisition. Even if the original intention had been to secure title under the homestead law, we doubt if Loomis or his successors in interest could be heard to urge that fact as a defense at this time, inasmuch as such purpose was not carried out, but abandoned for one that was perfectly lawful. However, we do not think the evidence establishes an intention to acquire the property from the government in an unlawful manner. Both parties knew that the land could not be obtained under the homestead law without fraud and perjury. It was because of this that they consulted an attorney as to how they could arrange the matter. In the absence of clear and convincing evidence, it will not be presumed that the attorney drafted, and they, pursuant to his advice, executed, a contract with the intention of carrying out its terms in a criminal manner when it was susceptible of a lawful performance. Under the pleadings and evidence, we think appellant is entitled to a decree awarding him an undivided one-half interest in and to the property in question.

The judgment and decree of the honorable superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter a decree as above indicated in appellant's favor.

DICKEY et ux. v. MADDUX et ux.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. WATERS—"SPRINGS."

In an action involving an alleged appropriation of certain springs, it appeared that certain so-called "springs" occupied a space of about one-half an acre, and that during a portion of the year about 10 acres was marshy, and a witness testified that the springs rested right on the brow of a drop-off; that there was quite a bit of water standing around in the springs, and it looked like there might be five or six springs; but the evidence showed that there was no stream leading into them, and that the water therefrom formed no channel or stream in leaving, though during a portion of the wet season some of the water would flow down, for a short distance on the side hill, where it would disappear in the soil. Held, that the pools of water were not live springs, and that they constituted nothing more than a bog occasioned by seepage water.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6017.]

2. SAME—APPROPRIATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A territorial statute enacted in 1873 (Laws 1873, p. 520) provided that any person holding a title or possessory right to any agricultural lands within Y. county should be entitled to the use of the waters of the streams in the county for the purpose of irrigation. This law and the common law were in force at the time of an alleged appropriation of certain water in 1883. The land on which the water was situated was a part of a railroad land grant; but plaintiff claimed its right did not attach until 1884, and that plaintiff had a right to appropriate the water under Rev. St. U. S. § 2339 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1437], providing that whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized by local customs, laws, and decisions, the possessors shall be protected in the same. It appeared that the water consisted of mere pools occasioned by seepage, that no stream or channel entered or flowed therefrom, that plaintiff gathered the water by digging a large number of holes and small ditches, and that no channel or flow of the water was obtained other than by this artificial means and by natural percolating and seepage to a small extent. Held, that there was no authority in law for the appropriation of water of that kind prior to the statute of 1891, if at all.

3. SAME—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHTS.

Where plaintiffs, seeking to enjoin taking of water from certain streams, claimed that they have used the water a sufficient length of time since the enactment of the statute of 1891 to give them a prescriptive right thereunder, but had never attempted to comply with the provision of such an act, they could not invoke it in support of their claim.

Rudkin and Fullerton, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kittitas County; H. B. Rigg, Judge.

Action by Ed. V. Dickey and wife against A. L. Maddux and wife. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

J. B. Davidson, for appellants. Hovey & Hale, for respondents.

ROOT, J. This is an action brought by respondents to enjoin appellants from interfering with the taking of water from certain alleged springs situated on the lands of appellants, which water the respondents claim was appropriated by their predecessor in interest in 1883. From a decree in favor of plaintiffs, this appeal is taken by defendants.

It is urged by appellants that the so-called springs are not flowing springs, nor in reality springs at all, and that there is no stream connected therewith; but that they are merely pools of seepage water coming from the side hill, and making a marsh or bog, and not constituting the character of water authorized to be appropriated under the law. It appears that there was about half an acre of these so-called springs, and that during a portion of the year there was a surrounding area of something like 10 acres which was marshy. One witness said: "There was a piece of level ground that goes off to the south and drops very abruptly. These springs rest right in the brow of that little drop-off. There was quite a bit of water standing around in the springs; looked like there might be five or six springs." The evidence showed that there was no stream leading into these springs, and that the water therefrom formed no channel or stream in leaving, although during a portion of the wet season of the year some of the water would flow down (but not in any stream or channel) for a short distance on the side hill, where it would disappear in the soil. A territorial statute enacted in 1873 read as follows: "Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the territory of Washington, that any person or persons, corporation or company who may have or hold a title or possessory right or title to any agricultural lands within the limits of Yakima county, Washington territory, shall be entitled to the use and enjoyment of the waters of the streams or creeks in said county for the purpose of irrigation and making said land valuable for agricultural purposes to the full extent of the soil thereof." Laws 1873, p. 520. This and the common law were in force at the time of the alleged appropriation of this water.

Respondents claim that these springs are surface bodies of water, and that, though their source may be from percolating water, they themselves are situated open to the air, and that they were flowing springs a portion of the year. It is admitted that this land was originally a portion of the Northern Pacific Railway Company's land grant. It is claimed by respondents that the rights of this company did not attach to said lands until December, 1884, and that, under section 2339 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1437], respondents or their predecessors in interest had a right to appropriate this water from these springs prior to said date. An examination of the evidence convinces us that these pools of water were not live springs, and constituted nothing more than a bog occasioned by the seepage water. No stream or channel entered this bog, or flowed therefrom. The respondents and their predecessors gathered this water by digging a large number of holes and small ditches, and it was only by this artificial means that any channel was made or any flow of the water obtained, other than the natural percolating and seepage thereof, and there was but a comparatively small amount of that. We think there was no authority in law for the appropriation of water of this kind prior to the enactment of the state statute of 1891, even if that statute would authorize it—a question not necessary to be now decided.

It is urged by respondents that they have used the water a sufficient length of time since the enactment of the statute of 1891 to give them a prescriptive right thereunder. As they have never complied, nor attempted to comply, with the provisions of the last-mentioned statute, we do not believe they are entitled to invoke it in support of their claim to the use of this water. See Wheelock v. Jacobs, 70 Vt. 162, 40 Atl. 41, 43 L. R. A. 105, 67 Am. St. Rep. 659; Slaght v. U. F.

St. Rep. 874. Farnham on Waters and Water Courses, p. 1561, § 458, says: "Water oozing from a spring through a soft and spongy ground, and flowing into a pond, does not constitute a stream within the meaning of a lease demising the pond of water and the water of the stream leading thereto; and the lessor is not liable for having sunk a tank on the ground adjoining the demised premises, thereby drawing off from the marshy ground such oozing water." KENDALL et ux. v. JOYCE et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 14, 1908.)

1. WATERS—APPROPRIATION—PRIORITIES.

In 1895 plaintiff settled on unsurveyed public lands under the federal homestead laws, and continued to occupy and cultivate his claim until 1903, when he received a patent therefor. Commencing in 1895, he diverted the waters of a stream for irrigation and for domestic use. He increased the amount of his cultivated land from year to year until 1905. He proceeded in good faith and with reasonable diligence to bring his land under cultivation and in applying the waters diverted to beneficial uses. Held, that his rights to the waters of the stream related back to the date of his original appropriation.

2. SAME—NOTICE.

Where one, at a time the law did not authorize it, filed a notice with the auditor of the county reciting that he claimed 500 inches of water from a stream at a certain point and an additional 500 inches at a certain other point, but did not divert the water and apply the same to beneficial uses within a reasonable time, he acquired no rights.

3. SAME—STATUTES—EFFECT.

Laws 1891, p. 327, c. 142, providing that one desiring to appropriate water must post a notice in writing in a conspicuous place at the point of intended storage or diversion, etc., does not change the rule as to what constitutes a valid appropriation, and a valid appropriation may be made by an actual diversion and use of the water, without posting any notice.

4. SAME.

Laws 1889-90, p. 706, § 2, providing that persons holding a possessory right to land abutting on a natural stream shall be entitled to use any water not otherwise appropriated for irrigation, etc., is declaratory of the then existing law that title acquired under a patent from the United States relates back to the date of settlement or filing, but does not authorize a mere squatter on public land, who subsequently sells or abandons his claim, to acquire riparian rights in a stream flowing through the land; riparian rights being a mere incident to ownership in the soil, not vesting until patent issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Okanogan County; R. S. Steiner, Judge.

Action by John Kendall and wife against Bill Joyce and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Taylor, J. W. Graham, and Harold Preston, for appellants. A. W. Barry, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. This was a controversy between two landowners over the right to use the waters of Johnson creek, a small stream flowing into the Okanogan river, in Okanogan county, for irrigation purposes. The rights of the respective parties are predicated upon the following facts: In the year 1895 the plaintiff John Kendall, a citizen of the United States above the age of 21 years, settled upon lots 3, 4, and 5, and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 25, and lot 1 and the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 36, township 35 N., range 26 E. W. M., under the homestead laws of the United States. The lands embraced within the settlement were at that time unsurveyed public lands of the United States. Kendall continued to occupy and cultivate his claim from date of settlement until September 11, 1903, at which time he received a homestead patent therefor. Commencing with the year 1895 he diverted the waters of Johnson creek for the purpose of irrigating his orchard and meadow lands and for stock and domestic purposes. He increased the amount of his cultivated land from year to year until 1905, when he had 55 or 60 acres under irrigation and cultivation. The testimony showed that he proceeded in good faith and with reasonable diligence in bringing his land under cultivation and in applying the waters diverted to beneficial uses. In the year 1887 one Phillip Perkins settled upon lands now owned by the defendants. On the 9th day of October of that year Perkins filed a notice of claim of water right with the county auditor of Okanogan county, claiming 500 inches of water from Johnson creek at a certain point, and an additional 500 inches at a certain other point. He continued to occupy the claim until about the year 1889, when he was succeeded by one Warren Perkins. The latter occupied the claim until 1897, when he was succeeded by William Maretta, and Maretta in turn was succeeded by the defendant Joyce in the year 1899. Joyce has since derived title to the original Perkins claim in part under the homestead law and in part by scripping. Prior to the year 1897 not to exceed 5 or 6 acres of the Joyce lands were irrigated or cultivated. Under these facts the court below awarded to the defendants a prior right to use the waters of the creek to the extent of seven miners' inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, to the plaintiffs one-third of one cubic foot per second of time, subject to the prior right of the defendants to the seven miners' inches, and enjoined the defendants from diverting the waters of the creek to the injury of the plaintiffs. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

Under the facts stated, the respondents having diverted the waters of the creek in 1895 and applied the same to beneficial uses with reasonable diligence, their rights relate back to the date of their original appropriation. Offield v. Ish, 21 Wash. 277, 57 Pac. 809; Longmire v. Smith, 26 Wash. 439, 67 Pac. 246, 58 L. R. A. 808. It is equally apparent that Perkins acquired no rights by filing the notice of claim of water right in 1887. There was then no law authorizing such a notice. The notice was too indefinite to subserve any purpose, and the notice was not followed by a diversion of the water and its application to beneficial uses within a reasonable time. If, therefore, the rights of the parties depend upon the law of prior appropriation, it is manifest that the rights of the respondent are superior to those of the appellants, except as to the quantity of water awarded to the latter by the court below. The appellants contend that the respondents acquired no rights as appropriators by reason of their failure to post and record a notice of their appropriation as required by the act of March, 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 327, c. 142); but "the statutes requiring the posting and recording of a notice are not intended to change the rule as to what constitutes a valid appropriation, but simply, by requiring an appropriator to post and record a notice, to apprise other persons contemplating the diversion of water from the same stream that the appropriator has taken the first step toward securing his rights, and also to preserve the evidence thereof. It is accordingly held that, notwithstanding the existence of these statutes, a valid appropriation may be made by an actual diversion and use of the water without posting any notice. The one who fails to comply with the statute requiring notice, but actually diverts and uses the water, acquires a good title in the absence of any conflicting adverse rights, and cannot be deprived, thereof by another who complies with the statute at a time subsequent to the former's completed diversion. Thus the failure of an actual appropriator of water upon the public domain to post a notice as required by law does not conflict with his right to the water as against one subsequently acquiring the land from the government." 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 498.

The appellants further contend that they acquired certain rights under section 2 of the act of March 4, 1890 (Laws 1890-90, p. 706), as successors in interest of Warren Perkins, who was occupying the land at the date of the passage of that act. The section referred to reads as follows: "All persons who claim, own, or hold a possessory right or title to any land, or parcel of land, within the boundary of the state of Washington, when such lands, or any part of the same, are on the banks of any natural stream of water, shall be entitled to the use of any water of said stream, not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of irrigation to the full extent of the soil for agricultural purposes." This section was simply declaratory of the existing law, viz., that title acquired under a patent from the United States relates back to the date of settlement or filing. Sturr v. Beck, 133 U. S. 541, 10 Sup. Ct. 350, 33 L. Ed. 761. It has never been contended that a mere squatter on public land, who subsequently sells out or abandons his claim, acquires or can acquire riparian rights in a stream flowing through the land. Riparian rights are a mere incident to ownership in the soil, and, while they may relate back by fiction of law to the date of settlement or filing, by virtue of the patent subsequently issued, yet they do not vest until patent issues; for up to that time the title to the land, with all its incidents, is vested in the United States, utterly beyond the power or control of state Legislatures, and the party thereafter acquiring title from the government acquires the land with all its incidents.

We are therefore of the opinion that the respondents have a valid claim to the waters awarded them by the court below, superior to any claim on the part of the appellants, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Saguache County; Charles C. Holbrook, Judge.

Action by John Welty against Homer Gibson and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Veerkamp, for appellant. J. I. Palmer, for appellees.

MAXWELL, J. Appellant, as plaintiff below, sued appellees to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the destruction by appellees of an irrigation ditch in which he claimed an interest. The evidence shows that the ditch was originally constructed by one who is not a party to this suit, through government lands; that, subsequent to the time when appellee Harriet Gibson acquired title to a quarter section of the land through which the ditch was constructed, appellant enlarged the ditch through Harriet's land for the purpose of irrigating the land owned by him, without acquiring any right, title, or interest in the original construction. At the time of the enlargement of the ditch by appellant the location of the section line in that vicinity was in doubt, and at that time it was generally supposed that the ditch was not on appellees' land. By a survey made subsequent to the enlargement of the ditch the location of the section line was determined, when it was found that the ditch was on appellee Harriet's land, who then arranged with the original owner of the ditch to move it off her land, and after she had plowed in the ditch, which alleged trespass is the foundation of this suit, she proposed to appellant to build a ditch upon appellant's land on the east side of the line separating her land from appellant's land. This proposition was declined by appellant, and this suit was instituted by him.

Appellant based his right to recover upon an alleged parol license for a right of way granted by appellee Harriet. Issue was joined upon this allegation. The court found that appellant made an enlargement of the ditch through the land of appellees without any license, or any right of way, or any right whatever, and dismissed the action. This finding of the court is sustained by sufficient competent evidence, and under the well-settled rule of this court the judgment cannot be disturbed. Tynon v. Despain, 22 Colo. 240, 43 Pac. 1039, and cases there cited, are relied upon by appellant. Appellant's evidence failed to bring his case within the rule announced in those cases. APPEAL—FAILURE TO DOCKET—REMAND.

3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp. § 1087, providing that, if an appeal from the county court to the district court is not docketed by appellant in the district court within 30 days after being lodged with the clerk thereof, the transcript shall be remitted by the clerk to the county court, etc., is mandatory; and where appellant, after the expiration of the prescribed time, docketed his appeal by paying his docket fee, the transcript should be remitted to the lower court on appellee's motion.

Appeal from District Court, Rio Blanco County; John T. Shumate, Judge.

Proceedings for the allowance of the claim of James Beattie against the estate of John P. Thomas. From a judgment of the county court disallowing the claim, claimant appealed to the district court, where judgment was rendered in his favor, and Thomas G. Thomas, administrator, appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss the appeal.

E. A. Martin, for appellant. James C. Gentry, for appellee.

GABBERT, J. Appellant is the administrator of the estate of John P. Thomas, deceased. In the county court, where the administration proceedings were pending, appellee filed his claim against the estate. Such proceedings were had thereon that the claim was disallowed. From this judgment claimant appealed to the district court. The transcript was lodged with the clerk of that court on July 15, 1904. On August 19th following the administrator filed a motion in the district court asking that the papers be sent back to the county court, for procedure as though no appeal had been taken, on account of claimant's failure to docket his appeal as required by law. When this motion was filed, claimant had not paid his docket fee. On September 5, 1904, claimant paid his docket fee to the clerk of the district court. On the next day, the first day of the regular term of the district court, the motion of the administrator to remand came on to be heard, and was overruled. Later the case was tried before a jury, the court instructing a verdict for claimant, which was returned, and judgment entered thereon. From this judgment the administrator appeals. The errors assigned relate to the action of the district court in overruling the administrator's motion to remit the case to the county court, the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the estate, and the reception of testimony. It is only necessary to consider the first error assigned.

Section 1087, 3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp., which relates to proceedings upon appeal from the county to the district court, provides the time within which the original process, pleadings, and other papers relating to the suit, together with a transcript of the record entries relating to the action from which an appeal is taken, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court to which the appeal is taken. It further provides: "In case the appeal is not docketed by the appellant in the district court within thirty days after being lodged with the clerk of the district court, the transcript shall be remitted by the clerk of the district court to the county court, and the county court shall proceed on such judgment as though no appeal had been taken." This section was under consideration by the Court of Appeals in Tierney v. Campbell, 7 Colo. App. 299, 44 Pac. 948, where it was said that the failure to docket an appeal from the county to the district court within the time prescribed prevented jurisdiction of the district court attaching to entertain the appeal. This section was also under consideration by this court in People v. District Court, 33 Colo. 416, 80 Pac. 1069, wherein it was stated that the statement in Tierney v. Campbell with respect to the jurisdiction of the district court was dictum, and that the failure of the party appealing from the county to the district court to follow up his appeal as the statute requires pertains to procedure, and is visited with the prescribed penalty. Whether the failure of appellant to follow the steps prescribed by the statute prevents the jurisdiction of the district court attaching, or whether such failure merely subjects him to the penalty prescribed, is immaterial, so far as the case at bar is concerned.

The purpose of the statute was to prevent unnecessary delay by requiring the appellant to promptly docket his appeal in the district court by paying the fee required for that purpose. If he did not do so within the time prescribed, the duty was imposed upon the clerk of the district court to remit the transcript to the county court, so that the latter might proceed as though no appeal had been taken. In the present case it appears from the record that more than 30 days had elapsed after the necessary papers were lodged with the clerk of the district court before the claimant paid his docket fee, and that during this default the administrator filed a motion asking that all papers in the appeal which had been lodged with the clerk of the district court be remitted to the county court. This motion was denied by the district court. This action was clearly erroneous, because the provision of the statute relating to the steps which a party appealing from the county court to the district court shall take are mandatory. The penalty prescribed for failure to take these steps had attached when the motion of the administrator was filed, and it should have been sustained.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the appeal, and transmit the transcript lodged with the clerk to the county court, with directions to that tribunal to proceed as though no appeal had been taken.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACT OF SALE—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff offered certain real estate to defendant for $1,600. Defendant made a memorandum of the price, and said to plaintiff, "You will hear from me," which statement he repeated on declining an invitation to examine the property. Defendant later wrote plaintiff, asking if he would take $1,200 net, adding, "I think I can make a deal at that figure." Plaintiff answered that $1,600 was his best price, to which defendant replied that he did not know whether he could make a deal at that figure, but would try his best. Later defendant requested the plaintiff to send a deed, made out in blank as to the consideration and grantee, with an abstract of title, to a bank, and that the bank would send plaintiff $1,600, all cash. Defendant wanted the blanks left, so he could fill in "name and amount to whom I sell." Held, that such negotiations indicated that defendant was endeavoring to sell the land as broker, and did not show a contract to purchase for himself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, § 75.]

3. APPEAL — PREJUDICE — RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the price of certain land, it was established that defendant never agreed to purchase the land on his own account, plaintiff was not prejudiced by evidence that defendant did not at any time tell plaintiff that he would purchase his land at any price, which was objected to as a conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161–4170.]

Appeal from District Court, Rio Grande County; Chas. C. Holbrook, Judge.

Action by Enos Keel against John M. Schaupp. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ira J. Bloomfield, for appellant. Jesse Stephenson, for appellee.

GABBERT, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in an action brought by appellant, as plaintiff, to recover from appellee, as defendant, the purchase price of land which plaintiff claimed to have agreed to sell defendant, and which the latter agreed to purchase. There was judgment for defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

In his complaint plaintiff alleged, in substance, that defendant, in writing signed by him, promised that if plaintiff would execute a warranty deed to certain premises, leaving the name of the grantee blank, so that he (the defendant) could fill in the name of the grantee when he would thereafter sell the premises, and send such deed to a bank at Ft. Dodge, Iowa, the bank would pay him the sum of $1,600; that plaintiff accepted this offer, and executed and sent the deed as requested, but the purchase price has not been paid. The defendant answered, denying that the deed mentioned was sent on account of any contract of purchase made by him. To this answer a replication was filed, reiterating that the deed was sent to the bank by direction of defendant, under an agreement that he was to pay the purchase price for the land therein described. It appears from the testimony of plaintiff that negotiations with respect to the land in question were first opened between the parties in this state, when plaintiff stated to defendant that he had a place he would sell. At this time plaintiff informed the defendant that $1,600 would buy the land. The defendant made a memorandum of the price, saying: "You will hear from me." Shortly thereafter the parties again met on a train, at which time plaintiff requested the defendant to stop off and look at the land; but he declined, saying he did not have the time, but stated to the plaintiff: "You will hear from me in a few days." Defendant resided in Iowa, and after his return there was some correspondence between the plaintiff and himself; the latter writing a letter in which he wanted to know if plaintiff would take $1,200 net, adding: "I think I can make a deal at that figure." To this plaintiff replied, declining the offer, saying that he would take $1,600 for the land, but no less. To this the defendant answered: "I do not know that I can make a deal at that figure, but will try my best." Plaintiff replied that he would not take less than $1,600 cash. Later the defendant wrote plaintiff as follows: "I want you to make out a warranty deed, signed by yourself and wife, and bring the abstract down to date, and send all to the First National Bank, of Ft. Dodge, Iowa, and they will send you $1,600, all cash. * * * I want you, in making the deed, to leave the name and amount blank, so I can fill in the name and amount to whom I sell. You will get $1,600, all cash, from the bank, so it won't matter to you what I get." Plaintiff testified that upon receiving this letter he replied, accepting the terms, and shortly thereafter sent the deed and abstract to the bank, as requested. The deed was never taken up, nor the purchase price paid. The defendant testified that, when negotiations were first opened, he informed the plaintiff that he did not want to buy the land himself, but that he might be able to sell it for him, to which plaintiff answered he would like to have him do so. Upon this record the trial court found that the defendant never agreed to purchase the land from the plaintiff, but was merely trying to sell it for him. The contention of counsel for plaintiff is that the testimony establishes that defendant agreed to purchase plaintiff's land, and that plaintiff performed all conditions upon his part.

We are of the opinion that the evidence clearly sustains the finding or conclusion of the trial court that the defendant never agreed to purchase the land on his own account, but merely undertook to negotiate a sale for a specified sum to be paid the plaintiff. The arrangement between the parties was never reduced to writing, and their agreement must be deduced from the oral testimony and letters which passed between them. There is a conflict in their oral testimony; but this conflict was resolved in favor of the defendant by the trial court, and cannot be disturbed on review. Besides, we think the trial court was right in determining this conflict in favor of the defendant, because the letters between the parties clearly indicate that the defendant merely undertook to negotiate a sale of the premises to some one who would be willing to pay a price over and above that which plaintiff was to receive. Otherwise, the defendant would not have employed the expression in his letter, wherein he inquired if plaintiff would take $1,200 net: "I think I can make a deal at that figure"—or have stated, when plaintiff informed him that he would not take less than $1,600: "I do not know that I can make a deal at that figure, but will try my best." Nor would he have stated, in his letter which the plaintiff seems to rely upon as evidencing the contract which he says he accepted: "I want you, in making the deed, to leave the name and amount blank, so that I can fill in the name and amount to whom I sell. You will get $1,600, all cash, from the bank, so it won't matter to you what I get." From these letters it is evident that a sale depended upon the defendant finding a purchaser at a price above that which plaintiff was to receive. An arrangement between the owner of land and another, to the effect that the latter will pay a specified sum for such land in the event he finds a purchaser, does not render the person merely undertaking to negotiate a sale upon such conditions liable to the owner as purchaser.

During the course of the examination of defendant he was asked, "Did you at any time tell Mr. Keel that you would purchase his land at any price?" to which he replied, "I did not." This was objected to by counsel for plaintiff upon the ground that the witness should not be permitted to state his conclusions. The objection was overruled. Conceding that the objection was good, plaintiff was not prejudiced, because we think it is established beyond all dispute, by the letters to which we have referred, that defendant never agreed to purchase the land on his own account. The admission of incompetent testimony, which it affirmatively appears was not prejudicial, is not reversible error.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CITY OF COLORADO SPRINGS v.
NEVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEFECTS IN STREETS—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Sess. Laws 1899, p. 365, c. 145, provides that, before a city of the first class shall be liable for injuries received on its streets, notice must be given stating "when, where, and how the injury was received, and the extent thereof." Held, that a notice that plaintiff "received personal injuries on account of the negligence of said city of Colorado Springs, for which she intends to hold said city liable for damages sustained in that regard," is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1696-1707.]

2. SAME—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL—LIABILITY FOR INJURY—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

Municipal corporations organized under the general municipal corporation act have such rights and powers and are subject to such liabilities as the General Assembly may give or impose, and an obligation may be imposed for injuries caused by defects in streets or sidewalks, and making it a condition precedent to such a liability that a notice of such injury be given the city.

3. STATUTES—RETROACTIVE OPERATION—STATUTES IMPAIRING VESTED RIGHTS.

Retrospective effect will never be given a law, unless the intention of the Legislature to give it such effect is clearly manifest; and a constitutional prohibition against such legislation renders void retrospective laws affecting vested rights injuriously.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, § 344.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TORTS—DEFECTS IN STREETS—ACTIONS—NOTICE OF CLAIM—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Sess. Laws 1899, p. 365, c. 145, provides that, before a city of the first class shall be liable for injuries received on its streets, a notice must be given stating "when, where, and how the injury was received, and the extent thereof." Sess. Laws 1903, p. 457, c. 175, approved April 9, 1903, became a law 90 days thereafter, and provides that, as a condition precedent to liability of a city for injuries due to its negligence, a notice must be given of the "time, place, and cause of injury." Held, that notice of an injury which occurred June 11, 1903, must be given under the law of 1899.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; Louis S. Cunningham, Judge.

Action by Ella Neville against the city of Colorado Springs. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Sheaffer, City Atty., Sheaffer & Kinney, and Wm. C. Robinson, for appellant. George Gardner, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. The plaintiff, Mrs. Neville, claiming to have been injured by falling on one of defendant's sidewalks, recovered a judgment against defendant, the city of Colorado Springs, a city of the first class, from which judgment defendant appeals.

Of the numerous errors assigned only one will be considered, as its decision in favor of the city's contention necessitates a reversal of the judgment. The injuries were inflicted June 11, 1903. The statute then in force (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 365, c. 145) provided: "Before any city of the first class shall be liable for damages to any person injured upon any of the streets, avenues, alleys or sidewalks of the city, the person so injured, his agent or attorney, shall give the mayor, city clerk or city council notice in writing of such injury within six months after the same has been received, stating in such notice when, where, and how the injury was received, and the extent thereof." The Fourteenth General Assembly (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 457, c. 175) passed an act concerning liabilities of cities and towns for personal injuries, which was approved April 9, 1903, and became a law 90 days thereafter, section 1 of which is: "No action for the recovery of compensation for personal injury or death against any city of the first or second class or any town, on account of its negligence, shall be maintained unless written notice of the time, place and cause of injury is given to the clerk of the city, or recorder of the town, by the person injured, his agent or attorney, within ninety (90) days and the action is commenced within two years from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury or death." Before beginning the action, and on July 21, 1903, after the act of 1903 took effect, plaintiff served upon the city clerk of defendant a notice, avowedly given as a compliance therewith, which, inter alia, stated that she "received personal injuries on account of the negligence of the said city of Colorado Springs, for which she intends to hold said city liable for damages sustained in that regard." When on the trial plaintiff offered in evidence a copy of this notice, defendant objected thereto upon the ground that it was not such a notice as is required by law. The particular defect thereof is said to be that the injuries were not therein described at all, or their extent given, as the act of 1899 requires.

It becomes important, therefore, to determine so far as concerns plaintiff's cause of action, which one of the foregoing acts concerning notice applies; for, if the rights of the parties are governed by the act of 1899, the notice was clearly insufficient under the decision of our Court of Appeals in City of Denver v. Barron, 6 Colo. App. 72, 39 Pac. 989. See, also, Stoors v. City of Denver, 19 Colo. App. 159, 73 Pac. 1094. Indeed, plaintiff makes no claim that this notice is sufficient under this act; but her contention is that the act of 1903, being a law in force at the time the notice was given (July 21, 1903), controls, and as this notice was strictly in accordance with its requirements, which are different and less onerous than those contained in the act of 1899, her compliance with the later act entitles her to maintain this action. Municipal corporations organized, as is the city of Colorado Springs, under the general municipal incorporation act, have such rights and powers, and are subject to such obligations and liabilities as the General Assembly sees fit to give or impose. For damages incurred by injuries upon its streets or sidewalks the General Assembly may or may not impose an obligation upon them to respond therefor. It is competent, therefore, for the General Assembly to pass statutes like those we are considering, making a condition precedent to the attaching of liability for such injuries, or the right to sue therefor, the giving of a notice of this character. Cunningham v. Denver, 23 Colo. 18, 45 Pac. 356, 58 Am. St. Rep. 212. These statutes therefore, are valid, and to settle the rights of these parties the point for decision is: With which one was plaintiff obliged to comply in giving notice.

In those jurisdictions where there is no constitutional inhibition upon retrospective legislation unless the intention of the Legislature is clearly manifested to the contrary, the courts will give only a prospective effect to public laws; and where, as in Colorado, there is a constitutional prohibition against this species of legislation, it would be beyond the power of the Legislature, even by manifesting its intention to do so, to pass retrospective laws which substantially affect injuriously vested rights. Though the title of the act of 1903 provides for a repeal of inconsistent acts, there is no express repeal in the body of the statute; and if the statute in any respect repeals or amends the act of 1899, it is by implication only. It is not necessary, however, for us now to determine whether the later operates as an implied repeal or amendment of the earlier act. For our present purpose we may assume that the intention of the General Assembly was to accomplish its repeal. In the act of 1903 no intention whatever is shown, and, if it was, effect could not be given to it, to make it apply to existing causes of action. It is restricted to causes of action for injuries which shall thereafter be sustained. In the leading case of Denver, South Park & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 162, the court, speaking by Thatcher, C. J., of our constitutional provision against retrospective legislation, said that it "operates as a saving clause incorporated into the repealing section"; and he further said that "neither an affirmative enactment nor a repealing statute can be so construed under our Constitution as to retroact upon and impair or take away accrued rights, which by the authority of law and in the manner pointed out by it had been previously asserted." In Brown v. Challis, 23 Colo. 145, 46 Pac. 679, it was held to be incompetent for the Legislature to create a new ground for the support of an existing cause of action, or to take away any legal defense to such action; and our Court of Appeals in Day v. Madden, 9 Colo. App. 464, 48 Pac. 1053, said that any law which deprives a party of any vested right of action or defense has been universally held unconstitutional and void under similar constitutional provisions.

It is clear, therefore, under these and other authorities which might be cited, that, without respect to the effect or bearing upon this case of the general savings act of 1891 (Sess. Laws 1891, p. 366), our constitutional provision (section 11 of article 2) against retrospective legislation operates as a saving clause incorporated into the act of 1903, if the latter is, as plaintiff claims, a repeal of the act of 1899 saving to plaintiff her vested cause of action, and to defendant its defenses thereunder, which could not be taken away. The liability of the city for the injuries which plaintiff sustained was conditioned by the act of 1899, among other things, upon the giving of the prescribed notice. Thereunder defendant's liability did not attach, and it had a substantial defense to the maintenance of an action by the plaintiff, if she did not, within the specified time, give the prescribed notice. It was not competent for the General Assembly, even had it so intended, which it did not, after the defendant's right of defense became vested, thereafter seriously to impair or take it away.

For the failure of plaintiff to give the statutory notice required this judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Appeal from Larimer County Court; J. Mack Mills, Judge.

Action by the city of Ft. Collins against Marie La Fitte. Judgment in police court for plaintiff. Defendant appealed to the county court, where plaintiff again recovered judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Feeny, E. A. Ballard, and C. M. Bice, for appellant. Cornelius Ferris, Jr., for appellee.

MAXWELL, J. Three separate complaints were filed in the police magistrate's court of the city of Ft. Collins, charging appellant with having violated three ordinances of the city, which are designated as "Ordinance No. 17, 1889," "Ordinance No. 14, 1902," and "Ordinance No. 3, 1903." Trials resulted in judgment against appellant upon the three complaints, from which judgments appeals were taken to the county court, where the appeals were docketed and numbered 2,502, 2,503, and 2,504, respectively. Trial was had to the court; a jury being expressly waived. Preceding the introduction of evidence, by agreement of the parties, it was ordered by the court that, each case be tried separately, and that case No. 2,502 be tried first, being the case for the violation of Ordinance No. 17, 1889. After the evidence had been introduced and the court had taken the case under advisement, the following appears in the record: "And thereupon, on motion of the attorney for defendant, it is ordered by the court that cases Nos. 2,503 and 2,504 be and they are hereby submitted to the court upon the evidence produced in case No. 2,502." Thereafter the court found the issues in favor of appellee, and rendered judgment against appellant in the sum of $200 and costs in each case, and, after denying the motion for a new trial, entered an order allowing an appeal to the Court of Appeals upon the filing of an appeal bond in the sum of $400.

Counsel for appellant says, in his printed brief, that the three cases were consolidated for trial and for the purposes of appeal. A thorough search of the record presented does not warrant this position. The order made by the court on the motion of the attorney for defendant, appellant here, after the case on trial had been taken under advisement, amounts to nothing more than the submission of the other two cases upon the evidence introduced in the case which had been tried. There is nothing in the record touching this question, other than the order above quoted; so counsel is in error in assuming that the cases were consolidated for trial and purposes of appeal. This conclusion eliminates from consideration all assignments of error urged by counsel pertaining to the two cases which are not in this court upon this appeal. It is due counsel for appellant, who signs the brief filed in this court, to state that he did not try the case in the court below, nor did he prepare the transcript filed in this court.

It is urged (1) that the court erred in denying the motion for change of venue, based upon the alleged prejudice of the inhabitants of the county and of the judge of the county court; (2) that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the judgment rendered.

1. The motion for change of venue and the affidavits in support thereof are not within the bill of exceptions, and no exception was saved to the ruling of the court upon the motion, which are sufficient reasons for declining to consider this question. Duncan v. Thomas, 17 Colo. App. 522, 524, 69 Pac. 310.

2. No exception was saved to the findings or judgment. Recitals in the record of an exception to the findings, and in the order allowing the appeal of an exception to the judgment, are no evidence that exceptions were taken. Exceptions are made part of the record only by bill of exceptions, allowed, signed, and sealed by the judge who presided at the trial. Goldsmith v. Newhouse, 19 Colo. App. 1, 4, 72 Pac. 809, and cases cited. Hence we cannot consider the assignment of error challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment.

3. It is contended that there was a failure of competent proof of the passage and publication of Ordinance No. 17, 1889. The clerk of the city, sworn as a witness for appellee, produced the original record of the minutes of the meeting of the city council of Ft. Collins held June 4, 1889, which record was admitted in evidence, and showed that the mayor and seven of the eight aldermen of the city were present at the meeting; that Ordinance No. 17, 1889, was taken up, read, and put upon its final passage; that the ayes and nays were called, and the names of the seven aldermen present were recorded as voting aye, and the mayor declared the ordinance passed and adopted. Section 4445, Mills' Ann. St. The editor of the Ft. Collins Courier, a newspaper published within the limits of the corporation, a witness sworn for appellee, produced the files of the Courier for 1889, which were introduced in evidence, and showed that the ordinance in question was published in that paper June 6, 1889. Counsel argues that section 4443, Mills' Ann. St., is mandatory as to the manner of proving the publication of an ordinance, and that the passage and publication of an ordinance can only be proved by the introduction in evidence of the book of ordinances therein provided for.

The last paragraph of the section completely refutes the argument of counsel. It is: "The book of ordinances herein provided for shall be taken and considered in all courts of this state as prima facie evidence that such ordinances have been published as provided by law." Prima facie evidence means evidence which is sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted—evidence which, standing alone and unexplained, would maintain the proposition and warrant the conclusion to support which it is introduced. 22 A. & E. Ency. 1294. The statute was intended to provide a convenient method of proving the fact that an ordinance had been published as required by law, and not for the purpose of making the book of ordinances the only and exclusive evidence of such fact, as contended by counsel. There was no error in the reception of the evidence introduced to prove the passage and publication of the ordinance.

This disposes of all the assignments of error available to appellant, with the result that the judgment must be affirmed.

MERRILL v. SUFFA.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. MANDAMUS—NATURE OF ACTION.

Where mandamus is invoked for the protection of the purely private right of the applicant, the proceedings may be conducted in the names of the real parties in interest, mandamus being, under the Code, a civil action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 287.]

2. SAME—JOINDER OF CAUSES.

In mandamus, the alternative writ must not include more than one cause, whether of the same or many individuals, because two or more distinct rights which the petitioner may have growing out of two or more entirely distinct wrongs committed against him cannot be joined in the same mandamus.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 6.]

3. SAME—PARTIES—ENFORCEMENT OF RIGHT TO INSPECT CORPORATE BOOKS.

In mandamus by a stockholder to enforce his right to inspect the corporate books, it is not necessary to make the corporation a party respondent, and it is sufficient to make the officer on whom the statutory duty is devolved such party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, §§ 291-293.]

4. SAME—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—INSPECTION OF CORPORATE BOOKS.

The acts of the secretary of different corporations in refusing leave to a stockholder to inspect the books of the corporations are separate and distinct wrongs committed against the stockholder, though the same person is the secretary of all the corporations, and one petition for mandamus by the stockholder to compel the secretary to permit inspection of the books of the corporations is bad for improperly uniting several causes of action, within Mills' Ann. Code, § 70, providing that in no event shall causes of action be joined unless they affect all the parties in the same character and capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 6.]

5. PLEADING—IMPROPER JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—REMEDY.

Where several distinct causes of action which may properly be joined have been commingled in one statement, a motion is the proper remedy to compel a separate statement, but where the objection is that the causes of action cannot be joined, demurrer is the appropriate remedy when the defect appears on the face of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 435, 1194-1198.]

6. MANDAMUS—PARTIES—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES RESPONDENT.

Since the acts of the secretary of different corporations in refusing leave to a stockholder to inspect the books of the corporations are separate and distinct wrongs against the stockholder, though the same person is the secretary of all the corporations, one petition for mandamus by the stockholder to compel the secretary to permit inspection of the books of the corporations is bad for misjoinder of parties respondent, there being a misjoinder in suing one individual in different representative capacities.

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; F. T. Johnson, Judge.

Mandamus by George A. Sutta against N. C. Merrill, secretary of certain corporations, to compel respondent to give petitioner access to corporate books. From a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, respondent appeals. Reversed and remanded.

George S. Redd, for appellant. Horace G. Benson and De Witt C. Webber, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. Action in mandamus. The petition for the writ designates the parties as petitioner and respondent respectively. Where, as here, the writ is invoked for the protection of the purely private right of the applicant, the proceedings may be conducted in the names of the real parties in interest, and therefore with equal propriety they might be called plaintiff and defendant, mandamus being, under our Code, regarded as a civil action. Stoddard v. Benton, 6 Colo. 508; Orman v. People, 18 Colo. App. 302, 71 Pac. 430.

The petitioner, a stockholder in each of eight separate and independent corporations, having, after due demand, been deprived, as he says, of his statutory right to inspect the stock books and other books and papers of these different corporations by the secretary thereof, who is one and the same individual, the respondent herein, filed this petition to compel respondent, as secretary of each company, to give him access to such books and papers with the privilege of making and carrying away extracts therefrom. To the alternative writ which was issued upon filing the petition, respondent demurred upon a number of distinct grounds, two of which are: (1) A misjoinder of parties respondent; (2) an improper union of several causes of action. The court overruled the demurrer, and, respondent electing to stand thereby the alternative writ was made peremptory, and from the final judgment awarding the same respondent appeals.

Without so deciding, we shall assume, for our present purpose, that the alternative writ alleges a proper demand and refusal, and shows that petitioner has, in other respects, brought himself within the statute which enjoins upon the secretary of a corporation, intrusted with its books, records, and papers, the duty of allowing an inspection thereof by certain stockholders at a proper time and place. It is manifest, however, that the special demurrer should have been sustained.

The misjoinders complained of are said to consist in the facts that each of the separate corporations is a distinct legal entity, neither one of which, nor its secretary, has any connection whatever with any other corporation or its secretary, nor any interest in this application, so far as concerns any of the other corporations, or its secretary; and that, if petitioner has an action against respondent in his official capacity as secretary of any of these corporations, the action is founded upon a tort entirely distinct from the tort committed by him as secretary of either of the others, and, as secretary of one, he has no interest in any manner affecting him in his capacity of secretary of any of the other corporations; and the tort, if any, which he has committed as secretary of one, was in a representative capacity which is not the same as, but different from, the capacity in which he acts as secretary of the others. We think this contention of respondent is sound. It is a primary rule in mandamus that the alternative writ must not include more than one case, whether of the same or many individuals, because two or more distinct rights which the petitioner may have, growing out of two or more entirely distinct wrongs committed against him, cannot be joined in the same mandamus. Tapping on Mandamus, *324.

In order to enforce the right of inspection here demanded, it is not necessary to make the corporation a party respondent, but merely its officer upon whom the statutory duty is devolved. Yet even though respondent, at the same time and by the same act, committed a wrong upon the same person (the petitioner) by refusing, as secretary of the eight distinct corporations, the inspection demanded, the same act constituted eight separate and distinct torts. The denial of the right of inspection in each case, in his capacity as secretary, constituted a single wrong by respondent, a violation of a duty imposed by statute, eight wrongs in all, and gave rise to eight separate rights and causes of action in petitioner's favor. Some torts are in their nature several, not joint—as slander. As secretary of one of these corporations, respondent could not, in the nature of things, be guilty of a tort which, as secretary of another, he committed against petitioner in refusing access to its books. The torts are of the same kind, but committed by different persons or the same individual acting in different capacities. Doubtless, petitioner would be the first to admit this if he were suing for the penalty the statute gives for a wrongful refusal. In their nature they were several, and not joint, torts, and could not be joined in one action. The respondent is not sued in his individual but in his official or representative capacity. Each of the eight corporations is a distinct and separate legal entity. True, the same individual (Merrill), who is secretary of one, is the secretary of each of the others, but his representative capacity as secretary of one is a different capacity from that in which he is secretary of the others, and is just as distinct as is that of the corporate entities themselves. So that when he is sued, as here, as secretary of each of eight distinct corporations, he is sued in eight different representative capacities, just as if the action was brought against eight different individual secretaries. The rule against such joinders has thus been stated by the learned author of the article on Mandamus in 28 Cyc. 447: "In the absence of statute to the contrary, separate and distinct rights, whether of one person or of several persons respectively, cannot be joined for the purpose of enforcement in one mandamus proceeding, whether the different duties rest on one person or on several persons respectively." Section 70, Mill's Ann. Code, relates to the joinder of causes of action, but does not permit of such a joinder as was attempted here. That section expressly, inter alia, says that, in no event, shall causes of action be joined unless they affect all the parties, and affect them in the same character and capacity. A joinder of causes of action, such as is here attempted, is just as improper as would be in one action the union of eight distinct causes of action, based upon eight distinct wrongs which, as executor of eight separate and distinct estates, respondent had committed against petitioner. We have been cited to no authorities, and have found none, sustaining such joinder of causes of action, or of parties respondent.

The point made by petitioner that a motion, and not a demurrer, is the remedy for a misjoinder of causes of action is not good. Where several distinct causes of action which might be properly joined have been commingled in one statement, a motion is the proper remedy to compel a separate statement; but where the objection is that the causes of action cannot be joined at all, demurrer is the appropriate remedy when the defect, as here, appears on the face of the complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 50 (Mills' Ann. Code); Ludington v. Hellman, 9 Colo. App. 543, 49 Pac. 377; Id., 26 Colo. 326, 57 Pac. 1075. The joinder of causes of action being unauthorized, it would seem necessarily to follow that there was an improper misjoinder of parties respondent—that is, a misjoinder in suing one individual in several different representative capacities. The following are in point: Dubois v. Bowles, 30 Colo. 44, 69 Pac. 1067; Faust v. Smith, 3 Colo. App. 505, 34 Pac. 261; State ex rel. v. Commissioners, 38 Kan. 317, 16 Pac. 337; Co. Comm'rs. v. King, 13 Fla. 451, 470; Haskins v. Board of Supervisors, 51 Miss. 406; Rex. v. Mayor, 11 Mod. 382; 6 Bacon's Abridgement, title "Mandamus," 421; Merrill on Mandamus, §§ 232, 234a; Pomeroy's Rem. & Rem. Rights, §§ 281, 307, 313, 442-451, 502; *A. T. & S. F. R. R. Co. v. HELM v. BREWSTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—RELATION OF PARTIES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action by a creditor of a husband to set aside conveyances to the wife, the burden is on the husband and wife to clearly establish that the transaction is honest, and without intent to hinder or defraud such creditor.

2. SAME—FRAUD—CONSIDERATION.

A sale of property, though for a full consideration, made by the owner with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, if the vendee participated in such intent, is void as against such creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, § 510.]

3. SAME—FRAUDULENT INTENT OF GRANTOR—EVIDENCE.

A grantor's intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors may be inferred from facts and circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 892-895.]

4. SAME.

A husband, while indebted to plaintiff for borrowed money, transferred an apartment building and the furniture used in conducting a boarding house to his wife. The wife knew that the husband was greatly embarrassed, and that his remaining property was so heavily incumbered that his equities were of little or no value. The only business that the husband was engaged in was that of keeping the boarding house, and, by transferring the building and furniture, his creditors, other than those having liens thereon, were temporarily prevented from reaching the property. The boarding house was continued the same as before, except that the name of the manager was changed from the husband to the wife. Prior to the transfer, the husband supported the family from the income from the boarding house, and after the transfer the wife supported the family from the same source. Money, which the wife testified she borrowed to pay her husband for his equity in the building, was immediately applied by him in discharge of taxes against property which she had agreed to pay in part consideration for the transfer. Held, that the transfer was fraudulent as against the husband's creditors.

5. SAME—RIGHTS OF VENDEE—CONSIDERATION.

Where a wife participated in her husband's fraud in conveying property to her to hinder and delay his creditors, she was not entitled as against them to any rights in the property by virtue of the consideration actually paid to her husband; the loss of the amount paid by her being the penalty for engaging in the fraudulent transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 578-582.]

6. SAME—SECURING INDEBTEDNESS.

A husband may secure an indebtedness to his wife which will be upheld as against the husband's creditors providing the transaction is bona fide.

7. SAME—ADDITIONS TO PROPERTY.

Where a husband conveyed a boarding house and the furniture therein to his wife, with intent to defraud his creditors, in which intention the wife participated, she acquired no rights as against the husband's creditors by virtue of having subsequently purchased furniture for the house from the proceeds of its operation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 578-582.]

8. APPEAL—SCOPE OF REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL—LACHES.

The defense of laches is not regarded with favor on appeal when raised there for the first time by the successful party below.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1079-1120.]

9. SAME—ACTION BY CREDITOR—CONDITION PRECEDENT—JUDGMENT.

A creditor is not entitled to maintain a bill to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by his debtor until the creditor's claim has been reduced to judgment.

10. SAME—LACHES.

Where, after a fraudulent conveyance of a boarding house by a husband to wife, the business was run in the same manner as before, and the wife devoted no more time nor money in improving the property and business than she would have done had the title remained in her husband, the delay of a creditor of the husband in recovering judgment and instituting a creditor's suit to set the conveyance aside had not been prejudicial to the wife, and hence laches was no defense to the bill.

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; Frank T. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Hannah E. Helm against Alice M. Brewster and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Appellant, as plaintiff, brought an action against appellees, as defendants, to subject certain real property, known as "the Aldine," standing in the name of the defendant Alice M. Brewster, together with the furniture therein, to the payment of a judgment which plaintiff had obtained against the defendant Albert W. Brewster. The latter defendant had borrowed a large sum of money from the plaintiff, which was the basis for this judgment. Their relation is that of brother and sister. The defendants are husband and wife. Subsequent to incurring the indebtedness to his sister, Mr. Brewster conveyed the property in question to his wife. This transfer the plaintiff claims was made for the purpose of hindering and delaying her in the collection of her claim against her brother. The main issue between the parties was the bona fides of this transaction. The trial resulted in a judgment dismissing the complaint, from which the plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeals. On behalf of the plaintiff it is contended that the testimony bearing on the issues between the parties does not conflict to any material extent, and clearly established that the property in controversy was held by the wife in trust for her husband, while on behalf of the defendants it is claimed that the testimony touching the issues tried was conflicting, and as the facts in issue were found in favor of the defendants they cannot be disturbed on review; and, further, that the evidence, without regard to its conflict, clearly established the good faith of the transfers from the husband to his wife. It therefore becomes necessary to review the testimony.

The defendants were married in 1888. About the time of their marriage, or shortly after, the husband purchased the lots upon which the Aldine stands for the sum of $10,500, and erected thereon a substantial brick building of six tenements at a cost of about $40,000. In order to make these improvements he borrowed money at various times, mortgaging the property therefor, which finally culminated in a mortgage for $30,000, given in December, 1895, the principal of which was wholly unpaid when plaintiff commenced her action. Between October, 1893, and March, 1896, Mr. Brewster borrowed the money from plaintiff, the indebtedness for which was reduced to judgment in April, 1901. She commenced her action May following. The sum borrowed aggregated $6,500, part of which has been repaid through the sale of collaterals pledged as security, leaving the balance due for which judgment was rendered the sum of $4,706.11. From the time the property was purchased until August, 1894, the defendants, with their children, occupied a brick cottage on one of the lots. From the time the new buildings were completed until the early part of 1894, they were rented to different parties. On this last date they were all rented to one person for the purpose of keeping a boarding house, or family hotel. Part of the furniture used for this purpose belonged to Mr. Brewster, and had cost about $3,000. In August, 1894, he bought out his tenant, paying her for the furniture which she had placed in the property, or allowing her therefor the equivalent of $9,600. From that time until September, 1897, Mr. Brewster, with the assistance of his wife, who devoted all her energies in assisting him, conducted the place as a boarding house. On this date he surrendered the business to her, and transferred to her all the furniture in the six houses. The consideration named in the bill of sale evidencing this transaction was $1,000. Thereafter the wife conducted the business. On the 30th of the same month Mr. Brewster conveyed the real estate to his wife. This included the six new buildings and the cottage above mentioned. The new buildings had been improved by the addition of a common dining room. The deed evidencing this transaction names the consideration at $1,200. It warrants the title, except as against the mortgage above referred to. It is claimed by the defendants that the wife, as part of the consideration for the transfer, assumed the payment of this mortgage and the interest then due thereon, which amounted to the sum of $1,425. It is also claimed that the wife assumed the payment of other indebtedness against the husband in consideration of the conveyance to her, and has, in fact, discharged such indebtedness, but what the arrangement was between the husband and wife with respect to these matters, or what particular indebtedness she agreed to pay, is not at all clear. The wife knew that the husband was indebted to the plaintiff and numerous other creditors at the time of the transfers, and that he had no other means with which to pay his debts than the property transferred to her, because his other property was then incumbered for practically all it was worth. At this time his creditors were pressing him for the payment of their claims. By the transfers there was no apparent change in the possession or use and enjoyment of the property other than that the business was thereafter conducted in the name of the wife, whereas, before, it was conducted in the name of the husband. The consideration for the transfer of the furniture and business was a note for $840, dated April 8, 1894, executed by the husband to the wife. Defendants testify that the note was given for money borrowed by the husband from the wife, which she earned by selling cakes to the Woman's Exchange between 1891 and August, 1894. It appears that during this period the family occupied the cottage above mentioned; that the cakes were baked in this cottage; that the family during this time was maintained by the husband, including the hiring and paying of a servant to do the general housework and care for the children; that the materials for the baking were bought by the husband in connection with the family supplies; that during this time the husband had no other business, and received orders for, and delivered, the cakes to the Exchange, and collected the accounts therefor. Occasionally the husband assisted the wife in preparing and baking the cakes. The books of account in connection with this business were kept by the husband, in which was entered the cost of materials. This was deducted from the gross receipts for the cakes, and the net proceeds turned over to the wife. The note above mentioned was given for a part of the money thus earned, which the husband claimed to have borrowed from the wife. Part of the money (about $600) which the wife claims to have paid the husband, on account of the transfer of the real estate in question, she testifies she obtained from her father.

On the question of the value of the real estate there was a conflict in the testimony—some of the witnesses testifying that it was worth from $38,000 to $50,000, while others placed the value at from $25,000 to $35,000. The court ruled that the houses could not be valued separately, but should be estimated as an entire block as transferred. As to the value of the personal property, the court ruled that it must be determined independently of the business in which it was being used, and that its value was only such as it would bring when so sold. On this basis there was testimony to the effect that its value was about $1,000, while another witness stated that, in connection with the business, it was reasonably worth from $6,000 to $7,000. It appears from the testimony that the wife paid much more upon indebtedness against the husband than the consideration named in the instruments evidencing the transfers; in fact, paid something like $3,000 more than she agreed to pay, but that she kept no account or memorandum of the amounts or dates of such payments. It also appears from the testimony of the defendant Brewster that the wife assumed the payment of the taxes on the Aldine; that shortly after the transfer of that property she obtained $490 from her father, which she turned over to her husband on account of the consideration of such transfer, which sum he applied upon taxes against the Aldine, which, according to the testimony, she had agreed to discharge. It also appears from the testimony that, outside of the money which Mrs. Brewster received from her father, the many obligations against her husband which she discharged were paid out of the proceeds of the Aldine, operated by the wife as a boarding house. Persons whom he owed boarded at the house, and their accounts therefor were applied upon the husband's indebtedness. Some of this indebtedness he had incurred in operating the house prior to the transfer to his wife, and some of it was on account of incumbrances upon his other property. With respect to his wife furnishing, or paying, him money on account of the transfers, Mr. Brewster states: "She was to give me money to pay my bills as I needed it; that is, a certain class of indebtedness that was unsecured that I thought I ought to pay as soon as possible. There was no definite amount named. It was my understanding that she was to furnish money to pay taxes on other property, and help me save it, and anything I needed for unsecured accounts." Prior to these transfers, according to the testimony of Mr. Brewster, he had maintained his family, consisting of his wife and five children, out of the proceeds of the Aldine when operated by him. Since the transfers the family has been maintained by Mrs. Brewster from the same source. Mr. Brewster says that since such transfers he has had his living out of the house, and has assisted his wife in running it as much as he thought would pay his way. He does not appear to have engaged in any other business. The only apparent change after the transfers was, as stated in his own language, "She was manager, and I was not."

R. T. McNeal and Thos. Macon, for appellant. Luther M. Goddard, Tom Herrington, and S. C. Warner, for appellees.

GABBERT, J. (after stating the facts as above). The statutes of this state provide that: "Every conveyance * * * of any estate or interest in lands, or in goods, or things in action * * * made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of their * * * demands, * * * as against the person so hindered, delayed or defrauded, shall be void." Mills' Ann. St. § 2030. Many decisions of courts of last resort in actions by creditors of a husband to set aside conveyances of property to his wife are reported, with the result that in this class of cases it has been firmly established that, when a conveyance by an insolvent debtor to his wife is attacked by a creditor of the former at the time of such conveyance, the husband and wife are required to clearly establish that the transaction was honest, and that there was no intent to thereby hinder and defraud such creditor. First Nat'l Bank v. Kavanagh, 7 Colo. App. 160, 43 Pac. 217; Horton v. Dewey, 53 Wis. 410, 10 N. W. 599; Lively v. Winton, 30 W. Va. 554, 4 S. E. 451; Glass v. Zutavern, 43 Neb. 334, 61 N. W. 579, 47 Am. St. Rep. 763; Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664; Seltz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 179. The reason for the rule is that the relationship of husband and wife affords exceptional opportunities for the former to defraud his creditors by conveying his property to his wife; and as they are generally the only persons who know all about transactions between themselves, the rule may be even stronger than we have indicated. In other cases where creditors have brought suits attacking conveyances by their debtors in fraud of their rights, it is also established that a sale of property, though for a full consideration, made by the owner with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, is, if the vendee participated in such intent, void as against the creditors of the vendor. Reithmann v. Godsman, 23 Colo. 202, 46 Pac. 684; Clements v. Moore, 6 Wall. 299, 18 L. Ed. 786; Bradley v. Ragsdale, 64 Ala. 558; Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435. And that fraud may be inferred from facts and circumstances. Grimes v. Hill, 15 Colo. 359, 25 Pac. 698; Innis v. Carpenter, 4 Colo. App. 80, 34 Pac. 1011; Greenleve v. Blum, 59 Tex. 124.

There is no real conflict in the testimony bearing on the good faith of the transactions between the defendants; and, applying the principles above mentioned to the facts logically deducible from such testimony, the judgment should have been for the plaintiff. At the time the husband transferred the property to his wife he was insolvent, or, at least, greatly embarrassed by indebtedness. The wife knew this fact, and was also aware that his remaining property was so heavily incumbered that his equities therein were of little or no value. The indebtedness to the plaintiff was in existence at the time of these transfers. The only property which the husband had which was not incumbered was the furniture in the house. It was necessary to protect this from creditors, or the business of conducting a boarding house in the Aldine could not be continued. The only business in which the husband was engaged was keeping this boarding house. By transferring the Aldine and the furniture therein, his creditors, except those having liens thereon, would, temporarily, at least, be prevented from reaching that property, and in this way the business could be continued. The only change in the transfer was that, prior thereto, the business was conducted in the name of, and managed by, the husband, while thereafter it was conducted in the name of the wife and managed by her. Prior to such transfers the family was supported by the husband from the income derived from operating the boarding house, while thereafter it was supported by the wife from the same source. If, as contended, the wife, as a part of the consideration of the transfer of the title of the Aldine to her, assumed the payment of the mortgage thereon and taxes then due and unpaid, it is rather strange that in struggling with such a great indebtedness she did not limit her efforts to liquidating it, instead of discharging obligations against her husband to the amount of upwards of $3,000 over and above what she had agreed to pay of such indebtedness as part of the consideration of the transfer of the title to her, as he from time to time requested. Or, to use his own language: "She was to give me money to pay my bills as I needed it. * * * There was no definite amount named. It was my understanding that she was to furnish money to pay taxes on other property and help me save it, and anything I needed for unsecured accounts."

Again, we find from the testimony that the wife kept no account or memorandum of the amounts or dates of the payments she made; that all these payments, except the note and money received from her father, were made with money derived from operating the boarding house, and that there was no definite arrangement between them regarding the amount she was to pay of indebtedness against her husband, which was not a lien upon the property which he had transferred to her. We further find that money which she says she borrowed from her father to pay her husband for his equity in the Aldine, and which she turned over to him, was immediately applied by him in the discharge of taxes against property which, according to their statements, she had agreed to pay. It is apparent, therefore, that the only change by the transfers was, as stated in his own language, "She was manager, and I was not;" and that the purpose of the defendants was to place the Aldine and its furnishings beyond the reach of the creditors of the husband, except those having liens thereon, and that, in fact, there was no sale of the property from the husband to the wife, but a mere transfer of title for the purpose indicated. The evidence clearly establishes that this is another instance of an insolvent debtor deluding himself with the idea that if he could secure time, he would be able to pay his debts, and, possibly, save a surplus for himself; and, to obtain time, has resorted to the often-tried experiment of conveying his property to his wife, hoping thereby to still retain control thereof, and thus hinder and delay his creditors in the enforcement of their claims, or defeat them in the end.

We think the evidence in this case clearly establishes, without contradiction, that the defendants have not only failed to prove that the transactions between them were honest, and that there was no purpose to thereby hinder and defraud the creditors of the husband, but that it establishes a fraudulent intent upon their part, because it is apparent from the testimony as a whole that the property transferred to the wife was handled, and the proceeds thereof applied, just as they would have been had the husband retained the title and continued the business in his own name. It is immaterial, therefore, whether some of the money which the wife paid her husband was her own, because it appears from all the facts and circumstances, fairly deducible from the testimony, that it was the purpose of the defendants, by the transfers in question, to hinder and delay the creditors of the husband, and hence they are void, as against his creditors. It is, therefore, not necessary to determine whether the profits arising from the baking and sale of cakes belonged to the wife or the husband, or what amount she may have received from other sources which she paid to him on account of such transfers, or whether the consideration she claims to have paid was adequate, for the reason that, as she participated in the fraudulent intent which actuated the transfers, she can take nothing thereby. In such cases the validity of the conveyances, evidencing sales made in such circumstances, is determined not by their consideration, but by the intention with which they were made and accepted. Bigby v. Warnock, 115 Ga. 385, 41 S. E. 622, 57 L. R. A. 754. Being a fraudulent grantee, she cannot set up against the plaintiff's right of action the amount of money which she may have paid her husband, because the rule in such cases is that the loss of the amount paid by the fraudulent grantee is the penalty which the law imposes for the fraudulent transaction. To protect the grantee in such circumstances would be to remove all danger of loss, and destroy the salutary restraint which the law has built up against such transactions. Id. A husband may secure indebtedness to his wife the same as to any other creditor. Bona fide transactions between them will be upheld, but when they are not, they will be avoided at the instance of a creditor of the husband, and, in circumstances like the case at bar, the husband and wife must show that their transactions were bona fide.

The testimony does not establish, as contended by counsel for defendants, that the husband was running behind in operating the boarding house, or that by the transfers in question his wife took over what was, under the management of her husband, a losing business, and by her efforts and superior business qualifications, made it pay. True, he was behind with his interest on the Aldine mortgage, and was owing his help, but, for aught that appears, it was because the proceeds from his business was used in discharging other indebtedness than that incurred in operating the boarding house. It is also claimed on behalf of Mrs. Brewster that the testimony established that she has expended something like $2,500 for furniture placed in the property since the purchase. This, however, is immaterial, in view of the fact that it appears the money thus expended was realized from operating the boarding house, a property and business which, for reasons already given, so far as creditors are concerned, belonged to the husband.

On behalf of the defendants it is urged that the laches of the plaintiff should bar her action. This question does not appear to have been raised in the court below, and a party against whose action laches is suggested as a defense ought to be allowed to explain it away; and therefore it is not regarded with favor on appeal when raised for the first time by the successful party below after the case has been brought to this court for review. Hagerman v. Bates, 24 Colo. 71, 49 Pac. 139. In a recent case—Mortgage Trust Co. v. Elliot, 36 Colo. 238, 84 Pac. 990—it is decided, in effect, that where the defense of laches is not presented to, nor passed upon by, the trial court, it will not be considered on appeal, because the party against whom it is thus first suggested would be deprived of the opportunity to explain his delay. Plaintiff could not maintain her creditor's bill until her indebtedness against Mr. Brewster had been reduced to judgment. At the time of the transfers it was not in judgment, but the case at bar was commenced shortly after she reduced her claim to judgment. If there had been any delay on the part of the plaintiff of which defendants might complain, it arises from the fact that she did not reduce her claim to judgment at an earlier date, whereby she would have been enabled to sooner institute her action. Counsel for plaintiff insist that the time within which she should have commenced her action only began to run from the date she obtained judgment against the defendant Brewster. We do not deem it necessary to pass upon this question. Laches in bringing an action cannot be successfully interposed as a defense unless delay in this respect has injuriously affected the party against whom suit is brought, or his position has been altered to his prejudice thereby. Morgan v. King, 27 Colo. 539, 63 Pac. 416; Farris v. Wirt, 16 Colo. App. 1, 63 Pac. 946; Du Bois v. Clark, 12 Colo. App. 220, 55 Pac. 750.

As previously stated, in substance, in reviewing the evidence, Mrs. Brewster does not appear to have expended any money of her own in improving the property or discharging indebtedness against it. Whatever she may have expended in either of these ways she obtained from the income derived from operating the property as a boarding house. She has devoted no time to managing the business or in looking after it different from that which she would have done had the title remained in her husband. From the date of the transfers down to the time when plaintiff commenced her action it appears that the income from the property has been devoted to the support of the family, and the discharge of indebtedness against Mr. Brewster, precisely the same as though the property had remained in his name, and he had conducted the boarding house himself; consequently, it is apparent that the delay of the plaintiff in obtaining a judgment and commencing her creditor's suit at an earlier date has not been prejudicial to the rights of the defendants, or either of them.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

SQUIRES et al. v. CURTAIN.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—VENUE—AGREEMENT—EFFECT.

Though, if defendants believed the justice before whom they were sued was prejudiced against them; they could have had the venue changed to the next nearest justice, the right could be waived, and by consenting that the case be transferred to a third justice they conferred jurisdiction upon him.

Appeal from Summit County Court; J. W. Swisher, Judge.

Action by Martha Curtain against L. L. Squires and another. From a judgment of the county court for plaintiff, on defendants' appeal from a justice court judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. R. Belford, for appellants. James T. Hogan, for appellee.

BAILEY, J. Appellee brought this action in the justice court before H. C. Rogers, a justice of the peace of Summit county. Appellants, who were defendants, asked for a change of venue because of the alleged prejudice of the justice. In the docket of the justice is the following memorandum: "Breckenridge, Colorado, October 12, 1903. Received of L. L. Squires $1.75 for change of venue to Eli Fletcher's court. H. C. Rogers, Justice of the Peace." The attorney for plaintiff filed an affidavit upon the 12th of October, wherein he states, "that Eli Fletcher, the other justice residing in the town of Breckenridge, is disqualified to act in this case because said justice is prejudiced against the case and cause of action, and thinks and believes said case should not be tried, and the plaintiff asks that the case be sent to some other court." The transcript of the justice's docket then contains the following: "October 12, 1903, 10 o'clock a. m. Court called. By consent of both parties this case was transferred to D. B. Webster, justice of the peace, at Kokomo, Summit county, Colorado." When the matter was taken before Justice of the Peace Webster the defendants appeared specially and moved to dismiss the case, for the reason that the court was without jurisdiction because, upon the filing of the application for a change of venue, it was the duty of the justice of the peace before whom the action was brought to immediately transmit the papers to the next nearest justice, and Webster, not being the next nearest justice, failed to acquire jurisdiction. This motion was overruled, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed to the county court, where the same motion was made, and it was again overruled, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. There was no appearance for the defendants either in the justice or county court, except for the purpose of making the motions. The overruling of this motion to dismiss by the county court is the only question before us.

If the defendants believed that the justice of the peace before whom the action was brought was prejudiced against them, they had the right to have the venue changed to the next nearest justice. This, however, is a right which may be waived. The record shows that the case was transferred to Justice of the Peace Webster by consent of the parties. When the venue is changed by an agreement of the parties, the court to which the transfer is made has jurisdiction. In the case of Judah v. Trustees, 23 Ind. 275, we find the following: "The venue was changed from Sullivan to Knox by agreement of parties, and then the appellant specially appeared in the Knox circuit court to object to its jurisdiction, and thereupon moved to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction. The motion was overruled, and this is assigned for error. The agreement entered of record in the Sullivan circuit court gave the Knox circuit court jurisdiction of the person of the appellant, and the law gives it jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit. The point has nothing like either principle or authority to support it." To the same effect, see Center Twp. v. Commissioners, 110 Ind. 579, 10 N. E. 291; Salter v. Salter's Creditors, 69 Ky. 624, and other cases cited in those authorities.

There is no contention that Justice Webster did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and when the defendants agreed that the case might be transferred to Webster they conferred upon him jurisdiction of the person. In relation to this matter appellants say: "This agreement to transfer only left the question of jurisdiction to try the cause by Fletcher open to the defendants' objection, which he promptly interposed." This is too narrow a construction to be placed upon the agreement that "the case is transferred to D. B. Webster." Parties may not in one breath agree to the transfer of a cause, and then in the next say that they only agreed to transfer in order to object to its being transferred, because the court had no power to make the transfer. By the agreement to transfer the case to Justice Webster, defendants conferred upon him jurisdiction of their persons, and there was no error in overruling the motion to dismiss because of the lack of such jurisdiction. The judgment of the county court will therefore be affirmed. Affirmed.

ELGIN JEWELRY CO. v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—DEMURRER—DEMURRER TO PART OF ANSWER.

Separate demurrers to different paragraphs of the same defense may not be taken, and hence, in an action for the price of goods sold, where the defendant pleaded that plaintiff fraudulently procured her signature to a different order from the one she gave and for a larger amount, and that she received other articles than those she ordered, whereupon she returned them to plaintiff, and that plaintiff since then had been and still was in possession thereof, a demurrer to the part alleging the fraud as not constituting a defense to the action and being ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, and another demurrer to the part alleging the return of the articles and that they were still in plaintiff's possession as being ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, were properly overruled.

2. SALES—FRAUD BY SELLER—RESCISSION.

In an action for the price of goods sold an allegation that plaintiff by fraud procured defendant's signature to an order for a larger amount than she supposed, and that, on discovering the fraud, defendant immediately returned the goods to plaintiff, who retained possession of them, would constitute a valid defense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 318.]

3. PARTNERSHIP—ACTION BY PARTNERS—AFFIDAVIT OF PARTNERSHIP—FAILURE TO FILE—EFFECT.

Sess. Laws 1897, pp. 248, 249, c. 65, provides that persons doing business in the state under the name of a company shall file with the clerk of the county of residence of the business and in which it is carried on an affidavit stating the full Christian names and addresses of the partners, in default of which they shall not sue to collect their debts. Held that, in an action for the price of goods sold, an allegation in the answer that plaintiff had failed to file such affidavit and should not have brought the action, was a good defense, and a motion to strike it out was properly denied.

Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; M. S. Bailey, Judge.

Action by the Elgin Jewelry Company, a copartnership, against Mrs. H. Wilson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Jeffrey, for appellant. Joseph H. Maupin, for appellee.

BAILEY, J. The complaint in this action alleges that appellee is indebted to appellant in the sum of $110 upon a written contract for the purchase of goods. After denying the allegations of the complaint, the defendant alleged that she agreed with the agent of plaintiff to purchase goods amounting to $11, but that the agent, then and there intending and contriving to cheat and defraud defendant, falsely represented to her that it was necessary that she sign a printed order for the goods, and that he showed her an order for the goods, amounting to $11, and requested her to sign it, but that he fraudulently and without her knowledge obtained her signature to another order for goods aggregating $110, representing to her, and she believing, that it was the $11 order; that when the goods arrived and she opened the package she discovered that, instead of containing the goods which she had agreed to purchase, it contained other articles, whereupon she returned the goods to the Elgin Jewelry Company, plaintiff; and that said company since that time has been and still is in possession thereof. To this answer plaintiff filed two demurrers—the first to that part of the defense alleging the fraud, because the facts therein alleged constituted no defense to the action, and because it was ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain; the second to that part of the answer alleging the discovery of the fraud and the return of the goods, and that they were still in the possession of the company, for the reason that that portion of the defense was ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, because it failed to show how it was a defense to the complaint. These demurrers were overruled by the court, and its action is assigned as error.

It will be borne in mind that these demurrers were not separate grounds of demurrer to the same defense, but were separate demurrers to different paragraphs of the same defense. This may not be done. The demurrer must go to the entire defense, and not to any segregated portion. The plaintiff may not pick out a sentence or a single allegation of an answer and demur to it because it is insufficient to constitute a defense, or because it is ambiguous or uncertain; but the answer must be taken as an entirety. This question was before this court in Herfort v. Cramer, 7 Colo. 483, 4 Pac. 896, and it was there said: "We observe, in the first place, that, whatever defects may exist in the portion of the answer under consideration, the demurrer is still more defective. The attempt thus made to separate the averments descriptive of the fraud practiced upon the defendant into two distinct offenses seems to be wholly without pretext. This portion of the answer does not purport to state two grounds of defense, but the single ground that the defendant was induced to enter into the contract of purchase through fraud, and that he has been injured thereby in the sum stated." Again in the same case it is said: "The connected structure of a pleading cannot thus be destroyed or disjoined at the pleasure of a pleader, and its disconnected averments separately demurred to. Such a practice is not to be tolerated." See, also, Cochrane v. Parker, 5 Colo. App. 527, 39 Pac. 361. Taking the entire defense as alleged in this answer, it would seem to be sufficient, if true. If the agent showed the defendant a written order for $11 worth of goods, which she consented to purchase, and signed the order for the purpose of procuring the goods, and then, by some subterfuge, chicanery, or fraud procured her signature to another order, which called for $110 worth of goods, and upon receipt of the goods and the discovery of the fraud she immediately returned them to the principal and the principal retained possession of them, this would seem to constitute a valid defense to an action upon the contract for the purchase price of the goods.

The defendant also alleged by way of defense that the plaintiffs had failed to file in the office of the clerk and recorder an affidavit of copartnership as required by statute. Motion was made to strike this allegation from the answer, and it is said that the court erred in overruling the motion. The answer alleges that the plaintiff ought not to have prosecuted this action against defendant, because the said T. O. Loveland and J. L. Records on or about the 9th day of February, 1902 (which was the time alleged as the date of the order), were doing business in the county of Fremont, state of Colorado, under the name of the Elgin Jewelry Company, as partners and associates; that they did not file for record with the clerk and recorder of said Fremont county, in which they were carrying on their said business, an affidavit, as the law requires, setting forth their full Christian names and addresses. The statute provides that persons doing business in this state as partners under any other name than the personal name or names of the members shall file for record with the county clerk of the county in which the business or trade is carried on an affidavit setting forth the full Christian and sur names and addresses of parties who are represented; that in default of filing for record such affidavits such parties shall not be permitted to prosecute any suits for the collection of their debts until such affidavits shall be filed. Sess. Laws 1897, pp. 248, 249, c. 65.

The allegation in the answer appears to show the failure on the part of plaintiffs to comply with the requirements of this statute, and, if the facts were as stated in the answer, the plaintiffs could not prosecute the action until they had complied with the statute. Consequently there was no error in overruling the motion.

No exception was taken to the instructions given by the court to the jury, and it rendered a verdict for the defendant. It is contended that the verdict was not supported by the evidence. We have examined the testimony, and find that there is sufficient legal evidence in the record to support the verdict. That being true, it should not be disturbed.

Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

4. APPEAL — REVIEW—INSUFFICIENT SPECIFICATION OF ERROR.

Under Supreme Court rule 11 (66 Pac. viii), requiring errors to be particularly specified, etc., a specification that the trial court erred in rendering final judgment and in the findings contained in the judgment is too general to authorize a review of the findings and judgment for any purpose.

Appeal from Pueblo County Court; L. B. Gibson, Judge.

Action by Isadore Leibowitz against M. Goldberger. From a judgment of the county court for plaintiff, on defendant's appeal from a like judgment in justice court, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Arrington, for appellant. C. S. Essex and D. M. Campbell, for appellee.

BAILEY, J. In September, 1902, appellant brought an action in a justice court of Pueblo county against the appellee and caused a writ of attachment to be issued and certain bundles of merchandise to be levied upon. No service was had upon the defendant in that action. The constable who levied upon the goods placed the same in the hands of the plaintiff for safe-keeping. The plaintiff then caused the suit to be dismissed and converted the goods to his own use. Defendant in that action, appellee here, then instituted this action in the justice court. Judgment was obtained in that court against the defendant therein, and an appeal was taken to the county court. It was stipulated in that court that the defendant was guilty of the conversion of the goods and that their value was $153.38; that, if the defendant should be entitled to interpose his counterclaim as a set-off, the amount thereof should be $99.38. The county court disallowed the counterclaim, and error is assigned because of its action.

The counterclaim was the basis of the suit which the appellant had brought against the appellee in which the writ of attachment was issued, and the amount was due plaintiff in that suit on account of the purchase price of a portion of the goods upon which the writ of attachment was levied. Code Civ. Proc. § 57, provides that: "A counterclaim may consist of a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint or answer as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim or defendant's defense or connected with the subject of the action." "If a transaction is set forth as the foundation of the plaintiff's demand, the counterclaim must arise out of that transaction." Pomeroy's Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 742. Here the transaction was the unlawful conversion of the goods, and the counterclaim, to be a valid set-off, must grow out of that. An antecedent debt cannot be set off against the damages arising from the tort. Schaefer v. Empire L. Co. (Sup.) 51 N. Y. Supp. 104; Reaner v. Morrison Express Co., 93 Mo. App. 501, 67 S. W. 718; 6 Current Law, 1444; Hanson v. Byrnes, 96 Minn. 50, 104 N. W. 762. And herein is the case of Warren v. Hall, 20 Colo. 508, 38 Pac. 767, cited by appellant, distinguished. There the counterclaim grew out of the same transaction alleged in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's cause of action. It appears to be fundamental that a demand founded on contract cannot be a set-off to damages proved in an action for the conversion of personal property. Waterman on Set-Off, § 138;

Moore v. Davis, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 144; Lane et al. v. Bailey, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 395; Donahue v. Henry, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 102. This action having been brought in a justice court, section 2644, Mills' Ann. St., which provides that all claims which either party has against the other of such a nature as to be consolidated into one action or defense must be brought forward, should be considered. This statute does not change the rule that a cause of action arising upon contract cannot be set off against an action of trespass de bonis or trover. Gunnerson v. Erickson, 69 Ill. App. 159, and cases there cited. In that case the Illinois statute covering proceedings in a justice court, from which ours was taken, was considered, and it was therein determined that "a claim arising from contract cannot be set off against an action for conversion of goods." So it is apparent that the court committed no error in disallowing the counterclaim of appellant.

The only other error that appellant assigns is in the following words, namely: There "is manifest error in the following particular, to wit: * * * Second, the rendition of final judgment in said cause and in the findings contained in said judgment." In the stipulation hereinbefore alluded to it was agreed that if the court "shall find that in the commission of the conversion complained of defendant was guilty of either malice or willful deceit, or that the same was willful and attended by circumstances of fraud or malice, or wanton or reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights, then in either of said events the judgment to be entered herein shall be in substance and form the same as rendered by the justice who tried the cause below." The court so found, and rendered the same judgment as had theretofore been rendered by the justice, namely, for the value of the goods, $153.38, and $100 as exemplary damages. Under the assignment of error above quoted, appellant desires that we review the findings and judgment of the court as to the allowance of exemplary damages. This we are unable to do. The specification of error is too general for any purpose. Stating generally that the court erred in the rendition of the judgment or in its findings is not a compliance with rule 11 of this court (66 Pac. viii). Percy C. M. Co. v. Hallam, 22 Colo. 233, 44 Pac. 509; Clear Creek v. Root, 1 Colo. 375; Colo. Central v. Smith, 5 Colo. 160; 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 955, 956.

Perceiving no reversible error assigned in this record, the judgment of the county court will be affirmed.

RIMMER v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question of negligence is for the jury, where the circumstances are such that men of ordinary intelligence may honestly differ as to the question, and when the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 279-302.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANT — LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Where the servant acts in obedience to an express order of the master, the master cannot escape liability for the consequences of the servant's acts, on the ground that they are outside the duty for which he was employed.

3. EVIDENCE — OPINIONS — QUALIFICATION OF WITNESS.

One shows himself qualified to testify to the value of a horse, which he knew; he testifying that he had lived in the place 10 years, that he had bought and sold horses, driving horses and single horses, and had seen them bought and sold in that place, and knew what they were bought and sold for, and that he almost constantly "dickered around horses" there, and knew the usual and fair market value of horses in that vicinity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2358.]

4. SAME — DETERMINATION OF QUESTION.

The sustaining or overruling of objections to testimony as to the value of property which is in almost universal use, when such objections are based on the qualification of the witnesses to answer the question, is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

5. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

There being competent testimony to show value, and no testimony placing it less than found, any error in receiving testimony of such value from persons not qualified was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161-4170.]

6. BAILMENT — DELIVERY — EVIDENCE.

That defendant, a farrier, was in the absolute control of plaintiff's horse, when it ran away after its harness had been unhitched from the buggy by defendant's servant, rather than that plaintiff's driver was in equal control with him, may be found from the testimony of such driver that she handed the reins to such servant when she got out of the buggy, and, aside from instructing him as to the character of shoes to be placed on the horse, gave no further instructions.

7. SAME — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Testimony of the servant of defendant, to whom plaintiff's driver turned over his horse to be shod, that after he had unhitched the harness from the buggy he spoke to the horse to "get up," and that it started on a jump and ran away, and that he did not have hold of the lines, halter, or strap, authorizes a finding that such driver did not have an opportunity to caution such servant in time to prevent the accident; she having no means of knowing he would attempt to drive it from the thills without having some means of controlling it.

8. APPEAL — OBJECTION AND EXCEPTION.

Complaint may not be made of a statement of the court to the jury; objection not having been made or exception saved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 1251.]

9. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICABILITY OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction, in an action for negligence, as to the things required to be found to authorize recovery, properly omits the element of contributory negligence; there being no evidence thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 596-612.]

10. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS.

There being practically no conflict in the testimony, judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed because of the use of the word "fair" in the court's instruction that plaintiff must prove defendant's negligence by the "fair preponderance" of the evidence, even if this requires a less degree of proof than would the word "preponderance" alone.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4219-4228.]

Appeal from El Paso County Court; James A. Orr, Judge.

Action by R. L. Wilson against Thomas Rimmer. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Sheafor, for appellant. R. L. Chambers, for appellee.

BAILEY, J. This action was brought by appellee against the appellant in the justice court to recover the value of a horse, which plaintiff claimed had lost its life through the negligence of the defendant. The case was tried in the justice court, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff, from which an appeal was taken to the county court, where the case was retried, a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment entered upon this verdict for $175.

The defendant was a blacksmith at Colorado Springs. The horse was taken by Catherine McGuire, the sister-in-law of plaintiff, to the shop of defendant for the purpose of having it shod; and defendant instructed his employé, Lalonde, to unhitch the horse and take it into the shop. Lalonde unfastened the harness from the buggy, and, without having possession of the lines or in any other manner placing himself in a position to control the horse, clucked at him to move forward. The horse passed out of the thills, ran away, met with an accident, and was injured to such an extent that he afterwards died. Some of the witnesses testified that he walked from the buggy for a short distance, then commenced to trot, and when some person attempted to stop him began to run. Others testified that, immediately upon being clucked to, the horse started with a jump and ran away. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved the court for a nonsuit, which motion was overruled. The action of the court in overruling the motion is assigned as error.

It is contended that the evidence failed to show any negligence on the part of Lalonde, and that whatever negligence there was was the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's agent, Miss McGuire. When Lalonde came from the shop, the custody of the horse was surrendered to him by Miss McGuire, and he was in a position to assume absolute control of it. In any event, where there is any proof of the negligence of a defendant, the question is one to be submitted to the jury. Where the circumstances are such that men of ordinary intelligence may honestly differ as to the question of negligence, it must be left to the jury; and it is always a question to be determined by that body when the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care. Miller v. U. P. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 12 Fed. 600; City of Denver v. Dunsmore, 7 Colo. 328, 3 Pac. 705; Colo. Central R. R. Co. v. Martin, 7 Colo. 592, 4 Pac. 1118; Colo. Mid. Ry. Co. v. O'Brien, 16 Colo. 219, 27 Pac. 701. It is also contended that, inasmuch as the duty of the employé, Lalonde, was the shoeing of horses, in unhitching this horse he was performing services outside of that duty, and the master was not responsible; but in this case the master instructed Lalonde to unhitch the horse and take it into the shop. In such cases, where the servant acts in obedience to an express order given by the master, the master is liable for all the consequences of the servant's acts. Sagers v. Nuckolls, 3 Colo. App. 95, 32 Pac. 187.

The next error discussed by appellant is that the court erred in admitting testimony of certain witnesses as to the value of the horse, contending that the witnesses were not properly qualified. The witness Gallagher said that he had lived in Colorado Springs for 10 years; that he had bought and sold horses, driving horses and single horses, and had seen horses bought and sold in that place, and knew what they were bought and sold for; knew what he paid, and that he almost constantly "dickered around horses" in Colorado Springs, and knew the usual and fair market value of horses in that vicinity; that he knew the horse in question, and that it was worth $200. Under any rule this witness was properly qualified to testify as to the value of the horse. Some of the other witnesses were not so well qualified; but those who were not placed the value of the horse at from $175 to $200, and the jury took the least value that was placed upon it. The defendant offered no proof whatsoever as to the value of this animal. The sustaining or overruling of objections to testimony of witnesses as to the value of property which is in almost universal use, when such objections are based upon the qualification of the witnesses to answer the question, is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court. Lundberg v. Mackenheuser, 4 Ill. App. 603; Ohio & Miss. R. R. Co. v. Irvin, 27 Ill. 178; Ohio & M. R. R. Co. v. Taylor, 27 Ill. 207. There being competent testimony to show that the value of the horse was in excess of the amount found by the jury, and there being no testimony placing the value at a less sum, the defendant could not have been prejudiced by any possible error that the court might have committed in receiving testimony as to such value from those who may not have been thoroughly qualified to answer.

The defendant contends that in rendering the verdict the jury absolutely ignored the instructions of the court, and that the verdict should have been set aside on account thereof. The third instruction was that if the jury found that the horse was not in the exclusive possession or under the control of the defendant, or that the agent of the plaintiff at the time of the accident was in equal control with the defendant in the charge and custody of the horse in question, they should find in favor of the defendant. The fourth instruction is to the effect that, if the plaintiff through his agent was present and witnessed any acts of negligence or misconduct on the part of defendant's agent in unhitching or handling the horse, it was the duty of the agent of plaintiff to speak to and make known to the defendant any omission on his part, and if the agent witnessed omissions or misconduct on the part of the defendant, and did not speak or make known to the defendant such omissions, if she had an opportunity to speak, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. These are the two instructions which it is contended the jury failed to observe. The witness, Miss McGuire, testified that she handed the lines to the employé when she got out of the buggy, and, aside from instructing him as to the character of shoes to be placed on the horse, she gave no further instructions or directions. The jury had a right to believe that the employé was in the absolute control of this horse at the time. The employé testified that he spoke to the horse to "get up," and that it started on a jump; that he did not have hold of the lines, halter, or strap. If the jury believed this testimony, it would have had the right to have assumed that Miss McGuire did not have an opportunity to caution the employé in time to prevent the accident, because she had no means of knowing that he would attempt to drive the horse from the thills without having some means of controlling him. Upon the examination of the testimony it seems that, so far as these two matters are concerned, the verdict of the jury was justified.

Complaint is made of the following statement made by the court to the jury: "This is an action brought by R. L. Wilson, the plaintiff, against Thomas Rimmer, the defendant, to recover an amount alleged to be due the plaintiff by the defendant for injuries resulting to a horse, the property of plaintiff, and said injuries resulting from the negligence of the defendant. The defendant resists the claim and demand of the plaintiff, and denies that he is indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever, and denies that he was in any way negligent in handling the property of the plaintiff." We fail to see anything in this statement which could mislead the jury; but, if there was, the defendant is in no position to urge a reversal because of it. It does not appear that he made any objection to the statement made by the court, or saved any exception to it.

The first instruction to the jury was that, in order for the plaintiff to recover in the action, he must prove by a preponderance of the evidence in the case, first, that the property of the plaintiff was intrusted to the defendant; second, that while in the care and custody of the defendant the property of the plaintiff was injured from the negligence of the defendant; third, if injury was sustained, the amount of the damage sustained by the plaintiff. It is contended that this instruction was erroneous, because it omits the element of contributory negligence. As we read the record, there was no evidence of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff; and hence that matter could have no proper place in the instruction.

In the sixth instruction the court informed the jury that, in order to recover, the plaintiff must establish by a fair preponderance of all the evidence in the case that the defendant was guilty of negligence, etc. The word "fair" was objected to as being a modification of the word "preponderance," and as not warranted by the law. There was practically no conflict in the testimony in this case, and, in the absence of a substantial conflict in the testimony, the judgment should not be reversed solely because the court used the expression "fair preponderance," instead of "preponderance," even though the former expression would require a less degree of proof than the latter, which we do not determine.

Being unable to find any material error in this record, the judgment will be affirmed. Affirmed.

3. SAME.

Nonuser alone, at least short of the period of the statute of limitations, is not sufficient to prove an abandonment; but nonuser continued for a considerable time, coupled with other acts showing an intention on the part of the owner not to repossess himself of the thing whose use he has relinquished, may constitute an abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Abandonment, §§ 3-6.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—ABANDONMENT OF RIGHTS.

In a suit to enjoin the diversion of water by an irrigation ditch, evidence considered, and held sufficient to sustain a finding of an abandonment of a priority decreed to defendant.

5. SAME—APPROPRIATION—ADJUDICATION OF PRIORITIES—RES ADJUDICATA.

A statutory decree establishing priorities to the use of water for irrigation is res adjudicata as to the volume of water awarded to a particular ditch, and cannot be attacked collaterally.

6. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF RIGHTS.

A statutory decree establishing priorities to the use of water for irrigation confers no new rights, but is merely evidence of pre-existing rights, which may be lost by subsequent abandonment.

7. SAME—ACTIONS TO PROTECT RIGHTS—EVIDENCE.

Though evidence of nonuser and similar acts before a decree establishing priorities to the use of water by the owner of an irrigation ditch is improper for the purpose of proving his right to use a less volume of water than that decreed to him, as well as for the purpose of showing the element of nonuser in a subsequent abandonment relied on by another appropriator suing for diversion of the water, but where there is sufficient legal evidence as to the element of nonuser subsequent to the decree, evidence of nonuser and similar acts by such owner before the decree, for the purpose of showing his intent in not using what was awarded to him, is proper and not prejudicial.

8. SAME—INJUNCTION—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE.

Where a senior seeks to enjoin a junior appropriator of water from diverting the same by an irrigation ditch, and defendant seeks to avoid the same on the ground that if the diversion is restrained the plaintiff will derive no benefit, such defense must be established by clear and satisfactory evidence.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

Where the evidence is legally sufficient to uphold a finding by the trial court, the appellate court cannot disturb it.

Appeal from District Court, Conejos County; Charles C. Holbrook, Judge.

Action by Piadad Nelson and others against the Alamosa Creek Canal Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appealed. Affirmed.

Jesse Stephenson, for appellants. Ira J. Bloomfield, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. This action was brought by plaintiffs, appropriators of water from the Alamosa river, a natural stream in water district No. 21 of this state, against defendants, appropriators from the same stream, to restrain the latter from diverting and using the waters thereof to the injury of plaintiffs, who are alleged to have the better right thereto. In 1888 a statutory decree was entered in the proper district court whereby the relative priorities of right to the use of water for irrigation between the various ditches and canals in this district were determined, including the rights of the parties here. The complaint alleged that defendants had wrongfully diverted the waters of the river, and threatened to continue the same, by means of the Molino ditch, to which ditch had been adjudicated priority No. 3 for 6.93 cubic feet of water per second of time to date from May 1, 1869, and that each and all of the priorities of plaintiffs were, under the decree, inferior and junior to the adjudicated priority of the Molino ditch. Though there was awarded to the Molino ditch the priority mentioned, nevertheless its capacity was never such as to carry the quantity given, and that it has never been used to irrigate more than about 12½ acres of land. That in their statement the then owners of that ditch, preliminary to their obtaining a decree, claimed only 3 cubic feet of water per second of time to irrigate 50 acres of land. That only .93 cubic feet of water per second of time has ever been used in irrigating the lands lying under the ditch by the owners thereof until shortly before the beginning of this action. The complaint then charges that all of the water decreed to the Molino ditch, except .93 cubic feet per second of time, has been by the owners of the ditch abandoned since the decree was entered, and the same has been hitherto appropriated and ever since continuously used and enjoyed by plaintiffs and other appropriators of water from the same stream until a short time before the bringing of this action, when such use was interfered with by defendants. In the answer defendants denied the abandonment, and claimed a superior right to plaintiffs, and as a second and affirmative defense alleged that the headgate of the Molino ditch was several miles higher up the stream than the nearest headgate of any of the plaintiffs' ditches, and that between such nearest headgate and the headgate of the Molino ditch were a number of ditches through which had been made appropriations of water senior to plaintiffs and junior to the Molino ditch, which were entitled to divert such water before the ditches of plaintiffs were supplied, and that if a quantity of water equal to the entire volume which had been decreed to the Molino ditch was not turned into its headgate, but allowed to run down the stream, the bed of the stream between that point and such nearest headgate was of such a nature and character of soil that none of it would reach the headgates of any of plaintiffs' ditches. Upon these affirmative matters being traversed by the replication, the issues thus raised were tried to the court without a jury, and the court made specific findings of fact in favor of plaintiffs and granted the injunction prayed for. Defendants appeal.

1. The burden of proof was upon plaintiffs to prove the abandonment alleged. Abandonment is made up of two elements, act and intention. Nonuser alone, at least short of the period of the statute of limitations, is not sufficient to prove an abandonment, but nonuser continued for a considerable length of time, coupled with other acts of a character tending to show an intention on the part of the owner not to resume, or repossess himself of the thing whose use he relinquished, may constitute an abandonment. The evidence in this case was conflicting, but we think it sustained the finding by the court of an abandonment.

The defendants say that it was error for the court to admit in evidence a copy of the statement of claim which the owners of the Molino ditch filed in the district court, as they were required to do under the statutes in order to obtain a decree of priority, and to hear evidence as to the carrying capacity of the ditch, and the quantity actually diverted and applied to a beneficial use before the decree was entered. This upon the ground that the decree is a verity, and that the volume of water thereby decreed is res adjudicata, and if such decree is not, within the statutory time, reviewed, set aside or appealed from, it is binding upon the parties to the proceedings, and cannot thereafter be questioned except on the ground of fraud. Defendants' propositions of law are correct, but they are in error as to their application to the facts of this case. We think the case as made comes squarely within the decision of this court in New Mercer Ditch Co. v. Armstrong, 21 Colo. 357, 40 Pac. 989, and is not opposed to anything decided in P. V. I. Co. v. Central Trust Co., 32 Colo. 102, 75 Pac. 391. In a late case decided at this term, O'Brien v. King, 92 Pac. 945, a similar objection, under a different state of facts, was considered. It was there held, in accordance with several of our previous rulings, that a statutory decree establishing priorities is res judicata as to volume, and cannot be collaterally attacked. In that case the complaint was framed upon two grounds: (1) That the appropriation had never been perfected to a greater extent than sufficient to irrigate two acres of land—a less quantity than the decree awarded; (2) an abandonment of the appropriation subsequent to the decree.

To sustain the first ground the plaintiff, who attacked the decreed appropriation, relied solely on the same kind of evidence as that objected to in the case at bar—that is, evidence of acts and conduct antecedent to the decree—and the court there said its admission was improper because such matters were not open to inquiry in that case, the question of volume being res judicata. Judge Goddard, who wrote that opinion, then proceeded to say that in some cases, evidently referring to the New Mercer and similar cases, which are like the one now before us, the admission of this class of evidence was held not to constitute prejudicial error, since evidence of acts subsequent to the decree was legally sufficient to prove abandonment; but in that (O'Brien) case, since the trial court made its findings of fact upon the issue of subsequent abandonment solely on evidence of what occurred before the decree was rendered, which the judge says was erroneously admitted in support of the first ground of complaint, a decree adjudicating abandonment, based on such findings, was unwarranted. And the learned judge expressly said that the issue of subsequent abandonment was not there considered or properly determined, because the inquiry was not limited to acts subsequent to the decree. This was manifest, he said, because there was no evidence at all before the court of subsequent acts tending to prove that the owner had, subsequent to the decree, failed to use, in whole or in part, this decreed volume, and the only evidence, and that on which the findings concerning abandonment were made, was that of antecedent acts improperly admitted to prove the other cause or ground of complaint.

It, therefore, is clear that the O'Brien Case, a collateral proceeding, was one where the trial court wrongly admitted evidence of acts done before the statutory decree to prove that the owner of the ditch had not appropriated as much water as that decree gave him, and after admitting such evidence, directed to the first cause or ground of complaint, without any evidence at all of any amount of water the claimant had used, or ceased to use, subsequent to the decree, which was necessary to sustain the second cause or ground of complaint, proceeded to apply to this latter ground the evidence of prior acts and conduct, and based its findings on the alleged subsequent abandonment solely on the evidence of the antecedent acts. Very properly it was held that a decree that subsequent abandonment was thus established could not stand. Very different, however, is the case at bar. Here there was evidence that not only for 19 years before the decree, but thereafter and continuously from the time it was made, and down to a short time before this action was begun, the owners of the Molino ditch never used more than 2.85 cubic feet per second of time of the 6.93 cubic feet which the decree gave it; and that plaintiffs, junior appropriators under the decree, and other appropriators from the same stream junior to defendant but senior to plaintiffs, had made their appropriations, and when they could get it—the common source of supply not being sufficient in times of scarcity to satisfy all consumers—used the water remaining in the stream after defendant had used the 2.85 cubic feet. Such subsequent nonuse for 14 years after the decree was accompanied by some circumstances tending to show that defendant did not intend to repossess itself of the excess. Abandonment, as applicable to water rights, consisting of act and intention, was thus supported by direct evidence of acts and conduct limited in time to a period subsequent to the statutory decree.

There can be no question, under the proof, that sufficient was shown to satisfy one of the elements of abandonment—nonuse. The other element, intention, a distinct and necessary ingredient of abandonment, must also be shown. To prove the intention with which the owner ceased to use a part of the volume after the decree was entered, it is competent to show a similar state of facts before its rendition. Certainly evidence thereof cannot be prejudicial. The statutory decree confers no new rights, but, as this court has repeatedly held, embodies in the form of a permanent, binding decree the evidence of pre-existing rights. It does not purport to be a perpetual insurance or guaranty to the owner of a ditch against a total or partial loss of his priority by abandonment. In that way he may lose the rights resulting from an appropriation and evidenced by the decree, just as he may where they have been acquired by purchase and conveyed by deed. If the statutory adjudication had not been made, it would be admitted, we think, that on the issue of abandonment nonuse could be shown, irrespective of time. In neither case would antecedent acts be admissible to prove that the right, alleged to have been abandoned, never existed in whole or in part, for one cannot abandon that which he never possessed or which never was in esse. Ditch Co. v. Ditch Co., 22 Colo. 115, 43 Pac. 540.

But because antecedent nonuse and similar acts by the owner of a part of a decreed priority may not be shown, either for the purpose of proving that he never was entitled to the entire decreed volume, or that, subsequent to the decree, he also omitted to use the volume in whole or in part awarded, it does not necessarily follow that such prior acts do not have a tendency to show an intention not to reclaim the thing the use of which has been discontinued since the decree was entered. On the contrary, nonuse and similar acts, before and after the decree, directly bear on the element of intention of the owner in the failure to use what was awarded him.

Evidence, though incompetent to prove one essential issue or element of a cause of action or defense, should not be excluded if it is competent to establish some other issue. So, here, evidence of the antecedent acts of which defendant complains, though not proper to prove the right of the owner to a less amount of water than that decreed to him, and not proper to show the element of nonuse in a subsequent abandonment, certainly is proper, and not prejudicial, as throwing light on the intention which the appropriator entertained when, for so long a time, he ceased after the decree to make use of a part of his decreed property.

We do not think the doctrine of the New Mercer Case is rightly applied by either party to the present action. It is not authority for the claim inferentially, though not expressly, made by plaintiff, that in a collateral attack the volume awarded by a decree is an open question. Neither can we agree with defendant that in a case like this, on the issue of subsequent abandonment, of which there is direct sufficient legal evidence, the admission of acts antecedent to the decree is necessarily erroneous or prejudicial. We are satisfied that the abandonment alleged in this case has been proved, and that no error prejudicial to defendant has intervened.

We have deemed it advisable, in view of the apparent misconception by counsel of the doctrine announced in the New Mercer Case, to give our views thereon, and to distinguish between this and the O'Brien Case, supra. The views herein expressed are in harmony with the New Mercer Case, Ditch Co. v. Ditch Co., supra, and Water Co. v. Irrigation Co., 24 Colo. 322, 51 Pac. 496, 46 L. R. A. 322.

(2) But defendants say, upon the assumption that the abandonment has been proved, plaintiffs are not entitled to this injunction because the granting of it would be a vain thing, for, as they allege in the affirmative defense of their answer, and as they attempted to prove at the trial, if the abandoned excess of water were not turned into the headgate of the Molino ditch, but was allowed to flow down the stream, none of it would reach the headgates of any of plaintiffs' ditches, and therefore they would not be benefited by an injunction restraining defendants from diverting it. Whether defendants are in a position to invoke such a defense in view of the fact that, as to this excess, they abandoned it and have no right whatever to it after intervening rights of other and junior appropriators have become vested before defendants manifested an intention to reclaim it, we need not decide. Such questions are discussed and passed upon in Clark v. Ashley, 34 Colo. 285, 82 Pac. 588, Lower Latham D. Co. v. Loudon I. C. Co., 27 Colo. 267, 60 Pac. 629, 83 Am. St. Rep. 80, and Platte Valley I. Co. v. Buckers Co., 25 Colo. 77, 53 Pac. 334. Where a senior seeks to enjoin a junior appropriator of water from diverting the same to the injury of the former, and the junior appropriator seeks to avoid the same upon the ground that if the use which he threatens to make of it is restrained the owner of the senior right will derive no benefit, such a defense ought to be established by clear and satisfactory evidence. The infringement of a prior by the owner of a junior right constitutes a legal injury, and, before the junior can justify his acts of interference with the prior right upon the ground stated, a strong showing should be made. Upon this controverted issue of fact which the defendants have set up in their affirmative defense the evidence was conflicting, and the defense was not established to the satisfaction of the trial court. On the contrary, the evidence was legally sufficient to uphold its finding in plaintiffs' favor, and we cannot interfere with it.

Perceiving no prejudicial error, and the findings and decree of the court being sustained by the evidence, the judgment is affirmed.

STEELE, C. J., and GABBERT, J., concur.

GABBERT J. (concurring specially). I concur in the judgment of affirmance; but on the question of abandonment, I do so for the reason that, in my opinion, the testimony bearing on the subject of nonuse of water, and other acts of the claimants through the Molino ditch subsequent to the decree, clearly establishes abandonment on their part, as found by the trial court, without regard to their use of water or capacity of their ditch prior to such decree. For this reason the evidence on the subject of abandonment objected to by appellants could not have been prejudicial, and the question of its competency is therefore immaterial.

Appeal from District Court, Conejos County; Charles C. Holbrook, Judge.

Action by Piadad Nelson and others against Peter Fornwald and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jesse Stephenson, for appellants. Ira J. Bloomfield, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. This is an action by plaintiffs, appellees here, appropriators and users of water for irrigation from the Alamosa river in water district No. 21, in this state, against defendants, appellants, appropriators from the same stream, to restrain the latter from diverting and using water from such stream to the injury of plaintiffs, who, as against defendants, are said to be prior appropriators. The judgment was for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Precisely the same questions of law, and largely the same questions of fact, are involved in this case as in Alamosa Creek Canal Co. v. Nelson, the opinion in which is published in 93 Pac. 1112. Indeed, some of the evidence is exactly the same in both cases. All these questions, we think, were correctly decided by the trial court, and upon the authority of the foregoing decision the judgment is affirmed.

HUGHES v. KERSHOW et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. FIXTURES—WHAT CONSTITUTE.

A lease of city lots provided that all improvements by the lessee should belong to him and might be removed during the last 60 days of the lease, if he had paid all rents and taxes to be paid by him. Held, that a five-story brick building erected on the lots by the lessee remained personal property during the lease; and, on failure to remove it as provided therein, it became a part of the real estate as a fixture.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fixtures, §§ 5, 64, 65.]

2. LIENS—LOSS OF LIEN.

The lien, if any, for money advanced for improvements made on premises by the lessee, is lost by the lessee's loss of the improvements by failure to remove them before the expiration of the lease as provided therein; the lien attaching only to the interest of the lessee.

3. SAME—PRIORITIES.

One who claims a lien on improvements on leased land for money advanced for such improvements cannot claim that the giving of a renewal of the lease without her knowledge invested the lienor with an absolute lien on the improvements free from the limitation to the lessee's interest, since she is presumed to know the date of the expiration of the lease, and is put on inquiry if the lessee fails to remove the improvements before its expiration; and, having failed to enforce her lien during the life of the lease, must be held to have acquiesced in the renewal lease and continue the lien subject thereto.

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD—AUTHORITY OF GUARDIAN.

A guardian of infants as lessor of premises has no power in the absence of express authority from the court, on the expiration of the lease, to agree to a lien on the improvements made by the lessee for advances to the lessee for such improvements.

5. LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—LACHES.

Delay of five years in suing to enforce a lien for money used in erecting improvements on leased premises, and almost five years more in bringing the action to trial without excuse, will defeat the claim.

6. SAME—PLEADING LACHES.

The defense of laches may be interposed in an action in equity to enforce a lien on property without being specially pleaded.

Appeal from District Court, Denver County; Peter L. Palmer, Judge.

Action by Margaret Hughes against Carlton M. Kershow and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jeremiah Kershow died seised of three lots at the corner of Sixteenth and Market streets, Denver. These lots became the property of his minor sons. J. Henry Kershow, as guardian for such minors, in 1882 leased the same to Paul T. Hughes, for a period ending April 23, 1893. By the terms of the lease, "all erections and improvements and repairs made by party of the second part at any time during said term erected upon said premises" were to remain the property of the tenant Hughes. Within the sixty days last preceding the expiration of the time fixed in the lease Hughes was given the privilege of removing such erections, improvements, etc., provided he had then "discharged all rents, taxes, and assessments" payable by him under the contract. The building first erected upon the premises was destroyed by fire in 1886. The insurance money not being sufficient to re-erect the kind of a structure desired, Hughes borrowed from appellant, who was plaintiff below and who was his wife, some $10,000 or $15,000 with which to finish the same. Mrs. Hughes took no notes or other evidences of this indebtedness, nor did she take any written security therefor. She asserts, however, that Hughes gave her a verbal lien upon the building as such security; and she further claims that after she had advanced some $3,000 or $4,000, and when the brickwork was only partly completed, J. Henry Kershow, the guardian, assured her that, if she would continue furnishing the money necessary to complete the building, he would see that she was repaid the same, and that she should have a lien on the improvement for all of the money so furnished. The building, being a brick structure covering the entire three lots and with a foundation capable of supporting five stories, was then completed; plaintiff furnishing the money. The lower part was used for stores. The upper part was finished off for and used as a theater. In December, 1892, four months before the expiration of the lease, owing to the hard times and other causes, Kershow, the guardian, and Hughes, the tenant, arranged for and completed the execution of a new lease extending the term of the tenancy to June 30, 1896, at a higher rental for the ground. Subsequently certain litigation arose between the parties, which was compromised and disposed of early in 1896. Through such compromise and settlement Hughes received a rebate of several thousand dollars upon rents due and $2,000 in cash, and turned the possession of the premises over to his lessors. On the 16th of June, 1898, plaintiff begun the present action for the enforcement of the lien so claimed by her upon the building. The answer of J. H. Kershow, guardian, was filed on March 11, 1899. The cause came on for trial on May 19, 1903, decision being rendered August 17th of the same year. From the decree, which was in favor of defendants, plaintiff prosecuted the present appeal.

Whitford & May, for appellant. Wells & Chiles, for appellees.

HELM, J. (after stating the facts as above). The building erected by Paul T. Hughes upon the three lots at the corner of Sixteenth and Market streets, Denver, leased from the heirs of Jeremiah Kershow, through J. H. Kershow, guardian, is clearly within the class of improvements known in law as "fixtures." This structure, as re-erected after the fire, was of brick, covering the entire three lots, and with a foundation sufficiently strong to support a five story building. The ground floor was divided into storerooms and so used, while the upper portion was finished off for theatrical purposes, and subsequently became known as the "Haymarket Theater." But the parties invested this structure with the character of personality. In the lease it was expressly stipulated that all improvements erected upon the property by the lessee should belong to him, and that he might remove the same during the 60 days last preceding the expiration of the lease, provided he had paid all rents, taxes, and assessments agreed to be discharged by him. Thus by express contract the building mentioned became personal property during the life of the lease. This provision was for the benefit of the lessee; but, to avail himself of such benefit, it was incumbent upon him to remove the building before expiration of the contract. If he failed to do so in accordance with the terms specified, then upon expiration of the contract, by operation of law, the building ceased to be personality. Its character as a fixture attached, and it at once became a part of the real estate. During the existence of the lease mentioned, plaintiff advanced to Hughes the tenant, who was her husband, an aggregate of about $15,000 with which to rebuild or reconstruct the building first placed upon the leased ground and previously destroyed by fire. The loans thus made were not evidenced by writing, but, according to plaintiff's testimony, Hughes, as security therefor, gave her a verbal lien upon his interest so retained in the building. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to consider the sufficiency of a lien thus created; for, assuming that this lien was valid and binding as between the parties, it could only extend to the interest held by Hughes in the property. And, when for any reason this interest legally terminated, plaintiff's lien thereon also terminated. Hence, as above observed, if Hughes allowed the period fixed in the lease to expire without payment of rents, taxes, and assessments and removal of the structure from the lots, as therein provided, the building became a part of the realty; that is to say, the inchoate right or claim of his lessors thereto ripened into complete ownership, and title vested in them. "It is hardly necessary to add that the plaintiffs can claim no better title to the property in controversy than that which was vested in the tenant under whom they claim as mortgagee. When the mortgage was made, the building and machine were fixtures annexed to the realty of the defendant by his tenant, and which the defendant had then the inchoate right to claim as part of the freehold if not seasonably disannexed before the term was ended." Talbot v. Whipple, 14 Allen (Mass.) 177. "Although the tenant possessed the right of removal, he was bound to exercise it if at all before his term expired or within the period limited by his lease, or, at all events, before quitting possession of the real estate upon which the trade fixtures were situated." Mass. Nat. Bk. v. Shinn, 18 App. Div. 282, 46 N. Y. Supp. 329;

Fitzgerald v. Anderson, 81 Wis. 342, 51 N. W. 554; Smith v. Park, 31 Minn. 70, 16 N. W. 490; Free v. Stuart, 39 Neb. 225, 57 N. W. 991. The giving of the new lease a few months before the original lease expired, extending the tenancy period on practically the same terms, did not operate to invest plaintiff with an absolute lien upon the structure, freed from limitation to the interest of Hughes. She says that this action was taken without her knowledge or consent, but she knew or must be presumed to have known the date fixed for expiration of the original lease. When her husband failed to take steps for removal of the building during the last 60 days of such period, she was put upon inquiry which would have disclosed the existence of the new contract; and, if she intended to assert her lien under the expiring lease, she should have taken appropriate steps so to do. Failing to assert her lien within the time fixed by that contract, she must at least be held to have acquiesced in the new lease and consented to the extension, intending to hold her lien subject thereto. She certainly can occupy no stronger position than that her lien continued to cover Hughes' interest under the new lease with the same force and effect it possessed under the former lease.

The conditions here are not analogous to the illustration used by counsel for appellant of two chattel mortgages given at different dates upon the same property. Undoubtedly in such case a release of the senior mortgage would invest the junior mortgagee with a paramount lien, even though a new mortgage were taken for the earlier debt. The lien of plaintiff under consideration being limited to the conditional interest reserved by Hughes in the building in the first lease, the only question arising is whether this lien perished altogether upon expiration of that lease, or whether under all the circumstances we can treat it as attaching to the interest of Hughes under the new lease. But when in 1896, shortly before expiration of the second lease, Hughes surrendered the tenancy and turned the property over to his lessors under an arrangement for distribution of accumulated rents, his title as tenant finally terminated, and all right or interest held by him in the building ceased. The character of the building as personality disappeared. It became a part of the real estate and ownership vested in the landlord. It might, perhaps, be held that, when the interest of Hughes thus ceased, the lien of plaintiff upon that interest also ceased; but, giving plaintiff the benefit of the most favorable view we could possibly adopt, her lien could not have continued beyond June 30th following, the date at which the second lease expired by its own terms. And, when she allowed this period to pass and the possession to be retained by the landlord, without attempting to assert any right or interest claimed under the lien, most assuredly the lien itself became ineffective and nonenforceable. In law she could not sit quietly by for two years, as she did, before taking steps to enforce her lien even had she possessed a right to such enforcement at the expiration of the period fixed by the second lease.

But counsel for appellant invite our attention to the alleged agreement of J. H. Kershaw, guardian for the minor heirs—owners of the lots, to recognize her claim or lien against the building; and they argue that by virtue of this agreement her status and rights as above indicated were in some way modified, so that her lien upon the building was preserved, and she was entitled to enforce the same in the present action. This agreement of the guardian is not clearly established by the evidence. It is denied by him. It is in certain respects, which we will not now enumerate, unreasonable and improbable. The trial court declined to determine the matter, saying that it was not material in view of his conclusion otherwise touching the case. But let us assume that the guardian did give plaintiff the assurances to which she testifies. His agreement that her advancements to Hughes should be returned was a mere verbal promise to answer for the debt of her husband, and was not binding even upon himself. And as guardian he had no power, certainly without express authority from the court, which nowhere appears, to place a lien or incumbrance upon the estate of his wards through such an agreement. His assurance, if he gave such an assurance, can only be regarded as an acquiescence by him in plaintiff's claim of a verbal lien upon the interest of Hughes in the building for moneys advanced by her. The foregoing conclusions require an affirmance of the decree under review, and it is not necessary to consider the additional questions discussed in the briefs and arguments on file.

If the view urged by counsel for appellant were correct, that plaintiff's lien was entirely independent of and unsupported by the second lease, her claim to relief would also be defeated by her laches. The first lease expired according to its own terms in April, 1893. Suit was not instituted by plaintiff until June, 1898, over five years after her cause of action, according to counsel's view, accrued; but this is not all. After instituting the action she did not bring it to trial until May, 1903, nearly five years later. No sufficient excuse, if indeed there could be one, appears in the record for either of these delays. This is an action in equity for the enforcement of a lien against property, and the wise and beneficent doctrine of laches is applicable, even though no such special plea is formally interposed by answer. In support of the foregoing suggestions in relation to plaintiff's laches, viz., that no formal plea thereof was necessary, that the delay in commencing this action should, under counsel's assumption above stated, operate as a bar thereto, and that such unreasonable delay in prosecuting a suit, even though it be commenced in time, might in and of itself bar a recovery in equity, we cite the following authorities: Hagerman v. Bates, 5 Colo. App. 402, 38 Pac. 1100; Hagerman v. Bates, 24 Colo. 80, 49 Pac. 139; Sullivan v. Portland R. R. Co., 94 U. S. 811, 24 L. Ed. 324; Johnston v. Standard Min. Co., 148 U. WITHERBEE et al. v. WALKER.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. BROKERS—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—EFFICIENT CAUSE OF SALE.

A real estate broker, who merely calls the attention of a church officer to a lot he has for sale, telling him the price, is not the efficient and procuring cause of the sale to the church, and so cannot recover commissions therefor; the church refusing to make the purchase through him, never making him an offer, and buying the lot through another agent.

2. SAME.

Where an owner of land openly places it for sale with rival real estate agents, and one of them, the first to make the attempt, makes a sale to a customer to whom the other had unsuccessfully tried to sell it, the latter is not entitled to commission.

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; John I. Mullins, Judge.

Action by Guernsey Walker against Lewis C. Witherbee and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

George K. Andrews, for appellants.

CAMPBELL, J. This action is by a broker to recover commissions for the sale of defendants' real estate. Trial before the jury resulted in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

The court should have granted defendants' motion for nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiff's case, and renewed after defendants produced their evidence. There is some doubt whether, under the evidence, the contract of employment was established. Plaintiff asked and obtained from the owners the price at which they were willing to sell, and it is uncertain whether anything more was done in that direction. In Castner v. Richardson, 18 Colo. 496, 33 Pac. 163, it was said this does not give rise to the relation of principal and agent between the parties. But for the purpose of the opinion it may be assumed that the contract of employment was proved. Let us, then, examine the evidence to see if plaintiff, under the law applicable to this case, earned a fee.

We first state the testimony of plaintiff himself. A church society wanted to buy this kind of property. Plaintiff interviewed an officer of the church, and called his attention to defendants' city lots, and told him the price at which they could be bought. Plaintiff does not say that his offer was accepted, or that a counter offer was made by the proposed purchaser. Plaintiff did not report to the owners this effort, or that he had procured, or was in negotiation with, a purchaser. About 10 days after he listed the property for sale one of the defendants came into his office and asked if the lots were sold, or would be taken by his party, apparently referring to the church. Plaintiff said that the sale was not complete, and the defendant owner replied, in substance, that "they," i. e., the church, had been corresponding with defendants through another agent, and were not dealing fairly by plaintiff, whereupon plaintiff told the owner not to sell to the church, as it was his customer, and he would hold defendants for the commission. Defendant asked plaintiff to buy the lots himself, but plaintiff said he could not. Plaintiff says that he told the owner of the efforts that he had made to make the sale. Two or three days after this conversation plaintiff learned that another broker of defendants had sold the property, through a third person, as trustee, to the church, and, upon defendants' refusal to pay his claim for brokerage fee, this action was brought.

Some of the officers or members of the church were called by plaintiff as his witnesses, and they testified that for some reason the church officers, who had the power to buy, refused to make the purchase of the lots through plaintiff, and never made him any offer for them, and refused to deal with him, but bought through another agent. Plaintiff was not the efficient and procuring cause of the sale, and, on his own showing, was not entitled to a commission. The nonsuit should have been granted when his evidence was in.

When defendants renewed such motion at the close of their case, for another reason, also, should the court have granted it. From the uncontroverted evidence produced by defendants it appears that the sale was actually made by another broker, Mr. Merritt, and that he began negotiations with defendants to secure this property for the church before it was listed for sale by defendants with plaintiff, and, therefore, first called the attention of the church to it. Before, and during, the time of plaintiff's efforts to sell, there were posted upon the lots at least two "For Sale" signs by two different agents, and the property had openly, and without any attempt at concealment, been placed by defendants with a number of different agents before plaintiff's authority to sell was given. Plaintiff was not given a monopoly of the sale of these lots. The sale, as made, was for $100 less than the price quoted to plaintiff.

Throughout the negotiations between the church and the various agents there is not a word of evidence that defendants interfered therewith, or favored one agent as against another. They remained neutral throughout. Merritt was paid his commission by defendants for making the sale before this action was brought. There is nothing tending to impeach the entire good faith of defendants. Under the uncontradicted evidence of both parties, plaintiff did not procure a purchaser, able, willing, and ready to buy at the price for which he might sell. Indeed his party absolutely refused to buy through, or deal with, him, and for such refusal defendants are not to blame. We do not say that the officers of the church were guilty of the improper conduct which plaintiff charges against them; but, if they were, defendants are not, in any way, connected therewith. In two respects there was a failure of proof: First, plaintiff was not the efficient and procuring cause of the sale; second, the case is also one where the owners of property openly placed it for sale with rival real estate agents, and one of them, the first to make the attempt, made a sale to a customer to whom the other had unsuccessfully tried to sell the same property. The owner, therefore, was liable for commissions only to the agent who made the sale, and plaintiff, the unsuccessful agent, was not entitled to recover. Carper v. Sweet, 26 Colo. 547, 59 Pac. 45; Scott v. Lloyd, 19 Colo. 401, 35 Pac. 733; Babcock v. Merritt, 1 Colo. App. 84, 27 Pac. 882; Lawrence v. Weir, 3 Colo. App. 401, 33 Pac. 646; Vreeland v. Vetterlein, 33 N. J. Law, 247.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

WILLIAMS v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

WILLS — CONTEST — APPEAL — BONDS — LIABILITY — ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A bond given by a contestant in a will contest on an appeal from an adverse judgment of the county court, conditioned on his performing whatever judgment may be rendered against him, and on his paying all "damages" which the executor has sustained by reason of the appeal, does not authorize a recovery of attorney's fees paid by the executor in successfully resisting the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1818, 1819.]

Error to District Court, City and County of Denver; John I. Mullins, Judge.

Action by Frederick A. Williams, executor of Caroline M. Rice, deceased, against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

F. A. Williams, pro se. Guy Lee R. Stevick, for defendant in error.

CAMPBELL, J. Action on an appeal bond. The plaintiff in error, Williams, is executor of the last will and testament of Caroline M. Rice, deceased. The will was contested in the county court of Arapahoe county by Edward E. Rice and Caroline E. Rice, and there sustained and admitted to probate. The contestants perfected an appeal to the district court, and gave an appeal bond signed by defendant in error as surety, which bond was conditioned that contestants "shall abide, fulfill, and perform whatever judgment may be rendered against them in said district court, and shall pay all damages which the said Frederick A. Williams, * * * executor as aforesaid, may sustain, by reason of such appeal and the delay incident thereto, and shall pay all costs." On trial de novo in the district court the will was again sustained and admitted to probate, whereupon the executor Williams brought this action against defendant in error, surety on the appeal bond, to recover the sum of $500 which he had paid as attorney's fees in the district court on the appeal. The judgment was for defendant, and plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Counsel are agreed that at common law attorney's fees paid in resisting an unsuccessful appeal could not be recovered as damages on the appeal bond. Plaintiff in error admits that, in the absence of a statute or contract so providing, they are not now recoverable in this state, but his contention is that the condition in this bond provides for them. He says that in the highest courts of most of the states of the Union, though not in the federal courts, attorney's fees disbursed in securing the dissolution of a writ of attachment or injunction may be recovered in an action on the bond as a part of the legal damages sustained by the wrongful issuing of the writ when the condition of the bond, on which it was based, provides for the recovery of "damages." This court and our Court of Appeals have so held in actions on injunction bonds (Belmont M. Co. v. Costigan, 21 Colo. 465, 42 Pac. 650; Church v. Baker, 18 Colo. App. 369, 71 Pac. 888), and possibly the same rule would be followed in actions upon attachment bonds. The tendency of the courts is not to extend the meaning of "damages" to include such elements as attorney's fees. The reason usually given for awarding as damages counsel fees incurred for services rendered in dissolving injunctions and writs of attachment is that they are provisional or extraordinary remedies, ancillary to the main purpose of the suit, and, as the granting of the writ secures to the applicant some privilege or right not incident to ordinary remedies, it is but reasonable to hold that "damages," as used in the bond upon which the granting of the writ is conditioned, embraces attorney's fees.

But this reason does not apply to appeal or supersedeas bonds in ordinary civil actions or will contests, and we are not inclined to extend to actions thereon the doctrine pertinent to injunction and attachment bonds, and allow as part of the legal damages attorney's fees which the obligee in the former kind of security has paid in resisting an unsuccessful appeal or writ of error. While this point has not hitherto been expressly ruled in this state, it is in line with the reasoning and intimation of several of the decisions of this court and our Court of Appeals. Tabor v. Clark, 15 Colo. 435, 25 Pac. 181; Joslin v. Teats, 5 Colo. App. 531, 534, 39 Pac. 349; Spencer v. Murphy, 6 Colo. App. 453, 41 Pac. 841. So far as we are advised, only the Supreme Court of Alabama adheres to a different doctrine. While the decisions of that eminent court are entitled to great respect, we think the weight of authority, as well as reason, is in favor of the conclusion which we have reached. The authorities are collated in 2 Cyc. 958, and 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1015.

The determination of the other points raised by plaintiff in error not being necessary to a determination of this writ, they have not been considered. The judgment is affirmed.

KERR v. BURNS et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. COURTS—JURISDICTION—COLORADO DISTRICT COURTS—WATER RIGHTS.

Const. art. 6, § 11, giving the district court jurisdiction of all causes both at law and equity, gives jurisdiction to determine claims to priorities in the appropriation of water from public streams, and that jurisdiction is not affected by the statutes dividing the state into water districts, and providing for the adjudication of priorities in those districts.

2. SAME—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

The district court having had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a suit to award priorities in the appropriation of waters from a stream, a defendant therein is estopped to assert for the first time in a suit brought nine years later that the court in the first suit was without jurisdiction on the ground that the adjudication should, under the statutes, have covered all the priorities in the district, and not merely priorities for water from such stream, where defendant voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court in the first suit, and fully participated in the proceedings, excepted to the findings and decree proposed by the referee, appealed from a judgment approving such decree, which judgment was affirmed, and received water according to the award.

3. JUDGES—DISQUALIFICATION—CONSENT.

Under Mills' Ann. Code, § 429, providing that a judge shall not sit in a case in which he has been an attorney unless by consent of all the parties, a judge who had acted as an attorney for one of the parties was not disqualified where all the parties participated in the suit without objecting to his sitting; such acquiescence being equivalent to affirmative consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Judges, § 233.]

4. VENUE — CHANGE — RIGHT — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

Mills' Ann. Code, § 29, providing for a change of venue when the judge is disqualified to try the action, did not require a change of venue in an action to enjoin parties holding decreed water priorities from taking more than they are entitled to, because the judge was an attorney in the suit in which the priorities were adjudicated.

5. APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

The granting or refusing of changes of venue is discretionary, and a refusal is not reviewable, unless there has been obvious abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3836.]

6. JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

All questions determined by a decree, adjudicating water priorities, affirmed on appeal, are res judicata, for the purpose of a subsequent suit against appellant and another to enjoin them from taking more water than they are entitled to do under one of the priorities.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1251.]

Error to District Court, La Plata County; James L. Russell, Judge.

Suit by Thomas D. Burns and others against Thomas A. Kerr and another. From the decree, defendant Kerr brings error. Affirmed.

In April, 1897, a final decree was entered by the district court of La Plata county in a proceeding for the adjudication of the water rights connected with the waters of Hermosa creek, begun in October, 1893. By this decree priority No. 3 was awarded for 1 cubic foot of water per second to irrigate 35 acres of land, a part of which land belongs to plaintiff in error, who was defendant below, and the remainder to one Mead. By the same decree priority No. 4 for 9 cubic feet of water per second to irrigate 435 acres of land, and priority No. 8 for 2 cubic feet of water per second to irrigate 70 acres of land, were awarded to defendants in error, who were plaintiffs below. To the referee's findings in that proceeding plaintiff in error filed and argued exceptions, and, after final decree was entered thereon, appealed the case to this court, where the decree was affirmed. Hermosa creek is a tributary of the Rio Las Animas river; and the lands in the state of Colorado irrigated by ditches or canals taking water from this river and its tributaries constitute water district No. 30. On the 11th of February, 1902, a complaint was filed in the present action by defendants in error, who were the owners of the water covered by said priorities 4 and 8, with the exception of a small interest belonging to one McNally, against plaintiff in error Kerr and the said Mead. This complaint set forth a portion of the said water decree showing the distribution therein of water to said priorities, the action of the water commissioner in distributing the water according to the decree, the alleged violation of the decree and of the rights of defendants in error by said Kerr and Mead through the diversion and use of more than the one foot of water awarded to priority No. 3; and a permanent injunction against the continuation of such alleged illegal and injurious diversion and use was prayed for. At the date of the institution of the original water adjudication proceeding above mentioned James L. Russell appeared therein as attorney for one William G. Allen, in 1895, and while said water adjudication was pending, said James L. Russell was elected judge of the district court of said district, and as such judge he proceeded with the adjudication, appointing a referee, receiving and approving the referee's report, and entering the said final decree thereon. He also presided at the trial of this cause below.

O. S. Galbreath, for plaintiff in error.
Reese McCloskey, for defendants in error.

HELM, J. (after stating the facts as above). The most important objection presented by the record before us is based upon the assertion of counsel for plaintiff in error that the complaint filed herein fails to state a cause of action. This contention would, if true, of course, nullify the proceedings below, and require a reversal of the judgment entered upon such complaint. The present action is in equity. It is based upon the refusal of plaintiff in error and another to comply with a decree entered in 1897, adjudicating water priorities to appropriators from Hermosa creek in La Plata county; such refusal resulting in injury to defendants in error, whose priorities were adjudicated at the same time, but were junior to that of plaintiff in error. The object of the action is to enjoin the latter and one Mead from using a greater quantity of water than they are entitled to use under said decree. So much of that water decree as covers the rights of the parties hereto is necessarily set forth in the complaint, and, of course, constitutes the basis of the action.

In support of the contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, plaintiff in error insists that said water decree of 1897 is absolutely void, and without any force or effect. This alleged invalidity is made to rest upon the fact that that adjudication only related to priorities for water from Hermosa creek; whereas, so it is contended, the cause should have covered priorities for the entire water district No. 30, of which the lands irrigated from Hermosa creek were only a portion. Counsel urges the view that since the adoption of statutes dividing the state into water districts, and providing for the adjudication of water priorities in those districts, no such proceeding as the one under consideration could take place; that water priorities must be determined for the entire district or not at all, there being no authority for adjudicating the same "piecemeal"; and, therefore, that the court in said Hermosa creek proceeding had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter. We are not now called upon to consider the status or rights of an appropriator from the Las Animas river below the mouth of Hermosa creek, which is a tributary of said stream. No such appropriator is here complaining; and the petition originally filed in that proceeding averred, among other things, that the Animas river below the mouth of Hermosa creek carried a volume of water greatly in excess of the quantity diverted by all appropriators from said river. The interest of plaintiff in error is confined to water taken from Hermosa creek. By article 6, § 11, Const., the district court is given jurisdiction of all causes both at law and in equity. This jurisdiction is amply broad enough to cover the determination of questions relating to priorities in the appropriation of water from the public streams of the state. The statutes referred to by counsel were adopted for the purpose of enabling parties to adjudicate in one proceeding all such priorities throughout a prescribed district covering, so far as possible, a single natural stream with its tributaries. They do not enlarge or limit the constitutional jurisdiction of the district court in this respect. They simply designate that court as the exclusive tribunal for the trial of such proceedings. Broadmoor D. Co. v. Brookside W. & I. Co., 24 Colo. 541, 52 Pac. 792. The district court of La Plata county, therefore, had jurisdiction over the subject-matter involved in the adjudication and decree of 1897. Plaintiff in error was a party to that proceeding. He voluntarily appeared, and, without objection, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. He offered evidence touching his claims to water, and fully participated in the hearings before the referee. He excepted to the findings and decree proposed by the referee, and argued his exceptions before the court. From the judgment of the trial court approving that decree, he appealed to this court, and again presented and argued all matters complained of in the proceeding; and this court, after full and careful consideration, affirmed the decree. Kerr v. Dudley, 26 Colo. 457, 58 Pac. 610. At no time from the beginning to the end of the water proceeding did plaintiff in error suggest the jurisdictional objection now urged. It was only upon the institution of the present action over nine years subsequent to the commencement of said cause that he first attempted to raise this question. Moreover, during the period between the entries of the said decree and the beginning of the present action plaintiff in error accepted the fruits of that adjudication. He received water according to the terms of the award therein made. He received and used water awarded by priority numbered 1, as well as that given under priority numbered 3, which latter priority is specifically involved in the case at bar. And, even if the water decree of 1897 were void, plaintiff in error would be now estopped from repudiating or assailing the same. D. C. I. & W. Co. v. Middaugh, 12 Colo. 436, 21 Pac. 565, 13 Am. St. Rep. 234; Arthur v. Israel, 15 Colo. 152, 25 Pac. 81, 10 L. R. A. 693, 22 Am. St. Rep. 381; Handy Ditch Co. v. South Side Ditch Co., 26 Colo. 336, 58 Pac. 30.

In view of the foregoing conclusion in relation to the decree entered in the water priority adjudication, it is needless to discuss the further claim that said decree was void because the presiding judge was counsel for one of the parties at the inception of that proceeding in 1893. Besides, this objection does not go to jurisdiction over the subject-matter. The statute upon which plaintiff in error relies—Civ. Code (Mills' Ann. Code) § 429—does not disqualify the judge under such circumstances when all parties consent to his acting. All the other parties to that proceeding, as well as plaintiff in error, voluntarily appeared therein, taking active part without objection or protest in this respect. From first to last the action of Judge Russell in presiding over those proceedings was acquiesced in by every one in any manner connected therewith. And such acquiescence must be held equivalent to an affirmative consent. The present objection, therefore, even had it been presented to this court on the appeal from the priority adjudication itself, would have been overruled. Much less is it available in the present controversy. Other reasons there are why this objection cannot now be favorably considered; but the foregoing is decisive.

The only remaining challenge worthy of notice attacks the court's action in overruling the motion of plaintiff in error for a change of venue. This motion also rests upon the fact last above considered, viz., that Judge Russell, who presided in the present cause, likewise presided at the final trial of the Hermosa creek water adjudication, notwithstanding he had appeared as counsel for one of the parties at the institution of that proceeding. Our Civil Code (Mills' Ann. Code, § 29) provides for a change of venue "when from any cause the judge is disqualified to try the action." The "action" there referred to is the action in which the motion for a change of venue is made. There is no claim that Judge Russell was ever attorney in the case at bar for any of the parties thereto. The specific objection urged in this connection is that he was counsel for a party at the inception of another and different proceeding which was terminated by final decree five years before the present cause was instituted. Clearly the judge was not disqualified to try this cause by virtue of the inhibition contained in section 429 of the Code above referred to. He might have granted the motion for a change of venue without error; but the granting or refusing of such motions is discretionary, and, unless there is obvious abuse of discretion, the refusal thereof is not reviewable. Doll v. Stewart, 30 Colo. 327, 70 Pac. 326.

The subject-matter of this action is wholly different from that involved in the earlier proceeding. That was an adjudication of priorities between parties claiming different appropriations from the same natural stream. This is an action in equity to enjoin parties holding a certain decreed priority from taking more water than they are entitled to take under such priority, to the injury of plaintiffs, who claim by virtue of a junior priority given in the same decree. True, it happens that the present action is to maintain rights covered by the decree in the former proceeding. But obviously the issues, the evidence, and the modes of procedure are widely different. And, since that decree is upheld as against the challenge of plaintiff in error in this case, all questions therein determined are for the present purpose res judicata. Had a motion for a change of venue been submitted in the Hermosa creek water adjudication upon the ground now urged, the objection would have been within the statute and the cases cited by counsel might have been pertinent. But in People ex rel. v. District Court, 26 Colo. 226, 56 Pac. 1115, the county judge was entertaining and proceeding to hear an application to set aside the judgment entered by his predecessor two years before, in a case where he had acted as counsel for the losing party at the trial. And in O'Connell v. Gavett, 7 Colo. 41, 1 Pac. 902, the county judge was about to try a case in which he had been counsel for the losing party at a former trial, wherein, on motion, a new trial had previously been allowed. No special intelligence or ability is required to discover the radical difference between the action of those judges in denying motions for a change of venue and the action of the trial judge in denying a similar motion in the case at bar; and, upon careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances, we cannot hold that there was here such an abuse of discretion as requires a reversal of the judgment or decree now under review.

Several other matters are earnestly urged as constituting fatal errors at the trial below; but all of these objections relate either to irregularities which could not have been prejudicial to plaintiff in error, or deal with matters touching the trial of the Hermosa creek water priority adjudication.

These objections are not well taken, and a discussion thereof would not be profitable.

The decree of the court below is accordingly affirmed.

SCOTT SUPPLY & TOOL CO. v. ROBERTS.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—ESTOPPEL TO COMPLAIN OF RULING ON EVIDENCE.

Even if a word as used in a contract was unambiguous, plaintiff cannot avail itself of the objection to evidence of its meaning, having also introduced testimony of the same tenor and effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3591-3610.]

2. SALES — CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION — "PLANT."

Where plaintiff's agent, when taking an order from defendant for an engine with connections, was present at defendant's well, wherein was installed a pump, invented by defendant, and knew that defendant desired to obtain power to utilize the pump in raising water to irrigate his crop, the word "plant," in the provision of the order that payment shall be as soon as "plant" is running in good order, will be held to cover and include the pump as well as the engine; its operation being essential to accomplish the purpose desired.

Error to Weld County Court; Charles E. Southard, Judge.

Action by the Scott Supply & Tool Company against John P. Roberts. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. E. Churchill (Joseph C. Ewing, of counsel), for plaintiff in error. Elbert C. Smith, for defendant in error.

GODDARD, J. The facts upon which this controversy arises are, in brief, as follows: On August 11, 1902, the plaintiff in error sold to defendant in error a certain gasoline engine and appurtenances at and for the agreed price of $575, to be operated in pumping water from a well on defendant's land to irrigate about 60 acres planted in potatoes. Defendant admits the purchase of the engine and appliances upon the terms and conditions set forth in the following written order:

"The Scott Supply & Tool Co., Denver, Colo.:

"Ship to John P. Roberts.

"How ship: F. by U. P. R. R.

"When: At once.

"Terms: Cash, as soon as plant is running in good order.

"One 14-H. P. Charter engine with all the connections including battery and 50 feet of 6-ply O-8 inch rubber belt. Will furnish a man to set it up. Party to pay expenses from Denver. No charge for time of man.

"Price, f. o. b. Denver, $575.

"[Signed] John P. Roberts."

And he claims that the plant referred to in the order was to be put in good running order by the 13th day of August, 1902; that the plant was not put in good running order on the 13th, or at any time; and that on the 20th day of August, 1902, he rescinded said order, and gave plaintiff notice that he would not accept the engine. Plaintiff, on the other hand, insists that it delivered the engine and accessories at the time and fully complied with the terms of the contract. There is a marked conflict in the testimony introduced by the respective parties as to the actual operation of the engine and pump; that of the plaintiff being to the effect that the plant, including the pump, was put in good running order, and successfully operated, that of defendant to the effect that not only the plant, including the pump, was not put in good running order, but that the engine itself was never put in good running order. There was testimony given by disinterested witnesses to support both of defendant's contentions, and upon which the jury, in the exercise of its province to determine the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses, might have based its verdict for defendant; but, since their finding might have been, and probably was, based upon the theory that the word "plant," as used in the written order, included the pump, as well as the engine by which it was to be operated, it becomes necessary to determine what the word "plant" referred to and was intended to cover in the circumstances surrounding the transaction.

Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that the word "plant," as here used, was unambiguous when considered with the actual state of the subject-matter at the time of the execution of the contract of sale, and plainly referred only to the engine itself and attachments, and assigns as error the ruling of the court in admitting testimony offered by the defendant as to the construction that should be placed upon the written contract above mentioned. Whether the court erred in this particular we do not feel called upon to determine, since the plaintiff is not in a position to avail itself of this objection, having on its own behalf introduced testimony of the same tenor and effect. Experts called by defendant were allowed to testify, without objection, to the meaning of the word "plant" when used in connection with an engine and pump, as in this case, and in rebuttal plaintiff in error offered to prove by William Nash, the agent of plaintiff who made the sale, what the term "plant," as used in the order, would imply. The Century Dictionary defines the word "plant" as "the fixtures, machinery, tools, apparatus, appliances, etc., necessary to carry on any trade or mechanical business, or any mechanical operation or process." In Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. D. 647, at page 658, Lindley, L. J., says, that "plant" in its ordinary sense 'includes whatever apparatus is used by a business man in carrying on his business, * * * all goods and chattels fixed or movable, live or dead, which he keeps for permanent employment in his business.'" Reading this contract in the light of these definitions, and the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of its execution, and the object and purpose for which the engine was purchased by defendant, the word "plant," as therein used, was clearly intended to cover the pump, as well as the engine, and that both parties so regarded and understood it. Mr. Nash, the agent of the plaintiff, at the time he procured the order was present at the well of the defendant wherein was installed a pump of which he was the inventor, and knew that the defendant desired to obtain power to utilize this pump in raising water from a well that afforded an abundant supply for the purpose of irrigating his crop of potatoes. It was therefore manifest to him that the defendant desired to purchase, and contracted for, the engine to operate the pump. In such circumstances it was manifestly intended and understood that the word "plant," as used in the contract of purchase, should cover and include the pump, as well as the engine, since its operation was essential to accomplish the purpose desired. And it follows therefore that if the court did err in submitting to the jury a question that was clearly determined by the contract on its face, and their finding was in conformity with such construction, such action, if erroneous, in no way prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff.

Error is also assigned upon the giving and refusing of other instructions which, after careful consideration, we think are untenable. The instructions given by the court fully and fairly announced the law, and embodied, in substance, the instructions asked by the plaintiff which were refused so far as they express the law. In lieu of giving plaintiff's instruction No. 5, the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are further instructed that if the engine furnished * * * was sufficient to operate an ordinary pump of the character and description and purposes of the pump on defendant's premises, but on account of some fault or defect in the pump, unknown to the plaintiff, plaintiff was prevented from putting the pump in good order and operating the said pump, then you will find for the plaintiff." And, further: "That if from the evidence you find that it was the intention of the parties to this suit that the defendant was to pay for the engine when it was put in good running order by the plaintiff, and that it was put in good running order by the plaintiff, then you should find for the plaintiff."

The further error assigned and argued is that the judgment is contrary to the law and the evidence. After carefully examining the record, we are satisfied that the judgment is supported by the evidence and conforms to the law as we have announced it.

The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

AGRICULTURAL DITCH CO. et al. v. ROLLINS.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

MANDAMUS—GROUNDS—PERFORMANCE OF IMPOSSIBLE ACTS.

In mandamus to compel a ditch company to transfer shares of stock to petitioner, and to deliver to him during the irrigation season of a designated year the quantity of water to which such shares entitle the owner, a judgment awarding the writ rendered after the expiration of the irrigation season for the designated year is erroneous, under the rule that courts do not order performance of impossible acts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 48.]

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; Peter L. Palmer, Judge.

Mandamus by Robert P. Rollins against the Agricultural Ditch Company and others to compel respondents to transfer capital stock to relator, and to deliver to him during an irrigation season a quantity of water. From a judgment awarding the peremptory writ, respondents appeal. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. Barnes, for appellants. William Young and C. L. Dickerson, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. The appellee, Robert P. Rollins, as petitioner, sought by writ of mandamus to compel the respondent ditch company and its officers to transfer upon its books four shares of its capital stock, which he had acquired by purchase, and to deliver to him during the irrigation season of 1903 the quantity of water to which these shares of stock in the company entitled their owner. From a judgment awarding the peremptory writ, the respondents appealed.

The alternative writ states that the respondent ditch company is a mutual benefit company organized under the laws of this state solely for the purpose of carrying and delivering to its stockholders water for irrigating their lands, and is in no sense a carrier of water for sale, rent, hire, or profit, otherwise than to its stockholders and at such charges as are necessary, the amount to be ascertained by its officers, to defray the actual expenses necessary or incidental to the keeping up of the ditch. It is alleged that the petitioner tendered to the proper officers of the company such charges for the year 1903 to be paid by him, and demanded of them an immediate delivery of water to irrigate his lands, which then were in need thereof for growing crops; but they refused either to transfer the stock or deliver the water, and the alternative writ commanded them to do so on or before June 2, 1903, or show cause why they should not. To the alternative writ the respondent company and its officers filed an answer, in which they said that this stock which plaintiff purchased was delinquent for various amounts due thereon to the respondent company by the former owner, and that petitioner refused to pay the same, although he knew of such delinquency at the time of his purchase; and respondents say that, until such arrearages are paid, defendant is not entitled to receive water to irrigate his lands during any irrigating season.

The respondents further claim that a writ of mandamus will not be granted to compel a private corporation to transfer stock upon its books, because the petitioner has an adequate remedy for damages against its officers if they wrongfully refuse to make the transfer. As to the question of the remedy, the authorities are in conflict. Butterfly-Terrible Gold Mining Co. v. Brind (Colo.) 91 Pac. 1101. We do not find it necessary to determine that question, or whether the facts set up in the answer to the alternative writ were proved, and, if so, whether they constituted a defense. The trial court found the issues both of law and fact in favor of petitioner, and awarded the peremptory writ. The hearing was had at the close of the year 1903, but final judgment awarding the peremptory writ was not rendered until May, 1904, long after the expiration of the season of irrigation for the year 1903. This judgment was manifestly improper. The object of petitioner was not to secure a decree establishing in him a perpetual water right, but the most that he can claim is that his object was temporary relief to secure a delivery to him of water during the irrigating season of 1903. Courts do not order performance of impossible acts, and the award of a peremptory writ in 1904 to compel the delivery of water during the year 1903 is impossible of fulfillment. That a judgment, such as was entered here, is wrong, has been expressly ruled by this court in Wheeler v. Northern Colo. Irr. Co., 10 Colo. 582, 596, 17 Pac. 487, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603; Townsend v. Fulton, &c., 17 Colo. 142, 29 Pac. 453; Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co., 17 Colo. 146, 28 Pac. 966, 31 Am. St. Rep. 275.

Since the proceeding by petitioner was to obtain relief for a particular year, nothing could be gained by him by a new trial. The judgment, therefore, should be reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the district court to permit petitioner to dismiss his action without prejudice.

Reversed.

CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO. v. PROVOLT et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS—VALIDITY—FUTURE WAGES.

An assignment of wages to be earned in the future is not void as against public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assignments, §§ 19-23.]

2. SAME.

An assignment of wages to be earned in the future is not violative of any provision of the Constitution of the United States, of the state, or of any statute of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assignments, §§ 19-23.]

3. SAME — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for assigned wages, assignee is not required to prove that at the time of notice of assignment wages remained due from defendant to assignor, but, on proof of the amount earned, the presumption of law is that it remained unpaid and payment or other extinguishment is a matter of defense.

4. SAME.

An assignment recited that assignor sold to assignee for the sum of $27.50 any and all his salary, amounting to $75 a month for one year, "or until such time as the sum as written above has been paid," authorized assignor to collect his salary on condition that he turn over to assignee $27.50 on each pay day "until the amount as written above has been paid," and provided that, on failure to do so, his authority to collect should become void, and assignee should collect "until the total amount collected and retained shall amount to $27.50"; that, on assignor's leaving his then employment "at any time before the full amount of $27.50 has been received," then assignee should have authority for 10 years to collect the salary of assignor from any one by whom employed "until the amount collected and retained shall amount to $27.50"; and that it was agreed "that, when the amount due has been paid in full, this contract shall become null and void." Held, that the assignment was simply security for money loaned, and not an absolute assignment of all the wages of assignor for the time stated, notwithstanding it purported to be of "any and all salary"; and hence, in an action for the assigned wages, proof of the amount due from assignor to assignee was essential to recovery against the employer.

5. CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a contract is susceptible of two constructions, the one working an injustice and the other consistent with the rights of both parties, the one which upholds the rights of the parties should be adopted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, §§ 723-735.]

6. ASSIGNMENTS—PARTIAL ASSIGNMENTS—VALIDITY.

A partial assignment of wages not accepted by the employer cannot be enforced against it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Assignments, §§ 59, 121-123.]

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; F. T. Johnson, Judge.

Action by T. S. Provolt and another, co-partners as the Employés' Credit Company, against the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Vaile & Waterman, E. N. Clark, W. W. Field, and Henry McAllister, Jr., for appellant. C. K. Phillips, for appellees.

MAXWELL, J. Appellees were plaintiffs below. They brought suit against appellant to recover wages alleged to be due Corse, Patty, and Palmer, employés of appellant, upon separate assignments made by the parties named to appellees.

The Corse assignment is as follows: "Articles of agreement, made and entered into this 23d day of October, A. D. 1900, by and between Employés' Credit Company, E. J. Cavanaugh, Mang., of Denver, Arapahoe county, Colorado, party of the first part, and F. A. Corse, of Denver, Arapahoe county, Colorado, party of the second part, witnesseth: That said party of the second part hereby sells, assigns, and transfers to said party of the first part for the sum of $27.50, and other good and valuable consideration, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, any and all of his salary, which amounts to $75 per month and becomes due and payable on the 15th day of each and every month, for the period of one year from the date hereof, or until such time as the sum first written above has been paid by or for said party of the second part to said party of the first part. Said party of the first part has made and delivered to said party of the second part written authority to collect the said salary when it shall become due from Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, the conditions of said written authority being that said party of the second part shall turn over to said party of the first part the amount of $27.50 on each and every pay day until the amount first written above has been paid to said party of the first part. On the failure of said party of the second part to turn over to said party of the first part said money as provided, the said authority to collect said salary shall become null and void, and all of the money to be paid to said party of the first part shall become due and payable at once, and the said party of the first part shall collect all of the said salary of the party of the second part from the said employers, and shall apply the same to the liquidation of the obligation due said party of the second part to the said party of the first part, until the total amount collected and retained by said party of the first part shall amount to $27.50, together with an attorney fee of $10 as liquidated damages and to cover the expense to said party of the first part in collecting the said salary or wages. It is further mutually agreed to by and between the parties to this contract that in case the said party of the second part shall at any time before the full amount of $27.50 has been received by said party of the first part, for any reason leave or discontinue in the employ of said present employers, the assignment of the salary or wages of the said party of the second part shall extend and apply to any and all positions hereafter held or occupied by said party of the second part for a period of ten years from and after this date, and the said party of the first part is hereby authorized to collect the salary of said party of the second part from any and all persons by whom said party of the second part may be employed during said ten years, until the amount collected and retained by the party of the first part shall amount to $27.50 and attorney's fees and interest. The said party of the second part hereby instructs his present employers, or any other person, firm, or copartnership, company, corporation, organization, or official by whom he may hereafter be employed, or from whom he may have any money due, to, on presentation of a copy of this contract, duly verified, any time before the expiration of ten years from the date hereof, pay to the order of the said party of the first part, for value received, the amount designated as due in the affidavit, filed with the verified copy of this contract, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum from the date hereof, out of any money his, due as salary, wages, commissions or from any other source, or to become due after notice to said debtor of the existence of this contract. The said party of the second part hereby irrevocably waives all exemptions or other rights he may have by reason of any law of any state in which he is now, or may hereafter be, employed or live, and orders such payment out of the first money to become his due. Said party of the second part further agrees not to collect or attempt to collect, any part of any salary, wages, commissions or other money due him from any employer or other person after a written notice of this contract to said employer or other person until amount due said party of the first part, or his assignees or representative, has been paid in full. It is further mutually agreed by and between the parties to this contract that when the amount due said party of the first part from said party of the second part, as shown by this contract, has been paid in full, this contract shall become null and void, and of no further effect. In witness whereof the said parties to this contract have hereunto set their hands and seals on the day and year first above written. Employés' Credit Co. E. J. Cavanaugh, Mangr. [Seal.] F. A. Corse [Seal.]" The Patty and Palmer assignments are in force and effect, the same as the Corse assignment, except that in the Patty assignment the consideration is stated at $39 and in the Palmer assignment at $26, and the monthly salary at $75 and $50, respectively. The complaint was in three counts alleging three separate assignments. The answer as it finally stood was a general denial. Appellees proved the execution of the assignments by the assignors, that assignors were employes of appellant at the dates of the several assignments, the several amounts due from the appellant to each assignor at the respective dates when assignors quit the service of appellant, as follows: Corse, $42.11; Patty, $27.80; and Palmer, $12—and introduced in evidence, over the objection of appellant, the several assignments. Defendant offered no evidence. The court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellees for $79.62, upon which judgment was rendered, from which is this appeal.

Many errors are assigned and urged by appellant based on rulings on demurrers and motions interposed to the pleadings, the reception and rejection of testimony, the instruction to the jury to find for appellees, and the refusal to instruct as requested by appellant, most of which may be comprehended in this statement found in appellant's brief. "We contend that these contracts and each of them were on their faces illegal, invalid, unenforceable, and void, because in violation of law, the Constitutions of Colorado and of the United States, the statutes of Colorado, and because against public policy; and, further, because the court below erred in refusing to permit examination of witnesses and the introduction of evidence tending and intending to disclose and establish the illegality and invalidity of said alleged contracts." The argument of counsel for appellant in support of this contention is erudite and forceful, and, if time and space permitted, it would be a pleasure to state and review it here. Since the filing of appellant's brief, the Supreme Court of Illinois has ruled the questions discussed by counsel under this head adversely to its contention, and the conclusion arrived at by that court meets with our approval. In Mallin v. Wenham et al., 209 Ill. 252, 70 N. E. 564, 65 L. R. A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 233, from the statement of facts it appears that Mallin had borrowed from Wenham at usurious rates of interest $342 more than he had paid back, and to secure such indebtedness executed and delivered to Wenham the following assignment: "For a valuable consideration to me in hand paid by C. F. Wenham, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I do hereby transfer, assign, and set over to said C. F. Wenham, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, all salary or wages, and claims for salary or wages, due or to become due me from Armour & Co., or from any other person or persons, firm, copartnership, company, corporation, organization, or official by whom I am now or may hereafter become employed, at any time before the expiration of ten years from the date hereof. I do hereby constitute, irrevocably, the said C. F. Wenham, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, my attorney, in my name to take all legal measures which may be proper or necessary for the complete recovery and employment (sic) of the claim hereby assigned and I hereby authorize, empower and direct the said Armour & Co. or any one by whom I may be employed as above, to pay the said demand and claim for wages or salary to the said C. F. Wenham, his executors, administrators or assigns, and hereby authorize and empower him or them to receipt for the same in my name. Chicago, Ill., third day of June, 1898. J. H. Mallin."

Wenham brought suit in the name of Mallin for the use of Wenham against Armour & Co., claiming the wages of Mallin by virtue of the above assignment. Mallin filed his bill in equity, without offering to repay the $342 or any part thereof, and prayed that the assignment be declared null and void, and that Wenham be restrained from enforcing the same. The following questions were presented: (1) Whether an assignment transferring wages to be earned in the future under an existing employment is valid. (2) Is such an assignment against public policy? The court said: "In respect to the first proposition mentioned, the authorities are ample and conclusive to the effect that an assignment of wages to be earned in the future, under an existing employment, is valid. This precise question has frequently been passed upon by the courts of the different states and of England, and, so far as we are advised, the courts of dernier ressort have, without exception, upheld such contracts where they have been for a valuable consideration and untainted with fraud." Our Court of Appeals announced the same conclusion in C. F. & I. Co. v. Kidwell, 20 Colo. App. 8, 12, 76 Pac. 923, where Judge Thomson, writing the opinion of the court, said: "It is well settled that a person in the employ of another may make a valid assignment of wages to be earned during the existence of the employment." We again quote from Mallin v. Wenham, supra: "The second proposition urged by appellant is that the assignment in question is against public policy, and for that reason ought not to be upheld. This question was raised in the case of Edwards v. Peterson, 80 Me. 367, 14 Atl. 936, 6 Am. St. Rep., 207, and the court there held such an assignment did not contravene public policy, and quoted with approval from the case of Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461, in which case it was said: 'It is argued that such contracts are so much against public policy that they ought not to be supported, but we think they are rather beneficial, and enable the poor man to obtain credit when he could not otherwise do it, and that without detriment to the creditors.' * * * Appellant, in this connection, calls attention to the statutes and exemption laws of this state, and insists that the liberal provisions made by the Legislature for the indigent and poorer classes indicate the adoption of a broad and liberal public policy toward the classes named, and that it is the duty of this court to so construe the law that the class and individuals so favored by the statute shall be compelled to accept of its beneficent provisions. Such is not the province of this court. The citizens of the state have a right to contract, and there is no law forbidding one from selling or assigning any property he may have. A person has the same right to assign his wages that he has to mortgage his homestead or to mortgage personal property that is exempt from execution. The statute provides liberal exemptions, of which a person has the right to avail himself if he so desires, but, if he does not, the courts are powerless to help him. The duty of the courts in instances of this kind is well laid down in the case of Carroll v. City of East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 632: 'It is the legislative, and not the judicial power in the state, that must control and give shape to its public policy. That power does not pertain to the courts. They can only observe that policy and apply it to cases as they arise, without changing or obstructing it.' * * * We also indorse the doctrine laid down in Greenhood on Public Policy, pages 116, 117, as follows: "The power of the courts to declare a contract void for being in contravention of sound public policy is a very delicate and undefined power, and, like the power to declare a statute unconstitutional, should be exercised only in cases free from doubt. Before a court should determine a transaction which has been entered into in good faith, stipulating for nothing that is malum in se, to be void as contravening the policy of the state, it should be satisfied that the advantage to accrue to the public for so holding is certain and substantial, not theoretical or problematical. He is the safest magistrate who is more watchful over the rights of the individual than over the convenience of the public, as that is the best government which guards more vigilantly the freedom of the subject than the rights of the state.' * * * We cannot see that there is anything intrinsically vicious in an assignment of wages. The assignor, in such case, simply draws upon his future prospects to supply present needs, which may be of the most urgent and pressing character. There is no law in this state to prevent a poor person from mortgaging or pledging any or every article of property he possesses as security for his debts, and such a privilege may be of great value. On the whole, we see no reason or right for holding the assignment in question here void as against public policy." The reasoning of the above case and the authorities therein cited convince us that there is no warrant in law for holding the assignments here under consideration void as against public policy, nor are they in any respect violative of any provision of the Constitution of the United States or of this state, or any of the statutes of this state. In Brewer v. Griesheimer, 104 Ill. App. 323, the court had under consideration an assignment almost identical in terms with the assignments in the case at bar, and at page 333 it was said: "We have sought in vain for legal ground on which the unearned wages or salary of a workman or employé may be protected against his own assignment, fairly and voluntarily made, for a valuable consideration. The law, when properly invoked, is ample to protect one in his rights, but, if a person has sufficient mental capacity to attend to ordinary business and act rationally in the ordinary affairs of life, the law is impotent to protect him against the consequences of his own deliberate folly."

Appellant further contends that appellees should not have had judgment, for the reason that they failed to prove that at the time of the service upon appellant of notice of the assignments any sums remained due from appellant to the several assignors. Appellees meet this contention by saying that, the answer being a general denial, the issue of payment was not raised thereby, and that payment, being a special defense, should have been pleaded and proved. D. & R. G. R. R. Co. v. Wilson, 4 Colo. App. 355, 36 Pac. 87, was a suit against the railroad company to recover assigned wages. The appellant contended that plaintiff was required to prove that the wages had not been paid or otherwise extinguished. Judge Thomson, writing the opinion, said upon this point: "We cannot assent to this proposition. We think the effect of the assignment was to transfer to the plaintiff wages of the assignors for the time mentioned. Upon proof of the amount earned by each, the presumption of law is that it remained due and unpaid; and payment, set-off, or anything else which might go in reduction or extinguishment of the claims was matter of defense." The foregoing case is decisive of this question, contrary to the contention of appellant. Wabash R. R. Co. v. Papin, 119 Ill. App. 99, is cited in support of appellant's contention. There is nothing in the statement of facts or the opinion of the court in the case cited to indicate the issue presented by the pleadings, and we are not disposed to follow the rule there announced, especially as the same is contrary to the rulings of our Court of Appeals.

It is further contended by appellant that the assignments were made merely as security for money loaned, they were by their terms limited in their operation to the reimbursement of plaintiffs the amount of such loan, and that the assignments were partial. The language of the assignments supports the contention that the assignments were made merely as security for the money loaned. In effect it is that the assignor sold, assigned, and transferred to appellees "for the sum of $27.50" any and all his salary, amounting to $75 per month for the term of one year, "or until such time as the sum as written above, has been paid," authority is given the assignor to collect his monthly salary upon condition that he shall turn over to appellees "the amount of $27.50 on each and every pay day until the amount as written above has been paid," and, upon failure of assignor to turn over to appellee "said money as provided," his authority to collect shall become null and void, and assignee shall collect "until the total amount collected and retained by said party of the first part shall amount to $27.50 together with an attorney fee of $10.00." In the event assignor leaves his present employment "at any time before the full amount of $27.50 has been received by said party of the first part," then the party of the first part has authority for a period of 10 years to collect the salary of assignor from any and all persons by whom he may be employed "until the amount collected and retained by the party of the first part shall amount to $27.50 and attorney's fees and interest." The last clause of the assignment is: "It is further mutually agreed by and between the parties to this contract that when the amount due said party of the first part from said party of the second part, as shown by this contract, has been paid in full this contract shall become null and void, and of no further effect." The language above quoted and italicized clearly indicates that the assignments were executed as security for money loaned, and testimony introduced by appellees was to the same effect. By the express terms of the assignments they became null and void when the amount of the secured debt was paid by the assignors; and it is clear that the indebtedness secured is the consideration expressed in each assignment. The latter proposition is established by the use of the words, "sum as written above" and equivalent expressions, found in the assignments, which expressions could only refer to the consideration stated. This being true, it follows that appellees should have proved the amount due from each assignor, otherwise the judgment rendered afforded appellant no protection against subsequent claims of assignors for any excess there might have been over and above the amounts due appellees from the assignors. The record in this case shows that the Corse assignment was dated October 23, 1900. Notice thereof was served upon appellant May 18, 1901, between which dates seven pay days intervened. If any presumption may be indulged, based upon the terms of the assignment, it is to the effect that payment of the indebtedness secured thereby had been made long prior to the service of the notice, and that the assignment was thereby rendered null and void. There is no evidence in the record as to the amount due from Corse to appellees. The evidence shows that $42.11 was due Corse as wages. The indebtedness secured by the Corse assignment was $27.50. The jury were instructed to return a verdict in an amount which must have included the whole amount due from appellant to Corse.

In Mallin v. Wenham, supra, the court held the assignment a lien upon the wages of the assignor dischargeable by payment. We quote from page 257 of 209 Ill., page 566 of 70 N. E. (65 L. R. A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 233): "The assignment of appellant's wages was simply a lien on the same so long as he remained in the employ of Armour & Co., and until the indebtedness secured thereby was satisfied." Cramer v. Marsh, 5 Colo. App. 302, 38 Pac. 612, was an action by the pledgee of personal property against the sheriff for seizure of the pledged property under a writ of attachment. There was evidence in the case showing that the amount of the indebtedness due appellee upon the assignment relied upon had been fully paid, and the court below was requested to instruct the jury that, if they found from the evidence that at the time of the seizure under the writ the claim secured by the assignment had been paid, then their verdict must be for defendant, otherwise such verdict must be for such amount as would be sufficient to satisfy the unpaid and outstanding portion of the claim. The trial court refused this instruction. The Court of Appeals reversed this action, holding: "When the property is seized by the owner, or by any one who claims in his right, the pledgee may then only recover the value of his interest in the goods." In Stevenson v. Lord, 15 Colo. 131, 133, 25 Pac. 313, it is said: "That the mortgagee is entitled to maintain replevin for the property mortgaged, where it is seized under a prior invalid mortgage, provided any portion of the debt secured by plaintiff's incumbrance remains unpaid." We think the principle announced in the last two cases cited is peculiarly applicable to the facts of the case here under consideration. Our conclusion is that the assignments relied upon in this case were simply liens and security for money loaned, that proof of the amount due from the assignors to appellees was essential to a recovery against appellant, and that the court erred in instructing the jury to find a verdict in favor of appellees, in the absence of such evidence. In arriving at this conclusion, the fact that the assignments purport to be of "any and all salary" of assignors is not lost sight of. Familiar rules applicable to the construction of contracts are that a contract must be construed as a whole, effect being given to all its parts and provisions, when that can be done without working an injustice to either party, and when doubt exists, and the instrument is susceptible of two constructions, the one working an injustice and the other consistent with the rights of both parties, the one which upholds the rights of both parties should be adopted. To hold that the contracts or assignments under consideration are absolute, unconditional, and unqualified sales and assignments of all the wages of assignors for the periods of time therein stated seems to be so unjust and inequitable as to preclude its adoption. The assignments being merely security for loans as we have determined, the amounts of such loans secured by each assignment as expressed therein, being less than the monthly salary or wages of each assignor, likewise expressed in the assignments, it follows that the assignments were partial, and, not having been accepted by the appellant, cannot be enforced against it. Welch v. Mayer, 4 Colo. App. 440, 36 Pac. 613; McMurray v. Marsh, 12 Colo. App. 95, 54 Pac. 852; V. School Co. v. Ponick, 16 Colo. App. 478, 66

Pac. 458; Home Ins. Co. v. Railroad, 19 Colo. 46, 34 Pac. 281.

For the reasons stated, the judgment must be reversed.

2. SAME.

Defendant employed a broker to procure a loan on real estate. The broker procured a blank application for a loan, which defendant filled out. The application stated that defendant held the undisputed title to real estate in fee; that he did not owe any money to mechanics for work done thereon; and that the proposed mortgage was to be a first lien thereon. An agent of the proposed lender notified the broker that the loan was accepted. The proposed lender, on ascertaining that buildings had recently been erected on the property, and that the time for filing liens had not expired, demanded that a bond should be given to protect the lender against liens. Defendant refused to give such bond. He, after the application, had conveyed to a third person an interest in the property. The loan was not made. Held, that the broker was entitled to his commissions.

Appeal from Pueblo County Court; L. B. Gibson, Judge.

Action by C. O. Chipman against Aaron Silberberg. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. Moore Berry, for appellant. J. T. McCorkle, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. Defendant, Silberberg, employed plaintiff, Chipman, to obtain for him a loan of $11,000, and for procuring it agreed to pay as commission $220. The proposed lender of the money was the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, and the printed form of application for the loan was one which that company used. The blanks were filled by Chipman at Silberberg's dictation, and the statements therein made were for the purpose of procuring the loan. Among other promises was one that "searches for liens of all kinds * * * if necessary, and such other papers as are desired by said company are to be furnished by me" (Silberberg). The security which the borrower offered was real estate in the city of Pueblo. The application stated that Silberberg held the undisputed title thereto in fee, and that the proposed mortgage for the loan was to be the first lien thereon, and that Silberberg did not owe any money to mechanics, builders, or others for work done, or materials furnished, upon the property. When the application was received at its eastern office, the company, through its western agent, notified the broker that the loan was accepted, and the broker at once notified Silberberg thereof, and the borrower handed the title papers to the property to the broker, who, in turn, delivered them to the local attorney of the lender for examination. A short time thereafter the western agent of the lender, as the result of a personal examination of the property, ascertained that some buildings had recently been erected on the same, and the statutory time for filing mechanics' liens thereon for labor and materials had not expired, and would not expire for about 60 days, and advised the broker that the company, in such cases, required a bond of indemnity to protect it against liens. When the broker told Silberberg of this fact, the latter said he would not give a bond. The lender insisted that a bond should be given, but Silberberg and his sister, to whom he had deeded an interest in the property after the application for the loan, though they still said they wanted the money, absolutely refused to give a bond. They asserted that the houses and improvements for which liens might be filed had been fully paid for, and that no liens would be filed, and Silberberg offered to furnish written proof thereof, and, if it was not satisfactory to the lender, to leave $1,000 cash in its hands with which to pay any just lien claim that might be presented. But the lender refused the borrower's offers, and declined to make the loan without an indemnity bond. The county court upon this evidence gave judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

On these facts, which are undisputed, the sole question is whether the broker earned his commission. Defendant's contention is that the commission was not earned because the loan was not made, owing to the wrongful insistence by the lender upon a bond of indemnity. His counsel argues that, under the written application, defendant was not obliged to furnish, and the lender could not require, a bond of indemnity against liens of mechanics or materialmen, and that, when he offered to leave on deposit with the lender $1,000 as a security against possible anticipated liens, or to furnish proof that none would be filed, and the lender refused such offer, this absolved him from the payment of commissions to the broker. The law applicable to this case is the same as that which governs the rights of a broker who is employed to sell real estate. When the broker obtains a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy at the price and upon the terms agreed upon, or a lender who is ready, willing, and able to lend the amount desired and upon the terms agreed upon, the broker has earned his commission if he has been the efficient and procuring cause of the sale or loan, even though the same is not completed because of the wrongful conduct of the principal. Squires v. King, 15 Colo. 416, 25 Pac. 26; Millett v. Barth, 18 Colo. 112, 31 Pac. 769; Lawrence v. Weir, 3 Colo. App. 401, 33 Pac. 646; Ross v. Smiley, 18 Colo. App. 204, 70 Pac. 766; Rundle v. Staats, 19 Colo. App. 164, 73 Pac. 1091. Defendant says he rightfully refused to furnish a bond, because his duties are such only as are imposed by the language above quoted from the application, "such other papers as are desired by said company." "Such other papers" he says must be documents of the same kind as the ones specifically mentioned in the same clause—that is, similar to abstracts of title, mortgages, and certificates of absence of tax liens, etc.; and indemnity bonds are not of this description.

The question here involved does not require that the meaning of "such other papers" be determined, for the rights of the parties may be ascertained from other parts of this application. In the application defendant stated that he held the undisputed title in fee simple to the property which he was offering as security for the loan, and that the mortgage which he proposed to give thereon was to be a first lien. By implication, if not by express agreement, defendant thereby represented that he had, for mortgage purposes, a perfect or marketable title to the property to be given as such security. Under the law of this state, mechanics and materialmen are given a certain time after the completion of a building or structure on land within which to file their statements claiming a lien for labor done upon, or materials furnished that went into, their construction. It appears in this case without contradiction that buildings had recently been constructed on the premises, and that at the time of the negotiations between these parties the time for filing liens thereon by laborers and materialmen had not expired. Nothing was said by defendant in his application about these improvements, and the broker did not know of them until the lender's agent notified him after the loan was accepted. If it be material here, we say it was not unreasonable, therefore, indeed it was wholly within his rights, and we think quite in accordance with the custom in similar cases, for the lender to exact as a condition for making the loan a bond of indemnity to secure him against future liens, the time for filing which had not then expired. If liens had been filed and established, they would have been paramount to the lien of the proposed mortgage given and recorded after the labor and materials were furnished. The offer of proof that liens did not exist, and would not be filed, and to leave with the lender $1,000 of the contemplated loan as security, if such proof was not satisfactory, were not, in the circumstances, the equivalent of a bond of indemnity. At least, it was entirely competent for the lender to reject the offer and insist upon the bond for the reasons stated.

For another reason the lender might have rightfully declined to lend the money. Defendant, after his application, conveyed to his sister an interest in the property, and thereafter he could not give a marketable title as security, as she refused to join in the bond.

It clearly appears that plaintiff fully complied with his contract, and he was entitled to the amount of compensation agreed upon. He obtained a lender who was willing, ready, and able to lend the amount of money which the defendant wanted to borrow upon the terms and conditions mutually satisfactory to lender and borrower. In other words, plaintiff brought them together, and their minds met with reference to the loan. The fact that the lender refused to complete it because of a defect in defendant's title, and that defendant refused to furnish the bond, do not deprive plaintiff of his brokerage fee. Indeed, the failure of defendant to obtain the money as a loan was due to his own act, his refusal to give as a security, what he promised to furnish, a marketable title for such purpose. The following authorities are in point, and sustain the conclusions reached: Crasto v. White (Sup.) 3 N. Y. Supp. 682; Folinsbee v. Sawyer (Super. Buff.) 36 N. Y. Supp. 405; Van Orden v. Morris (City Ct. N. Y.) 42 N. Y. Supp. 473; Bruce v. Wolfe, 102 Mo. App. 384, 76 S. W. 723; Ross v. Smiley, 18 Colo. App. 204, 70 Pac. 766; Middleton v. Thompson et al., 163 Pa. 112, 29 Atl. 796; Gauthier v. West, 45 Minn. 192, 47 N. W. 656; Fitzpatrick v. Gilson, 176 Mass. 477, 57 N. E. 1000.

The judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

PEOPLE v. MORRIS. (Cr. 65.) (Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 3, 1907.) Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge. Gertrude Morris was convicted of a crime, and she appeals. Affirmed. Lafayette Gill and K. H. Stahl, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was charged, under section 523 of the Penal Code, with sending a threatening letter with intent to extort money from another. Upon the trial she was convicted as charged, and appeals from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial. No points or authorities are filed by appellant; but counsel in oral argument contends that the verdict should be reversed and a new trial ordered on the sole ground that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The evidence is largely circumstantial, but consists of circumstances all of which tend to prove that defendant wrote the letter upon which the charge is founded. In addition to the circumstantial evidence pointing to her guilt, there is direct evidence to the effect that the letter was in her handwriting. There is nothing in the record which would justify this court in disturbing the verdict. Judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; TAGGART, J.

BOEKEN et al. v. SCHOOL DIST. NO. 49, ALLEN COUNTY. (Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.) Appeal from District Court, Allen County; Oscar Foust, Judge. Action by School District No. 49, Allen County, against Harry Boeken and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Dismissed. Ewing, Gard & Gard, for appellants. Campbell & Goshorn, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The school district sued Boeken, ex-treasurer of the district, and his bondsmen, for $331.82, alleged to be money remaining in his hands as such treasurer belonging to the school district, and which he refused to turn over on demand to his successor in office. Boeken answered, setting up a counterclaim for a small amount, and admitted a balance of indebtedness of $105.29, for which he offered to confess judgment. The case was tried to a jury in the district court of Allen county, and a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for $194.54, and judgment was rendered against the defendants for that sum and costs. The difference between the amount of the judgment and the offer is $89.25, and this is the sum attempted to be put in controversy in this court by the appeal. The error proceeding is not within the jurisdiction of this court. Civ. Code, § 542. The appeal is dismissed.

COURTNEY v. HARKINS. (Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.) Error from District Court, Leavenworth County; J. H. Gilpatrick, Judge. Action by W. H. Courtney against L. J. Harkins. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed. Arthur M. Jackson, for plaintiff in error. A. E. Dempsey, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff sued to recover rent of a farm. The bill of particulars claimed that the rent amounted to $800, and gave defendant credit for payments amounting to $652.19, and asked for judgment for the balance. Defendant answered, and claimed cash payments amounting to $770, and set up a counterclaim of $57.19 for repairs and labor. He asked judgment on his counterclaim for $27.19. The jury returned a verdict for defendant. Plaintiff then moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. This, as well as a motion for a new trial, being denied, judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict, and plaintiff brings error. The contention is that because the jury refused to find any balance due the defendant they discredited the entire counterclaim, and plaintiff insists that this entitled him to judgment in full for his claim. The only authorities cited are cases where there were separate findings. In this case there were no findings, and there was evidence to support the verdict; and, as the judgment has been approved by the trial court, it must be affirmed.

DIXIE DEVELOPMENT CO. v. SMITH et al. (Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.) Error from District Court, Wilson County; L. Stillwell, Judge. Action by John Smith and others against the Dixie Development Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed. P. C. Young, for plaintiff in error. A. H. Ward, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. Action to cancel an oil and gas lease, which stipulated that it should continue as long as oil or gas should be produced in paying quantities by the lessee. The company, which was an assignee of the lease, sank several wells, from four of which considerable oil was at first obtained. After several months the flow of oil greatly diminished, and at the end of 1½ years only one well was in operation, and pumping from that was finally suspended. Then followed this action, in which it was claimed that the lease ought to be canceled because there had been abandonment and forfeiture, and upon conflicting evidence a cancellation was adjudged. From the testimony it then appeared that oil was not being produced in paying quantities and that nothing better could be expected from a continuance of operation under the lease. The wells were in bad condition, and their product had been turned over by the company to an operator under an agreement that he should clean out and put the wells in good condition; but after several months it appeared that the output lacked $800 or more of paying the expense of repair and operation. The fact that the company had incurred a large indebtedness, however, is no ground for cancellation; but there was abundant testimony going to show that the operation of the wells was unprofitable. In fact, the company had stated in an allegation of its answer, which was afterwards stricken out, that oil could not be produced in paying quantities from the wells and that they could not be profitably operated. A good deal of testimony was also introduced, such as the neglect of the wells, the pulling out of tubing, and permitting the appliances to deteriorate and go to destruction, which indicated an intention to desert the wells and abandon the enterprise. We have no hesitation in holding that there is sufficient testimony to sustain the judgment, and it must therefore be affirmed.

HOBBS v. HOBBS. (Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.) Error from District Court, Lyon County; F. A. Meckel, Judge. Action by W. T. Hobbs against Sarah A. Hobbs for divorce. Judgment for defendant for divorce, and from an allowance of alimony, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed. W. A. Randolph, for plaintiff in error. O. S. Samuel and Lambert & Huggins, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Action by W. T. Hobbs to obtain a divorce from Sarah A. Hobbs and an equitable division of the property. She filed a cross-petition asking for a divorce on account of the default of the husband, and this the court granted. W. T. Hobbs was awarded $700 as his share of the accumulated property, the title of which stood in the name of Mrs. Hobbs, and the award was made a lien upon the property. He makes no complaint that a divorce was granted to the wife; but it is insisted that he was not given a fair share of the property. It appears that the property was acquired and preserved largely through her labor and management. While the area of the property is considerable, its location is not desirable, and the rentals derived from it are uncertain and not large. To pay the judgment of $700 awarded to him considerable of the property must be sold, and when the difficulty in finding tenants and the unprofitable character of the property are considered the disparity in the shares allotted may not be great. He has an insurance policy of $2,000, which was assigned to a relative to pay for his maintenance during his life, and he also has a pension from the government. In view of the fact that the divorce was granted because of his wrong, and also of the way in which the property was acquired, and considering, further, the superior opportunities of the trial court to measure the rights of the parties and fairly divide the property, we do not feel justified in disturbing the distribution that was made. Judgment affirmed.

NEPTUNE v. COLLINS. (Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.) Error from District Court, Sedgwick County; Thos. J. Flannelly, Judge. Action by R. L. Collins against John F. Neptune. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed. Stanley & Stanley and Geo. W. Freerks, for plaintiff in error. Wm. E. Keith, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Action to cancel a deed conveying real estate in Wichita, the execution and delivery of which by J. F. Neptune is alleged to have been procured by misrepresentation and fraud. Mathis, assisted by his partner, Tunnel, who were real estate agents, negotiated an exchange of Neptune's property in Wichita for Collins' farm in Oklahoma, and it was agreed that each party should assume the mortgage on the property he received in exchange. In pursuance of the agreement, deeds for the respective properties were executed by both parties and deposited in escrow with Mathis, to be delivered, according to some of the testimony at least, when the abstract of Collins' land was returned from Oklahoma showing no other incumbrance than the one agreed to be assumed by Neptune. The abstract was returned, showing the title as had been represented, and, the required conditions having been performed, the deed was turned over to Collins, and the Collins deed mailed to Neptune. Neptune insists that there was collusion and fraud between Collins and Mathis, which destroyed the validity of the transfer. Although he pleaded the deposit of his deed in escrow, he gave a different version of the conditions upon which it was to be delivered than was related by other witnesses, and he also testified that prior to the delivery of the deed he gave notice to Mathis not to deliver the same. There was some testimony, too, that there was misrepresentation as to the character and value of the Oklahoma property. On the other side, there was contrary testimony as to representations made regarding the property in Oklahoma, and testimony, too, that there was a fair escrow agreement providing that the deeds should be placed with Mathis, who was acting for both parties, and that he should deliver the deeds upon certain conditions, that these conditions had been performed, and that the deeds had been accordingly delivered. The claims of misrepresentation and fraud, the nature of the escrow agreement, the irrevocable character of the deposit of the deeds as an escrow, and whether there had been a compliance with the conditions, were all questions of fact, which were settled by the trial court adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in error; and the decision, being based on sufficient testimony, must be regarded as final. Judgment affirmed.

ELLIS v. ELLIS. (Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 11, 1908.) Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County, Arthur L. Frazer, Judge. Suit by Goldie R. Ellis against Joseph T. Ellis. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and suit dismissed. H. H. Northrup, for appellant. L. E. Crouch, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a suit by the wife for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and personal indignities, rendering life burdensome. From a decree in her favor, dissolving the marriage contract, the defendant appeals. The plaintiff, on cross-examination, contradicted several of her statements made on direct examination, and, when her attention was called to the discrepancy, she admitted that mistakes had been made in the sworn declarations. Her testimony is corroborated in many respects by her foster mother, whose exclamations, by way of emphasis, "So help me God," and "May God be my judge and strike me dead," in the affirmance of her statements, as well as her admission as a witness that she had used vile epithets when talking to the defendant over the telephone, very much discredit her testimony. There is, in the declarations of these witnesses, such a degree of improbability, when considered in connection with the circumstances mentioned, as to lead to the belief that the story which they told at the trial was made up for the occasion and false in most particulars. Without further alluding to the testimony, which is unfit for publication, the decree is reversed, and the suit dismissed.

NATSURHARA et ux. v. CLAPSADDLE et ux. (WITT et ux., Interveners). (Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.) Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge. Action by Cecil Natsumhara and wife against George W. Clapsaddle and wife, in which action L. E. Witt and wife intervened. Judgment for plaintiffs, and Clapsaddle and wife appeal. Affirmed. Charles R.

Crouch, for appellants. James Hart and Jay C. Allen, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appeal in this case presents only a question of fact. We have examined the evidence, and are satisfied with the findings of the trial court. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

DUNBAR and ROOT, JJ., took no part.

STATE v. VON SHULTZ. (Supreme Court of Washington. Dec. 20, 1907.) Appeal from Superior Court, Whatcom County; Jeremiah Neterer, Judge. Prosecution of F. Von Shultz for sodomy. From a judgment of dismissal, the state appeals. Affirmed. Virgil Peringer and George Livesey, for the State. Hardin & Hurlbut, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the state from a judgment of dismissal, after sustaining a demurrer to an information filed under section 7226, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. The demurrer was properly sustained. Wharton, Criminal Law (10th Ed.) 576; Bishop's Criminal Law, § 794; Prindle v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 551, 21 S. W. 360, 37 Am. St. Rep. 833 and authorities cited. Honselman v. People, 168 Ill. 172, 48 N. E. 304, and Kelly v. People, 192 Ill. 119, 61 N. E. 425, 85 Am. St. Rep. 323, cited by the appellant, arose under a different statute and are not in point. Had the defendant been convicted, it might become our duty to further discuss the questions involved; but, inasmuch as the state alone is interested, we feel that its interests will be best subserved by silence. The judgment is affirmed.

STILES v. SIMPSON et al. (Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.) Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge. Action by G. H. Stiles against J. M. Simpson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. J. P. Perkins and Hamblen, Lund & Gilbert, for appellant. Horace Kimball and Belt & Powell, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appellant and respondent J. M. Simpson entered into a contract, in the month of November, 1904, by which appellant, for a stipulated consideration, was admitted to the office of the respondent as a student, with certain duties to perform, and under the terms of which he was to receive certain compensation. It is not necessary to reproduce the long contract here. After remaining in the office for nearly a year under the terms of the contract, the appellant brought this action to obtain relief from an alleged fraud, alleged to have been practiced upon him by respondent by means of false representations by which he (appellant) was induced to enter into the contract. The case was placed in issue by answer and reply, and was tried before a judge without a jury. Upon the conclusion of the testimony, the court announced that he was of the opinion that plaintiff had failed to prove the allegations of his complaint, and had failed to prove or show that defendant was guilty of any fraud, misrepresentation, or overreaching in the matter of the contract and transactions between plaintiff and defendant, or that plaintiff was entitled to any relief whatever. The action was dismissed. From the judgment dismissing the case, this appeal is taken. A careful perusal of all the testimony convinces us that the conclusion by the trial judge was entirely justified.

The appellant was in the prime of life, a man of education and varied experience, and was in reality what might be termed a trading man, and there were no fiduciary relations existing between him and the respondent, and it does not appear that any undue influence whatever was brought to bear upon him to induce him to execute the contract, or, for that matter, that it was an unconscionable contract. About all that can be said was that the venture did not prove as profitable as he had hoped, while, on the other hand, the property which he had sold to respondent had increased in value beyond his calculations. Without any extensive analysis of the testimony, we are satisfied that the appellant signally failed to establish the material allegations of his complaint; and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

(152 Cal. 645)

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES FARMING & MILLING CO. (L. A. 1952.) (Supreme Court of California. Feb. 21, 1908.) In Bank. On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 93 Pac. 869.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. In recording the order denying a rehearing of this cause I desire to protest against the citation of my opinion in City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585 as authority for the affirmance of this judgment. It is true that the opinion of Justice Temple in that case, which was concurred in by a majority of the justices, furnished a precedent for the present decision; but that opinion, it will be seen by reference to page 647 of 124 Cal. and page 604 of 57 Pac., was written for the express purpose of overriding that portion of my opinion commencing on page 639 of 124 Cal. and page 600 of 57 Pac., in which I expressly deny the rights here asserted and upheld. In my opinion the paramount right of Los Angeles to the waters of the Los Angeles river is limited to that part of the present city comprised in the four leagues (about 17,500 acres) constituting the original pueblo, and cannot be asserted for the satisfaction of the wants of the additional 10,400 acres added by the amended act of incorporation, or the territory since added and that may be hereafter added by the joint action of the municipal authorities and the inhabitants of the extensive unincorporated area adjoining the city. But this is what is now decided to be the law: The city of Los Angeles, as it has been enlarged far beyond the limits of the old pueblo and as it may be indefinitely enlarged in the future, has a paramount right over all riparian proprietors above the city to the use of all the water necessary to the supply of its inhabitants. It may annex all the lands between it and the ocean, including a vast area not riparian to the Los Angeles river, and the inhabitants of this annexed territory immediately become invested with the paramount right to the water flowing in the tributaries of the river, whether above or below ground, notwithstanding they have been used for a hundred years by the grantees of Spain and Mexico, and their successors, of lands riparian to the stream. This is, I concede, the logical outcome of the decision of the court in Los Angeles v. Pomeroy; but it is a doctrine which I disclaimed in that case, and for which neither Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, nor Vernon District v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762, is authority.
